In those cases he was constrained to speak of himself, in order to vindicate his authority, and to establish his claims to be heard as an Apostle[3].

But the erroneous Teachers in Phrygia do not appear to have shown any personal hostility to St. Paul.

Perhaps the restoration of his influence in Galatia[4], and the fame of his preaching and miracles at Ephesus, deterred them from such an attempt. Besides, it is not clear that the false Teachers had as yet gained a footing at Colossæ[5].

The honourable mention made by St. Paul of Epaphras[6] may have been designed to support his authority by his own apostolic name, and also to show the concurrence of Epaphras, a Colossian, and a Pastor of Colossæ, in what was now written to the Colossians in this Epistle by St. Paul at Rome, where Epaphras then was[7]. It was as much as to say, I concur in what Epaphras taught, and he concurs in what I now write.

The reference to what the Colossians had learnt of Epaphras seems rather to intimate that St. Paul had been at Colossæ with him, and had seen and heard what he had taught. It is in no way inconsistent with a belief that Epaphras himself, a Colossian, had been converted, as Philemon, a Colossian, was by St. Paul[8]; and that, having been approved by St. Paul, he was left by him at Colossæ in the pastoral charge of that city; and that therefore St. Paul speaks of him as he does in this Epistle to the Colossians[9].

Perhaps also Epaphras had come to Rome in order to report to St. Paul the state of the Colossian Church; and it may have been at his instance that St. Paul wrote this Epistle, in order to avert the dangers which then threatened the Christians there.

Besides, it must be remembered that the last visit which St. Paul had paid to Phrygia[10] was not less than about ten years before he wrote the Epistle to the Colossians. He might therefore well refer to Epaphras in matters concerning their spiritual condition when he wrote.

On the whole, there seems to be nothing of sufficient weight, in the allegations above recited, to invalidate the arguments—if any can be adduced—to make it probable that St. Paul visited and evangelized Colossæ.

But the main support of the opinion that St. Paul was never at Colossæ, is contained in the fourth proposition recited above, which refers to the Apostle's words in ch. ii. 1, "I desire you to know what conflict I have for you and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh."

It may be readily allowed, that the first impression made on the mind at hearing these words is, that the Colossians, whom he was addressing, had never seen the Apostle.

It may also be granted, that if we had no other evidence on this subject but what could be derived from this passage, such a conclusion would seem to be not improbable.

But, on the other hand, it may be affirmed, that, on further consideration, we have much reason to doubt whether such a conclusion is correct.

[1] This he himself states Acts xx. 31. But there was great difference between a speech to friends from Ephesus, and an Epistle to be read publicly in that Church, and in all other Churches.

[10] That mentioned in Acts xviii. 23.

It seems to proceed from an inadequate conception of the character and design of the Epistles of St. Paul.

In reading these Epistles, we are reading divinely-inspired writings, intended not only for the use of the particular Churches to which they were originally addressed, but also to be communicated to other Christian Communities, and to be read publicly in their ears, as lively oracles of God, even to the end of time.

If we bear in mind this their true nature and purpose, we may be disposed to assign a different meaning to those words in the beginning of the second chapter;

They may perhaps be paraphrased thus:—I would that ye, Colossians, to whom I now write this Epistle from my place of captivity at Rome, knew, what great conflict I have for you and for those of Laodicea who have seen me in the flesh, and who will be the first to receive and hear this Epistle from me publicly read in your Churches; and for this purpose I charge you to send it on to Laodicea [1], and to receive another Epistle from them. But I wish you to know also, what conflict I have likewise for others, who have never seen me, and who will also receive and read this Epistle in due course of time, and when they hear and read it, I wish them to know that I have no less conflict for themselves whom I have not seen, than for you and the Laodiceans whom I have seen.

Thus interpreted, this sentence of St. Paul receives a large and comprehensive character of perpetual and universal application, in all ages and in all places, similar to that of the prayer of our Blessed Saviour Himself, "Father, I pray for them whom Thou hast given me .... Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also that shall believe on Me through their word [2]."

This interpretation, as is well known, is not a novel one. It has been already proposed by one of the most intelligent Interpreters of St. Paul, Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus in Syria in the fifth century, in his note on that passage.

It is also corroborated by the following considerations;

(1) At the beginning of the Epistle, St. Paul associates the name of Timothy with his own name, in his address to the Colossians.

Timothy was a young man at that time [3]; and it is not at all probable that he would be thus prominently put forward, unless he had been at Colossæ.

Wherever Timothy is thus named at the commencement of any other of St. Paul's Epistles, it may be shown that Timothy had been at the places to which those Epistles were sent, and that he had been there in company with St. Paul, or soon after him [4].

It is observable also, that Timothy's name is associated with St. Paul's name in a similar manner in the opening of the Epistle to Philemon, who dwelt at Colossæ [5].

(2) Now on reference to the Acts of the Apostles, we find that soon after St. Paul had taken Timothy into his company at Lystra, they visited Phrygia together [6].

Colossæ and Laodicea were cities of Phrygia; and it is probable that they were visited by St. Paul and Timothy at that time.

It has indeed been said, that as Colossæ was not then a very important place, it would hardly have been worth while for St. Paul to spend his time there.

But, it may be observed, that Colossæ is mentioned with Laodicea in the beginning of the second chapter; and if it is argued from that passage, that St. Paul in visiting Phrygia had not visited Colossæ, then, by parity of reason, he had not visited Laodicea. But this is very improbable. For Laodicea was one of the most important cities, not only of Phrygia, but of the whole of Asia Minor [7]. Besides, in his Epistle to the Colossians, he sends salutations to "the brethren at Laodicea, and to Nymphas, and to the church in his house [8]," which seem to intimate personal acquaintance with that city.

It is therefore not unlikely, that in then visiting Phrygia, he not only visited Laodicea, but also its neighbouring city Colossæ.

(3) We see, also, as a fact, that St. Paul thought it worth while to write an Epistle from Rome to Colossæ. Would he not also have thought it worth while, when he was in Phrygia, to visit it?

(4) It is also recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, that St. Paul, about three years after his first visit to Phrygia, made a second visit to that country, and went through the country in order, confirming all the disciples [1].

Hence the probability is increased, that St. Paul had visited and evangelized Laodicea, and also Colossæ, before he wrote this Epistle.

(5) This opinion is corroborated by internal evidence in the Epistle itself.

(1) He speaks of his having been made a minister of God to them [2].

(2) He supposes that they take an affectionate interest in his personal concerns, and sends Tychicus to declare all his state unto them [3].

(3) He supposes them to be acquainted with his friends and fellow-labourers, and to take an interest in their affairs also, and sends them their salutations [4].

(6) This conclusion is confirmed also by the Epistle to Philemon.

Philemon was an inhabitant of Colossæ [5]. He had been converted by St. Paul [6], probably when he had visited that city.

St. Paul speaks of Apphia, generally supposed to be Philemon's wife, and of his house, and of his friend Archippus [7], and of Philemon's slave Onesimus [8]; and he desires Philemon to prepare for him a lodging, for he expected to visit him at Colossæ [9]; thus showing local and personal acquaintance with Colossæ and its inhabitants.

Hence it appears that St. Paul thought Colossæ to be well worth an Apostolic visit. Hence also the probability is enhanced that he had been already there [10].

Probably, in fine, the Apostle's visit to Colossæ, and to the house of Philemon there, and his preaching of the Gospel to them, and his conversion of them to the Christian Faith, and the personal influence he had exercised over them, had made a deep impression on the mind of one of the humblest inmates of that family, and led the fugitive slave, Onesimus, in the hours of his sad and solitary remorse, in the great wilderness of Rome, to repair, in the contrite spirit of the returning prodigal, to the prison-house of St. Paul, and to open his griefs to him, and to seek comfort from the Apostle, and to ask for his friendly intercession with his master, and thus, by the blessing of God, he was received into the Church, and was restored to his master Philemon as a beloved brother in Christ.

[5] This may be shown from the many coincidences between the Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, and particularly by means of the history of Onesimus, who had fled to Rome from Philemon (v. 12), and who is described as "one of you" to the Colossians (iv. 9).

Πρὸς Κολασσαεῖς] So A, B, K, and C in Subscr. ad Matt., Lachmann, Tisch., Meyer, Alf. As to the orthography of the word, see on v. 2.

CH. I. 1. Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ] of Jesus Christ. It is observable that in the beginning of this Epistle—addressed to a Church where the Name of Jesus Christ was disparaged by many, and written in order to vindicate His Dignity—the Apostle repeats the word Christ four times. Chrys.

— Τιμόθεος ὁ ἀδελφός] Timothy our brother. Timothy was with St. Paul when he passed through Phrygia, in which Colossæ was situated. (Acts xvi. 1—6.) Probably he visited Colossæ with the Apostle at that time. If Timothy had not been at Colossæ, it is hardly probable that, being still a young man, he would have been associated with the Apostle in this address to the Colossian Church.

In the case of all the other Epistles, where Timothy is thus introduced, it is certain that he had been with St. Paul at the places, and was well known to the Churches, to which those Epistles were sent. (See 1 Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1. 2 Cor. i. 1. Phil. i. 1.) Hence it may be inferred that he had been at Colossæ, and that he had been there with St. Paul, and that St. Paul was not unknown (as has been supposed by some) to the Colossian Church, but had visited it probably in one or both of his missionary tours mentioned in Acts xvi. 6 and Acts xviii. 23, in the latter of which it is specially recorded that the Apostle went through the region of Phrygia in order, confirming all the disciples. This could hardly be said if he had not visited Colossæ. See above, the Introduction to this Epistle, and below on ii. 1.

This opinion is also confirmed by the words ὁ ἀδελφὸς, our brother, annexed here to Τιμόθεος, and signifying that he was well known to them as such, and was their own brother as well as St. Paul's. Timothy is introduced as "Timothy the brother" in the Epistle to Philemon, who lived at Colossæ (Philem. 1); and this confirms the opinion stated above, that St. Paul and Timothy had visited Colossæ.

2. Κολοσσαῖς] A (C in Subscr.), and above forty Cursive MSS., and Syriac, Coptic, Æthiopic Versions, and Origen, Theodoret have Κολασσαῖς, and so Lachm., Tisch., Meyer, Alford, Ellicott.

But the reading Κολοσσαῖς is in B* (see Cardinal Mai's Errata, p. 503: hitherto the reading of B has been cited erroneously), and in D, E, F, G, I, and many Cursive MSS., and Chrys., and in Vulg., and Latin Fathers, and is etymologically correct, and is supported by the evidence of ancient coins of Colossæ inscribed with the words δῆμος Κολοσσηνῶν (Eckel iii. 47). It will be observed, however, that these coins do not present the form Κολοσσαεῖς or Κολασσαεῖς (which are the forms in the MSS. of St. Paul's Epistle), but Κολοσσηνοί, and they are anterior to the age of our present MSS. of St. Paul, when the form Colassæ (probably a Phrygian accommodation of the Greek word Colossæ) seems to have been the name popularly known. A similar adoption of a popular appellation may be seen in John xviii. 1.

Colossæ, mentioned by Herodotus (vii. 30) as a large City of Phrygia, was situated on the river Lycus, a branch of the Mæander, and not far from Laodicea (the principal city of Phrygia, see on ii. 1) and Hierapolis (iv. 13), and is classed among the 'celeberrima oppida' of Phrygia by Pliny, v. 41.

Colossæ was the residence of Philemon, to whom St. Paul sent an Epistle from Rome at the same time as the present Epistle. See below on iv. 9, 10, and the Introduction to this Epistle.

7. Ἐπαφρᾶ] Epaphras, a Colossian (see iv. 12, ὁ ἐξ ὑμῶν), was probably now a fellow-prisoner with St. Paul at Rome (see Philem. 23, ὁ συναιχμαλωτός μου), and had recently come from Colossæ to St. Paul, and had made a good report to the Apostle of their spiritual state (v. 8), and at the same time made known to the Apostle the spiritual perils from false teachers, by whom the Colossian Church had been invaded. A, B, D*, G have ἡμῶν here, not ὑμῶν.

It is probable, that this report of Epaphras gave occasion to this Epistle, which the Apostle, as their spiritual Father, would be more eager to write, on account of the detention of Epaphras, the pastor of the Colossians, at Rome, in this hour of trial for his flock. At the same time he bears testimony to the faithfulness of Epaphras, and confirms them in what they heard from him.

8. ἐν Πνεύματι] in the Holy Spirit. Cp. Rom. xiv. 17. And as to the absence of the article, see Winer, § 20, p. 123. Cp. ἐν Χριστῷ, v. 4.

10. εἰς πᾶσαν ἀρέσκειαν] to all pleasing. St. Paul biddeth Titus exhort servants to please their Masters in all things (Tit. ii. 9); so must God's servant do. He must study to walk worthy of Him unto all pleasing, not much regarding how others interpret his doings, or what offence they take at him, so long as his Master accepteth his services. Whoso is not thus resolved to please his Master, although he should thereby incur the displeasure of the whole world, is not worthy to be called the servant of such a Master, for "If I yet sought to please men, I should not be the servant of Christ" (Gal. i. 10). Bp. Sanderson (iii. p. 320). Cp. Eph. v. 10.

— τῇ ἐπιγνώσει] So the major part of the best MSS., not however B (see Mai). Elz. has εἰς τὴν ἐπίγνωσιν. Ἐπίγνωσις, full knowledge, is more than γνῶσις (see on Luke i. 4), it is a gift and grace of the Holy Spirit. See ii. 2; iii. 10; and Meyer here.

This word occurs oftener in this Epistle than in any other of St. Paul. Perhaps St. Paul may have used it as a contrast to the false γνῶσις (1 Tim. vi. 20) or Gnosticism of the false teachers, who were beguiling the Colossians with the speciousness of their vain Philosophy. (ii. 8.) They, in their theories, promised γνῶσις, but the Apostle gave ἐπίγνωσις by his ministry.

12. τῷ ἱκανώσαντι ἡμᾶς] who made us meet for, qualified us for, made us ἱκανοὺς, such as might hope to arrive at, come to (ἱκάνειν, see Passow) the portion of the inheritance of light into which nothing that is unholy is fit to enter, or will be allowed to come. (Rev. xxi. 27.) Cp. Isa. xxxv. 8. S. Aug. renders the word rightly by 'qui idoneos fecit' (Serm. 217).

— εἰς τὴν μερίδα] to the portion of the inheritance. He does not mean 'our particular portion of that inheritance,' which would be a somewhat invidious and exclusive expression, but to the portion generally, to that portion by which the inheritance of light is parted off (μερίζεται) from the region of darkness. On this sense of μερὶς, see note above on Acts xvi. 12.

This meaning is further illustrated by what is said in the following verse on their translation from the one region to the other. Cp. Bp. Sanderson (iii. 380—384) on the character of these two regions respectively, and their inhabitants.

13. τοῦ Υἱοῦ τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ] the Son of His Love, Who, in dying for the World on the Cross, and in delivering us from the Powers of darkness, is the special object of His Father's Love, and is then pre-eminently the Beloved Son, in Whom He is well pleased. Cp. Eph. i. 6, τῷ ἠγαπημένῳ. (Chrys.) St. Paul takes care to anticipate and obviate the objection (caught at in later times by Socinians) that the Son could not have been loved by the Father, Who gave Him up to die a cruel death for men who were rebels against Him. He therefore calls the Redeemer "the Son of His Love." See notes above on Matt. xvii. 5. Eph. i. 6.

14. ἀπολύτρωσιν] redemption, by means of the λύτρον, or ransom, no other than His own blood, which He shed ἵνα λύσῃ, i. e. in order that He might loose or release us from the captivity of sin and Satan, in which we were imprisoned and enslaved. See above on Matt. xx. 28, and Eph. i. 7, and below, Heb. ix. 12.

Elz. adds διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ, which is a gloss, and is not found in the best MSS., and was imported probably from Eph. i. 7.

— τὴν ἄφεσιν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν] the remission of sins. See above on Eph. i. 7.

15.] St. Paul now proceeds to vindicate the Divine Majesty of CHRIST against the false teachers at Colossæ, who disparaged Him as man, and as inferior in dignity, and posterior in time, to Angels. Theophyl.

— εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ἀοράτου] the image of God Who is Invisible. The Fathers generally regard these words as an assertion of the Divine consubstantiality of the Son; δηλοῖ ἡ εἰκὼν τὸ ὁμοούσιον. Theodoret. Origen (c. Cels. vi.) and Hilary (de Synodis, c. 33) speak of Christ as rightly described as the "Inconvertible and Immutable Image of the Divinity, and Essence, and Virtue, and Glory." See also Hilary (de Trin. viii. 49), who says that Christ is an image of God by His creative power. So also Theophylact here, who says, "Christ is the Image of God, inasmuch as Christ is God, and the Son of God; and therefore He is superior to Angels and to all created Beings." "Filius Dei est Patris sui vera, viva ac perfectissima Imago, ipsi Patri per omnia etiam magnitudine respondens." Bp. Bull (Def. Fid. Nic. ii. 9. 17).

Since Christ is the Image of Him that is Invisible, He is an Image of the substance of God. (Chrys.) And again, He, Who is an Image of the Invisible, is Himself Invisible, or He would not be an Image of Invisibility. And Basil (in Caten. p. 304), Christ is not like an Image made by art, but He is a living image, or rather Life itself, not in any outward fashion, but in the very essence itself, preserving the invariability of God. And Greg. Nazian. (in Caten. p. 305), Christ is an Image of God in His Consubstantiality. He is a Living Image of the Living One.

Augustine (de Divers. Quæst. 74, Vol. vi. p. 120), expounding this text, says, Since God is not subject to the laws of time, and He cannot be said to have begotten the Son in time, by Whom He created all time, it follows that the Son is an image of God not only as being from God, and that He is not only the likeness of God because He is the image of God, but He is so equal with God as not to be separated from Him by any interval of time.

It is necessary to bear in mind the language of the ancient Expositors on this passage, as a caution against some more recent Interpretations (e. g. that of Meyer, p. 27, and others), applying these words to Christ's Humanity only, and thus impairing the force of the Apostle's words, and marring the connexion of the argument.

— πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως] first-begotten before every creature. Christ is πρωτότοκος τῆς κτίσεως, not as if He had the Creature as a brother, but as being born before every creature. For how can He be a brother of creatures, and yet their Creator, as the Apostle here declares Him to be? Theodoret.

In this clause St. Paul, vindicating the Eternal Pre-existence and divine Power and Majesty of CHRIST against the false Teachers, distinguishes Him from, and contrasts Him with, all created beings, and predicates two things of Him,

(1) That He is begotten and not made, and therefore not a creature; and

(2) That He is prior to all creatures, as is expressly asserted in v. 17, πρὸ πάντων.

οὐρανοῖς καὶ τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, τὰ ὁρατὰ καὶ τὰ ἀόρατα, εἴτε θρόνοι, εἴτε κυριότητες, εἴτε ἀρχαὶ, εἴτε ἐξουσίαι, τὰ πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ καὶ εἰς αὐτὸν ἔκτισται· 17 καὶ αὐτὸς ἔστι πρὸ πάντων, καὶ τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνέστηκε.

And (3) he enforces this second assertion by adding, that by Him all things were made.

The word πρωτότοκος is used here with a genitive in the same way as πρῶτός μου in two places of St. John (i. 15. 30), before Me, and first of all.

As to the Arian objection, raised from the word πρωτότοκος, first-begotten, as if it implied that other sons were begotten after Him, and that therefore this word cannot be applicable to the Son as God, it is enough to observe (as Theophylact has done) that the word πρωτότοκος is also used of Christ as the first-born Son of Mary, and that phrase was never supposed by the Catholic Church to imply that the Blessed Virgin Mary had other children after Jesus. See note on Matt. i. 25.

The words of St. Paul here were understood in the primitive ages of Christianity to be declaratory of Christ's Divinity, as distinguished from His Humanity. S. Justin Martyr often cites them in that sense. Thus in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. 84) he says, that He Who was πρωτότοκος πάντων ποιημάτων became man. And in c. 85 he affirms that all evil spirits are overcome by the name of the Son of God, the πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, who became man. And he says, still more clearly (c. 100), that He revealed to us all things which we have understood by His grace; and we have known Him as the First-begotten of God, and before all creatures, πρωτότοκον, τὸν καὶ πρὸ πάντων τῶν κτισμάτων,—a clear exposition of St. Paul's meaning here. See also ibid. c. 125. 138.

So also Tertullian (c. Praxeam, 7), referring to this passage, says, God made the Son equal to Himself, from Whom He came forth as the Son, and the First-begotten, as begotten before all things, and the only-begotten, as alone begotten of God. See also c. Marcion. v. 19.

Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch in the second century, quoting this passage (ad Autol. ii. 22), says, that before any thing was made, God had the Word as His Counsellor (that is, as ἐνδιάθετον); and when He desired to create the World, He begat the Word as προφορικὸν, πρωτότοκον πάσης κτίσεως. Cp. ibid. c. 10.

S. Hippolytus also, the scholar of Irenæus (in his recently discovered treatise, "the Philosophumena, or Refutation of all Heresies," p. 335), says, that God begat the Word; and the Word, being His πρωτότοκος, created all things according to His Father's pleasure. See also other authorities on this subject in the present Editor's Volume, "S. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome," p. 280.

Novatian also, in the third century, asserts (de Trin. c. 16), that Christ is primogenitus omnis creaturæ, because He, as God the Word, according to His Divinity, came forth from His Father before every creature (quoniam secundùm divinitatem ante omnem creaturam à Patre Deus Sermo processit),—which is a clear exposition of this text.

S. Hilary also (de Trin. viii. 50) says, that the term 'first-born' is a declaration of Eternity.

Athanasius, and some Catholic Fathers, sometimes apply this text to illustrate the συγκατάβασις, or condescension, by which Christ became "the first-born among many brethren" (Rom. viii. 29), and because all in Christ are new creatures (2 Cor. v. 17. Heb. x. 20), and the creature is preserved from corruption by its communion with the Incarnate Word. Athanas. (Orat. ii. c. Arianos, p. 419, § 62; and also ad Gentes, p. 32, § 41.) But Athanasius strenuously protests against the notion that Christ can be called a κτίσις, or creature; and asserts that, when Christ is said to be πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, this is not because He is on a level with creatures, and their chief in time; for how (he asks) can this be, since He is the Only-begotten Son? Athanas. (Orat. ii. c. Arianos, § 62.)

The above exposition of this important text has been adopted by our best divines; among whom it may suffice to quote Bp. Pearson and Dr. Waterland, as follows:—

We here read of the Son of God, in whom we have redemption through His blood (Col. i. 14); and we are sure that these words can be spoken of none other than Jesus Christ. He therefore it must be Who is thus described by the Apostle, Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature. For by Him were all things created that are in heaven and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by Him and for Him. And He is before all things, and by Him all things consist. In which words our Saviour is expressly styled the first-born of every creature, that is, begotten by God as the Son of His love, antecedently to all other emanations, before any thing proceeded from Him, or was framed and created by Him. And that precedency is presently proved by this undeniable argument, that all other emanations or productions came from Him; and whatsoever received its being by creation, was by Him created. Which assertion is delivered in the most proper, full, and pregnant expressions imaginable. First, in the vulgar phrase of Moses, as most consonant to his description, for by Him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth; signifying thereby that he speaketh of the same creation. Secondly, by a division which Moses never used, as describing the production only of corporeal substances. Lest therefore those immaterial beings might seem exempted from the Son's creation, because omitted in Moses' description, he addeth visible and invisible; and lest in that invisible world, among the many degrees of the celestial hierarchy, any order might seem exempted from an essential dependence upon Him, he nameth those which are of greatest eminence, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers, and under them comprehendeth all the rest. Nor doth it yet suffice thus to extend the object of His power by asserting all things to be made by Him, except it be so understood as to acknowledge the sovereignty of His person and the authority of His action. For, lest we should conceive the Son of God framing the world as a mere instrumental cause, which worketh by and for another, he showeth Him as well the final as the efficient cause; for, all things were created by Him and for Him. Lastly, whereas all things first received their being by creation, and when they have received it continue in the same by virtue of God's conservation, in Whom we live, and move, and have our being (Acts xvii. 28), lest in any thing we should be thought not to depend immediately upon the Son of God, He is described as the Conserver, as well as the Creator. For He is before all things, and by Him all things consist. If then we consider the two last-cited verses by themselves, we cannot deny but that they are a most complete description of the Creator of the world; and if they were spoken of God the Father, could be no way injurious to His Majesty, Who is nowhere more plainly or fully set forth unto us as the Maker of the World. Bp. Pearson (on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 214).

The following is from Dr. Waterland:—

I pass on to a famous passage in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Colossians, which runs thus: Who is the image of the invisible God, &c., By Him all things consist. Strong, lively, and magnificent expressions, plainly intended of a Person, the Son of God just before mentioned (v. 13); so that here is no room for any Sabellian pretences of a Person pre-existing before the world began (so that here is as little left for the Socinian); lastly, of a Person Who was before all creatures, and made all creatures, which is enough to silence the Arians:

The last particular I am principally obliged to speak to.

In the Greek we have two expressions, ἐν αὐτῷ and δι' αὐτοῦ, in Him and by Him were all things created; and also εἰς αὐτὸν, for Him, the same expression which we find used of God the Father probably (Rom. xi. 36), and is there rendered to Him.

So now we have found εἰς αὐτὸν τὰ πάντα, as before δι' αὐτοῦ τὰ πάντα, equally applied to Father and Son. Such expressions, so indifferently applied to either, have a meaning, and did not drop by chance from inspired writers.

But to consider the passage more distinctly.

In respect of the words first-born of every creature, our translation comes not up to the force or meaning of the original. It should have been born (or begotten) before the whole creation, or, rather, before every creature (see John i. 30, πρῶτός μου ἦν), as is manifest from the context, which gives the reason why He is said to be πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως. It is because He is before all things, and because by Him were all things created. So that this very passage, which as it stands in our translation may seem to suppose the Son one of the creatures, does, when rightly understood, clearly exempt Him from the number of creatures.

He was before all created beings, and consequently was Himself uncreated, existing with the Father from all eternity. Waterland (Moyer Lectures, ii. p. 34).

Bp. Fell (p. 264, note) rightly paraphrases the words thus, "the first or only-begotten before all creatures."

Finally, this exposition has been adopted by Meyer (p. 30), who confirms it on philological grounds.

16. ἐν αὐτῷ] Observe the very frequent repetition of the pronoun αὐτὸς in this and the six following verses, where it occurs no less than fifteen times.

It was doubtless designed to bring out more emphatically o Eph. 1. 10, 22, 23. & 4. 15. & 5. 23. Acts 26. 23. 1 Cor. 15. 20, 23. Rev. 1. 5.

the Power, Majesty, and Love of CHRIST, as the Creator, and Preserver, and Ruler of the Universe, and the only Mediator between God and Man, in opposition to the false Teachers at Colossæ, who assigned to Angels the office and operation which belong only to HIM.

— ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα] He is before all created things, because by Him all things were created. A clear assertion of His Divinity.

See the exposition of this text by the Council of Antioch, A. D. 269, against Paul of Samosata. Routh (R. S. ii. 468). As Dr. Waterland says in the sequel to the words above quoted from him,—

Creation is here ascribed to the Son in very full, clear, and expressive terms. All things, not sublunary things only, not this inferior system, but all things, whether above or below, that are in heaven, and that are in earth; not inanimate things only, or the inhabitants of this globe, but also what is remote and distant, all things visible and invisible; and not only all rational creatures of an inferior rank and order, but the very highest orders of Angels or Archangels: whether they be Thrones or Dominions, Principalities or Powers, they are all created in and by Him, not only so, but for Him, or to Him. He is the final as well as efficient Cause, as much as to say, that they are made for His service and for His glory, the ultimate end of their creation. And that it may not be suspected that they have their dependence upon another, and not upon Him, or that in Him they do not live and move and hold their being, the Apostle adds farther, that by Him all things consist. He is not Creator only once, but perpetual Creator, being the Sustainer and Preserver of the whole Universe. (Waterland.)

The force of this exposition is not weakened by the sense which may be assigned to ἐν αὐτῷ, and has been assigned to the preposition ἐν by able Philologers such as Winer (§ 50, p. 372), and Meyer, and Ellicott here, who distinguish its sense from that of διὰ in δι' αὐτοῦ which follows.

The World was created by God in Christ (says Winer) in so far that the Divine Word was the personal cause of the Divine Act of Creation, just as the World was redeemed by God in Christ.

This may be the force of the preposition ἐν here, though it must be allowed that the Greek Fathers generally regard ἐν here as instrumental; a sense which it often bears. Thus Chrys. says, ἐν αὐτῷ δι' αὐτοῦ ἐστίν. See Winer, § 48, p. 346.

However this may be, the work of Creation is ascribed to Christ's agency in the following words, All things have been created (ἔκτισται) by Him, and exist by Him.

The Apostle uses two tenses here, ἐκτίσθη and ἔκτισται, to describe the work of Creation by Christ. The former tense describes the action of creation itself; the perfect tense affirms that all creatures have been created by Him, and that the effects of that one creative act still subsist. Cp. Meyer. Winer, § 40, p. 242, 243, where examples may be seen of a similar combination of the aorist followed by a Perfect in the N. T. Cp. 1 Cor. xv. 4.

— τὰ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς] the things which are in heaven. Therefore Angels were created by Him. Do not imagine then that He is posterior in time to them. Theophyl.

— εἴτε θρόνοι κ.τ.λ.] The Cherubim and the Angelic Hierarchy. Theodoret, who refers to Ezek. x. 1, and Dan. x. 13.

St. Paul thus condemns the heresy of the False Teachers of Colossæ, who ascribed the work of creation to Angels, and assigned to them authority in ruling and upholding the world, and placed them in a higher degree than Christ Himself, and made them objects of worship.

— εἰς αὐτόν] into Him; so as to depend on Him as their support, and to minister to His glory as their end.

Their whole substance depends upon Him. Christ not only brought them out of nothing, but He rivets them together, so that if they were severed from His Providence they would fall to pieces, and be dissolved (Chrysostom), who here, and on Eph. ii. 22, interprets these words as teaching that Christ is the Living Centre, to which all things in Creation converge, the divine Keystone in the arch of the Universe, on which the whole fabric leans; but he warns his readers against supposing that Christ Himself is consubstantial with the creatures whom He made and upholds.

This sense of the preposition εἰς is to be further enlarged, so as to express the truth that the purpose, for which all things hang upon the Divine Power of Christ, is the manifestation of His Glory.

— ἔκτισται] have been created; have been brought into being. All things have been brought into existence from nothing by Him, and into Him as their Creator, Preserver, and Lord, on whose Providence they depend, and Whose glory they proclaim.

17. ἔστι] exists. The editions commonly read ἐστί, which is less forcible and appropriate.

— πρό] before, in time, not only in rank, as is alleged by Socinians and others. See above, v. 15.

18. Καὶ αὐτός] And He Himself also is the Head of the Church. He, the Mighty Divine Being, Whose Majesty I have been describing, even He Himself condescended to take our Nature, and incorporate us as Members in His Mystical Body the Church. Marvellous condescension!

It is observable, that the Apostle often makes the most striking transitions to a new subject by means of the simple conjunction καί, and thus mounts, as it were, by steps on a heavenly ladder to higher degrees of glory. See, for instance, here, vv. 17, 18. 20, 21; below, ii. 10.

Having spoken of Christ's Divine Power, he now proceeds to speak of His infinite Love to Mankind. Theophyl.

Having declared Christ's Divine Pre-existence, and Omnipotence, and Glory, he now passes on to describe His relation to us, as God Incarnate, and Head of the Church. Theodoret.

— ἡ κεφαλὴ τοῦ σώματος] the Head of the Body. See Eph. i. 22; iv. 15; v. 23.

— ὅς ἐστιν ἀρχή] In that He is the ἀρχή, or Head, a word which has a twofold sense, indicating—

(1) Principium, beginning;

(2) Principalitas, dominion, rule.

(1) In the first sense, Christ, by reason of His Incarnation, Death, and Resurrection, is the source and well-spring of Life, both in body and soul, to the Church. In this respect He is the ἀρχὴ τῆς κτίσεως, the beginning of the new Creation (Rev. iii. 14); and He says, I make all things new, I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first principle, and the beginning (ἡ ἀρχή), and the end (Rev. xxi. 6). See also Rev. xxii. 13.

(2) In the second sense, by virtue of His Incarnation and Ascension into heaven, He is the Ἀρχή, or Principality, Supremacy, and Chiefty of all things; the Head πάσης ἀρχῆς (Col. ii. 10), ὑπεράνω πάσης ἀρχῆς (Eph. i. 21). And therefore the Angelic ἀρχαὶ and ἐξουσίαι are not (as the false Teachers pretended) superior to Him because He is Man; but even in His Manhood He is their Lord, and He has elevated Human Nature itself to a dignity superior to that of Angels. Compare Heb. ii. 5—10 for a full exposition of the Apostle's meaning here.

The word Ἀρχή is applied to Persons as here in Gen. xlix. 3. Deut. xxi. 17. Meyer.

— πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν] the first-born from the dead (cp. Rev. i. 5); a beautiful expression suggested by Christ Himself (John xvi. 21), and intimating that Christ, by dying, made Death to be a Birth, and made the Tomb to be a Womb of Life Everlasting, both to body and soul. See notes above on John xvi. 21, and on Acts ii. 24, and xiii. 23.

— ἵνα γένηται] that He might become. Observe this word γένηται, which affords a clue to the sense of this passage.

Christ consented to become mortal and die, and to be the first-born from the dead, in order that as man He might become chief and first in all things. The Apostle is speaking of what He became (ἐγενήθη), not what He was (ὑπῆρχεν); and he is describing the primacy and supremacy which Christ acquired by His Humanity. See above on Matt. xxviii. 18, and on 1 Cor. xv. 24, 25, Phil. ii. 6—11, which fully explain St. Paul's meaning here.

— αὐτός] He and no other.

— πρωτεύων] first and chief. See note on ἀρχή above.

"Ad mortem pervenit, ut sit primogenitus ex mortuis, Ipse primatum tenens in omnibus, princeps vitæ, prior omnium et præcedens omnes." Irenæus (ii. 22. 4).

Perhaps ἐν πᾶσιν is best rendered by 'in all things.' Cp. τὰ πάντα in v. 17 and v. 20.

19. ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ εὐδόκησε πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα κατοικῆσαι] because He was well pleased that all the fulness (of the Godhead) should dwell in Him. The word εὐδόκησε may either signify—

(1) That God the Son was pleased, or

(2) That God was pleased.

(1) If the former interpretation be adopted, the sense of τὰ πάντα εἰς αὐτὸν, εἰρηνοποιήσας διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ σταυροῦ αὐτοῦ, δι' αὐτοῦ, εἴτε τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, εἴτε τὰ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς.

this profound assertion may become clear, when it is remembered that the two Natures are perfect and yet unconfused in the One Person of Christ.

Christ Himself, as God, was well pleased that all the fulness of the Godhead should dwell in the Man Christ Jesus. The Eternal Word consented gladly to His own Incarnation. He said to the Father, "Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not (οὐκ ἠθέλησας), but a body Thou hast prepared Me. In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin Thou hast had no pleasure (οὐκ εὐδόκησας). Then said I, Lo, I am come (ἥκω) to do Thy Will, O God" (Heb. x. 5—9). Because God the Father (οὐκ εὐδόκησεν) was not well pleased with (that is, did not rest with complacency on) burnt offerings for sin (inasmuch as they were not adequate to satisfy His offended Justice), but had disciplined a Body (see Heb. x. 5) in order that the Son, in that Body, God Incarnate, might redeem the world; therefore God the Son was well pleased to do His Father's Will, and to take the Body that was prepared for Him, and to become Man: and He was well pleased that all the fulness of the Godhead, of which (with reverence be it said) He was as complete a Possessor as the Father Himself, should be communicated to Man, and should dwell in Man.

That this sense may be given to the passage seems evident from the grammatical structure of it, in which αὐτὸς is emphatically applied to Christ, and from St. Paul's words in the next chapter (Col. ii. 9), where he says that in Christ (i. e. the Man Christ Jesus) dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.

And so this sentence was understood in the second century, e. g. by Tertullian, who says, "Boni duxit omnem plenitudinem in semetipso habitare." (c. Marcion. v. 19.) And this εὐδοκία, or good pleasure, of God the Son, has been well expressed by one of the greatest of the ancient Catholic Fathers who have written on the doctrine of the Trinity, S. Hilary, who, commenting on the second chapter of this Epistle of St. Paul, thus writes (de Trin. ix. 6): "These heavenly mysteries were arranged before the world began, that the only-begotten of God should be willing to be born, and to take upon Him human nature, to remain for ever in God; that He, Who is God, should be willing to suffer . . . that He, Who is God, should be willing to die. Therefore God is born, to take us into Himself; He suffers, to make us innocent; He dies, to vindicate us against the Devil; our Humanity abides in Him Who is God; the Spiritual Powers of Wickedness are conquered by the triumph of the Flesh, in which God dies."

The Apostle was not ignorant of this Mystery; and he who knew that this world's Philosophy could not fathom it, says (Col. ii. 8), "Beware lest any man spoil you," &c.

(2) Another interpretation is also admissible. It may be said, with probability, that the nominative Θεὸς, God, is to be supplied before the verb εὐδόκησε. This ellipse of Θεὸς is observable in the phrase, διὸ λέγει, sc. Θεὸς (Eph. iv. 8; v. 14). Cp. Kühner, § 414. 3, Vol. ii. p. 36; and see Meyer here. And this sense will not differ much from the preceding; for it will predicate of the Godhead generally what the former sense ascribes to the good will of One of the Consubstantial Persons of the Undivided Trinity, namely, of the Son.

If, however, St. Paul had meant to ascribe the εὐδοκία to the Father alone, he would hardly have failed to express Him by Name.

The words εἰς αὐτὸν, into Himself, are very significant, and represent the Reconciliation which was effected by the taking of the Manhood into God, and by the incorporation of the universal family of Mankind, as a Church, into the mystical Body of Christ, both God and Man.

This work of Reconciliation is here attributed to the Son, and in v. 21. It is ascribed to the Father in 2 Cor. v. 19, because the Father works in the Son, and the Son doeth what He seeth the Father do, and doeth always those things that please Him. (John v. 19. 30; viii. 28, 29.)

(3) On the whole, we may perhaps affirm, that the Apostle designedly placed εὐδόκησεν here without any limitation of a nominative expressed, in order to bring out the truth more fully that the εὐδοκία is to be ascribed to the Father in the Son, and to the Son in the Father, and that there is perfect unity in Will and operation in both. (See John xiv. 9, 10. 20.)

Cp. also a similar example, ii. 13—15, note.

20. δι' αὐτοῦ ἀποκαταλλάξαι τὰ πάντα εἰς αὐτόν] and by Himself to reconcile and restore all things into Himself.

On the sense of ἀποκαταλλάξαι, see above note on Eph. i. 10, and ii. 16. The Son of God is Lord of Angels, who were alienated from Man by reason of Man's disobedience to God (Chrys., Theodoret); and by becoming Man He became the Second Adam, and the Head of the Church; and so, by the union of the two Natures in His One Person, He brought all things, which before were estranged, into harmony, and effected a complete work of reconciliation and restoration between Earth and Heaven. See on Eph. i. 10; ii. 16.

— εἰρηνοποιήσας] See notes on Eph. ii. 14—17.

— εἴτε τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, εἴτε τὰ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς] See on Eph. i. 10; ii. 16. The work of Reconciliation of all things in and by Christ, whether in heaven or earth, is manifestly—

(1) Between God and Man, and
(2) Between Angels and Men, and
(3) Between Jew and Gentile, and
(4) Between Man and the inferior creatures;

For, as Bp. Sanderson observes (iii. 159), Man had forfeited by the fall his right of dominion, which he had originally in Adam, over all the creatures which were estranged from him; and God under the Law had forbidden Man the use of many of the creatures as unclean, but now under the Gospel has taken away the stigma of uncleanness from the creature, and has reinstated Man in the free use of creation; and he has recovered all his royalties in the Second Adam, Jesus Christ.

God the Father hath granted us, and God the Son hath acquired to us, and God the Holy Ghost hath sealed to us, a new Patent. The Son of God, having made peace through the blood of the cross, hath reconciled us to His Father, and therein hath also reconciled the Creatures both to us and Him; reconciling, saith the Apostle, all things, not men only, unto Himself. God, having given us His own Son, the Heir of all things (Heb. i. 2), hath He not given us all things else? Hath He not permitted us the free use of the creatures in as ample use as ever? See above on 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23.

This fourth particular in the work of Reconciliation and Restoration is necessary to be noted, because by it the Apostle prepares the way for the refutation of the false Teachers at Colossæ, who impeached this Christian Liberty, and marred this work of Universal Reconciliation, by endeavouring to bring men back into their former state of bondage and estrangement, from which they had been freed by Christ, and would have enslaved them, and have done dishonour to Christ by forbidding them the free use of the Creatures. See the next chapter, vv. 20, 21.

21. Καὶ ὑμᾶς] And you. He now proceeds to speak of that reconciliation and restoration of the Gentile World to God their Heavenly Father, which Christ has accomplished by His Death, and which He had before revealed in the Parable of the Prodigal Son. (Luke xv. 11—32.)

— ἀποκατήλλαξεν] B has ἀποκατηλλάγητε, and so Lachm. D*, F, G, have ἀποκαταλλαγέντες, and so the old Latin Version of Irenæus, v. 14.

22. ἐν τῷ σώματι] in his sinless flesh. Christ reconciled our sinful flesh, and brought it back into amity with God. Irenæus (v. 14. 2), who compares the words of St. Paul, Eph. ii. 13—15. See above, Rom. viii. 3.

As to this universal diffusion, compare our Lord's command "to preach the Gospel to the whole creation" (Mark xvi. 15), and note on Rom. x. 18, where the Holy Spirit, speaking by the Apostle, as here, from the altitude of His Divine Prescience, regards God's Will as already actually done; for who hath resisted His will? God has done His part, that the light of the Gospel should be as universal as the light of the sun. In His desire and design it is Universal. Cp. above, v. 6.

24. παθήμασι] Elz. adds μου, which is not in the majority of the best MSS. and Edd.

— ἀνταναπληρῶ τὰ ὑστερήματα κ.τ.λ.] I am filling up by a correspondent and reciprocal supply (ἀντὶ) what is still lacking of the sufferings of Christ, in my flesh for His Body, which is the Church. As Tertullian renders the words (c. Marcion. v. 19), "Dicit adimplere se reliqua pressurarum Christi in carne pro corpore Ejus quod est Ecclesiâ."

Christ Himself had said, from His seat in heavenly glory, to Saul persecuting His Church, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" and "I am Jesus of Nazareth Whom thou persecutest" (Acts ix. 4, 5).

Well therefore might the Apostle have comfort in reflecting that he himself, who had persecuted Christ, was now filling up what was lacking of the persecutions and afflictions to be endured by Christ in His Body, the Church. So Chrys. and Augustine in Ps. lxi., who thus speaks:—

Jesus Christ is One Man with His Body and His Head; the Saviour of the Body and the Members of the Body are twain in one flesh; they are one in suffering, and when the iniquity of this world is past, they will be one in rest. Therefore the sufferings of Christ are not limited to Christ; nay, rather the sufferings of Christ are not except in Christ. For if you understand Christ to be both Head and Body, the sufferings of Christ are all in Christ. Christ is not only the Head, He is the Body also. Hence the Apostle says, "Ut suppleam quod desunt pressurarum Christi in carne meâ." Whosoever therefore thou art, if thou art a Member of Christ, whatsoever thou sufferest, was lacking to the sufferings of Christ. Therefore that suffering of thine is added because it was lacking: thou art filling up the measure, not making it flow over. Thou sufferest so much in thyself as was to be poured into the universal passion of Christ, Who suffered in our Head, and Who suffers in His Members, that is, in us. The whole measure of suffering will not be filled up till the world comes to an end.

See also on Ps. lxxxvi., where he says, Christ on the cross filled up the measure of His sufferings as our Head when He said, "It is finished" (John xix. 30). "Tunc impletæ erant omnes passiones, sed in Capite; restabant adhuc Christi passiones in corpore."

Hence the Apostle says, that I may fill up what is lacking of Christ's sufferings in His Body; not in the Head.

And again, in Ps. cxlii., S. Aug. says, "Christ still suffers, not in His own flesh, by which He ascended into heaven and is glorified, but in mine (says the Apostle), which still groans upon earth."

This distinction must be carefully borne in mind, as a safeguard against the erroneous teaching of the Romish Church, which affirms that the sufferings of Christ's saints upon earth are supplementary to the sufferings of Christ upon the cross, and form together with them an exhaustless stock of merit, to be dispensed in Indulgences by the Bishop of Rome. See Bellarmine, Salmeron, Suarez, and the Brief of Pope Clement VI. called Unigenitus, cited here by A Lapide.

But (as Bp. Fell observes here) "these sufferings of the Saints are necessary for the Church, not for the reconciliation of it to God, or satisfying for sin, for that Christ did perfectly, but for the effectual conversion of the world, example to others, perfecting of the Saints, augmentation of the reward;" and, we may add, for a manifestation of God's strength in their weakness, and of the glories of His Grace in what He alone enables them to do and suffer for Christ.

On the "full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction" made by Christ once for all upon the Cross for the sins of the whole world, see the scriptural and Catholic authorities in Bp. Beveridge, and Professor Browne on Art. XXXI., and below, notes on Heb. x. 12.

25. κατὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν τ. Θεοῦ] according to the dispensation of God, the ministry committed to me by God. Theodoret. Cp. 1 Cor. ix. 17.

This dispensation of God, i. e. instituted by Him, and "assigned by Him to me," is particularized here by what follows, τὴν δοθεῖσάν μοι εἰς ὑμᾶς, and the sense of the words is, Of which Church I was made a Minister, according to the dispensation of God, namely, that holy function which was assigned to me as a gift (see iv. 17) for you, i. e. as the scope of my ministry, to fill up the Word of God even to the full measure and extent which He designs for its diffusion.

— εἰς ὑμᾶς] to you. Hence, says Theodoret, we may reasonably infer that St. Paul had preached at Colossæ. For if they were part of the sphere and scope of the ministry committed to him by God, the Apostle, when he visited Phrygia (Acts xvi. 6), would not have failed to visit Colossæ and Laodicea, which were chief cities of that country. See above, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 305.

26. ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν γενεῶν] The mystery kept secret from the ages, and from the generations of all who lived in them (Eph. iii. 5. 21), but now made manifest to His Saints.

Another argument against the erroneous doctrine of the false Teachers at Colossæ, who ascribed divine powers to Angels. (Col. ii. 18.) The past ages (says the Apostle), even the Angels themselves, knew not the Mystery which is now revealed to the Church, and by her means to the Angels themselves, as he teaches in the Epistle to the Ephesians (iii. 10).

That teaching in the Ephesian Epistle, and other points of like nature contained in it, would have made it very serviceable for the Colossians; a consideration which confirms the opinion that the Epistle from Laodicea, mentioned below (iv. 16), was the Ephesian Epistle.

See above, Introduction to the Epistle to the Ephesians, p. 272, 3.

27. ὅς ἐστι Χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν] Who is Christ in you. Christ is supreme over all, and Christ is in you. Why then do you adore Angels? And he adds, v. 28, "that we may present every man perfect in Christ." Why then do you seek for perfection from Angels? Chrys., Severian.

I have for you and for those in Laodicea; and also for as many others as have not seen my face in the flesh.

This struggle of the Apostle was not only internal, that of anxiety, but it was also a conflict against false Teachers at Rome (cp. Phil. i. 16, 17), who vexed him with their erroneous doctrines, probably not unlike those at Colossæ, and in other Churches of Phrygia, and perhaps abetted the propagation of those notions in that region. Cp. what is said of Epaphras, below, iv. 13.

It is supposed by some, that these words imply, that the Apostle had never been at Colossæ.

The ancient Expositors were divided on this point;

Theodoret, in his Preface to this Epistle (Vol. iii. pt. i. p. 472), says, "Some argue from these words that the divine Apostle had never been at Colossæ. But they ought to have examined the general tenour of the words. His meaning is, 'I have much anxiety not only for you, but also even for those who have never seen me.' For, he cannot be supposed to say, that he has no solicitude for those who have seen him. Accordingly, the blessed Luke has informed us (Acts xviii. 23) that the Apostle 'went through the region of Galatia and Phrygia,' in which Colossæ is situated."

And in his commentary here, Theodoret observes, that the Apostle says (in v. 2), "that their hearts may be comforted. He does not say 'your hearts;' but the hearts of those who have not seen me."

This question has been considered above in the Introduction to this Epistle, p. 305.

Laodicea, a rich commercial city, famous for its Literature and Arts, on the river Lycus, not far west of Colossæ, and six miles south of Hierapolis. It is mentioned below, iv. 13. 15, 16, and in Rev. i. 11; iii. 14—17. It was the head of a "Conventus," or group of cities, to which Colossæ and more than twenty other towns belonged. Strabo (pp. 576—8). It is fully described by Schmitz in Dr. Smith's Dict. of Ancient Geography, ii. p. 122.

2. συμβιβασθέντες] So the best MSS. and Edd. Elz. συμβιβασθέντων. For examples of this participial anacoluthon, see below, iii. 16. Eph. i. 18; iv. 2. Phil. i. 30. Winer, § 63, p. 505.

— πλοῦτος] So A, C, Lachm., Tisch. B πᾶν πλοῦτος.

— τῆς πληροφορίας τῆς συνέσεως] of the full assurance of understanding. On the word πληροφορία, see on Luke i. 1, and cp. Rom. iv. 21; xiv. 5. 1 Thess. i. 5. This πληροφορία is not an effect of the logical faculty, but it is due to the inner working (ἐνέργεια) of the Holy Ghost. Chrys.

— τοῦ Θεοῦ Χριστοῦ] of the God Christ. So B and Lachmann, Steiger, Meyer, Ellicott. And this (as Meyer, Tregelles (p. 153), and Ellicott have observed) appears to be the original reading, from which most of the other variations have been derived. Thus A, C have τοῦ Θεοῦ Πατρὸς τοῦ Χριστοῦ, which perhaps arose from a fear that the words τοῦ Θεοῦ Χριστοῦ might be rendered the God of Christ.

D* has τοῦ Θεοῦ ὅ ἐστιν Χριστός.

D, E, I, K, and many Cursive MSS., and Elz. have τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ. Griesb., Scholz., and Tisch. (in his second edition), and Alf. have only τοῦ Θεοῦ, but this reading has no uncial MS. in its favour.

The reading of the Text is confirmed by S. Hilary (de Trinitate ix. 62, tom. ii. p. 312), who renders St. Paul's words thus: "in agnitionem sacramenti Dei Christi;" and thus expounds them, 'The God Christ is a Mystery,' &c. "Deus Christus Sacramentum est; et omnes sapientiæ et scientiæ in Eo thesauri latent." And he calls Christ, in the same place, "Unigenitus Deus," "the Only-begotten God;" and he says, referring to this chapter of St. Paul's Epistle (de Trin. viii. 53, p. 257), "That man is of this world, who knows not Christ as the true God. Christ is the Life, born from the Living God into Living God. The elements of this world were created by God, but are not God. Christ, God of God, is Himself that perfection, which is God. Christ, having God in a Mystery in Himself, is in God."

S. Hilary therefore understood St. Paul to affirm in these words that Christ is God, and he thus rendered them "to the recognition of the Mystery of God Christ," namely, to the recognition of Christ as God.

This Interpretation seems most in harmony with the true sense of the word Mystery, a religious arcanum or secret, and with St. Paul's use of the word, especially as applied to Christ. See above, Eph. iii. 3, 4. 9; v. 32; and below, 1 Tim. iii. 16, "Great is the Mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh."

It was not the Mystery of the Messiahship, but it was the Mystery of the Divine Nature of the Man Christ Jesus—it was the Mystery of the God Christ—which St. Paul was most concerned to teach in this Epistle; and which the Colossians most needed to learn, in order to be safe against the seductions of the false Teachers.

This interpretation, which refers the Mystery to Christ as God, is also confirmed by the statements which follow; that in Him All the treasures of wisdom are hid, and that in Him all the fulness of the Godhead dwells (v. 3. 10).

3. σοφίας καὶ γνώσεως] of wisdom and knowledge. See Aug. in Ps. cxxxv. 8, who considers the difference of these words, and affirms, that σοφία contains within it a divine affection of the heart. Cp. above on Eph. i. 9.

— ἀπόκρυφοι] hidden, stored up, like riches in some deep Treasury, such as the subterranean Treasuries of Atreus at Mycenæ, or of the Minyæ at Orchomenus.

They are ἀπόκρυφοι, concealed, even from the Angels themselves; and, therefore, Christ, Who is the Treasury of all Wisdom and Knowledge, is superior in Wisdom and Knowledge to them. Chrys.

— διὰ τῆς φιλοσοφίας κ.τ.λ.] by means of the Philosophy, which the Apostle proceeds to characterize in the following part of this chapter, and which may be best reviewed collectively here;

This Philosophy is described by him as

(1) κενὴ ἀπάτη, empty, vain-glorious, deceit; and as dogmatizing,

(2) κατὰ τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, according to the traditions of men, in contradistinction to the Revelations of God (cp. Matt. xv. 1—9), and also,

(3) κατὰ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, according to the elements of this world; the physical elements (cp. Gal. iv. 9), such as the Sun and Moon, regulating times and seasons; and according to superstitious observances of times, Feasts, New Moons, and Seventh-Day Sabbaths (v. 16), ordered thereby (Chrys. Cp. Gal. iv. 3. 9), as if they were of the same importance with articles of faith, and equally necessary to salvation; and as if they had not been fulfilled in Christ, and abrogated by Him (v. 17).

1 John 1. 14. ch. 1. 19. οὐ κατὰ Χριστόν· 9 [1] ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ κατοικεῖ πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος σωματικῶς.

(4) And therefore, not according to Christ (v. 8), in Whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and Who has fulfilled and taken away the shadows of the Levitical Law (vv. 16, 17. 20, 21), and has incorporated you in Himself by Baptism (v. 19), and has quickened you together with Himself by His Resurrection, and has forgiven you your sins, and has triumphed over them in His Cross, and has raised you as new creatures, engrafted in Himself, to the hope of a glorious Immortality.

(5) And as professing humility, and yet vainly puffed up with a carnal mind, and intruding into things which it has not seen, and teaching to worship Angels as Mediators (v. 18), and so 'not holding the Head,' which is Christ, the Only Mediator (1 Tim. ii. 5), but disparaging His Divine Nature, and derogating from the dignity of his Mediatorial Office.

(6) And also as professing a rigid asceticism in meats and drinks (v. 16), forbidding to "handle, to taste, and even to touch" (v. 21), those creatures which God has made and blessed, and which Christ has restored to the free use of man (see above on 1 Cor. vi. 12), and doing this according to "the Commandments and doctrines of men," and not according to the Law of God; so usurping a dominion and lordship over you, who are the servants and freemen of Christ; and subjecting your will to its own arbitrary will (v. 18) while it affects humility; and not holding in due honour the body, which has been sanctified by Christ's Incarnation; and thus tempting to a licentious indulgence, and slavish debasement, of the flesh (v. 23), and so doing dishonour to Him Who is "God manifest in the flesh."

The characteristics here specified, point in the first place to the spirit of that proud, vain-glorious, Pharisaic Judaism, which endeavoured to corrupt the simplicity of the Gospel, and to impose the observances of the Ceremonial Law, and of their own Traditions on the conscience of Christians, as necessary to salvation, and so to domineer over those whom Christ had purchased with His own blood, and to usurp His authority, and encroach on His Royalties, and to build up what He had broken down, and to deny virtually that He had fulfilled the Levitical Law, and to abridge the use of those creatures which Christ has sanctified and restored to man.

The handwriting of Ordinances was now blotted out, the partition-wall was broken down, and the legal impurity of the creatures was purged away by the blood of Christ. They who sought to bring in Judaism again into the Christian Church evacuated the Cross of Christ. Cp. Bp. Sanderson, iii. 160.

This was now attempted by the false Teachers at Colossæ, under a disguise of humility, and a pretence of mortifying the body; whereas their dogmas proceeded from pride, presumption, and love of power, and tended (by disparaging the Incarnation of Christ) to the debasement and pollution of the flesh.

The worshipping of Angels (as distinct from heathen deities and idols), mentioned in v. 18, was probably grounded by these False Judaizing Teachers on the facts, that God had often revealed His Will by Angels to the Patriarchs, and to Moses, and to the Prophets in the Old Testament; and that the Levitical Law had been given on Mount Sinai by the Ministry of Angels (see on Acts vii. 53), as St. Paul himself had taught (Gal. iii. 19; cp. Theodore in Catenâ, p. 325, and Theodoret); and on the revelations of Angel Rulers of Kingdoms in the Book of Daniel (x. 20, 21); and it was based also on the plea of an affected humility, that man in his fallen state needs the mediatorship of those pure Angelic spirits, in order that by them he may approach God. See Severian on v. 18, and so Chrys., Œcumen.

On the prevalence of Angel-worship among the Jews, see below on Heb. i. 4.

This veneration of Angels appears to have been combined with Pharisaism by the heresiarch Cerinthus, who is affirmed to have been the leader of the Judaizing party at the Council of Jerusalem. See above, on Acts xv. 1, and Ittig, de Hæresiarchis, p. 51.

The Cerinthians affirmed that the world was created by Angels, and they enforced Circumcision, and the other ceremonies of the Levitical Law. See Iren. i. 25. Augustine, de Hær. 8. Epiphan. de Hær. 28. And Cerinthus professed to have received revelations from Angels. Caius, ap. Euseb. H. E. iii. 22. Cp. Theodoret, Hær. Fab. ii. 4, and Ittig, de Hæres. p. 53.

Cerinthus commenced his preaching in Asia (Epiphan. Hær. 28), and would probably have found a favourable field for it among the inhabitants of Colossæ, Laodicea, and other cities of Phrygia, who were famous for their enthusiastic temperament and ascetic practices, which had displayed themselves in heathen times in the mutilations of the flesh and in the phrenetical orgies of the worship of Cybele (cp. above, Gal. v. 12), and which afterwards developed themselves in the Phrygian Church in the visionary revelations and self-mortifying discipline of Montanus—a native of that country.

The false teaching of Cerinthus and his sectaries would have been abetted by another heresiarch of the Apostolic age, Simon Magus, and his school, which taught that it was necessary to learn the names of the Invisible Principalities and Powers, ἀρχαὶ καὶ ἐξουσίαι (see above, i. 16), and to offer sacrifices to the Father of all by their means (Epiphan. Hær. 21). Tertullian (de Præscript. 33) says, that "the magic of the Simonian doctrine was Angelis serviens," and so Iren. i. 23; ii. 57; vi. 17.

And in these respects they would also receive support from a third heretical school of primitive times, the Ebionites. See Iren. i. 26; iv. 59; v. 2. Tertullian, de Carne Christi, c. 14. Præscr. Hæret. 33. Philost. de Hær. 37. Augustine, de Hær. c. 10. Theodoret, Hæret. Fab. ii. 1. Epiphan. Hæres. xxx. Euseb. iii. 27. Ittig, p. 61 - 64.

They agreed also with the Cerinthians in their low notions of Christ as a mere man, and therefore inferior to Angels, and in their enforcement of the Levitical Law.

The worship of Angels, as creators of man, and as entitled to honour from him, and a rigid spirit of asceticism, were fostered by the systems of Menander, Carpocrates, Saturninus, the Sethiani and Caiani, which grew out of those mentioned above. See Epiphan. de Hæret. § 23, and the notes on Iren. i. 24—27, and A Lapide on v. 18. Ittig, p. 97—119.

On these heresies generally, besides the work of Ittig, Lips. 1690, see Oehler, Corpus Hæreseologic. Berlin, 1856.

Whether, among the Jews, the Essenes were chargeable with Angel-worship, admits of a doubt; though Josephus tells us that they were careful to preserve their names (B. J. ii. 8. 7); and their rigid asceticism would have favoured the errors of the false Teachers here censured by St. Paul. See Euseb. ii. 27. Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2. B. J. ii. 8. Hottinger, Thesaur. Phil. p. 39. Jahn, Archæol. Bibl. § 322.

The Jewish systems of Theology, Cosmogony, and Metaphysics, which were contained in the Cabbala,—the origin of which was traced either from Ezra or Moses, or even Adam himself,—and in which there was much mystical lore concerning the forms and orders of Angels, would have lent their aid for the same end. See Hottinger, Thesaur. Phil. p. 439.

Finally, the admixture of the Platonism of the Jewish Alexandrine school (which has its exponent in the works of Philo) would be also auxiliary in the same design. Philo affirms that Moses introduces the Angels as Ambassadors and Mediators between God and men, and as communicating their needs to Him, and making them acceptable to Him. See Philo, de Gigantibus, p. 222, and de Somniis, p. 455, quoted by Whitby here; and Wetstein, p. 289.

Consequently, we find that the worship of Angels was prevalent in early times in Asia, especially in Phrygia. See Theodoret in v. 18. And the Council of Laodicea, a neighbouring city to Colossæ (he observes), was constrained to pass a decree against the Worship of Angels.

The Canons of this Laodicene Council (circa A.D. 320) deserve notice, as reflecting much light on this chapter. It decreed, that Christians may not "leave the Church of God, and go away and invoke the names of Angels; and let such persons be anathema, for they desert our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God." (Canon 35.) "Ecclesiastical Persons may not use incantations, or make phylacteries." (Canon 36.) "Christians may not receive presents from Jews on their Feast-Days, or feast with them" (Canon 37), or "receive unleavened bread from Jews, or partake in their impieties." (Canon 38, p. 77. Ed. Bruns.) "Christians may not Judaize, and rest on their Sabbath, but rest on the Lord's Day; and if they are found to Judaize, let them be anathema." (Canon 29.)

Cp. S. Cyril Hierosol. Catech. iv. p. 51. 70, with the note of the Benedictine Editor; and Const. Apost. v. c. 20, 21; and Concil. Elib. c. 49.

The prevalence of the worship of Angels among the Jews and Judaizing Christians, to the disparagement of the dignity of Christ, furnished reasons for the arguments in the Epistle to the Hebrews, proving Christ's pre-eminence over Angels, and the consequent superiority of Man's Nature over that of Angels (Heb. i. 4—7. 13; ii. 5—16), and for the declaration that the Angels are ministering spirits, sent to minister to them that are heirs of salvation. (Heb. i. 14.)

It may also have supplied a motive to St. Luke, the companion of St. Paul, for his frequent mention, both in his Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, of the employment of the ministry

9. ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ—σωματικῶς] because in Him dwelleth (κατοικεῖ, abideth perpetually, not παροικεῖ, or sojourneth transitorily; cp. A Lapide) all the fulness of the Godhead (θεότης) bodily. The word θεότης bespeaks the essential Godhead of Christ.

Θεότης is to be distinguished from θειότης. Cp. Rom. i. 20; and Trench, Syn. § ii. Θειότης is the property of θεότης: θεότης is the abode of θειότης.

The Godhead dwells in Christ bodily,—namely,

(1) Substantially and truly,—not figuratively, as in a shadow. (See v. 17, where σῶμα is contrasted with σκιά.)

This sense of the word σωματικῶς is clearly set forth by S. Hilary commenting on this text, in his work on the Trinity (viii. 53—55, and ix. 1), where he says: "'Corporaliter' in Eo Dei ex Deo naturæ significat veritatem . . . Divinitas corporalis in Christo est, non ex parte sed tota, neque portio sed plenitudo; ita corporaliter manens ut unum sint, ut à Deo non differat Deus;" and ix. 1: "Per 'corporaliter habitantem,' verum et perfectum, et paternæ naturæ Deum demonstrari docuimus." See also ibid. ix. 6—11, where he dilates with force and clearness on this text so understood.

(2) Some ancient Expositors apply also the word σωματικῶς (bodily) to illustrate the doctrine of the Incarnation. They teach that the Godhead dwells in Christ bodily, because it dwells not only in the soul of Christ, but in His body; and because the whole of it dwells there, and is not therefore mixed or confused with the body: for, if it were, it would be limited in space, which is contrary to the Nature of the Godhead.

This is thus expressed by the Council of Antioch summoned against Paul of Samosata (A.D. 269. Routh, R. S. ii. p. 473): "We confess that the Son, being God, with the Father, and Lord of all creatures, was sent by the Father from heaven, and became Man in our flesh. Wherefore, the body which He took from the Virgin received all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and is immutably united to the Godhead, καὶ τεθεοποίηται. The same God and Man was foretold by Moses and the Prophets, and is believed in the whole Church under heaven to be both God and Man."

S. Augustine (Epist. 187, p. 1036) combines both the above senses, thus; "In Ipso inhabitat omnis plenitudo Divinitatis corporaliter. He had only dwelt umbraliter, i. e. in types and figures, in the Temple (of the Jews) made with hands, but in Christ the Godhead dwells substantially; or the word 'corporaliter' is used, because God dwells in the body of Christ, which He took of the Virgin, as in a Temple." Cp. John ii. 19. 21, where Christ speaks of the Temple of His Body.

— τὸ πλήρωμα] the fulness. This word pleroma, which afterwards became so celebrated in the Valentinian and other Gnostic systems, by which they adulterated the purity of the Gospel, may perhaps have been already in use among the false Teachers in Phrygia. Cp. Irenæus (iii. 11).

Hence Dr. Waterland says (v. p. 185): "The Gnostics in general, and the Cerinthians in particular, were wont to talk much of the πλήρωμα, or fulness; in which, they meant, a fictitious plenitude of æons was supposed to subsist, and into which spiritual men (such as they esteemed themselves) should hereafter be received. It was the doctrine of the Valentinians (and probably of the elder Gnostics also) that they were themselves of the spiritual seed, had constant grace, and could not fail of being admitted into the plenitude above; while others were in their esteem carnal, had grace but sparingly or occasionally, and that not to bring them so high as the plenitude, but to an intermediate station only. But St. John (i. 16) asserts that all Christians, equally and indifferently, all believers at large, have received of the plenitude or fulness of the divine Logos; and that not sparingly, but in the largest measure, grace upon grace, accumulated grace, or rather grace following in constant succession, grace for grace,—that is, new succours coming on as quick as the former should wear off or cease; or new supplies for the old ones past and gone, without failure or intermission."

10. Καί ἐστε ἐν αὐτῷ πεπληρωμένοι] And ye are made full in Him. Wonderful Mystery! Ye too have been made full of the divinity,—not however by yourselves, but in Him; that is, by His Incarnation. For since our Nature is joined to God in Christ, we have been made partakers of the Divine Nature. See Eph. ii. 6. Theophyl. Cp. John i. 14—16, where St. John declares Christ's absolute pleroma, or fulness, in the assertion that He is the Word of God, God of God, the Maker of all, the true Light, and the Only-begotten of the Father, and full of grace and truth (i. 1—14); and then proceeds to say, that of His fulness we have all received.

So here St. Paul, having spoken of the Divine Nature of Christ, passes on to speak of His Incarnation, and its consequent benefits to us. See above on i. 18, where the same transition is made by means of καί. As S. Hilary well observes (de Trin. ix. 8): The Apostle, knowing well the Mystery of the Incarnation, and that the Philosophy of this world cannot comprehend it, gives this caution, Take heed that no one spoil you, &c. After that, the Apostle, having declared the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in Christ bodily, immediately proceeds to proclaim the Mystery of our assumption into Him. Ye have been filled full into Him. "Ut enim in Eo Divinitatis est plenitudo, ita et nos in Eo sumus repleti; id est, per assumptionem carnis Ejus, in Quo Divinitatis Plenitudo inhabitat." Here is the source of our Hope. "Hujus Spei nostræ non exigua in Eo Potestas est."

The Apostle then goes on to show, how this plenitude in Christ is virtually and really applied to us; and by what means we receive the benefits flowing from His Incarnation and of His Divinity, and are made partakers of His fulness,—namely, by the Holy Sacrament of Baptism.

See the words of Hooker (V. lii.—lxviii.), where that admirable writer, following the method of St. John and St. Paul, first considers Christ's two Natures,—His Godhead and Manhood,—united in His one Person; and then proceeds to show, how the blessings of the Incarnation are communicated to us; and is thus led to declare the doctrine of the Holy Sacraments, instituted by Christ for the purpose of applying personally to each of us the graces and glories of the divine Nature, joined to our Nature in Christ, in Whom we are incorporated by Baptism, and Who is our spiritual food and sustenance in the Lord's Supper.

— πάσης ἀρχῆς κ. ἐ.] And therefore higher than Angels. See above, i. 16.

11, 12. ἐν ᾧ καὶ περιετμήθητε κ.τ.λ.] in whom ye were also circumcised with the true Circumcision.

Your false Teachers may desire to impose Circumcision upon you; but the fact is, you have been circumcised. Ye were circumcised in your Baptism with the true Circumcision, the Circumcision of Christ, the Circumcision of the Spirit, in which ye put off the body of the flesh, and of which the Levitical Circumcision was only a type. See Rom. ii. 29. Phil. iii. 3. And see even the legal and prophetical declarations of the spiritual significance of Circumcision in Deut. x. 16. Jer. iv. 4; and cp. Tertullian, c. Marcion. v. 13.

In this Evangelical Circumcision it was not a part of a bodily member that was cut off, but all the old man was cast off, and ye put on the new man; or, as is expressed in the Baptismal Office, grounded on this passage of St. Paul, the "Old Man was buried, and the New Man raised up." See Rom. vi. 4; and cp. Tertullian (de Res. Carnis, c. 23); and S. Hilary (de Trin. ix. 7), where, commenting on this text, he says, "that the Apostle,—having declared the Mystery of Christ's Nature, and of our Assumption into Him, in Whom the fulness of the Godhead dwells, and we have been filled in Him, by means of His Birth as Man,—proceeds to reveal the rest of the plan of our salvation, saying, 'In Whom ye were circumcised,' &c. We therefore were circumcised, not with the carnal circumcision, but with the Circumcision of Christ; that is, by being born into the new man. For, when we were buried with Him in Baptism, we died to the old man, because the Regeneration of Baptism is the power of the Resurrection. This is the Circumcision of Christ,—not the cutting off of the flesh of our foreskin, but the dying wholly with Him, that so we may live wholly to Him. For we rise again in Him, by faith in that God Who raised Him from the dead."

Thus S. Hilary, who assigns the true spiritual meaning to the words ἐν τῇ ἀπεκδύσει τοῦ σώματος τῆς σαρκὸς, which seems to have escaped many later Expositors. See the next note.

As Christ dying on the cross put off by death the body of

His flesh (cp. St. Peter's expression, "I must soon put off this my tabernacle, i. e. of my body, by death," 2 Pet. i. 14), in order that He might rise again to glory, so we in our Baptism, in which we are conformed to Christ's Death and Burial, put off the body of our flesh, the old man, the body of death (as the Apostle calls it, Rom. vii. 24), in order to put on the new man, the spiritual man, and to rise to grace here, and with a body of glory hereafter, in and through Christ. See Phil. iii. 21, and the note on v. 13, and also on ἀπεκδυσάμενος in v. 15.

Elz. has τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν after σώματος, and τῶν before νεκρῶν in v. 12, but against the preponderance of the best authorities. The sentence gains much in clearness and force from the omission of τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, for the words doubtless apply to the body of Christ by comparison, as well as to ours.—B, D*, F, G have βαπτισμῷ: see on Heb. vi. 2.

13—15. καὶ ὑμᾶς κ.τ.λ.] The Philosophy of this world comprehends not this mystery. God raised Christ from the dead—Christ, in Whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; and He raised us with Him, forgiving us our sins; cancelling the bond of the Law, which by its previous enactments was adverse to us; and Christ took it away from between us and God, and nailed it to the Cross, divesting Himself of His own Body, τῇ ἀπεκδύσει τοῦ σώματος, by Death, and thus making a display of the opposite powers, and triumphing over them. Hilary.

Who can comprehend and express this Mystery? The power of God raises Christ, and this same power raises us in Christ, if it forgives our sins, and cancels the bond, and nails it to the Cross. Christ lays aside the flesh in Death. He displays the Powers of Darkness to scorn, and triumphs over them. Here is the Power of God raising Christ from the Dead. Here is the Power of Christ working in Himself, whatever God works. Christ died as Man, He wrought our Salvation as God. S. Hilary (de Trin. ix. 10), who thus speaks,—

The Apostle knows not the fear of pain in Christ. No. When he was about to declare Christ's Passion, he preached it in the Mystery of His Godhead. When he is describing the work of our salvation by Him, he so represents the death of Christ as to display Him laying aside His flesh in death, and boldly exposing the adverse powers to ignominy, and trampling over them. Therefore, the shame and suffering of the Cross are not to be perverted into occasions of contumely against the weakness of a frail nature; but in Christ's Death we must contemplate the action of Christ's Own Free Will, and the Mystery of His Power, His Courage, and His Triumph. A Triumph indeed it was, for Him,—to be sought by His foes, and when He offered Himself to their hands, to strike them prostrate to the ground (John xviii. 6). A Triumph indeed it was, to stand at the Judgment-seat to be condemned to death, and thence to rise to the Right Hand of Power. A Triumph it was, to be pierced with nails, and to pray for his murderers, to drink vinegar, and to finish the Mystery; to be numbered among the transgressors, and to give a grant of Paradise (Luke xxiii. 43); to be raised aloft on the Tree, and to make the earth tremble; to hang on the Cross, and to make the Sun and Day to flee away; to depart from the body, and to recall the souls of the dead to their bodies; to be buried as dead, and to rise again as God; to suffer all weakness for us, as man, and in all these weaknesses to triumph over all as God. Hilary (de Trin. x. 48).

The comments of S. Hilary here are the best solution of the difficulty supposed by some to exist, as to the subject of these propositions. Do they refer to the Father, or to the Son? They refer to God in Christ, and to Christ as God. See above on i. 19, at end.

14. ἐξαλείψας τὸ καθ' ἡ. χειρόγραφον τ. δόγμασιν] having blotted out (literally, having expunged the letters of a wax-tablet) the handwriting that was against us in its δόγματα, that is, its positive decrees and ordinances.

The χειρόγραφον, or handwriting, was the Levitical Law, written by God's hands: which may also be regarded as a Bond or Syngrapha (συγγράφω), on which the contracting parties write together (συγ-γράφουσι) their own names, and to which they affix their seals. This the Israelites did by pledging themselves to obey all the precepts of the Law (Exod. xxiv. 3; xix. 8. Deut. v. 27).

But what does St. Paul mean by τοῖς δόγμασιν?

We must be careful not so to interpret the word, as to open a door to Antinomian libertinism. Christ did not come to take away the Moral Law. On the contrary, He said, If thou wilt enter into Life, Keep the commandments (Matt. xix. 17). And St. Paul says that "the commandment is holy, and just, and good" (Rom. vii. 12). The New Testament refers us to the Commandments for a summary of our duty, and enforces their perpetual obligation, and declares to us that Christ died for us, in order that we might fulfil the Law.

See above on Gal. iii. 13. Rom. viii. 4.

It cannot, therefore, be truly said (as is said by some) that Christ "nailed all the Mosaic Law, with all its decrees, to the Cross; and it died with Him."

The word δόγματα properly signifies such decrees and ordinances as have no force before their promulgation. See on Eph. ii. 15.

This is evident from the etymology of the word. Δόγμα is ὃ δέδοκται, and it is equivalent to the Latin placitum, id quod placet, and is decreed and published as such, and derives its force, not from its intrinsic morality, but from the authority by which it is decreed and promulgated; and only continues to be in vigour as long as it is enforced by the authority which exacts it, and which may repeal it.

Hence the word δόγματα is used in the New Testament for the placita, or decreta, of the Imperial Power of Rome. (Luke ii. 1. Acts xvii. 7.)

The δόγματα, therefore, of the Levitical Law, are those parts of it which are not grounded upon the basis of the Natural Law, and Immutable Morality (such as the commandments of the Decalogue), which have never been repealed, nor, with reverence be it said, ever can be, inasmuch as they are based on the Unchangeable Attributes of God. But the δόγματα are merely θετικὰ, or positive, accidental, circumstantial, local, and temporary.

Such was

(1) the curse denounced on every act of disobedience to the Law. See Gal. iii. 10—13.

Such also was

(2) Circumcision, and all the ritual ordinances and decrees of the Ceremonial Law.

These ordinances were against us, because we were thus subject to a curse (see on Gal. iii. 10—13), and the ordinances of the Ceremonial Law were a yoke too heavy to bear. (Acts xv. 10.)

Christ dying for us on the cross, has cancelled all these δόγματα, and has taken (ἦρκεν) them out of the way (ἐκ μέσου), out of the midst, so that they no longer stand between us and God.

This is St. Paul's meaning here. Accordingly he says (v. 16), Let not therefore any one judge you in respect of meat and drink, or in respect of a holy day, &c., or sabbath, or new moon, which are a shadow of the future things, but the substance is Christ. These evidently are the δόγματα of which he here speaks. Compare the sense of δογματίζεσθε as explained in ii. 20.

On this subject the reader may see the note above on Rom. vii. 6.

— προσηλώσας α. τῷ σταυρῷ] He has taken it away, having nailed it to His Cross. The allusion seems to be to the cancelling of bonds when they are no longer valid, by transfixing them with a nail; so A Lapide, and Bp. Pearson, who says,—

It is necessary to express our faith in Christ crucified (Eph. ii. 15), that we may be assured that He hath abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments; which if He had not done the strength and power of the whole Law had still remained: for all the people had said Amen (Deut. xxvii. 26) to the curse upon every one that kept not the whole Law; and entered into a curse and into an oath, to walk in God's law, which was given by Moses the servant of God, and to observe and do all the commandments of the Lord their God, and his judgments and his statutes (Neh. x. 29), which was in the nature of a bill, bond, or obligation, perpetually standing in force against them, ready to bring a forfeiture or penalty upon them, in case of non-performance of the condition. But the strongest obligations may be cancelled; and one ancient custom of cancelling bonds was by striking a nail through the writing: and thus God, by our crucified Saviour, blotted out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross. (Col. ii. 14.)

15. ἀπεκδυσάμενος τὰς ἀρχάς] A profound mystery is revealed in these words;

Observe the middle voice, "having put off from himself." This text will be best explained by reference to the Apostle's language above in v. 11, ἀπεκδύσει τοῦ σώματος τῆς σαρκὸς, which, as has been already observed, refers primarily to Christ's putting off of His own body by death;

Hence some Ancient Expositors interpret ἀπεκδυσάμενος here to mean, "having divested Himself of His flesh by death," He made a show of hostile Powers. So Hilary (de Trin. ix. 9), "exutus carnem," and see his observations there, ix. 11. So Augustine, c. Faustum xvi. 29, "Exuens se carnem, principatus et potestates exemplavit," for (adds Aug.) by death the Malignant Powers of the Devil domineered over us, and Christ by dying (i. e. by putting off His mortal body) triumphed over them.

This ancient exposition affords a clue to the true meaning of the words.

Other Interpreters, especially modern ones, interpret ἀπεκδυσάμενος as having little more than an active sense, i. e. having "spoiled Principalities and Powers," having stripped them.

This (as has been observed by Mr. Ellicott, in his valuable edition of this Epistle) is manifestly incorrect.

In order to explain the word ἀπεκδυσάμενος, it must be remembered that

(1) Its plain grammatical sense is "having divested himself of."

(2) Christ's flesh was that by which He was mortal, and by which He was capable of suffering the shame and anguish which Satan and "all the Principalities and Powers" of Darkness and the World inflicted upon Him on the Cross. The body of His Flesh was that by which they had power over him.

(3) Those Principalities and Powers plotted and perpetrated His death, in order to reduce Him, as they imagined, to the lowest abyss of sorrow, suffering, and shame; and in order, as they vainly supposed, to conquer and crush Him for ever.

(4) By dying, He put off from Himself, by his own free Will, the Body of His Flesh. He divested Himself of it.

(5) And by dying He thus divested Himself of that very thing by which they had power over Him.

(6) He thus disentangled Himself from the grasp of those adverse Powers. He divested Himself of them. As (with reverence be it said) Joseph, the type of Christ, extricated himself from the grasp of Potiphar's wife, when he left his own garment in her hand, and fled and got him out (Gen. xxxix. 12); and as Joseph divested himself of her, by disentangling himself of the garment by which she held him, so Christ cast off the garment of His Body (see a similar metaphor in 2 Cor. v. 2. 4); and in casting off His mortal Body, He cast off His weakness. He cast off that by which He was weak, and by which his enemies were strong, for they derived their strength from it. He cast off from Himself His bodily vesture, and with it He also cast off from Himself the Principalities and Powers of Darkness. He unlocked their grasp. He shook them off from Himself with the same ease that Samson shook off his enemies (Judg. xvi. 9—15). He flung them off with the same ease as He cast off His Body, or as He threw aside His raiment, or as He cast off His grave cloths.

He cast off His mortal body in order to raise the same body immortal, and in order to raise us to Immortality. Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more, Death hath no more dominion over Him (Rom. vi. 9). Christ is risen from the dead, and hath raised us with Himself (1 Cor. xv. 20). And thus by Death, even by that Death which Satan had plotted and perpetrated, He overcame Death, and destroyed him that had the power of it, the Devil (Heb. ii. 14), and reconciled us to God by the body of His flesh through death. See above, i. 22, and Rom. viii. 3.

This interpretation is confirmed by the expositions of Chrys., Theodoret, and Theophylact.

— ἐδειγμάτισεν] He displayed them as Captives led in a Triumphal procession before a Conqueror.

— θριαμβεύσας αὐτοὺς ἐν αὐτῷ] having led them in triumph by it. On the word θριαμβεύσας, see above on 2 Cor. ii. 14.

Christ is here represented as a glorious Conqueror riding in victory on the triumphal Chariot of His Cross (Theophyl.), and triumphing over His enemies by it; by that very Cross which they had erected for Him, and to which they had nailed Him. And so Satan was like Haman, nailed to his own gallows, which became like a Triumphal Car to Him for whom he erected it.

It is, therefore, well said by an English Theologian,—

Is it not comfortable and pleasant to behold Christ there on the Cross, standing erect, not only as a resolute sufferer, but as a glorious Conqueror: where having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a solemn show, triumphing over them? (Col. ii. 15.) No conqueror loftily seated in his triumphal chariot did ever yield a spectacle so gallant or magnificent; no tree was ever adorned with trophies so pompous or precious as the Cross. To the external view and carnal sense of men, our Lord was then exposed to scorn and shame; but to spiritual and true discerning, all His and our enemies did there hang up as objects of contempt, quite overthrown and undone. There the Devil, ὁ ἰσχυρὸς, that strong and sturdy one (Matt. xii. 29. Luke xi. 22. Heb. ii. 14), did hang, bound and fettered, disarmed and spoiled, utterly baffled and confounded. There Death itself did hang gasping, with its sting plucked out, and all its terrors quelled (1 Cor. xv. 54. 2 Tim. i. 10); His death having prevented ours, and purchased immortality for us. There the world, with its vain pomps, its counterfeit beauties, its fondly admired excellencies, its bewitching pleasures, did hang up, all disparaged and defaced as it appeared to St. Paul; God forbid, saith he, that I should glory, save in the Cross of Christ, by which the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world (Gal. vi. 14). Dr. Barrow (Serm. xxvi. Vol. iv. p. 595). See also Bp. Pearson (Art. ii. p. 290), who says,—

Contrary to the custom of triumphing Conquerors (of this world), Christ did not sell, but buy us; because while He saved us, He died for us, and that death was the price by which He purchased us; even so this dying Victor gave us life; upon the Cross, as His triumphant chariot, He shed that precious blood which bought us, and thereby became our Lord by right of redemption, both as to conquest and to purchase.

16. Μὴ οὖν] See on v. 8.

The οὖν explains the δόγματα in v. 14. The βρῶσις and πόσις refer specially to the eating and drinking of meats and drinks prohibited by the Levitical Law. See Rom. xiv. 2.

On this, and the following verses to the end of the chapter, see the Epistle of S. Jerome (ad Algasiam, qu. 10, Vol. iv. p. 204).

— ἐν μέρει] in respect of. See 2 Cor. iii. 10.

— ἑορτῆς] of a festival. See above, v. 8, and Gal. iv. 10.

— σαββάτων] The Seventh-Day Sabbath, the Jewish Sabbath, which, as far as it was the seventh-day Rest, had been fulfilled by Christ resting in the grave. See note above on Luke xxiii. 56.

The position of the Day is changed from the seventh to the first day of the week (see on Acts xx. 7), but the proportion of one-seventh of our time to be dedicated to God, which dates from the Creation, and is grounded upon it, and concerns all creatures (Exod. xx. 8—11), remains unchanged, and has received new strength and sanction by its consecration to Christ under the Gospel in the Lord's Day. See above on Matt. xxvii. 62; xxviii. 1, and the authorities quoted in No. xliv. of the Editor's Occasional Sermons, on "The Christian Sunday."

17. τὸ δὲ σῶμα Χριστοῦ] but the substance of them is Christ's. The σῶμα is substantial reality, as opposed to shadow; as σωματικῶς in v. 9.

The shadows of the future things (Heb. x. 1) belonged to Moses and the Law, and to the Jews, but the substance of them belongs to Christ and to the Gospel; and as ye, who have been baptized into Christ, have passed from the shadow to the substance, from the letter to the spirit, therefore if ye return to them, ye renounce the substance for the shadow, and ye forfeit the spirit for the letter. Cp. Theophylact and Augustine (Epist. 149), and Jerome (ad Algasiam, qu. 10).

The word καταβραβευθῆναι is used, when one competitor deserves a prize and another receives it. (Chrys., Theodoret.) The preposition κατὰ indicates that the prize is unfairly adjudged against the deserving candidate.

On the word βραβεῖον, e. g. a palm-branch, or crown, or other prize to a runner in a course, or a charioteer, &c., see 1 Cor. ix. 24. Phil. iii. 14.

Your false Teachers promise you special privileges; but the fact is, they would defraud you of the everlasting crown which you will receive as your reward from the Eternal Judge (βραβεὺς) at the Great Day, if you persevere in the Christian race on which you have entered. See A Lapide here.

— θέλων] By the exercise of his mere will (θέλημα); domineering over you by his will, following his own spirit (Ezek. xiii. 3), dictating to you, with arbitrary wilfulness, terms of salvation contrary to the Divine Will (θέλημα), as revealed in the Divine Word.

This spirit of wilful usurpation, in matters of religious doctrine and discipline (which says, "sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas"), is referred to in another word, ἐθελο-θρησκεία, Will-worship, v. 23, and see above on Gal. iv. 9, θέλετε δουλεύειν.

18, 19. ἐν ταπεινοφροσύνῃ κ.τ.λ.] In affected and mock lowliness of mind and self-abasement, cp. v. 23 (Theophylact), as is shown by what follows, "vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind," which words (as Chrys. observes) prove that it was a vain-glorious humility; Pride in its worst form; Pride dressed up in the disguise of Lowliness. And this is the besetting sin of the human heart, which is more puffed up by false humility than by open pride. Augustine (Ep. 149).

The false Teachers alleged, that man is too unholy to approach God without the mediation of some spiritual beings; and then, in a proud, presumptuous spirit, they intruded into hidden secrets, and made Mediators for themselves in the person of Angels. (See above, v. 18.) And, not holding the Head, they rejected the "only Mediator between God and Man" (1 Tim. ii. 5), Whom God Himself has provided, the Man Christ Jesus. This they did in the name of Humility!

For an exposition of this passage and the context, see Augustine (Epist. 149, tom. ii. p. 764).

— θρησκείᾳ τῶν ἀγγέλων] the worship of Angels. See above on v. 8.

19. ἐξ οὗ πᾶν τὸ σῶμα] See Eph. iv. 16.

20. Εἰ ἀπεθάνετε] If ye died with Christ in your Baptism. See v. 12.

— σὺν Χριστῷ ἀπὸ τῶν στοιχείων τοῦ κόσμου] If ye died with Christ from the elements of the world.

This is best explained by Gal. iv. 8—10, where see note.

The Colossians, like the Galatians, had been heathens, they had been subject to the Elements of this World divinized,—to the Powers of Nature, the Sun, the Moon, the Earth, worshipped as gods. In their conversion to Christianity they died from these; they renounced them, and acknowledged Christ as Lord of all.

But now, by submitting to false Teachers, who arbitrarily required submission to observances (see v. 16) grounded on the elements of Nature, the course of the Sun, and the phases of the Moon, they returned to their ancient bondage. Theodoret on v. 8.

— τί—δογματίζεσθε] why are ye subject to such δόγματα as follow, Handle not, taste not, nor even touch? Chrys. See v. 14.

St. Paul recites, per irrisionem, the words of the false Teachers against whom he was warning them, "Handle not, &c., whereas to the pure all things are pure, and every creature of God is good" (Tit. i. 15. 1 Tim. iv. 4). Augustine (Ep. 149).

21. Μὴ ἅψῃ] Do not handle, do not hang on to, do not grasp, embrace. As to the meaning of ἅπτομαι, see on John xx. 17. 1 Cor. vii. 1.

— μηδὲ θίγῃς] nor even touch, however lightly. So Augustine, 'Ne attaminaveris.' Cp. Trench, Synonyms of N. T. § xvii.

22. ἅ ἐστι πάντα εἰς φθορὰν τῇ ἀ.] which all tend to perish in the using.

These meats, from which you are required by your false Teachers to abstain with such scrupulous superstition, cannot enter into the inner man, and cannot defile the heart; they only go into the mouth, and into the belly, and "are cast out into the draught" (Matt. xv. 17. Mark vii. 19), and perish. (Jerome, Theophyl.) But those evil things,—the pride, and the self-righteousness, and the carnal wilfulness, and the spirit of disobedience to God, and of bondage to the traditions of men, and the low and unworthy thoughts of Christ, which your false Teachers entertain, and would put into your hearts under pretence of humility and self-mortification,—those are very pernicious, and tend to destroy you.

— κατὰ τὰ ἐντάλματα] See above on Matt. xv. 9.

23. ἅτινά ἐστι κ.τ.λ. σαρκός] which things have a show of wisdom in will-worship, and in mortification of the body not held in any honour, and tending to the pampering of the flesh. B omits καὶ after ταπεινοφροσύνῃ.

In order to understand these words, it must be remembered that the False Teachers—

(1) Pretended to humility, but they were puffed up with pride in their fleshly mind (see v. 18);

(2) That they made a great show of mortification of the flesh, but, in fact, they pampered the fleshly mind by wilfulness, and self-righteousness, and other evil passions of the carnal heart;

(3) That instead of holding "the body in any honour," ἐν τιμῇ τινι, and in due reverence (as God had commanded to do), they degraded the body by not holding the Head, in Whom "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," and by denying the Godhead of Christ, the Word Incarnate, "God manifest in the flesh," Who has taken Human Nature both in Soul and Body, and has joined it for ever to the Nature of God, and has thus consecrated the human body, and by means of the death which He had suffered in the "body of His flesh" has overcome death (i. 21) and vanquished Satan, and has raised us from death, and has delivered us from the bondage of the Law, and from its curse, and has given us the adoption of Sons, and has made our bodies to be "members of Himself" (1 Cor. vi. 15), and to be "Temples of God" (1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19), and has carried the Body into Heaven, and has seated it in Glory at the Right Hand of God; and Who has also sanctified even the inferior creatures, which God has given for the food of the body, and has restored them to us, to be used by us freely and thankfully, as pure to those who are purified by Him. See on 1 Cor. vi. 12. 1 Tim. iv. 3, 4. Tit. i. 15.

(4) That these false Teachers, by their irreverence toward Christ, the Incarnate God, had not maintained the Body in honour (ἐν τιμῇ), but had robbed it of all its dignity and glorious prerogatives, and had taken away the best safeguards of its purity and holiness, and had opened a wide door to the pampering of the flesh (πρὸς πλησμονὴν τῆς σαρκὸς) by surfeiting and uncleanness.

For ample illustration of the meaning of the word πλησμονή, fulness, satiety, surfeiting, the reader may consult the numerous passages cited by Wetstein, p. 290, in almost every one of which the word πλησμονή is used in a sense of voluptuous and vicious excess. The words πρὸς πλησμονὴν τῆς σαρκὸς do not here signify "for the satisfying of the flesh in its necessary cravings," but "for the satisfying of the flesh in its sensual concupiscence."

(5) That, therefore, while they affected Humility, they were eaten up with Pride; and that their pretences to bodily Mortification, by means of which they professed to elevate themselves and their hearers to superior degrees of purity and sanctity, tended rather to carnal licentiousness and to voluptuous sensuality, and dissolute indulgence in fleshly lusts.

(6) That the meaning above assigned to the words οὐκ ἐν τιμῇ τινι, "not in any honour" (that is, not held in any honour, whereas the body ought to be held in great honour as being a "member of Christ" and a "Temple of God"), is confirmed by St. Paul's words in another Epistle, "This is the will of God,

(7) Deep wisdom there was, and prophetic foresight, in these words of St. Paul to the Colossians, as was afterwards proved by the history of that remarkable sect which flourished in their neighbourhood, the sect of Montanus, which, commencing with the principles here censured by the Apostle, of arbitrary will-worship, and specious professions of lowly self-abasement, and rigid asceticism, and corporal mortification, and "neglect of the body," developed itself in fanatical excesses and Antinomian licentiousness.

St. Paul's vigilant eye descried the seeds of this evil, and he endeavoured to uproot them. The history of this Phrygian sect affords a practical comment on St. Paul's Epistle to the Church of Colossæ.

See the primitive collections on this subject in Routh's Reliquiæ Sacræ, ii. 55—62, ed. 1814.

— ἐθελοθρησκείᾳ] will-worship. For an excellent exemplification of the results of ἐθελοθρησκεία in the History of the Christian Church, the reader may see the Sermon of By. Andrewes "On the Worshipping of Imaginations," Vol. v. p. 55—70.

Ch. III. 1. Εἰ οὖν συνηγέρθητε] If therefore ye rose together with Christ in your baptism, seek those things that are above, where Christ your Head is sitting (ἔστι, not ἐστὶ, is emphatic) on the Right Hand of God.

If we live well we have died, and are risen again. He who lives ill lives not; let him die now, in order that he may escape eternal death. "Mutetur, ne damnetur." And what is it to live well? To mind those things which are above; to seek for happiness above, and not on Earth. Augustine (Serm. 231).

— τὰ ἄνω ζητεῖτε] Hence Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch in the second century (ad Autolyc. ii. § 17), speaking of the Creation, says, "Four-footed beasts are like images of men who mind earthly things (Phil. iii. 19); but they who live righteous lives soar aloft, like birds, on the wings of the soul, and mind those things that are above."

3. ἀπεθάνετε γάρ] For, in your baptism, ye died to this world, in order that you might attain to that world where is no death. No one dies in that world, to which none will ever come who has not died to this world. He must die by that death which God's elect die, and by which their heart passes to heaven, while they still abide in this mortal flesh on earth. This is the death of which the Apostle here speaks.

This Death is Love, which is strong as Death (Cant. viii. 6). This Love is Death to the World, and Life with Christ in God. By it we ascend from Earth to Heaven. Augustine (in Joann. Tract. 65).

— ἡ ζωὴ ὑμῶν κέκρυπται] your life has been hid with Christ in God, Ye live a hidden life; a life concealed from the observation of this world (Luke xvii. 20), who perhaps despise you as dead. Ye have been engrafted in Him. Be ye good trees. Now, in the world's eye, is your winter; to men ye appear like dry sticks. Your life is hid with Christ. Ye are dead to the world, dead in appearance, but not dead in reality; dead, as to show of luxuriant leaves, but not dead in your spiritual root. Your root is Christ. His coming will be your summer. Then ye will put forth a glorious foliage. Ye will appear with Him in glory. And the leafy fig-trees of this world will be withered by His Coming. See Augustine (Serm. 36).

4. ὁ Χριστὸς—ἡ ζωὴ ἡμῶν] See John xi. 25, and cp. Ignat. ad Ephes. 3, Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς τὸ ἀδιάκριτον ἡμῶν ζῆν.

— ὅταν—φανερωθῇ] when He, Who is now invisible in Heaven, shall have been made manifest to every eye by the glory of His coming to Judgment. (2 Thess. ii. 8. Rev. i. 7.)

5. Νεκρώσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς] Mortify your members that are upon the earth. For, your Head is in heaven; there He lives, and thither, by His Ascension, He has raised you, who are His members. (Eph. ii. 6.) He is your Life; your Life is hidden invisibly in Him, and you must therefore mortify your members upon the earth, so that they may not weigh down your heavenly members and destroy your heavenly life. You must be dead to earth, in order to live in heaven. Cp. Phil. iii. 20; and Irenæus (v. 12), who says: "Harum depositionem Apostolus præconatur, et eos, qui talis operantur, velut carnem et sanguinem tantùm existentes non posse regnum cœlorum possidere." While we mortify our members upon the earth, we quicken our members in heaven. The death of the one is the life of the other. Augustine (in Epist. Joh. Tract. 9).

Unless we die to the world, we cannot live to God. Therefore St. Paul says of himself, "The world is crucified to me, and I to the world;" and then he adds, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." (Gal. ii. 20.) S. Gregor. on 1 Kings ii.

— πορνείαν] Put in apposition with μέλη, as being their works, unless they are mortified. See Winer, § 59. 8, p. 469. Or, as the word may be interpreted, "membra dicebantur ipsorum ea vitia, quæ in membris habitabant ipsorum, modo locutionis (quâ exprimitur) per id quod continet, id quod continetur, sicut dicitur, 'Totum forum loquitur' cùm homines loquuntur qui sunt in foro." Augustine (de Continentiâ, § 30, vi. p. 527, where he gives an exposition of this passage).

8. ἐκ τοῦ στόματος] out of your mouth,—that mouth by which you receive the communion of the Lord's Body. Theoph.

9. ἀπεκδυσάμενοι] seeing that ye have put off the old man. (Authorized Version.) See on Eph. iv. 22.

10. ἀνακαινούμενον] who is being renewed daily. The new man was born in you at your regeneration in Baptism, but needs the daily renewal of the Holy Ghost. See on Tit. iii. 5.

On the difference between νέος and καινὸς see Eph. iv. 24.

On the word εἰκὼν see 1 Cor. xi. 7, where man is called εἰκὼν καὶ δόξα Θεοῦ. It is used by the LXX in Gen. i. 26, 27; v. 1. 3; ix. 6, where God is said to have created man in His own likeness,—that is, His intellectual, rational, moral, and spiritual likeness. See Barrow's Serm. vii. Vol. iv. p. 163. 171, on Gen. i. 27, "On the being of God proved from the frame of Human Nature."

11. τὰ πάντα καὶ ἐν πᾶσι Χριστός] but Christ is all and in all, and so God is all in all. This is the fruit of the Incarnation. He who had existed in the form of God, and took on Him the form of a servant, is to be confessed as ever existing in the glory of God the Father. He is in Him, in Whom He was before.

And now, God has become all in all by the Mystery of the Incarnation, in order to make us conformable to the likeness of God. This is our gain, our advancement. The Only Begotten 20 t Τὰ τέκνα, ὑπακούετε τοῖς γονεῦσι κατὰ πάντα· τοῦτο γάρ ἐστιν εὐάρεστον ἐν Κυρίῳ.

21 u Οἱ πατέρες, μὴ ἐρεθίζετε τὰ τέκνα ὑμῶν, ἵνα μὴ ἀθυμῶσιν.

22 x Οἱ δοῦλοι, ὑπακούετε κατὰ πάντα τοῖς κατὰ σάρκα κυρίοις, μὴ ἐν ὀφθαλμοδουλείᾳ ὡς ἀνθρωπάρεσκοι, ἀλλ' ἐν ἁπλότητι καρδίας, φοβούμενοι τὸν Κύριον. 23 y a Ὃ ἐὰν ποιῆτε, ἐκ ψυχῆς ἐργάζεσθε ὡς τῷ Κυρίῳ καὶ οὐκ ἀνθρώποις, 24 εἰδότες ὅτι ἀπὸ Κυρίου ἀπολήψεσθε τὴν ἀνταπόδοσιν τῆς κληρονομίας. Τῷ Κυρίῳ Χριστῷ δουλεύετε. 25 z Ὁ γὰρ ἀδικῶν κομιεῖται ὃ ἠδίκησε, καὶ οὐκ ἔστι προσωποληψία.

IV. 1 a Οἱ κύριοι, τὸ δίκαιον καὶ τὴν ἰσότητα τοῖς δούλοις παρέχεσθε, εἰδότες ὅτι καὶ ὑμεῖς ἔχετε Κύριον ἐν οὐρανῷ.

2 b Τῇ προσευχῇ προσκαρτερεῖτε, γρηγοροῦντες ἐν αὐτῇ ἐν εὐχαριστίᾳ, 3 c προσευχόμενοι ἅμα καὶ περὶ ἡμῶν, ἵνα ὁ Θεὸς ἀνοίξῃ ἡμῖν θύραν τοῦ λόγου, λαλῆσαι τὸ μυστήριον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, δι' ὃ καὶ δέδεμαι, 4 ἵνα φανερώσω αὐτό, ὡς δεῖ με λαλῆσαι.

Son of God, although He was born as man, is no other than God, all in all. And by Him our manhood is advanced. We are advanced to a glory conformed to Him, and are renewed into the knowledge of God. This is what the Apostle says: "Exuti veterem hominem in actibus suis, et induti novum qui innovatur in agnitionem Dei, secundùm imaginem Ejus qui creavit Eum. Consummatur itaque homo imago Dei." Man recovers the divine image which he had lost. And being created anew, he obtains the perfection of his creation by agnition of his God, and by being thus His image, and advancing to Eternity by piety, and by Eternity abiding for ever, the Image of His Creator. S. Hilary (de Trin. xi. 49).

The Apostle, in saying that "the new man is being renovated to perfect knowledge," shows that man, who did not know God, is renovated by that knowledge which has God as its object. And by saying "according to the image of Him that created him," he declares the restoration of man, made in the beginning in the image of God.

12. σπλάγχνα οἰκτιρμοῦ] bowels of mercy. Cp. Luke i. 78. 2 Cor. vi. 12. Phil. i. 8; ii. 1. Elz. has οἰκτιρμῶν.

13. ὁ Χριστὸς ἐχαρίσατο] Christ freely forgave you. Forgiveness of sins, attributed to God in Christ (Eph. iv. 32), is here attributed to Christ, and thus the Godhead of Christ is declared. See above on i. 19, 20.

14. σύνδεσμος] τὸν δεσμὸν τῆς ἀγάπης τοῦ Θεοῦ τίς δύναται ἐξηγήσασθαι; Clem. Rom. i. 49.

For ὅ, the reading of A, B, C, F, G, Elz. has ἥτις.

15. Χριστοῦ] So A, B, C*, D*, F, G.—Elz. Θεοῦ. In this Epistle St. Paul dwells specially on the dignity of Christ. See i. 1, and in this chapter vv. 1, 2, 3. 11. 13. 16, 17.

— βραβευέτω] Let Peace preside and decide the contest. When there is a competition in your heart between two rival passions, good and evil, Love and Hatred, let Peace sit there as Arbitress, and put an end to the dispute, and award the palm to Love. Cp. Theodoret and Theophylact, and the authorities in Wetstein, especially Clemens Alex. Prot. p. 45.

On the literal meaning of βραβεύω, βραβεὺς, see on ii. 18.

16. ψαλμοῖς κ.τ.λ.] See Eph. v. 19. Elz. has καὶ before ὕμνοις and ᾠδαῖς and τῇ καρδίᾳ here, against the preponderance of the best authorities; Elz. also omits τῇ before χάριτι, and has Κυρίῳ, not Θεῷ.

17. ἐν ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ—δι' αὐτοῦ] Do all in His name, and offer your praises through Him, and not through Angels or any other Mediators. Theophyl.

For an exposition of this text see Dr. Barrow's Sermon xxxiii. "Of doing all things in the Name of Christ," Vol. ii. p. 247. Elz. has Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ. The reading in the text is that of A, C, D*, F, G, Lachmann, Ellicott.—Elz. has καὶ before Πατρὶ, but it is not in A, B, C.

18. Αἱ γυναῖκες] With this and the eight following verses compare the parallels in Eph. v. 21—25; vi. 1—9. After τοῖς Elz. has ἰδίοις and Θεὸν for Κύριον in v. 22.

20. ὑπακούετε—κατὰ πάντα] See also v. 22, where κατὰ πάντα is also used. An example of a precept proceeding on the charitable supposition that the other party will do its duty; for if Parents and Masters order any thing contrary to God's Law, then Children and Servants "must obey God rather than men." (Acts v. 29.) The words κατὰ πάντα are not in Eph. vi. 1. 5.

On St. Paul's different modes of address to different Churches, as here exemplified, see on Eph. vi. 1, 2.

22. ὀφθαλμοδουλείᾳ] So A, B, D, E, F, G. Elz. ὀφθαλμοδουλείαις.

23. Ὃ ἐάν] So the majority of the best MSS.—Elz. καὶ πᾶν ὅ τι ἐάν.

25. κομιεῖται] Receive back virtually and in effect, though not in the same form. See Eph. vi. 8. 1 Cor. xv. 37, and Winer, § 66, p. 547, who compares John xii. 5, where the ointment is spoken of as to be given to the poor, whereas it was its price, after it had been sold, that was to be so bestowed.

CH. IV. 1. Οἱ κύριοι] See Eph. vi. 9. Elz. has οὐρανοῖς here. A, B, C have οὐρανῷ.

5. πρὸς τοὺς ἔξω] Toward those who are not within the Church of Christ. 1 Thess. iv. 12. 1 Cor. v. 12, 13.

— τὸν καιρὸν ἐξαγοραζόμενοι] Redeeming for yourselves the opportunity (ἐξ) out of the hands of the Evil One. The Days are Evil, in this world, sold as it were under bondage, and it is for you to rescue the Opportunity out of the grasp of your Ghostly Enemy. Seize, as it were, the Opportunity by the forelock, and make it your own. See above on Eph. v. 16, where the reason of the precept is expressed, which the Apostle does not therefore repeat here.

6. ἅλατι ἠρτυμένος] seasoned with salt. See on Mark ix. 50.

— εἰδέναι] that you may know. On the infinitive cp. Acts xv. 10. Heb. v. 5. Winer, § 43, p. 283. Ellicott.

7. Τύχικος] Tychicus. See Eph. vi. 21, 22.

8. ἵνα γνῷ τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν] So Elz., Tisch., De Wette, Alf., Ellicott, with C, D, E, I, K, and a majority of Cursive MSS. and ancient Versions. A, B, D*, F, G, Griesb., Lachm., Meyer, Scholz. have ἵνα γνῶτε τὰ περὶ ἡμῶν. But, the very purpose (αὐτὸ τοῦτο) for which St. Paul sent Tychicus to the Colossians, was not (it would seem) in order that they might know how St. Paul was faring, but that he might know whether they were standing stedfast in the faith against the attempts of the false Teachers.

The communication of tidings concerning the Apostle was no doubt a purpose, and would be a consequence of his mission, but not the final cause.

9. σὺν Ὀνησίμῳ—ἀδελφῷ] with Onesimus, the faithful and beloved brother. See Philem. 10—15.

Onesimus had been the slave of Philemon. To how high a dignity has he here been raised, to become the brother of St. Paul! Theophyl.

St. Paul had just been giving Christian counsel to Masters and Slaves, members of the Church at Colossæ, and he now makes a practical application of his own precepts, by sending to them Onesimus, a slave, who, when a heathen, had defrauded his master Philemon at Colossæ, and had run away from him to Rome; but now, having been converted to Christianity by St. Paul, is restored to Philemon, and to them, as one of themselves, a "faithful and beloved" brother in Christ (see below, the Introduction to the Epistle to Philemon), and a confidential messenger of the Apostle; and is commended to them as such, in this Epistle, which was to be read publicly in the Churches of Phrygia, Asia, and the world, and which has been openly read and received every where as divinely inspired Scripture from that day to this.

How much native truth, courage, and beauty is there in Christianity, which enabled the Apostle to speak thus of a runaway slave, to the inhabitants of that city from which he had fled! What other religion in the world could have done this? See below, p. 325—8, Introduction to the Epistle to Philemon.

10. Ἀρίσταρχος ὁ συναιχμάλωτός μου] Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner. Aristarchus of Thessalonica in Macedonia, who was with St. Paul at Ephesus (Acts xix. 29), and accompanied him and St. Luke to Jerusalem with the alms (Acts xx. 4) in the voyage to Rome (xxvii. 2), where he now was a sharer in his captivity. Cp. Euseb. ii. 22.

— Ἀσπάζεται ὑμᾶς] The salutations in this Epistle are the same as in that to Philem. 23, 24. Each of these two Epistles, however, furnishes some new incidents. Here (v. 12 and i. 7) Epaphras is called a servant of Christ, and a fellow-servant of St. Paul, there (v. 23) he is called συναιχμάλωτος, a fellow-captive.

Here also Aristarchus is called a fellow-captive, but there he is classed with the fellow-labourers of the Apostle (v. 24). Both Epaphras and Aristarchus were sharers in St. Paul's labours and in his bonds.

It may reasonably be inferred from the non-occurrence of the name of Philemon, the Colossian, in the salutations of this Epistle, that the Epistle to him was sent at the same time as this Epistle; otherwise he would have been greeted here.

— Μάρκος ὁ ἀνεψιὸς Βαρνάβα] Mark, cousin of Barnabas. On the meaning of ἀνεψιὸς, see Euseb. iii. 11, who calls Symeon τὸν ἀνεψιὸν of the Saviour, because Cleophas, his father, was the brother of Joseph; and cp. Wetstein here, p. 295, and Lobeck, Phryn. p. 306, who says, "Hesychio ἀνεψιοὶ sunt fratrum filii ἐξάδελφοι in versione Alexandrina, et Scriptoribus Christianis."

It is probable, that the Colossians, and other Christians of Phrygia (a country which St. Paul visited in company with Timothy, Acts xvi. 1—6), very soon after the separation which took place between the Apostle and Barnabas, on account of the temporary defection of his relative, St. Mark (Acts xv. 37), had heard of St. Mark's defection, and of the separation between Paul and Barnabas. Cp. Theodoret here.

There would, therefore, be something very graceful and affecting to their minds in this reference, on St. Paul's part, to St. Barnabas and to St. Mark. It would seem to say, Barnabas was tender-hearted to St. Mark his kinsman: he did for him a kinsman's part; and Mark, though he faltered for a time, has profited by his kinsman's kindness, and by my severity; and he has now returned to me, and to the service which he quitted for a time, never to leave it more. You may have heard of the separation which took place between Barnabas and me; you may have heard of St. Mark's dereliction of me. You will therefore rejoice to hear that now he is with me; I send you his greetings. I have given you commandments concerning him; and if he comes to you, I desire you to receive him. Cp. note below on 2 Tim. iv. 11, and above, on Acts xv. 39.

This friendly mention of Barnabas here, as well as of St. Mark, the son of St. Peter in the faith (1 Pet. v. 13), was not without its use in reminding the Judaizing Colossians that St. Paul, who had resisted Peter and Barnabas at Antioch, when they sided with the Judaizers there (Gal. ii. 11), was now on terms of amity with them both. See next note.

11. οἱ ὄντες ἐκ περιτομῆς] who are of the Circumcision. See Acts v. 17 as to the participle.

Do not therefore imagine, that I am singular in condemning the imposition of Circumcision, and other Levitical ordinances, as necessary to Salvation. (See above, ii. 11, 12.) They of the Circumcision themselves, whom I have mentioned, concur in what I have said; and Timothy, whom I myself circumcised in charity to the Jews (see on Acts xvi. 3), joins with me in writing this Epistle (i. 1). Cp. on Gal. i. 2.

— οὗτοι μόνοι] these only are my fellow-workers. Therefore it does not seem probable that St. Peter was now at Rome.

12. Ἐπαφρᾶς] See on v. 10. Epaphras was now detained in captivity with St. Paul. (Philem. 23.) This may account for the fact that he, who was a Colossian (v. 12), and had been instrumental in evangelizing Colossæ (i. 7), was not sent with the Epistle.

— πεπληροφορημένοι] fully assured. See on Luke i. 1; and above, ii. 2. Elz. has πεπληρωμένοι. The reading in the text is in A, B, C, D*, F, G.

13. πόνον] So the major part of the best authorities. Elz. ζῆλον.

The word πόνον, painfulness, labour, intimates that a Pastor, though absent from his flock in body, may, and must, labour for them in spirit, especially by prayer (v. 12), and, if need be, by suffering for them in bonds; as Epaphras did for his charge at Colossæ, and as Paul did for the whole Church of Christ. (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1.)

This sentence, therefore, is like a reply to those at Colossæ who might have misinterpreted the absence of Epaphras from his flock, into a sign of indifference to their welfare. He also informs the Colossians, in his Epistle to Philemon, that the absence of Epaphras from Colossæ was not voluntary, but that he was detained there by force, as a confessor for the faith which he had taught. (Philem. 23.)

Compare the similar instances of Apostolic thoughtfulness in 2 Tim. iv. 11. 20.

14. Λουκᾶς ὁ ἰατρὸς ὁ ἀγαπητός] Luke the Physician, the beloved; more expressive than "Luke the beloved Physician."

It would seem that St. Luke was known to the Colossians as a Physician. The neighbouring city of Laodicea was a great medical school. (Strabo, xii. p. 580.) It may have had professional attractions for him.

This special mention also of an ἰατρὸς as ὁ ἀγαπητὸς may have been designed by St. Paul to impart a Christian dignity to the Medical profession, which was not held in high repute by the polite nations of Antiquity; and to remind its practitioners, particularly those of Laodicea, to whom this Epistle was to be sent (iv. 16), of the honour and holiness of the medical calling, as ministering to the human body, which has been ennobled and consecrated by the Incarnation of Christ. See on ii. 23.

He might also thus intimate, that though special and supernatural gifts of healing were vouchsafed to the Church in those days (1 Cor. xii. 9. 28. 30), yet that even then the ordinary means were not superseded, which were provided and bestowed by Almighty God for alleviating the sufferings of humanity through the art and skill of the Physician.

These words, Luke the Physician, the beloved, suggested in early times the allusion which is adopted by the Church of England in her Collect for St. Luke's Day, where he is called a "Physician of the Soul;" and a reference is made to the "wholesome medicines of the doctrine delivered by him" for the healing of the "diseases of the Soul," as may be seen in S. Jerome's Epist. 50, ad Paulinam, iv. p. 574, where he says, that the Acts of the Apostles seem at first to be merely an Historical Book, and to describe the Infancy of the Church; but if we remember that their Author is Luke, whose praise is in the Gospel, we shall acknowledge that all his words are medicines of the soul in sickness.

Probably St. Luke was already known to the Gentile Churches of Asia by his Gospel. See on 2 Cor. viii. 18.

It would seem also, that the Acts of the Apostles were written by St. Luke at this time. See Introduction to St. Luke's Gospel, and on Acts i. 1. Cp. Iren. iii. 14, and Euseb. ii. 22, Jerome, Cat. Eccl. Sor. 7.

— Δημᾶς] See Philem. 24, Δημᾶς, Λουκᾶς, οἱ συνεργοί μου. 2 Tim. iv. 10, Δημᾶς με ἐγκατέλιπεν. Whence Theodoret rightly infers that the Second Epistle to Timothy was posterior to this.

16. ὅταν ἀναγνωσθῇ] when this Epistle shall have been read. Observe St. Paul takes it for granted that this Epistle will be publicly read in the Church of Colossæ; a proof that the precept he had given as to the public reading of his Epistles from the beginning (see 1 Thess. v. 27) had been generally understood, received, and complied with by the Churches to which they were sent.

This second precept for the communication of this Epistle to another Church, and for the reception of another Epistle from that Church, is also a specimen of what was to be done with all his Epistles; and doubtless this precept also was obeyed. And thus the Epistles of St. Paul were diffused throughout the world, and have been preserved by public reading, and by the multiplication of copies, in their original integrity.

— τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας] the letter coming to you from Laodicea; not the letter written from Laodicea, but the letter written to Laodicea, and coming on to you from Laodicea. See Winer, § 66, p. 554, who compares Luke ix. 61; xi. 13, ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ δώσει Πνεῦμα ἅγιον.

The Epistle here referred to was probably St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. See above, the Introduction to that Epistle, p. 272.

On the special uses of the Ephesian Epistle to the Colossian Church, see on Eph. iii. 10.

17. Ἀρχιππον] Archippus, of Colossæ. Cp. Philem. 2, Ἀρχίππῳ τῷ συστρατιώτῃ ἡμῶν. Theodoret.

— διακονίαν] ministry; his pastoral office. Here is a public charge to Archippus, more needful in the absence of Epaphras the spiritual Pastor of the Colossians; a charge also to the Colossians themselves to obey Archippus as over them in the Lord. This is an example of Paul's prudence in government. He gives a public command to the Pastor to do his duty to the flock; and thus he also virtually commands the flock to recognize and obey their Pastor. Theophyl.

18. Ὁ ἀσπασμός] See 2 Thess. iii. 17.

— Μνημονεύετε μου τῶν δεσμῶν] Remember of me the bonds. More expressive than τῶν δεσμῶν μου. (Cp. 1 Tim. iv. 12.)

St. Paul's bonds were providential. If he had been continually moving from place to place in missionary Journeys, the Church might perhaps have never possessed his Epistles to the Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians, and the Philippians. And how much force do his Apostolic appeals in behalf of the Gospel derive from his Sufferings for it! She therefore has good cause to remember his bonds with thankfulness. The Word of God, which is there written, is not bound, but it has had force to restrain the Evil One who bound the Apostle, and to deliver immortal souls from the bonds of Satan and of Sin, and to open to them the gates of Paradise and Heaven.

When the Apostle, who was then bound to a Roman soldier, took up the pen to write the words just preceding, he must himself have been reminded of his own bonds. And the fact that those Epistles (to the Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon, and the Philippians) were written by him in this state of durance and restraint, and yet were designed to minister comfort to others, and that they have never ceased to cheer the Church of Christ, is certainly one which is worthy of everlasting remembrance.

— ἡ χάρις] See 1 Thess. v. 28.

TO

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

It has been already observed, in the Introduction to the Epistle to the Colossians, that there is an intimate connexion between that Epistle and the Epistle to the Ephesians.

Both those Epistles were written by St. Paul in his imprisonment at Rome, at the same time; and probably both were sent into Asia by the hand of the same messenger, Tychicus; and both, it would appear, were to be communicated, by a reciprocal interchange, to the Churches of Ephesus and Colossæ [1].

The main doctrine of both these Epistles is also one and the same,—the doctrine of the Incarnation of the Son of God.

God manifested in the flesh, the Sun of Righteousness, is, as it were, the centre, around which, if the comparison may be allowed, these luminaries revolve, diffusing their spiritual light in the firmament of the Church.

One of these two Epistles, the Epistle to the Ephesians, has specially a positive character. Reflecting the lustre of the Incarnation, it displays the doctrine of Church-Communion and of Church-Unity, as genuine emanations radiating from the Evangelic Shechinah of Christ, the Light of the World, pitching His tabernacle in human flesh [2]. And it exhibits the household charities of private life, especially the institution of Marriage, as invested with heavenly beauty, by the effluence of glory which streams upon it in exhaustless abundance from the countenance of Christ.

The other Epistle, that to the Colossians, has also its own peculiar character. It borrows the light of the Incarnation, in order to dispel the mists of Error, and the clouds of Heresy. Its office in this respect has been already considered [3].

Attached to the Epistle to the Colossians is another Epistle, the shortest of St. Paul's writings, the Epistle to Philemon. It was sent at the same time from the same place and by the same hands to the same city as the Epistle to the Colossians. It is, as it were, its satellite.

It performs also a similar work. It dissipates the gloom of darkness by the light of Christ's Incarnation. It puts to flight one of the worst social evils that brooded over the world, that of Slavery. It does this, by teaching the doctrine of universal fellow-membership, and of universal brotherhood, consequent on the Incarnation of Jesus Christ.

"Philemon (says Theodoret [4] in the fifth century) was a Christian citizen of Colossæ, and his house still remains in that city; and he had a slave called Onesimus, who committed a theft on his master, Philemon, and fled to Rome, and was caught in the Evangelical net by St. Paul, who was there at that time in imprisonment. The Apostle, having judged him fit to receive Holy Baptism, sent him back to his master with the present Epistle.

"If St. Paul showed such care for a fugitive slave, and instructed him in spiritual doctrines, and made him an heir of salvation, was there any one in the world, whom the Apostle would have deemed to be beneath his regard?"

Philemon was of Colossæ, and was the master of Onesimus, and afterwards his brother in the Lord; and Onesimus is called a Colossian by St. Paul [5], and he accompanied Tychicus, the bearer of St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossian Church, which seems to have been sent at the same time as this private commendatory Letter from the Apostle to Philemon.

Hence we find a mention made of Archippus in both the Epistles [1], "whom I suppose (says S. Jerome [2]) to have been Bishop of the Church at Colossæ; wherefore he is admonished by St. Paul to fulfil his ministry with zeal and diligence. However this may be, it is evident that Philemon, Archippus, and Onesimus, were of Colossæ, and that the four Epistles which I have mentioned,—those to the Philippians, Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon,—were written about the same time, and that Tychicus was sent with Onesimus by St. Paul from Rome to Colossæ [3]."

Let us observe now, how this short Epistle was instrumental in performing the great work of emancipating the immense population of Slaves which crowded the cities of Europe and Asia.

The Divine Founder of Christianity did not tempt the vast multitude of slaves, with which the Roman Empire then swarmed, to receive the Gospel by promising them Liberty. He cancelled no existing rights, but He christianized them all. He broke no bonds of allegiance, but He dignified and hallowed them, and changed them from iron fetters into the cords of a man. He addressed the slave by the voice of St. Paul,—Art thou called, being a slave? Art thou baptized into Christ, being a bondsman? Care not for it; let not thy slavery afflict thee. Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. But if thou mayest be made free, use it rather; that is, seize not liberty with force, but embrace it with joy [4].

He reproved by St. Paul those false Teachers who would inveigle slaves into Christianity by promising them freedom. "Let the slaves count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and His doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have Christian masters, let them not despise them because they are brethren, but rather do them service because they are faithful and beloved." "These things (says St. Paul to Timothy [5]) teach and exhort." The Apostle also condemns the false Teachers, who perverted Christian liberty into a plea for licentiousness. "If any man teach otherwise than this, and consent not to wholesome words, and to the doctrine according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, doting about perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, supposing that godliness is a trade." "From such teachers (says the Apostle) withdraw thyself [6]." And then he cheers the Christian slave by saying, "But godliness with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content."

Still more, St. Paul taught the slave to obey his master in all lawful things for the sake of Christ. "Slaves, be obedient to your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of heart as unto Christ; not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but as the slaves of Christ; doing the will of God from the heart, with good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men, knowing that whatever good thing any man doth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free [7]."

Thus he dignified their service. It was a work done to Christ, and would be rewarded by Him with an inestimable recompense at the Great Day.

Here was the comfort of the Christian slave; thus his service became one of holy love and religious joy. He knew that the eye of his heavenly Master was upon him, in the field, in the house, in the vineyard, in the garden, at the mill,—even in the prison, and, if God so willed it, on the cross. The slave here would be a saint hereafter. He would be free for ever. He might not receive the cap of liberty upon earth, but he would wear a crown of immortal glory for ever in heaven.

Such were the exhortations and consolations of Christ, speaking by His Apostle to the Slave.

He had also instruction for Masters.

St. Paul wrote to the Church of Colossæ, the city of Philemon; and in that Epistle he had inserted a mention of Onesimus. At the close of it [8], he gave Christian precepts to masters concerning their duty to their slaves; and then he passed on by a natural transition to speak of the Colossian fugitive. And in what terms? He joins the slave Onesimus with his beloved Tychicus, the bearer of the Epistle; he calls Onesimus "the faithful and beloved brother," one of themselves. "All my state (says he) shall Tychicus declare unto you, whom I have sent unto you, with Onesimus, the faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you."

Thus he commended Onesimus to the love of the Church. And as if this were not enough, the noble-hearted Apostle, "Paul, the aged, the prisoner of Christ," wrote a special letter to Philemon, in behalf of Onesimus, "his own son, whom he had begotten in his bonds;" a letter unrivalled in tenderness, and pathos, and refined delicacy, and courtesy,—rendered more attractive by its genial playfulness of style, and breathing a divine spirit of Christian wisdom and love.

Philemon, the beloved friend of St. Paul, one whom (as the Epistle says) St. Paul habitually remembered in his prayers, one in whose love he had great joy, "because the bowels of the saints were refreshed" by his mercy, must have been moved by the touching appeal of the Apostle in behalf of his son Onesimus, whom he had begotten in his bonds, and for whom he had proffered such an earnest petition. "Receive him, not now as a slave, but above a slave, a brother beloved, specially to me, and how much more unto thee both in the flesh and in the Lord. If thou countest me therefore a partner, receive him as myself." Philemon must have yielded with joy to such an appeal as this, backed, as it would be, by the intercessions of the Colossian Church, whose sympathies had been wisely enlisted by St. Paul in behalf of the returning Onesimus.

The fact also, that the Epistle to Philemon was communicated by him to the Church of his own city, and was publicly read in the Church in the age of Philemon, and has continued to be so read to this day, authorizes us to conclude, that the hopes of the Apostle were realized, that his petition was granted, and that the Christian slave was welcomed as a brother by his Christian master, and by the Christian Church of Colossæ.

This conclusion is confirmed by the circumstance already mentioned, that the house of Philemon at Colossæ, to which Onesimus returned, was long afterwards pointed out to the affectionate memory of the faithful.

Some persons in ancient times[1] expressed surprise, that this short Epistle, addressed to a private person, on a private occasion, should be publicly read in the Church, and be received as a part of Canonical Scripture.

But the world's History has fully justified the Church of Christ in this respect.

In the age when it was written, Europe was filled with slaves. Wheresoever the word 'servants' occurs in the New Testament, we must understand 'slaves,'—slaves purchased with money, or taken in war, or reared from slaves in the house of their master. Phrygia, in which Colossæ was situated, was the land of slaves. A Phrygian was another word for a slave[2]. Nothing could be more miserable than their condition.

But Christianity was for all. How would it affect them? What would it do for them? Would it leave them in their present misery? Would it mitigate the rigour of their sufferings? And if so, by what means?

The answer to these questions is supplied by the EPISTLE to PHILEMON.

That short letter, dictated from "the hired house" of the aged Apostle, a prisoner at Rome, may be called a divine Act of Emancipation; one far more powerful than any edict of Manumission promulgated by Sovereigns and Senates,—an Act, from whose sacred principles all human statutes for the abolition of slavery derive their virtue,—an Act, which by its silent influence, such as characterizes all genuine reformations, gradually melted away and thawed the hardships of Slavery, by softening and warming the heart of the master with the pure and holy flame of Christian love; an Act, which while it thus ameliorated the condition of the Slave, not only did not impair the just rights of the Master, but greatly improved them, by dignifying service, and by securing obedience to man as a duty done to Christ, and to be hereafter rewarded by Him; and by changing the fearful slave into an honest servant, and a faithful brother; and by binding every Onesimus in bonds of holy communion with every Philemon, in the mystical body of Christ, in the fellowship of the same Prayers, and of the same Scriptures and Sacraments, in the worship of the same Lord, and in the heritorship of the same heaven.

[1] S. Hieron. Procem. in Epist. ad Philem.

Therefore the writing of this short Letter was like a golden era in the History of mankind. Happy is it for the world, that this Epistle, dictated by the Holy Ghost, has ever been read in the Church as Canonical Scripture. And every one, who considers the principles laid down in this Epistle, and reflects on the Reformation they have wrought in the domestic and social life of Europe and the World, and on the felicitous results which would flow from them in still greater abundance, if they were duly received and observed, will acknowledge with devout thankfulness to God, that inestimable benefits, civil and temporal, as well as spiritual, have been conferred on the world by Christianity.

St. Paul did not constrain Philemon to emancipate his slave Onesimus. But he inculcated such principles as divested Slavery of its evils. The Gospel of Christ, as preached by the holy Apostle, did not exasperate the Slave-owner by angry invectives, and by contumelious and contemptuous sarcasms. It did not embitter him against the Slave, and injure the interests of the Slave himself by an acrimonious advocacy of his rights, and by a violent and intemperate partizanship; and thus inflict damage and discredit on the sacred cause of Emancipation. But, by christianizing the Master, the Gospel enfranchised the Slave. It did not legislate about mere names and forms, but it went to the root of the evil, it spoke to the heart of man. When the heart of the master was filled with divine grace, and was warmed with the love of Christ, the rest would soon follow. The lips would speak kind words, the hand would do liberal things. Every Onesimus would be treated by every Philemon as a beloved brother in Christ.

Here is the genuine specific for the abolition of Slavery. Here also is the true groundwork for the extinction of Caste in India. It is to be found in the doctrine of the Incarnation of the Son of God, and in the incorporation of all Nations and Families of the earth in the mystical Body of Christ. Wise will be the Sovereigns, Senates, and States, who recognize this Truth.

Πρὸς Φιλήμονα] So A, D, E, F, G.

1. Παῦλος] He does not add the title of Apostle (as in other cases, with some observable exceptions, see 1 Thess. i. 1) because he was not writing as an Apostle, but as a friend, as "Paul aged, and in bonds." See on v. 9.

— δέσμιος Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ] See Eph. iii. 1.

He refers to his bonds in the other Epistles written at this time (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1. Col. iv. 18. Phil. i. 7. 13, 14. 17), but (as S. Jerome here observes) he does not commence any other Epistle with this appellation of bondsman.

There was something appropriate in introducing himself as a "bondsman of Jesus Christ" in a letter where he pleads the cause of a bond-slave.

— Τιμόθεος] Timotheus is associated with St. Paul, in like manner, in the beginning of his Epistles to the Colossians and Philippians, written at this time. See on Col. i. 1, and S. Jerome here, who rightly says, "Scribit Paulus ad Philemonem, Romæ vinctus in carcere, quo tempore mihi videntur ad Philippenses, Colossenses, et Ephesios, Epistolæ esse dictatæ."

2. ἀγαπητῇ] beloved. The ancient authorities are nearly equally balanced between this reading and ἀδελφῇ, sister.

It seems less likely that ἀδελφῇ would have been altered by the copyists into ἀγαπητῇ, than that ἀγαπητῇ should have been changed by them into ἀδελφῇ, for the reason suggested by Theodoret here, who says, that "some persons were staggered by St. Paul's application of this word beloved to Apphia, who was the wife of Philemon. This offence has been caused by the degenerate practice of the world. But formerly the word beloved was honourable."

Besides, it is not improbable, that ἀδελφῇ was a gloss on the word Ἀπφίᾳ, for (as Hesychius says) Ἀπφία was a name of endearment for a sister.

— Ἀρχίππῳ τῷ συστρατιώτῃ ἡμῶν] to Archippus, our fellow-soldier. Archippus was a Christian pastor at Colossæ (Col. iv. 7), and a fellow-soldier of St. Paul, in fighting the good fight of faith against the enemies of the Gospel. (Theodoret, Jerome.) Cp. Phil. ii. 25, where Epaphroditus is called by the same title.

— τῇ κατ' οἶκόν σου ἐκκλησίᾳ] to the Church assembling at thine house. Philemon was probably a person of substance, and in the lack of a public edifice set apart for Christian worship, appears to have opened his own mansion for the reception of a congregation of Christians.

This was one way in which Philemon might be said to have "refreshed the bowels of the saints" (v. 7), and to have shown his Christian faith and love to his poorer brethren. Here probably it was that St. Paul preached when at Colossæ.

No wonder that this same house should have been pointed out as an object of religious interest even till the fifth century. See Theodoret.

This concession of some apartment in their own houses for the purposes of the public worship of the Christian Church, "a sect every where spoken against" (Acts xxviii. 22) in those days, was an act of zeal and courage on the part of the wealthier members of the Christian community, and seems to have elicited special expressions of notice, approval, and affection from St. Paul and the other Apostles. (Rom. xvi. 5. 23. Col. iv. 15. Cp. 2 Tim. i. 16; iv. 19. 3 John 6, 7.) See Joseph Mede (Discourse on religious places of worship in ancient times, in reference to 1 Cor. xi. 22, Works, p. 324), who says, "Those who were saluted under this title, as having a Church in their house, were such as in their several cities had bestowed and dedicated some part or place within their dwellings, to be an oratory for the Church to assemble in, for the performance of divine duties according to the rule of the Gospel."

5. ἀκούων] hearing, probably from Epaphras of Colossæ, then at Rome. (Col. i. 7; iv. 12.)

6. ὅπως] in order that; depending on προσευχῶν. The meaning of this clause, which has been deemed by some to be a difficult one, may perhaps be explained by the considerations stated on v. 2.

The House of Philemon appears to have been opened for the public worship of Christians at Colossæ, and is specially saluted by St. Paul; and he now prays that a blessing may rest upon it, that the communion of thy faith (i. e. the charitable benevolence with which thou in thy faith hast opened thy house and thy purse, and hast communicated them, and dost now communicate them, for the use of others, thy fellow-members in Christ) may become effectual in the full knowledge of every blessing that is in us into (i. e. into union with) Christ Jesus: that is, that it may be instrumental in communicating the blessings of the Gospel, in the dispensation of the Word and Sacraments to the Christians at Colossæ, gathered together under thy roof, for their spiritual incorporation into, and for their spiritual life in, and their eternal reception into glory in, Christ Jesus. For I had much joy and comfort in thy love, because the bowels of the Saints have been refreshed by thee, brother.

On this use of κοινωνία, see 2 Cor. viii. 4; ix. 13. Cp. Gal. vi. 6. Phil. iv. 15.

Hence κοινωνία is here interpreted ἐλεημοσύνη by Theodoret.

7. τὰ σπλάγχνα τῶν ἁγίων κ.τ.λ.] the bowels; that is, the cravings and yearnings "of the saints," that is, of the Christians, those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, "have been refreshed by thee."

The word σπλάγχνα, bowels, the inner seat of affection, signifies longing desires, as in v. 20, ἀνάπαυσόν μου τὰ σπλάγχνα, and Phil. i. 8, "I long after you in the bowels of Christ."

The sense is, they had been refreshed in body and soul by thy love, which has been, as it were, poured forth upon them abundantly, like a refreshing stream; and has been received by them, as cool water by a thirsty ground, into the inmost recesses of their heart. Cp. Theophyl.

9. τοιοῦτος ὢν ὡς] being such an one as Paul, an old man, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ.

A beautiful specimen of Christian humility and genuine pathos. I might be bold to command thee in Christ's name, by which I am strong; but thou dost not need any argument derived from my strength; and for love's sake I rather beseech thee by my own weakness, by my years, and by my chains. Such language, the language of entreaty, best befits me now in my prison, and in my old age.

Not therefore now, as St. Paul the Apostle, do I command thee (and therefore he had not prefixed the title of Apostle, as in other Epistles, see v. 1), but as Paul, an old man, and a prisoner for Christ, do I entreat thee.

The Apostle might have confidently commanded, in Christ's name (ἐν Χριστῷ), but he rather entreats, which he does with great authority, as being Paul, and now an old man, and a prisoner of Jesus Christ. Jerome.

Have regard, I pray thee, for Paul; for his old age, for his bonds, which he wears for the Gospel. Theodoret.

So the ancient Expositors; but many modern Interpreters place a colon at παρακαλῶ, and begin a new sentence with τοιοῦτος.

But such an arrangement seems to embarrass the meaning, and to impair the rhythm of the sentence, and also to mar the beauty of the sentiment.

As to St. Paul's age at this time, it may be remembered that St. Paul is called a νεανίας at the time of St. Stephen's martyrdom; but as he was employed by the Chief Priests, and sent by them with authority to the city of Damascus to execute a public commission in their name (Acts xxii. 5), and as he appears to have been at that period a member of the Jewish Sanhedrim (see Acts xxvi. 10), he could hardly have been less than thirty years of age at that time.

If St. Stephen's Martyrdom was in A.D. 33 (as seems probable, see "Chronological Synopsis" and "Chronological Table" prefixed to the Acts of the Apostles; cp. 1 Tim. i. 13), then St. Paul, writing this Epistle about A.D. 63, would be not less than sixty years of age at this time.

St. Paul never exaggerates any thing, for the sake of producing an effect. And he could hardly be less than sixty years old, when he appealed to his old age as a ground of regard to his intercession for Onesimus.

The words of the Apostle here seem to have been in the mind of S. Ignatius (ad Ephes. 3).

10, 11. Ὀνήσιμον,—τὸν ποτέ σοι ἄχρηστον, νυνὶ δὲ σοὶ καὶ ἐμοὶ εὔχρηστον] As to the play on the word Ὀνήσιμος, continued in v. 20, see A Lapide, "Olim erat anonesimus, id est, inutilis, imò noxius, jam est Onesimus, id est, utilis; olim Paganus, jam Christianus; olim fur, jam fidelis servus; olim profugus, jam redux, ut tibi sit assecla fidus, et perennis." So also Wetstein, p. 381; and see Winer, p. 561, note; and above on Matt. xxvi. 2. Luke xxii. 15. Cp. Acts iv. 30; viii. 31.

11. ὃν ἀνέπεμψα] whom I send back to thee,—the epistolary aorist. See Gal. iv. 8. Eph. vi. 22. Phil. ii. 28.

The Apostle St. Paul would not tempt away Slaves from their Masters, but sent them back to them as brethren. Here is one of the practical uses to be made of the present Epistle. Chrysostom (in Procem.). See above, Introduction, p. 328.

12. τὰ ἐμὰ σπλάγχνα] the son of my bowels. Gen. xv. 4. 2 Sam. xvi. 11.

"He is my son born from my own bowels" (Theodoret and Suicer in voce, p. 998). Cp. Gal. iv. 19, τεκνία μου οὓς πάλιν ὠδίνω.

Observe the zeal and magnanimity of the Apostle. He is confined in a prison, bound with chains, manacled to a soldier, and separated from his friends, yet he does not feel pain; he knows no other thought but the Gospel, and to beget children to Christ. See Jerome.

13. ἐβουλόμην] I was wishing. It was my wish.

14. οὐδὲν ἠθέλησα κ.τ.λ.] I willed to do nothing. See on 1 Thess. ii. 18. Tittmann (Syn. N. T. p. 124).

15. ἵνα—ἀπέχῃς] in order that you may receive him as your own friend and brother everlastingly.

The conjunction ἵνα is here used, not to indicate the design of the agent himself, Onesimus, but of Almighty God permitting him to act as he did. Cp. 2 Cor. iv. 7; and as to the sense, see the words of Joseph to his brethren, Gen. xlv. 5. 7, 8.

17. με] So C, D, E, F, G, I. Elz. ἐμέ.

18. τοῦτο ἐμοὶ ἐλλόγει] set that down to my account. A, C, D*, F, G have ἐλλόγα, which has been received by Lachm., Tisch., Alf., Ellicott, but no example has been quoted of its use. See Fritz. (ad Rom. v. 13), where ἐλλογεῖται is used.

19. Ἐγὼ Παῦλος ἔγραψα] I Paul wrote it with my own hand, i. e. wrote the words which just precede, viz., If he owes thee any thing, set this down to my account, and also I write this present clause with my own hand.

It does not follow from this sentence that the whole of this Epistle was written with the Apostle's own hand; rather it would seem, that he made this engagement of repayment to be more emphatic and significant by distinguishing it from the rest of the Epistle, and by taking the pen from the hand of his secretary, and by inditing that particular clause with his own autograph, well known to Philemon.

— ἵνα μὴ λέγω σοι] not to remind thee. See 2 Cor. ix. 4, ἵνα μὴ λέγωμεν ὑμεῖς.

— σεαυτόν μοι προσοφείλεις] Thou owest even thyself to me, in addition to the favour which I now ask at thy hands.

k 2 Cor. 7. 16. l 2 Cor. 1. 11. Phil. 1. 25. & 2. 24. Heb. 13. 2. m Col. 1. 7. & 4. 12. n Acts 12. 12, 25. & 15. 37. & 19. 29. & 20. 4. & 27. 2. Col. 4. 10, 14. 2 Tim. 4. 10, 11. 1 Pet. 5. 13.

On this use of προσοφείλω, see Xenophon, Pædag. 3. (Wetstein.)

Hence it would appear that St. Paul had been in person at Colossæ, and had preached there. He addresses Philemon as his disciple. (Theodoret.) See above, Introduction to the Epistle to the Colossians, p. 305—8.

20. ἐγώ σου ὀναίμην] May I have joy of thee. May I gather fruit from thee, as from a good tree, rich in works of love. Theodoret.

So Ignatius (ad Eph. 2), ὀναίμην ὑμῶν διὰ παντὸς, ad Polyc. 6. Mag. 2. 12. Rom. 5.

There is a play on the word ὀνήσιμος in ὀναίμην—ἐγὼ δὲ Ὀνησίμου ὄνησίν σου ἔχοιμι. See v. 11.

— ἐν Χριστῷ] So A, C, D[e], F, G, I.—Elz. ἐν Κυρίῳ.

— τὰ σπλάγχνα] See v. 7.

22. ἑτοίμαζέ μοι ξενίαν] prepare me a lodging. A thought concerning himself, introduced here not for the sake of himself, but because, as he adds, they prayed to God that his presence might be vouchsafed to them, not only for their personal gratification, but that he might impart to them some spiritual gift, as an Apostle. (Rom. i. 11.) Cp. Phil. i. 25; ii. 24, where a similar hope of liberation is expressed.

23, 24. Ἀσπάζεταί σε] The same salutations as in the Epistle to the Colossians (Col. iv. 10. 12. 14), with the exception, that in that Epistle Philemon himself is not saluted, a circumstance which confirms the opinion, that this Epistle was sent to him at the same time as the Epistle to the Colossians was sent to them.

On the names here mentioned, Epaphras, see note, Col. i. 7; iv. 12; Mark, see on Col. iv. 10, where Mark is mentioned as about to leave St. Paul, and probably as about to come to Colossæ. Here he is mentioned as still with St. Paul. Another evidence of the contemporaneousness of the two Epistles.

There is a striking contrast between St. Mark and Demas thus placed side by side. The Apostle might seem now to say, Mark had once forsaken me (Acts xiii. 14; xv. 38, 39), as Onesimus had left thee, but he has now returned to me as Onesimus returns to thee.

Concerning Demas the Apostle afterwards wrote, "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world" (2 Tim. iv. 10); never, it is probable, to return to him in this life.

Luke has bequeathed his Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles to the Churches of Christ; and as some of the Apostles from being Fishermen were made Fishers of men, so Luke the Physician became a Physician of the soul; and of him the Apostle says in another place, that he is the brother whose praise is in the Gospel through all the Churches (2 Cor. viii. 18). As long as his writings are read in the Churches of Christ, so long will Luke, the beloved physician (Col. iv. 14), continue to exercise his medical art. S. Jerome.

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

THIS Epistle appears to have been written at the close of St. Paul's two years' detention at Rome, mentioned in Acts xxviii. 30,—that is to say, in the Spring of A.D. 63.

I. That it was written when he was then in prison, may be inferred,

From the references in it to his bonds[1], and to the manifestation of those bonds in Christ to the "whole of the Prætorium and to all the rest[2]."

From the special salutation sent in it to the Philippians from the Christians of Cæsar's household[3]; and

From the confident declaration of the Apostle, that he will be released from his confinement, and be enabled to see them again soon[4].

These particulars do not harmonize with the circumstances of any other imprisonment, either

At Cæsarea, which was followed by his voyage to Rome, whither he was sent on his own Appeal to Cæsar[5], or

With his last imprisonment at Rome, which did not end in his liberation, but in his death[6].

Therefore this Epistle was written in his first imprisonment at Rome, which lasted two years.

II. It was written at the close of that imprisonment.

This may be inferred from the following circumstances:

1. Time had been given for the occurrence of a series of events. The Philippians had already had time to hear that St. Paul had been sent to Rome, and that he was detained there; and they had had time to make a collection for him, and to send Epaphroditus from Philippi with pecuniary supplies to St. Paul at Rome. Epaphroditus had fallen sick at Rome in consequence of his exertions in behalf of the Apostle, and had had time to recover from that sickness which brought him "nigh unto death;" and he had now so far recovered his health as to be in a fit state to travel back again as far as Macedonia, to which he seems to have carried the present Epistle[7].

2. St. Paul expresses his hopes in this Epistle to send Timothy shortly to Philippi[8]; and he adds, that he will despatch Timothy as soon as he knows how it will fare with himself[9]. He is therefore now contemplating the issue of his Trial, and he preannounces what it will be[10], and expresses a hope of coming soon to Philippi[11].

He sends Epaphroditus immediately to the Philippians, in order to comfort them[12]; and he will also send Timothy speedily, as soon as he is enabled "to see the things concerning himself[13],"—that is, the result of his Trial, at the imperial Tribunal, and his own future consequent movements.

If St. Paul had expected to remain much longer at Rome after the date of this Epistle, he would probably have despatched Timothy immediately, in order that he might receive at Rome that report concerning the spiritual state of the Philippians, which he was very anxious to have [1].

But he awaited the decision of his cause, in order that he might apprise the Philippians of the result, and in order also, that having arranged his own plans, he might inform Timothy of the place where he may find him, and to which Timothy is to come, with the report which the Apostle desires to receive of the Philippians through him.

3. In the other Epistles written during his two years' detention at Rome, the Apostle has still with him some of the companions and fellow-labourers who had accompanied him from Cæsarea to Rome, or had followed him to Rome. Such were Luke, Aristarchus [2], Tychicus, Epaphras, Marcus [3]. But none of these are mentioned in this Epistle, as now with him. Tychicus had gone to Asia with the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians [4]. Mark had probably gone to Asia [5]. No person but Timothy is mentioned in this Epistle as present with the Apostle; and it is expressly said that no other of his companions and fellow-workers was now with him [6].

III. Indeed, it seems probable from internal evidence, that the Epistle to the Philippians was written after the hearing of the Apostle's cause in the presence of the Emperor and his Assessors, and in the interval between that hearing and the public declaration of the sentence, by which he was eventually set at liberty [7].

IV. These considerations are illustrated, and this conclusion is confirmed, by the substantial similarity, combined with certain circumstantial variations (harmonizing with the differences respectively of St. Paul's two imprisonments at Rome), between this Epistle to the Philippians, and that Epistle which was the last of all the Epistles written by him, viz. the Second Epistle to Timothy.

Both these Epistles were written from Rome. Both were written by St. Paul when in prison.

The Epistle to the Philippians was written at the close of his first imprisonment, when he had an immediate prospect of release by acquittal.

The Second to Timothy was written at the close of his second imprisonment, when he had an immediate prospect of release by death.

The substantial resemblances between these two Epistles, and also their circumstantial differences, may be seen in the following passages among others. Compare—

Phil. i. 23—25.	2 Tim. iv. 6.
τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν ἔχων εἰς τὸ ἀναλῦσαι . . . . οἶδα ὅτι μενῶ καὶ συμπαραμενῶ πᾶσιν ὑμῖν.	καιρὸς τῆς ἐμῆς ἀναλύσεως ἐφέστηκε.

Phil. ii. 13, 14.	2 Tim. iv. 7.
Where he is describing his being still in the course, not having attained the goal.	I have now finished my course, and the crown of glory is laid up for me.

Compare also the conclusions of both these Epistles.

Phil. iv. 20.	2 Tim. iv. 18.
τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Πατρὶ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων . . . . ἡ χάρις τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν.	ᾧ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων . . . . Ὁ Κύριος Ἰησοῦς μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματός σου.

Thus these two Epistles stand in a peculiar relation to each other, to St. Paul and to Christendom.

The Epistle to the Philippians may be regarded as the Apostle's farewell Epistle to the Gentile Churches. Accordingly, we find in it a compendious summary, and brief recapitulation of what he had already delivered to the Churches in his other Epistles [1].

In the Second Epistle to Timothy, he delivers a parting charge and spiritual legacy to his beloved son in the faith, the Bishop of Ephesus, and to other chief Pastors, whom he had set over the Churches founded by him.

In the former, that to the Philippians, he declares his desire to die, and yet his willingness to live. In the latter, the Second Epistle to Timothy, he exults in the prospect of approaching martyrdom. In the one he takes leave of the Flock; in the other, he bids adieu to the Shepherds. In both he ascribes glory to God for ever and ever; and he pronounces an Apostolic Benediction on all Christian Churches and Pastors in the Name of the Lord Jesus Christ, for Whom he had lived, and for Whom he died, and with Whom he longed to be for evermore.

Ch. I. 1. Παῦλος] Paul. Why does he not add the title of Apostle? He does so in all his other Epistles, except the two earliest (to the Thessalonians), and to the Hebrews, and to Philemon, for which omissions there were special reasons. See 1 Thess. i. 1. Philem. 1, and Heb. i.

Probably this may be ascribed to his modesty, and also to his love. This was the last Epistle that he wrote to a Gentile Church; he was now Paul the aged, and had almost run his Apostolic race. He was still an Apostle to Timothy and Titus (1 Tim. i. 1. Tit. i. 1. 2 Tim. i. 1), and had an Apostolic charge for them. But he had done his work, for the Churches of Asia and Greece. He was now like Aaron before his death, laying aside his sacred garments, in order that others might wear them (Num. xx. 28). He would not magnify himself; but the nearer he was to heaven the more lowly he would be. He would divest himself of his official dignity, and leave behind him an example of self-abasement after a life of self-denial and self-sacrifice for Christ.

In like manner, the beloved disciple, St. John, who was privileged in some respects above the rest, lays aside the title of Apostle, and calls himself "the elder," or simply "John." (2 John 1. 3 John 1. Rev. i. 1. 4. 9; xxii. 8.)

Besides, St. Paul was writing to the Philippians, of whose love he was well assured. He had no need to speak to them in the tone of authority, or to stand on his Apostolic dignity in addressing them. He would, therefore, lay aside his official title, and show his affection towards them by not writing to them as an Apostle, but as a friend and a father.

It may also be worthy of consideration whether St. Paul had not now constituted Epaphroditus to be the Chief Pastor and Apostle of the Philippians. He gives him the title of their Apostle in ii. 17; and Theodoret and others of the ancients affirm that he had been appointed to be their Bishop, and that the chief spiritual authority over them was now committed to him as the successor of the Apostle in that city. See below, note on σὺν ἐπισκόποις.

— καὶ Τιμόθεος] and Timotheus. At the commencement of both the Epistles to the other Macedonian Church, Thessalonica, another name is inserted between those of St. Paul and Timothy, viz. the name of Silvanus or Silas. And he had been St. Paul's chief fellow-labourer at Philippi, as well as at Thessalonica. See Acts xvi. 25.

If, therefore, the Epistle to the Philippians had been written at the same time as the two to the Thessalonians, the name of Silvanus would doubtless have been associated with that of Paul and Timothy.

But this Epistle was written at the close of St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome. See above, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 332.

Then Timothy was with him, and accordingly is associated with him at the commencement of this Epistle, and of that to the Colossians and Philemon written about the same time.

But Silas was not with him then. Indeed it is observable, that after St. Paul's first visit to Corinth, and soon after his first visit to Philippi (Acts xviii. 5), the name of Silas or Silvanus never occurs in the Acts of the Apostles, nor is he mentioned in any Epistle of St. Paul written after that time, as present with him. Indeed it disappears altogether from the Apostolic history.

Here, then, is a remarkable coincidence of a negative kind between the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul.

This coincidence derives additional interest from the inquiry,—

What then became of Silas?

From a hint casually let fall in another part of the New Testament, it appears probable, that he laboured, perhaps with St. Mark, among the Asiatic Churches, to which Mark seems to have been known (Col. iv. 10. Philem. 24. 1 Pet. v. 13, compared with 1 Pet. i. 1), especially the Jewish Christians, to whom Silas would be acceptable, from his connexion with Jerusalem (cp. Acts xv. 22), and was associated with another Apostle, St. Peter, who mentions him with St. Mark, and characterizes him as "the faithful brother, Silvanus." (1 Pet. i. 12.)

Such coincidences as these are not undeserving of notice. A forger who had before him St. Paul's two Epistles to the Thessalonians—the first written of the Epistles—and who saw the name of Silvanus there associated with that of St. Paul, and even taking precedence of that of Timothy, would hardly have failed to give him a place in other Epistles, especially in an Epistle to another Church in Macedonia.

The simultaneous evanescence of the name of Silas from the Acts and the Epistles, is also a silent evidence of the consistency and authority of both.

— ἐν Φιλίπποις] in Philippi. On the history and character of Philippi, and on the labours and sufferings of Paul and Silas there, about ten years before the date of this Letter, on the occasion of his first visit, see above, notes on Acts xvi. 12—40; xvii. 6.

St. Paul paid another visit to Philippi, and spent an Easter there, in his journey from Corinth to Jerusalem with the alms for the poor Christians there (Acts xx. 6), soon after he had written the Epistle to the Romans, and about four years before the date of this Epistle.

S. Polycarp, disciple of St. John, and Bishop of Smyrna, early in the second century wrote an Epistle, still extant, to the Philippians, at their request, in which he refers to this Epistle of St. Paul. He there says (cap. 3), Neither I, nor any like me, can keep pace with the wisdom of the blessed and glorious Paul, who, being with you in the presence of those who then lived, preached the Word of Truth with zeal and soundness; and when absent, wrote an Epistle (ἐπιστολὰς, cp. Acts ix. 2. 1 Cor. xvi. 3. 2 Cor. x. 9. 11. Cp. Polyc. Ep. 11) to you, by which, when you study it, you will be able to be built up into the Faith that has been given you, which is the mother of us all, if Hope follows, and Charity, both toward God, and Christ, and our neighbour, leads the way.

— σὺν ἐπισκόποις] with the episcopi, viz. with those of the second order of Ministers, who were called Πρεσβύτεροι, or elders, on account of their age and dignity, and were also called Ἐπίσκοποι, or overseers, because they had oversight of the flock. See Chrys.

and Theodoret here, who affirm that Epaphroditus, who was then with St. Paul at Rome, and therefore was not addressed in the Epistle, and whom he calls their Ἀπόστολος (ii. 25), was their Chief Pastor; and so Blunt, Early Church, p. 81.

According to this ancient Exposition, we have three orders of Christian Ministers at Philippi:

1. Epaphroditus, the successor of the Apostle at Philippi.

2. Presbyters under him, here called Ἐπίσκοποι, as overseers of the flock.

3. Deacons.

Theodoret says (on 1 Tim. iii.), that in the Apostolic age "they called the same persons by the two names, Πρεσβύτεροι, Elders, and Ἐπίσκοποι, Episcopi or Overseers; and that the Persons who are now (i. e. in the fifth century) called Ἐπίσκοποι, were then called Ἀπόστολοι, Apostles. But in course of time they reserved the name of Apostle to those who had been truly such (viz. those sent by Christ), and gave the name Episcopus to those who had been formerly called Apostles. Thus (adds Theodoret) Epaphroditus was the Apostle of the Philippians."

See below, on 1 Tim. iii. 1, 2, where other reasons are adduced for the opinion that the word ἐπίσκοποι is here applied to the second order of Ministers in the Church of Philippi; and this opinion seems most probable, even after the elaborate argument of Bp. Pearson (Vind. Ignat. ii. 13, p. 534—575), who connects the words σὺν ἐπισκόποις with Παῦλος καὶ Τιμόθεος.

The opinion of Theodoret, that Epaphroditus was the Chief Pastor of Philippi, with the two orders of Presbyters and Deacons under him, is entitled to careful consideration.

It had been the Apostle's usage from the beginning to ordain Presbyters in every Church. (Acts xiv. 23.)

The Apostle may also have already placed some person at Philippi as Chief Pastor over the Presbyters there, as he afterwards placed Timothy at Ephesus, and Titus in Crete; and this person may have been Epaphroditus.

St. Paul was now approaching the end of his Apostolic career, and he would naturally be anxious to provide for the spiritual oversight, after his own departure, of the Churches which he had founded. As Moses appointed Joshua to fill the place which he himself was about to vacate (Deut. xxxi. 7—23); as Kings at the close of their reign have been accustomed to name their successors; as the great Conqueror of the East, the son of that king from whom Philippi derived its name, distributed, before his death, his own dominions among his Generals, so the Apostle of the Gentiles, at the end of his career, would now probably be disposed to delegate his own Apostolic functions to several persons, whom he set as his successors over special portions of his own spiritual province.

The Church of Philippi was one of the first that had been founded by St. Paul; and it was one which, from the affectionate regard that it had shown to the Apostle from the beginning of his ministry (iv. 15, 16), was specially entitled to his paternal attention; and would be one of the best qualified, by its ripeness in Christian virtue, to receive such a settled form of Church-Government, as the Apostle designed to leave behind him, and would be one of the best disposed to co-operate with him in giving stability to such a system of Church-Polity.

It is therefore probable, that one of the first examples of Diocesan Episcopacy—that is to say, an ecclesiastical form of Government, in which a Chief Pastor, succeeding the Apostles in their ordinary spiritual functions, has under him two other orders of Ministers, namely, Priests and Deacons, and has the oversight of them, and of the people in a particular City and its precincts (παροικία)—was exhibited to the world at Philippi.

3. ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ μνείᾳ ὑμῶν] on the whole of my remembrance of you, intimating that the whole of his recollections were entirely those of joy, unalloyed by any admixture of regret or disapprobation.

5. ἐπὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον] for your communion toward the Gospel,

(1) by your incorporation into the fellowship of the body of Christ;

(2) by your continual indwelling in it by faith and love, and harmonious co-operation with it and its Ministers in sympathy and suffering, and affectionate contribution towards its spiritual life by almsgiving and prayers. See iv. 15. Rom. xii. 13; xv. 17. 2 Cor. viii. 4. Heb. xiii. 6.

See Chrys. and Theophyl. here, who say, How did the Philippians thus communicate? By acts of love to St. Paul, and by thus associating themselves in labours and sufferings for the Gospel, and so communicating with Christ. Cp. Matt. x. 40, and the explanatory word συγκοινωνοὺς in v. 7 here.

— ἀπὸ πρώτης ἡμέρας—ἄχρις ἡμέρας Χριστοῦ] from 'the first day'—a happy expression, as marking the beginning of their new life. From that first day their view is extended to the Day of Christ, the Last Day; or, in other words, from their first Resurrection to spiritual life, even to their second Resurrection to life Everlasting. Cp. Rev. xx. 5, 6—12, 13. John v. 25.

7. ἔν τε τοῖς δεσμοῖς—ὄντας] inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the Gospel, you all are my partners in my grace.

He says 'partners in grace,' because (as he expresses it in v. 29) not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for Him, was freely given them as a grace (ἐχαρίσθη). Theodoret.

The proof of their partnership in his grace was shown by their kindness towards the Apostle at Rome (iv. 10), now that he was a prisoner for Christ, and His Ambassador in bonds. (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; vi. 20. Philem. 9.)

— ἀπολογίᾳ] my public defence. See on v. 13.

8. ἐν σπλάγχνοις Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ] in the bowels of Christ Jesus, with Whom I am incorporated, and in Whom I dwell, and He in me, so that He lives in me (Gal. ii. 20); and I yearn for you with His love, even with the σπλάγχνα Θεοῦ. Cp. Luke i. 71. "Induimus et quasi transformamur in viscera Christi cùm Ejus misericordiam, compassionem et amorem induimus." A Lapide.

9. προσεύχομαι, ἵνα] I pray that—. The ἵνα marks both the subject and object of the prayer. See Mark v. 18; vii. 26; viii. 22; xiv. 35. Luke viii. 31. 1 Cor. i. 10; xvi. 12. 2 Cor. ix. 5. Winer, p. 300.

10. δοκιμάζειν τὰ διαφέροντα] to approve the things that are excellent: literally, that differ by superiority. See Rom. ii. 18.

— εἰλικρινεῖς καὶ ἀπρόσκοποι] pure and without offence. Two things are here predicated of them; first, that they are pure; and, secondly, that they do not trip and stumble in their Christian course, are not offended and scandalized by suffering, or by evil examples.

the part of the Philippians in approving the things that were excellent, not to stumble at, and to be staggered by, the things which had happened to St. Paul.

They had seen the Apostle delivered by a miracle from prison in their own city (Acts xvi. 26), and yet he has now been imprisoned again; he has lain in prison for two years at Cæsarea, and now he is in prison at Rome. And they hear of no miracle wrought to deliver him from his bonds. How was this to be explained? Was he now deserted by the Power which once had rescued him at Philippi?

The Apostle, therefore, might well warn them not to stumble and be perplexed by what they heard: well might he assure them that all that had befallen him had tended "to the furtherance of the Gospel," and that the chains by which he was bound were instruments in God's hands for manifesting the Gospel to the World.

On the word εἰλικρινὴς = καθαρὸς, ἄδολος, ἀμιγὴς (Hesych., Suid.), see on 1 Cor. v. 8; and on ἀπρόσκοπος = ἀσκανδάλιστος (Hesych.), cp. Acts xxiv. 16.

11. καρπὸν—τόν] So the majority of the MS. authorities, and so Griesb., Scholz., Lach., Tisch., Alf., Ellicott. The Vatican MS. omits τόν. Elz. has καρπῶν—τῶν. On καρπὸς δικαιοσύνης, see James iii. 18.

12. Γινώσκειν—εἰς προκοπὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου] For an historical demonstration of the striking truth of this assertion of the Apostle, see above on Acts xxv. 23.

Indeed this sentence might form a motto not only to the Book which records his sufferings, but also to the History of the Church. Cp. Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles, p. xix—xxiv.

13. ὥστε—δεσμούς μου] so that my bonds have been made manifest in Christ: that is, as laid on me in Him, and for His sake, and not for any crime of mine; so that I am His prisoner (Eph. iii. 1. Philem. 1. 9), and my bonds are the bonds of the Gospel. (Philem. 13.)

— ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ] in the whole of the Prætorium. These words have occasioned much discussion.

With a view to the right interpretation of them, it may be remembered—

(1) That the other prisoners who were conveyed to Rome with St. Paul (Acts xxvii. 42), were delivered by the Centurion, who escorted them, to the στρατοπεδάρχης, or Commander of the Camp, the Præfectus Prætorio at Rome. Acts xxviii. 16.

(2) But St. Paul, probably on account of the impression which he had evidently made on the mind of the Roman Centurion of the Augustan Band (xxvii. 43), already prepossessed in his favour (xxvii. 3) by his presence of mind and language in the storm (xxvii. 21—26), and by his miracles at Malta (xxviii. 7—9), was treated with greater consideration than the other prisoners (xxviii. 16), and was allowed to dwell apart by himself with a soldier that guarded him, and occupied a lodging (ξενίαν, xxviii. 23) or private hired apartment of his own (ἴδιον μίσθωμα) at Rome, and was enabled to send for the principal Jews three days after his arrival (xxviii. 17), and to receive them there, and as many as would come to him; and that he abode there two whole years, preaching the kingdom of God, and the things concerning our Lord Jesus Christ, with all boldness, no man forbidding him. (xxviii. 30, 31.)

(3) Such is the narrative of St. Luke. To it St. Paul adds here, that "his bonds were made manifest in the whole of the Prætorium, and to all the rest." And he also says in iv. 22, "All the Saints salute you, particularly they who are of the household of Cæsar."

(4) What then does St. Paul here mean by the word Prætorium?

Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, Primasius, and the main body of ancient Expositors, understand by that word the Royal Residence of the Emperor Nero, which was on the Palatine Hill, on the South of the Forum at Rome.

(5) But since the time of Perizonius (A.D. 1690) it has been affirmed by many learned writers, that by the word Prætorium St. Paul does not designate the Palace of the Emperor within the City and on the Palatine Hill, but that he means thereby the Camp of the Prætorian soldiers, or Body Guard of the Emperor, who were quartered on the N. E. of the City of Rome, outside the Wall beyond the Quirinal Hill.

This opinion has been maintained with much ingenuity, especially by a learned writer in the "Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology," Cambridge, No. X. Art. iii.

(6) It has been affirmed by other writers that Prætorium here means only the Barrack of the Prætorian Guards attached to the Residence of the Emperor in the Capital.

(7) But neither of these latter opinions appears to be correct.

As to the former of the two, it seems to have been assumed too confidently, that St. Luke says that St. Paul was committed to the Commander in Chief of the Prætorian Guard, στρατοπεδάρχης (xxviii. 16), in order that he might be confined in the Prætorian Camp.

There is nothing in St. Luke's narrative which justifies such a supposition.

A distinction was made between St. Paul and the other prisoners (v. 16), and he was allowed to dwell by himself in a ξενία, or μίσθωμα, and to receive all who came to him.

(8) It has also been too easily taken for granted, that the word Prætorium must mean the Prætorian Camp, or Barrack.

But this word Prætorium occurs in seven other places of the New Testament, and in none of those does it mean a camp, but in all of them it signifies the residence of a King (Acts xxiii. 35), or of the Representative of a King, especially in his military and judicial, or, in Roman language, his prætorian, character. See Matt. xxvii. 27. Mark xv. 16. John xviii. 28 bis, 33; xix. 9.

In this sense the word is used in Acts xxiii. 35. So also classical writers of St. Paul's age use the word; as, for instance, Virgil (Georg. iv. 75) speaks of the Prætoria as the royal residence: "Et circa Regem atque ipsa ad Prætoria densæ Miscentur." And Juvenal says (x. 161), in the same sense, "sedet ad Prætoria Regis." And in Suetonius (Aug. 63, 72, Calig. 37, Tit. 8) the word Prætorium is employed in the same sense as 'palais' and 'palazzo' in modern times. In Zonaras' Lex. we find πραιτωρίῳ = παλατίῳ, and in the Acta Thomæ, pp. 8. 30, 31. 33, ed. Thilo. Wieseler, p. 405.

(9) Further, special salutations are sent in this Epistle from those Christians who were of Cæsar's household (iv. 22); and this appears to confirm the supposition that the apartment in which St. Paul dwelt was not in the extramural Barrack of the Prætorian Guards, but was connected with the Imperial Residence on Mount Palatine in the heart of the Roman Capital.

(10) But it may be asked,

Why then does he not say that his bonds were made manifest in Christ, ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ παλατίῳ, or ἐν ὅλοις τοῖς βασιλείοις? Why does he use the word Prætorium?

Because it was not with Cæsar, as residing in a Court, that St. Paul had to do; but he was brought before Cæsar as the Sovereign Power, who "bare the sword" (Rom. xiii. 4), in his military and judicial capacity.

St. Paul had appealed unto Cæsar, and to Cæsar he was sent. It was to the Imperator in his Prætorium, and not to the Prince in his Palace; it was to Cæsar as the World's Prætor (for such he was, and therefore all the Legates of the Emperor's Provinces were called Proprætors. Dio, liii. 13), and as having the prerogative of final cognizance and judicature in all causes of Appeal, that St. Paul was sent by Festus from Cæsarea to Rome. Cp. Acts xxv. 21. 25—27.

(11) Yet, further; it was in the Tribunal of Cæsar, sitting as Supreme Judge of Appeals in his Prætorium on the Palatine Hill (Dio, lvii. 7), that St. Paul was actually tried. Cp. the authorities quoted by Howson, ii. p. 541—543.

(12) This interpretation is that which (as has been already observed) was generally received by Christian Antiquity, and has recently received the approval of the able and learned Author of the "History of the Romans under the Empire," Vol. vi. p. 268, note.

(13) If it is the true interpretation (as the Ancient Church believed), then it may be added, that it has the advantage of suggesting some interesting and heart-stirring reflections, which would be marred by recent expositions.

St. Paul's Divine Master had been arrested by the Jews, and had been delivered up to the Romans, and stood in bonds at Jerusalem, arraigned before Cæsar's Representative in his Prætorium. Matt. xxvii. 27. Mark xv. 16. John xviii. 28. 33; xix. 9.

St. Paul himself had been arrested by the Jews, and was now in bonds for his Master, arraigned before Cæsar himself in his Prætorium at Rome.

It would have been an inexpressible comfort to the Apostle to be thus made like unto Christ.

Next, it would have been hardly worth while for St. Paul to τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἐν Κυρίῳ πεποιθότας τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου περισσοτέρως τολμᾶν ἀφόβως τὸν λόγον λαλεῖν.

15 Τινὲς μὲν καὶ διὰ φθόνον καὶ ἔριν, τινὲς δὲ καὶ δι' εὐδοκίαν τὸν Χριστὸν n 1 Cor. 9. 16, 17. Gal. 2. 7, 8. 1 Tim. 2. 7. 2 Tim. 1. 11, 12. & 4. 6, 7. κηρύσσουσιν· 16 n οἱ μὲν ἐξ ἀγάπης, εἰδότες ὅτι εἰς ἀπολογίαν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου κεῖμαι, 17 οἱ δὲ ἐξ ἐριθείας τὸν Χριστὸν καταγγέλλουσιν, οὐχ ἁγνῶς, οἰόμενοι θλῖψιν ἐγείρειν τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου.

tell the Philippians that his bonds were made manifest in the whole of the soldiers' barracks outside the city wall.

But it was very important for him to declare in this Epistle, designed for them and for all Churches of the world, that his sufferings for Christ, and with them the tidings of the Gospel, were made manifest in the heart of Rome, the World's Metropolis, and even in the royal residence of its Sovereign.

It was also a striking fact, that after his bonds had been already made manifest in Christ in the Prætorium of the Roman Procurator, the Vicegerent of Cæsar, at Cæsarea, for the space of two years (Acts xxiii. 35; xxiv. 27, see on Acts xxiv. 23, 24), those bonds were also made manifest at Rome, during a like space of two years, in the Prætorium of the Roman Cæsar himself.

Well might he say, that what had befallen him "had happened for the furtherance of the Gospel" (v. 12).

Lastly, there was a remarkable propriety in the mention of this fact in the present Epistle.

It is addressed to the Church of Philippi, which was a Roman Colony in Macedonia (see on Acts xvi. 12), a Colony which bore the Roman title of Augusta Julia.

The Philippians had listened to St. Paul's preaching, and had seen his miracles; they had witnessed his wonderful deliverance from prison by an earthquake in their city. (Acts xvi. 11—26.) They had acknowledged him as a Roman Citizen. (Acts xvi. 38.) But they had heard that he was now again a prisoner, in their own Mother City, Rome.

Was he now forsaken by Christ? Was Christ not able to defend him? They might be perplexed by such surmises as these. See on v. 10.

It must therefore have been no small consolation to them, no slight confirmation of their faith (both as Romans and Christians), to learn that by means of this very imprisonment of their own Apostle, the blessings of the Gospel had been communicated to the Royal Residence of their own Cæsar, the supreme Military Chief and Judicial Arbiter of the World, and had been diffused to others in the great Metropolis; and it must have been with no small comfort that they now received greetings of Christian affection communicated to them by St. Paul from "those of Cæsar's household."

— τοῖς λοιποῖς πᾶσι] to all the rest.

How could St. Paul's bonds have been made manifest to all the rest of the world at Rome?

It could hardly be otherwise than by some public hearing of his cause.

Appeals like his were heard by the Emperor in his Palace, and in this hearing the Emperor presided, and was assisted by Twenty Assessors, two of whom were the Consuls, and the rest were high Functionaries of the City. (Dio, liii. 21.)

After the Trial each Assessor delivered his opinion in writing to the Emperor, who, having read the several opinions in private, afterwards pronounced Judgment. (Sueton. Nero, 15. Howson, ii. 546.)

It seems probable that this Epistle to the Philippians was written in the interval between the Trial and the Sentence.

For (1) St. Paul here speaks of the sympathy of the Philippians with him in his Ἀπολογία, or public defence. Cp. this forensic use of the word, Acts xxii. 1; xxv. 16. 2 Tim. iv. 16; and ἀπολογοῦμαι, Acts xix. 33; xxiv. 10; xxv. 8; xxvi. 1, 2. 24.

(2) He is contemplating the nearness of the issue either for life or death (i. 21—24), and predicts the result of the trial. (v. 25.)

(3) He hopes to send Timothy immediately, as soon as he sees what is the result, and says that he trusts to come soon to Philippi. (ii. 24.)

And (4) he here asserts, that his bonds have been made manifest to "all the Prætorium," and (as by a consequence of that judicial manifestation) to "all the rest" at Rome.

4. τοὺς πλείονας] the more part.

15. Τινὲς μὲν καί] Some person indeed even. He does not mean any of the brethren mentioned above, but some other parties, perhaps Judaizers, jealous of St. Paul's influence; some of those at Rome who may have been offended by the doctrines propounded in his Epistle to the Church of Rome, where he now was. Cp. 1 Tim. vi. 4, where the feelings here described of φθόνος and ἔρις are specified as associated with the teaching of those who do not consent to "the doctrine according to godliness."

16. οἱ μὲν ἐξ ἀγάπης—δεσμοῖς μου] This is the order of the paragraphs in the majority of the best MS. authorities, and so Griesb., Scholz., Lach., Tisch., Alf., Ellicott.—Elz. inverts it, putting οἱ μὲν ἐξ ἀγάπης in the first place.

The sense is, They who out of love proclaim Christ, do so because they know that I am set for the defence of the Gospel; but they who proclaim Him out of partizanship, and not purely, do so because they think thus to raise up affliction to my bonds.

On the sense of ἐριθεία, see above, Gal. v. 20.

Some expositors interpret οἱ ἐξ ἀγάπης as equivalent to those that are of love, that is, who act on a principle of love; and οἱ ἐξ ἐριθείας as tantamount to those that are of rivalry, that is, who act from a spirit of contentiousness. Compare Rom. ii. 8.

This rendering is entitled to consideration, but it is not confirmed by the Ancient Versions; and it would seem to intimate that the Christians at Rome were divided into two parties, either of love toward, or partizanship against, St. Paul personally, and that they acted on motives relative to himself in their announcement of Christ.

Such an exposition seems hardly in keeping with the modesty of the Apostle.

The sense of the passage appears to be rendered clearer by considering οἱ, in the second member of the sentence, as a relative pronoun (οἵ), and it is represented accordingly in the text.

17. οἰόμενοι θλῖψιν ἐγείρειν τοῖς δ. μου] thinking to raise up affliction to my bonds.

To understand this expression it must be remembered that though St. Paul was in bonds, yet he enjoyed much relaxation (ἄνεσιν) in his confinement (see Acts xxviii. 16. 30, 31); he did not suffer that affliction which might have been expected in his condition; and what he complains of here, is, that his bonds were made more rigorous and galling by the agency of some who professed to be his friends.

The mention of the word ἐριθεία (properly 'mercenary partizanship') suggests that the false Teachers here mentioned acted from venal motives; and he says that they preached οὐχ ἁγνῶς, not holily, i. e. not in a pure love of truth, but with corrupt minds and sinister views.

He thus seems to describe that class of persons, who are described by him in another place as making a traffic of godliness (1 Tim. vi. 5), and are there charged with fostering the passion here mentioned, "envy and strife." (1 Tim. vi. 4.)

Such Teachers as these would bring Christianity into discredit, and would entail hardships and afflictions on the Apostle's bonds from the Authorities of Rome, being exasperated against him, as if he were a preacher of a religion of insubordination and sedition. Such persons would inflame the passions of the multitude against their Rulers, and would irritate the Civil Magistrates against Christianity, and against its Apostle, by not qualifying the doctrines of Christ's Sovereignty, and of Christian Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, with those reasonable restraints with which those doctrines are always coupled and limited by St. Paul himself, especially in his teaching concerning the duties of subjects to Sovereigns, and of Slaves to their Masters, on which he specially dwells in his Epistles to Rome, and from Rome (Rom. xiii. 1—4. Eph. vi. 5—8. Col. iii. 22, and Philemon), and by which he endeavours to disabuse the Heathen of the prejudices raised against the Gospel by his enemies, especially by the Judaizing faction.

The sense is well expressed by Primasius, who says that "they preached for worldly lucre, and excited obloquy against Paul by their preaching, and aggravated the sufferings of his bonds;" and so Chrys., Theodoret, Theophyl.

The full development of this ἐριθεία or mercenary partizanship and contentiousness of false brethren, is traced in St. Paul's first Epistle to Timothy (vi. 1—6) and to Titus (i. 10—12; cp. ii. 9); and it is well known to have brought manifold afflictions on the first preachers of Christianity, and much odium on the Gospel itself.

18. Τί γάρ;—χαρήσομαι] What then? Notwithstanding, in every way, whether in pretence or truth Christ is preached, and therein I do rejoice, yea and I will rejoice. This text has been sometimes alleged as an apology for preaching in Schism.

But it may be doubted whether St. Paul is here speaking of ministerial preaching at all. Cp. Blunt on the Early Fathers, p. 291.

But even if this be admitted, it may be remarked that these persons preached Christ, and that St. Paul approved the preaching of Christ; but St. Paul did not, in any respect, approve the preaching in strife. On the contrary, he teaches that envy and strife are carnal (1 Cor. iii. 3); and in the next chapter of this Epistle (ii. 3) he says, using the same word as here, "Let nothing be done through ἐριθεία:" and St. James says, using again the same word, that "where there is ἐριθεία, there is every evil work" (James iii. 14. 16); and "if ye have bitter envying and ἐριθεία in your hearts, this wisdom is earthly, sensual, devilish." See S. Chrysostom's Sermon on this text, v. p. 410, ὑγιὲς ἦν τὸ δόγμα, ἑαυτοὺς δὲ ἀπολλύουσιν ἐκεῖνοι ἐξ ἀπεχθείας κηρύττοντες. "Quod fecit malè, non prædicat de Cathedrâ Christi; inde lædit, unde mala facit, non unde bona dicit; cùm audis bona dicentem, ne imiteris mala facientem." August. (Tractat. in Joann. xlvi.) Cp. Aug. Serm. 101 and 137. "Novit Dominus de malis benè operari, et ad meam omnia salutem gubernat; et adversa vertit in prospera." Primasius. Whatsoever we do without religious affection is hateful in God's sight, who is therefore said to respect adverbs more than verbs—and the mind approves itself to God, not by doing, but by doing well. Hooker (V. lxii. 5).

— ἀποθανεῖν κέρδος] to die is gain. Because I shall then have a nearer fruition of the presence and glory of Christ (v. 23).

The language of one who soon afterwards wrote to the Christians of the city where St. Paul now was, and died a martyr at Rome, and who is expressing his ardent desire for martyrdom, may be compared here, "Suffer me to be the food of wild beasts, that I may attain unto God. σῖτός εἰμι τοῦ Θεοῦ κ.τ.λ. I do not command you, as Peter and Paul did; they were Apostles, I am condemned. They were freemen, I am only a slave.... Suffer me to die. Pardon me in this; I know what is best for me. Now I begin to be a disciple. Let nothing that is seen or unseen envy me the joy of being Christ's. Fire and the Cross, the assaults of wild Beasts, lacerations, distractions, and dispersions of my bones, the crushing of my joints, the grinding of my whole body—welcome, welcome, to them all—so that I may gain Him! I covet not kingdoms of earth. I long to die into Christ Jesus, rather than to be king of the World. Him I seek, Who died for me; Him I long for, Who rose again for me. Now my birth is near. Forgive me, brethren; do not hinder me from being born; do not desire that I should die—I who desire to be God's. Allow me to emerge into the pure light; when I shall arrive there, I shall be a man of God. Suffer me to be an imitator of the Passion of my God." S. Ignatius (ad Rom. 4—6).

22. εἰ δὲ τὸ ζῆν ἐν σαρκὶ τοῦτό μοι καρπὸς ἔργου] I have said, that to me to live is Christ; that is, my life, as long as it is spared to me, consists in being one with Him, and in living in Him, by Him, and for Him, and in doing His work, and in promoting His glory.

I have also said, that to me to die is gain; for when I die, I hope to have a nearer and fuller enjoyment of His presence.

But if to live in the flesh, if even this, I say, is not to me and others a barren thing, but is the very fruit of labour; that is, if the essence of that fruit is in my life, and if that life is, as it were, a productive tree, upon which the ripe fruit of Apostolic labour grows, and that fruit is ministerial to the everlasting health of others, as well as to my own, then I even wot not which I ought to choose, whether to die or to live, and therefore I leave myself in the hands of God, Who alone knoweth all things.

An important moral has been hence derived by Irenæus (v. 12. 4), "Si vivere in carne hic fructus operis est, non utique substantiam contemnebat carnis." If to live in the flesh is the very fruit of his labour, verily he did not despise the substance of his flesh. No; and hence may also be deduced a solemn protest against the sin of self-destruction, by which a man recklessly robs himself and others of the fruit which ought to grow on the tree of his own life, and impiously hews down that tree with his own hands. Cp. Chrys., Theodoret, Theophyl., Primasius.

The pronoun τοῦτο here brings out the preceding clause more emphatically. See 1 Cor. vi. 4, and cp. below, iii. 7; iv. 9. Winer, p. 145.

On αἱρήσομαι, the future indicative, where a conjunctive would rather be expected, see Winer, p. 267.

On this use of γνωρίζω = γινώσκω (Phavorin.), see Job xxxiv. 25. Prov. iii. 6, LXX. Schleusner.

The καὶ, even, indicates that so far from arrogating to himself the liberty of choosing for himself what should be his lot, whether to live or to die, the Apostle does not even understand what he shall choose; he frankly confesses that he has not the requisite qualifications for making any choice at all.

23. συνέχομαι δὲ (so the best MSS. Elz. has γὰρ) ἐκ τῶν δύο] I am held together by the two—as he was held at this time a prisoner between the two soldiers, to whom he was bound by two chains. (Acts xii. 6.)

— τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν ἔχων κ.τ.λ.] Having my desire, or yearning toward the (τὸ) departure—which will one day be mine.

My Desire (ἡ ἐπιθυμία) turns its eyes in that direction, and longs for that blessed time when I shall be permitted to loose my cable from the shore of this world, where I am a stranger and a foreigner, and to set sail for the heavenly port of my everlasting peace.

But my Reason acts as a chain, drawing me in another direction, and still holds me to earth.

In a few years afterwards, he was allowed to exclaim, using the same figure, in the same city where he now was, "The hour of my departure is at hand." See on 2 Tim. iv. 6.

This word ἐπιθυμία, thus used by St. Paul, seems to have been consecrated to express the longing of Christian Martyrs to depart and be with Christ. Cp. Ignat. Mart. 3, ἐπιθυμία τοῦ πάθους, and 6, τοῦ ἁγίου μάρτυρος πληροῦσθαι τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν κατὰ τὸ γεγραμμένον ἐπιθυμία δικαίου δεκτὴ (Prov. x. 24), and 7, τὸν τῆς φιλοχρίστου ἐπιθυμίας τελειώσαντι δρόμον.

On this text, cp. Tertullian, de Patientiâ 9, and Augustine iii. 2528. 2571; v. 1778. "Qui desiderat dissolvi et esse cum Christo patienter vivit, et delectabiliter moritur." Aug.

— σὺν Χριστῷ εἶναι] to be with Christ. Not to be any longer ἐν σαρκὶ (to which the words are here opposed, v. 24), but to be delivered from the burden of the flesh, as an ancient Father expresses it; "Lucrum maximum computabat Apostolus, post hanc vitam sæcularibus laqueis non teneri, jam nullis peccatis et vitiis carnis obnoxium fieri; et ideò mortem desideravit ut his malis careret; et ut ad illam perfectam justitiam, quæ ista non pateretur, perveniret." Augustine (c. duas Epistolas Pelagian. iv. 28). Hence St. Paul says that to him "to live is Christ," but to die is to be "with Christ."

26. τὸ καύχημα] theme of glorying.

27. ἀξίως—πολιτεύεσθε] Ye inhabitants of Philippi, who dwelling in Greece, justly regard it as an honourable distinction to be citizens of Rome, and privileged subjects of Cæsar, to you I say, Live as citizens of Heaven, and as loyal subjects of Christ. See on Acts xvi. 12. 20. 34. 37, 38; and below, on iii. 20.

S. Polycarp, in his Epistle to the Philippians, adopts this expression (c. 5), ἐὰν πολιτευσώμεθα ἀξίως αὐτοῦ, καὶ συμβασιλεύσομεν αὐτῷ. So Polycrates (Bishop of Ephesus in the 2nd century), ap. Euseb. v. 24, Μελίτωνα ἐν ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι πάντα πολιτευσάμενον, and ibid. ἐν Κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ πάντοτε πεπολίτευμαι.

28. πτυρόμενοι] scared—as horses. Diod. Sic. de Alex. M. xvii. 34, οὐ πτύρομαι ἐπὶ τοῖς καταπλησσομένοις. A word perhaps connected with πτερόν. "Puniceæve agitant pavidos formidine pennæ" (Virg. Georg. iii. 372), or it may be derived from πτοέω, πτήσσω (Passow).

Compare as to the sense, 2 Thess. i. 4—7.

— ἥτις] your intrepid bearing, due to God's grace, is an evidence of His favour to you, and of His wrath against your enemies. See 2 Thess. i. 5.

"Breviter utrumque commendavit Apostolus, et causam pro quâ patiamur, et patientiam quâ mala perferamus, à Deo nobis esse. Quia vobis donatum est pro Christo, &c. Ecce causa bona, quia pro Christo, non pro hæresi et schismate contrà Christum. Vobis, inquit, donatum est pro Christo, non solùm ut credatis in Eum, sed etiam ut patiamini pro Eo. Hæc est vera Patientia, hanc diligamus, hanc teneamus." Augustine (Serm. 283 and 284).

30. οἷον εἴδετε] Acts xvi. 19.

Ch. II. 1. Εἴ τις οὖν] The order of the clauses here is the same as in the Apostolic Benediction, in the name of the Ever Blessed Trinity. (2 Cor. xiii. 14.)

The Apostle appeals to what the Philippians themselves have received, and hope to continue to receive from God, as the reason for what they ought to render to one another. If they feel comfort from the grace given them in Christ, and consolation in a sense of God's Love, and are joined together with one another in God, by the communion of the Holy Ghost, and if the Apostle has been to them the minister of these blessings from God, let them fulfil his joy, and dwell together in unity.

St. Paul conjureth the Philippians by all the hope they had of comfort in God, to be at one among themselves. Bp. Sanderson (i. p. 207).

— τινα] All the known uncial MSS. (A, B, C, D, E, F, G, I, K) have τις here, which is received by Griesb., Scholz., Lachmann, Tisch.

A remarkable concurrence in error. The true reading, τινα, is found in some Cursive MSS., and in Clem. Alexandrin. (of the 2nd century), Strom. iv. p. 604, and in other Fathers. Some MSS. (D* and I) have also τις παραμύθιον—a similar solecism.

This text, therefore, among many others, affords evidence that it is not a sound principle of criticism, to limit the data for determining the readings of the New Testament to the most ancient extant MSS., and that it is necessary to extend the range of inquiry to the Cursive MSS. and other collateral aids.

3. μηδὲν κατ' (so B, C, D*, F, G, J) ἐριθείαν] nothing 'in the way of rivalry,' a phrase adopted by Ignatius (ad Philad. 8), who adds, ἀλλὰ κατὰ χριστομαθίαν, which is a brief summary of the Apostle's teaching here. On ἐριθεία, see Gal. v. 20.

4. σκοποῦντες] So B, and the majority of the best authorities. Elz. σκοπεῖτε.

5. φρονείσθω] Seven Uncial MSS., A, B, C*, D, E, F, G, here have φρονεῖτε, and this reading has been received by Lachmann and Ellicott.

Nearly all the Cursive MSS., and C, I, K, have φρονείσθω, which is retained by Tisch. and Alf., and this seems to be the true reading. If so simple a form as φρονεῖτε had been found in the original, it is hardly probable that a copyist would have altered it into the more difficult form φρονείσθω.

6. ἐν μορφῇ Θεοῦ ὑπάρχων] subsisting, or pre-existing, in the form of God.

The meaning of the word μορφὴ, as used here, is explained by the subsequent repetition of it with δούλου. The 'form of God' is contrasted here with the 'form of a servant.' And since Christ really and truly took the 'form of a servant,' and acted as such, both towards His Father (Isa. xlii. 1. Zech. iii. 8. Matt. xii. 18. John vi. 38), and to His disciples (Luke xxii. 27. John xiii. 5), so, as the Ancient Fathers rightly argue, He was really and truly God, before He took the form of a servant.

He who was subsisting in the form of God, and thought Himself to be equal with God (in which thought He could not be deceived, nor be injurious to God), must of necessity be truly and essentially God; because there can be no equality between the divine essence, which is infinite, and any other whatsoever which must be finite. But this is true of Christ, and that antecedently to his conception in the Virgin's womb, and existence in His human nature. For, being (or rather, subsisting) in the form of God, He thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but emptied Himself, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men (Phil. ii. 6, 7). Out of which words naturally result three propositions, fully demonstrating that Christ was in the form of a servant as soon as He was made man. Secondly, that He was in the form of God before He was in the form of a servant. Thirdly, that He was (as much) in the form of God, that is, did as truly and really subsist in the divine nature, as in the form of a servant, or in the nature of man. Bp. Pearson (Art. ii. p. 228).

By the word "form" is certainly understood the true condition of a servant, and by the likeness is infallibly meant the real nature of man; nor doth the fashion, in which He was found, destroy, but rather assert the truth of His humanity. And, therefore, as sure as Christ was really and essentially man, of the same nature with us, in whose similitude He was made, so certainly was He also really and essentially God, of the same — οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ] In order to understand these important words, it is to be borne in mind—

(1) That St. Paul is exhorting the Philippians to mutual condescension, self-abasement, and self-sacrifice, in regard to, and for the sake of, others. "In lowliness of mind let each of you esteem the other better than himself, looking not to your own things, but every one also to those of others."

He then enforces these precepts by referring them to the pattern of their divine Exemplar, JESUS CHRIST, Who, though He was God, emptied Himself of His glory, and became man, and humbled Himself, and took on Him the form of a servant, and became obedient to death, even to death on the cross.

(2) What the Apostle specially dwells on in the Condescension of Christ, is the fact, that the humiliation of Christ was not imposed upon Him by any constraint from any other external force, but that it was purely and entirely voluntary. It was not like the surrender of any thing which He had wrongly usurped, and of which therefore He might be rightly despoiled; nor was it the sacrifice of any thing which He lost by abdication; but it was the free and spontaneous cession by His own gracious choice, of what appertained to Him by His own inherent and indefeasible right as God existing from Eternity; and this act of self-abasement resulted in an augmentation of His glory. He did not lose His Deity by taking Humanity, but by His perfect obedience and meritorious sufferings in His Human Nature, He glorified the Humanity which He took and united to God.

(3) Hence the Apostle emphatically repeats the word ἑαυτὸν, Himself. Christ (he says) ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν, emptied Himself. Christ (he says) ἐταπείνωσεν ἑαυτὸν, humbled Himself. Christ of His own accord "took the form of a servant," and became obedient to death, even to death on the Cross.

(4) These considerations lead to the true sense of the word ἁρπαγμὸς, as used here.

This word is derived from ἁρπάζω, to seize, as rapine, prey, booty, or spoil, as distinguished from property legally acquired and possessed.

Here, as in many other cases, the text is illustrated by the Septuagint Version, in which the cognate word ἅρπαγμα often occurs, and signifies spoil. See Levit. vi. 4. Ps. lxi. 10. Isa. lxi. 8. Ezek. xviii. 7. 12. 16; xix. 3. 6; xxii. 25. 27.

(5) Further, the ancient Versions of this passage agree, for the most part, in translating the word ἁρπαγμὸν as equivalent to 'a thing seized by violence.' Thus the Vulgate, "Non rapinam arbitratus est se esse æqualem Deo." So the Syriac; and the Arabic has "Semper existens ad imaginem Dei non tenuit sortem raptam parem se esse Deo." And the Æthiopic, in a paraphrastic gloss, "Non abripuit ei qui fuit Deus." And the Gothic and Coptic Versions also confirm the interpretation, which assigns to ἁρπαγμὸν the sense of 'usurpation' and 'rapine.' So likewise the ancient Latin Version in the Codex Boernerianus, and that of the Codex Augiensis lately published by Mr. Scrivener.

(6) The assertion of the Apostle here concerning Christ's Eternal Co-equality with God, may also be illustrated by what he says of Christ's Priesthood,—viz. Christ did not glorify Himself to be a High Priest (Heb. v. 5), but He was rightly constituted as such. So here Christ did not usurp His divine Co-equality; but He had it by right of His Eternal Generation from the Father.

(7) The Apostle's words may therefore be thus paraphrased;

Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, Who, subsisting from Eternity in the form of God, did not think that His own equality with God (τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ, see next note) was a spoil which He had usurped wrongfully, and of which therefore He might justly be divested by another: or which, on principles of justice, He was Himself obliged to give up; and which, if He veiled it in a human form, He might be imagined not to possess, and which therefore He would fear to conceal in such a mortal dress. He did not suppose that the divine glory, which He had, was a stolen thing. Satan, who endeavoured to usurp it, fell from heaven; Adam grasped at it, and incurred death. But Christ had it as His own from Eternity.

But He freely emptied Himself of His own divine Glory, and willingly took the form of a servant. Do not therefore imagine that it was imposed upon Him. By His own free act He appeared in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, yea, even death on the cross.

(8) This, in the main, is the sense which was assigned to this celebrated passage by the best Authors in ancient times.

Christ did not regard His own Divinity as a stolen spoil; He did not fear lest any one should take it from Him. No; He veiled it willingly. He had not seized it as a prey. It was His own. He had it by the very essence of His Nature. Therefore, the Apostle says, He emptied Himself. Where now, therefore, are those false teachers, who say that Christ submitted to necessity,—that He was forced to do what He did? No. He emptied Himself. He humbled Himself. He took the form of a servant. Chrysostom.

The Son of God did not scruple to veil His glory, for He knew that He would not thus impair it. Therefore the Apostle says, He did not deem His own equality with God to be a thing stolen. An usurper fears to lay aside the purple, for he knows that it is stolen and does not belong to him. Not so a king; for he is conscious that it is his kingly right. Chrys. (in Catenâ here, p. 253.)

The Son did not seize for Himself the dignity of the Godhead; wherefore Paul says that He did not deem His co-equality with God to be a thing stolen; but it was well-pleasing to the Father, as well as a joy to the Son, that He possesses a kingdom of equal dignity with the Father. Hesychius, in Ps. cix. 1.

Any one who has snatched a thing by violence, dreads to lay it down, lest he should lose what he knows to be not his own. St. Paul, therefore, says here, that the Son of God did not fear to stoop from His proper Dignity, because He was conscious that He possessed that Dignity (of being co-equal with the Father), not by rapine, but by nature. He therefore chose to be humbled, because He knew that in His Humility He preserved His Dignity. Theophylact.

Cp. Tertullian (c. Marcion. v. 20): "In effigie Dei constitutus non rapinam existimavit pariari Deo, sed exhausit semetipsum."

See also Augustine, Serm. 183: "Non rapinam arbitratus est Filius esse æqualis Deo. Non erat ei rapina; natura erat: sic erat ex æternitate, sic erat æqualis Patri .... Semetipsum exinanivit; formam servi accipiens, non formam Dei amittens."

See also Augustine, iv. 372. 716. 844. 1570; vi. 935; viii. 1048; particularly v. 2095, Serm. 361, where he says: How came it to pass that Christ died? because He took the form of a servant. He Who pre-existed in the form of God, had He taken the form of God, or did He possess it by His Nature? The Apostle answers this question. For when he speaks of His being in the form of God, he uses the words cùm esset (i. e. ὑπάρχων); but when he mentions the form of a servant, he uses the word accipiens (λαβών). Christ therefore was somewhat, and He took somewhat; He was in the form of God, and equal with God, as St. John testifies (i. 1). He was God; and being in the form of God, He did not deem that existence of equality to be an usurped thing (rapinam). That which is not in us by nature, but is usurped illegally, is rapina (ἁρπαγμός). An angel usurped equality with God, and fell, and became the Devil. Man usurped equality with God, and fell, and became mortal. But Christ, Who was born equal with God, because He was not born in time, but is the Everlasting Son of the Everlasting Father,—always born, and the Creator of all, He was existing in the form of God. But in order to be Mediator between God and Man, between the Just and Unjust,—between mortals and the Immortal,—He took something from the unjust and the mortal to reconcile them to the Just and Immortal, and taking what He took, He kept what He was. Augustine.

The sense is thus briefly expressed by a judicious ancient Expositor, Primasius; "Non rapuit quod habebat, id est, æqualitatem Patris, quam naturaliter habebat, non rapuit."

(9) The meaning which has been assigned to these words by some Interpreters in recent times,—viz. "He did not deem equality with God to be a thing to be grasped or clutched at, or a prize to be coveted," seems to be liable to grave objections on theological grounds.

The Son of God, God of God, is co-equal with the Father from Eternity; and to say that He did not deem such co-equality to be a thing to be seized upon and to be grasped at, seems to involve an assertion that He did not possess it. For if He had it, how could He be said to grasp at it? Indeed, this interpretation seems chargeable with the Arianizing tendency which i Isa. 53. 12. John 10. 17. & 17. 1, 2, 5. Acts 2. 33. Heb. 1. 4. & 2. 9.

9 i Διὸ καὶ ὁ Θεὸς αὐτὸν ὑπερύψωσε, καὶ ἐχαρίσατο αὐτῷ τὸ ὄνομα τὸ ὑπὲρ πᾶν ὄνομα, 10 k ἵνα ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ πᾶν γόνυ κάμψῃ ἐπουρανίων καὶ k Isa. 45. 23. Rom. 14. 11. Rev. 5. 13.

has been censured by some of the Fathers here. Thus Theophylact well says,—It is alleged by false teachers, that the Son, being an inferior Deity, did not venture to grasp at equality with the superior God. But St. Paul (he adds) affirms, that Christ is, and ever has been co-equal with the Father. And here is the force of the Apostolic lesson of Humility derived from the pattern, which he propounds to us, of Christ, Who being by nature co-equal with the Father, and conscious of His own co-equality, voluntarily emptied and humbled Himself, and so became an Example to us.

This may also serve as a reply to the Arian exposition cited by Waterland (Vol. i. qu. 2, p. 11): "He did not affect, claim, assume, take upon Him, or eagerly desire to be honoured as God;" and therefore (it is inferred by the Arians) He was conscious that He was not equal with God—contrary to St. Paul's assertion here.

(10) Further, it may be remembered, that St. Paul, writing to the Philippians, Roman inhabitants of a heathen city in Greece, was obliged in his teaching concerning Christ's self-humiliation, to guard them, and the Gentiles generally, against such errors as, under the influence of false teachers, the ancient Heathens were likely to be betrayed into.

When the Gentiles heard of the humiliation of the Son of God, and of His descent from His heavenly Throne, they might be tempted to think of the traditions of their own Pagan Theology. Kronus had been dispossessed by Zeus, and Saturnus by Jupiter, in the Greek and Roman Pantheon. The Titans had rebelled against the usurping son of the ancient ruler of Olympus. The Heathens therefore might be told by some (and such indeed was the tendency of much of the Gnostic speculations) that the condescension of the Son of God in Christian Theology was only a just act of deposition from an usurped dignity, or an abdication forced on Him by a conscious sense of usurpation, such as the Heathens were familiar with in their own Mythology.

Standing upon the low ground of their own unregenerate Reason, they might well be slow to suppose, that such a stupendous act of condescension and self-sacrifice, as that of the Son of God, was one of free choice. It is only by Faith in God's Word that we can rise to the Mystery of the Incarnation.

Well, therefore, did the Apostle, writing to the Philippians, a Roman Colony in Greece, provide a safeguard against such erroneous and dangerous surmises, by assuring them that the Son of God had subsisted from Eternity in the form of God, and that it was not because His Equality with God was a stolen thing, and because He was conscious that it was so, that He condescended from His high estate; but that it was of His own free will and spontaneous choice that He, Who had subsisted for ever in the form of God, emptied and humbled Himself, and took upon Him the form of a servant.

(11) Lastly, the remarkable fitness of this wonderful condescension of the Son of God, rightly understood, to be an example of the grace and virtue of Humility here commended to the Philippians by St. Paul, deserves attentive consideration;

If He, Who is God from Eternity, and possesses all the glory of the Godhead by right, stooped so low of His own accord

(1) As to take on Himself the nature of man

(5) If this was His path to glory, and to the exaltation of our Nature in Him even above the nature of Angels: and

(6) If that exaltation was the reward of His obedience and suffering in our Nature, which He took, and in which He suffered and obeyed, surely they whose Nature He took, they whose Head He is, they whom He has made members of His own mystical body, they whom He, as God-Man has united to the Deity, and has exalted to God's Right Hand, have, in this condescension of their God and King, the most constraining motives to condescension and love, to self-abasement and self-sacrifice, for the sake of their fellow-men and of their fellow-members in Christ.

— τὸ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ] the being on a par with God, i. e. His own pre-existence, in a condition of equality with God. The very memorable words of a celebrated ancient Synod of the third century afford an excellent comment here. Ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τῇ ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανὸν πάσῃ Χριστὸς πεπίστευται Θεὸς, κενώσας ἑαυτὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ. Concil. Antioch. i. p. 848, Labb. Routh, R. S. ii. 473. Cp. ibid. i. 292. 328; iii. 377. On the infinitive with the article as here used, see Winer, p. 298.

The neuter plural ἴσα, used adverbially (cp. Winer, p. 160), is more expressive than the masculine singular would be, as indicating existence in a condition of general equality with God. See the examples in Whitby here and Wetstein.

The Fathers rightly dwell on this clause, and the context generally, as a safeguard against almost all the Heresies concerning the Nature and Person of Christ;

Consider how many Heresies are here confuted. Marcion condemns the world and the flesh as the work of the Evil One, and thence affirms that flesh could not be assumed by God, and that the body which Christ took was a mere shadow and phantom. Photinus and others say, that the Word is only a power of God, and not a Person. Paul of Samosata affirms that He began to exist from Mary. Sabellius asserts that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are mere names of one Personal God. Arius, that the Son is a Creature. Apollinarius, that He had not a human soul.

All these are confuted by these words of the Apostle. For, against Marcion we say, How could that flesh be a mere shadow and phantom which was taken by One Who had the form of a servant, and was found in the fashion of a man, and Who suffered death on the Cross? And to the others, above mentioned, we put these questions, How can the Son be merely a Power and not a Substance, since He Who is said to have taken the form of a servant is said also to have pre-existed in the form of God? How can it be alleged, that He derived His existence from Mary, when He is declared by the Apostle to have subsisted in the form of God? How can He be thought to be a mere Name, when He is said to have existed in a state of equality with God? Equality is between two things. No one can be said to be equal to himself. Therefore we here see a duality of Persons in the One Godhead. How, again, can He be thought to be a Creature, when it is asserted by St. Paul that He existed in the form of God, that is, in the very nature and essence of God, and that He did not count it an unjust assumption on His part (as the Arians do for Him) to be equal with God? How, lastly, could it have been said by the Apostle, that He took the form of a servant and suffered death (which is the separation of soul and body), if He had not also a human soul as well as a human body? See Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophyl., and Caten. (p. 247—253), Tertullian (c. Marcion. v. 20), and Bp. Bull (Def. Fid. Nic. ii. 2, 2, p. 105, ed. Burton), who says, "This one passage, if it be rightly understood, is sufficient for the refutation of all the Heresies against the Person of our Lord Jesus Christ."

7. ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσε] He emptied Himself. Θεὸς κενώσας ἑαυτὸν, ἀπὸ τοῦ εἶναι ἴσα Θεῷ. Concil. Antioch. (i. p. 848, Labbe). Ὁμογενὴς Θεοῦ Λόγος, Θεὸς ὑπάρχων, ἐκ Θεοῦ κεκένωκεν ἑαυτὸν, καὶ τὴν ἄδοξον ταύτην σάρκα ἠμφιέσχετο. S. Hippolytus (ii. p. 29).

We are not, therefore, to imagine that He either lost His Godhead for a time, or that it was confused with his Manhood. No; "the Word became Flesh," but was not changed into, or confused with, Flesh. See on John i. 14. "In semetipsum assumendo quod non erat, non amittendo quod erat." Primasius.

7, 8. ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος, καὶ σχήματι εὑρεθεὶς ὡς ἄνθρωπος] being made in the likeness of men, and found in fashion as a man. In another place St. Paul says that He appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh (see Rom. viii. 3), and yet he does not deny, but asserts, that He truly took our flesh, but took it without sin. So likewise the Apostle here, when saying that He became in the likeness of men, and was found in fashion as a man, does not deny but assert His very Manhood, but intimates also that He was more than Man, namely, "God manifested in the flesh." Theophylact.

9. Διὸ—ὑπερύψωσε] On the exaltation of Christ in that Nature, namely, the Human, in which He obeyed and suffered, an exaltation consequent, by way of reward, on that obedience and suffering, see the notes above on Matt. xxviii. 18, and on 1 Cor. xv. 24.

Whose nature was it that was raised by Christ's Ascension into heaven? Ours. The Father is inseparably in the Son, and the Son in the Father. But because the Word and Flesh make one Person in Christ, therefore that which was assumed, viz. the Flesh, is not divided from Him Who assumed it; and the honour of its Exaltation is called the Augmentation of Him Who exalted it. As St. Paul says, "Wherefore God very highly exalted Him," where St. Paul is declaring the exaltation of that Human Nature which was assumed, so that it, in Whose sufferings the Deity abode with it inseparably, became co-eternal in the glory of the Deity. S. Leo (Serm. 70, p. 152), and Athanas. (c. Arianos, i. § 44, and § 45, p. 353).

— τὸ ὄνομα (so A, B, C. Elz. has only ὄνομα) τὸ ὑπὲρ πᾶν ὄνομα] the Name that is above every Name. Observe the article τὸ, intimating that the Name given to Jesus, as Man, was no other than the incommunicable Name of Jehovah. See v. 11, and on John xvii. 2, and Augustine (Tract. Joann. 104, p. 2375). What is that Name which is given to the human nature of the One Christ? The Name of God. Theophyl. Cp. Rev. xix. 12, 13. 16.

10. ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι] in the Name Jesus, acknowledged to be above every name. Cp. above on Rom. ix. 5, and Heb. i. 5, and Rev. v. 12, "Worthy is the Lamb." "Ut Christo Jesu, Domino Nostro, et Deo, et Salvatori omne genu curvet." Irenæus (i. 10. 1).

See also above on Eph. i. 22 on the Adoration of the Manhood of Jesus by Angels.

On this text, see Bp. Andrewes (Serm. 11, pp. 280. 324).

— καταχθονίων] of beings under the earth; especially Death and the Grave, over whom Christ has partly triumphed already, and will fully triumph hereafter (see 1 Cor. xv. 26. 54, 55. Rev. xx. 13, 14), and Satan himself and all the Powers of Darkness. (Rev. xx. 10.) The sense is best explained by Rev. v. 13, where the creatures beneath the earth join in ascribing honour to the Lamb.

11. καὶ πᾶσα γλῶσσα κ.τ.λ.] that every tongue may confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, JEHOVAH. Observe the Apostle says, that this confession of the Godhead of the Son is the Glorification of the Father; therefore to deny the Godhead of the Son, is to do dishonour to the Father. Cp. John v. 23, and Chrys., Theodoret, Theophyl. here.

The reading ἐξομολογήσεται here is confirmed by A, B (see Mai), C, D, F, G, I, K.—Elz. has ἐξομολογήσηται. The words of the Apostle here are to be compared with Rom. xiv. 11, ζῶ ἐγὼ λέγει Κύριος, ὅτι Ἐμοὶ κάμψει πᾶν γόνυ, καὶ πᾶσα γλῶσσα ἐξομολογήσεται τῷ Θεῷ. And from this comparison it plainly appears, that the same honour is to be paid to Jesus as to God, because He is God. Cp. S. Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippian Church, c. 2.

12. Ὥστε] So then. Itaque (Vulg.).

13. Θεὸς γὰρ κ.τ.λ.] We are commanded to work out our own salvation, and that with fear and trembling, lest we should fail of being saved; and not with pride and vain-glory, as if our works were due to our own deserts, and not to the grace of God in us. When the Apostle thus commands us to work out our own salvation, he acknowledges our free will: but when he adds, "with fear and trembling," he warns us against the pride of ascribing our good works to ourselves; and he therefore adds, that it is God who worketh in us. Augustine (de Gratiâ, c. 9).

Thus St. Paul has provided an antidote to the Heresy of Pelagius, who allowed that our power of willing and liberty of action are from God, but contended that our actual willing and doing are from ourselves. See Augustine (de Gratiâ Christi, c. 3, c. 5, c. 10), A Lapide, and the Expositors on Article X. of the Church of England, "We have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will."

Lest, however, it should be said, that we are not able to act on account of our human weakness, and that we are excusable if we do not work out our salvation, the Apostle adds, "For it is God Who is working in you (ἔστιν ἐνεργῶν stronger than ἐνεργεῖ) both to will and to do." Wherefore we not only recognize our need of Divine Grace, but also the duty of not resisting it, and of not receiving it in vain, but of cherishing and using it aright, in order that it may receive increase from Him Who gives Grace to those who ask for it, and increases Grace to those who use it, and adds new degrees of Grace according to their use of it. And, therefore, God's working in us is a stimulus to our working, both antecedently as setting us to work, and subsequently as rewarding that work with greater power of working. Cp. Theophyl. and Hammond in Sanderson's Works, v. pp. 342, 343.

It is well observed by Mr. Ellicott, that ἐνεργῶν, in St. Paul's Epistles, signifies more than 'worketh in you,' it implies that this in-working is energetic and effective. "Deus facit ut faciamus, præbendo vires efficacissimas voluntati." Augustine (de Gratiâ, 16), who says (Serm. 169), "Sine voluntate tuâ non erit in te justitia Dei."

— ὑπὲρ τῆς εὐδοκίας] in behalf of His good pleasure. It is not God who worketh in you to do what is evil, but that which is good; not to fulfil your own desires, but to do His will; not to run into your destruction, but to attain everlasting salvation. It is God's Will, that your will should be free, and that, by a right exercise of your free will, sanctified and quickened by His grace, you should be saved. (1 Tim. ii. 4.) Therefore work out your salvation, for He worketh in you both to will and to do for the attainment of that end. Cp. Theophyl. here.

15. μέσον] So A, B (see Mai), C, D*, F, G.—Elz. ἐν μέσῳ.

— γενεᾶς σκολιᾶς καὶ διεστραμμένης] ye shine forth like lights which serve to light the steps of the traveller in a crooked and winding way. So you, who bear in your hands the word of truth, as a torch which is a lantern unto the feet and a light unto the paths (Ps. cxix. 105), appear in the darkness of the night of heathen error and sin, and serve to lead others in the way to everlasting salvation.

Some learned expositors suppose that the Apostle's metaphor is derived from the Luminaries of the Firmament, to which he compares the Christians of Philippi. No doubt the word φωστῆρες is used in this sense. See Gen. i. 14—16, and compare Trench (Syn. N. T. xlvi.). But this opinion seems hardly consistent with the context. The Luminaries of the Firmament do not shine in the midst of what is crooked and perverse, but of what is clear and glorious. Nor do they guide any one through the midst of winding intricacies.

Rather (as is above intimated) the figure seems to be taken from the custom of carrying torches to guide passengers along the dark and narrow streets of ancient cities (see Aristoph. Vesp. 219, and compare the authorities in Smith's Dictionary, v. 'Fax'), perhaps of Rome itself, which was at this time remarkable for its narrow and winding streets (ὁδοὶ σκολιαὶ καὶ διεστραμμέναι), soon to be destroyed by Nero's conflagration, which changed the aspect of the city. See Tacitus (Ann. xv. 43) and Suetonius, who says (in his life of Nero, c. 38), that the Emperor set fire to the city, "offensus deformitate veterum ædificiorum, et angustiis flexurisque vicorum."

The Christians little thought, when they read these words of the Apostle, that some of their number would soon be literally made to be φωστῆρες by the Emperor in that city. "Ut flammati, ubi defecisset dies, in usum nocturni luminis urerentur." Tacitus (xv. 44). Juvenal (i. 156).

— φαίνεσθε] ye shine forth. Cp. Matt. ii. 7; xxiv. 27. 2 Macc. xii. 9.

17. εἰ καὶ σπένδομαι] if I am even poured out as a libation, or drink-offering, upon the sacrifice and ritual service of your faith.

The appropriateness of the Apostle's figure here will appear from a consideration of the fact, that under the Levitical Law the drink-offering was never offered alone, but was always poured forth before the Lord (Num. xxviii. 7), in the Holy Place, "in conjunction with the slain sacrifices, to complete the Mincha, or Meat-offering" (Lev. ii. 1—16). Cp. 2 Chron. xxix. 35, and see Mather on Types, p. 221.

The drink-offering (Nesek) consisted of Wine (Num. xv. 5. Judg. ix. 13), an apt emblem of blood; the blood of branches grafted in the True Vine, which is Christ (John xvi. 1—5), Who alone enables them to bring forth fruit, and alone makes their fruit, whether in doing or suffering, to be acceptable to God.

St. Paul here puts as a supposition, what in his second imprisonment at Rome (when he knew that the hour of his departure was at hand), he afterwards stated as a fact, Ἐγὼ γὰρ ἤδη σπένδομαι, For I am now being poured out (2 Tim. iv. 6), where see note; and cp. the similar relation of Phil. i. 23 to 2 Tim. iv. 6; and see above, Introduction to this Epistle.

The latter is the consummation of the former. What he looked forward to in his first imprisonment at Rome, was realized in his second imprisonment in the same city.

The Apostle regards the shedding of his own blood in Martyrdom as a Christian drink-offering to be poured out upon the sacrifice and ministration of the Faith of his Christian Disciples, considered as a meat-offering (Mincha) to God; for they are not staggered by his sufferings, but believe that Christ will receive and reward him and all others who have faith in His promises, and suffer according to His example.

Observe also, that in the word here used, there is something prophetic, not merely of the fact of his martyrdom, but of the manner of it.

If St. Paul had been burnt at the stake, as many Christian Martyrs were, the figure would have been less suitable. But it was significant of effusion of blood by decapitation.

The Libation of the blood of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, in the great Metropolis of the Heathen World, was indeed like a drink-offering, completing and consummating the Mincha, or meat-offering, of the faith of the Philippians and other Heathen Nations, whom he has brought to Christ; according to Isa. lxvi. 19, 20, They shall declare My glory among the Gentiles, and they shall bring all your brethren for a Mincha unto the Lord. Cp. Rom. xv. 16, where, writing at an earlier period, he regards the Gentile World as a προσφορὰ, or offering, presented by himself to God as their Minister.

But now, at a later period, when he has his own offering-up in his thoughts, he aptly changes the metaphor, and anticipates the pouring out of his own blood as a drink-offering on their sacrifice.

Finally, when he saw his death at hand, and exclaimed, "I am now being poured out!" (2 Tim. iv. 6) he completed the metaphor. How much harmony of thought and language is there in this! And if the remark may be permitted, how striking is the evidence derivable from this specimen, among others, of the profit and pleasure to be derived from reading the Epistles of St. Paul in chronological order.

20. γάρ] for: a remarkable reason. St. Paul, in the time of his trial, sends Timothy away from himself at Rome to Philippi, because he has no one who is like-minded with himself, and therefore no one will be so earnest and affectionate in his love and care for them. He gives to others what he loved best, and what he needed most for himself.

Thus the divine Apostle exemplifies and enforces by his own practice his precept to them, "Look not at your own things, but every one at the things of others" (v. 4).

— ἰσόψυχον] like-minded with myself, an "alter ego." A remarkable tribute to Timothy, at this the close of his Epistles to the Gentile Churches; and a sufficient reason for St. Paul's subsequent appointment of Timothy to the Bishopric of the great city of Ephesus. Compare his testimony to Titus, afterwards Bishop of Crete, 2 Cor. viii. 6. 16. 23.

— γνησίως] with genuine love; as a genuine spiritual Son of his Apostle and Father in the faith, who will show his love for me by his love of you; cp. iv. 3, σύζυγε γνήσιε. Some expositors interpret γνησίως 'paternally;' but γνήσιος, opposed to νόθος, and derived from γένος, is rather applicable to the offspring than to the parent; and see v. 22, where Timothy's filial relation to St. Paul is commemorated as known to the Philippians; and St. Paul writes to Timothy himself as γνησίῳ τέκνῳ, 1 Tim. i. 2, and to Titus i. 4.

22. γινώσκετε] Acts xvi. 1—3; xvii. 14; xviii. 5; xix. 22.

23. ἀπίδω] I shall have seen, as from a point, from which I am able to contemplate the things around and concerning me; not only the issue of my trial, but also my own consequent movements. Cp. Jonah iv. 5, where it is said that the prophet went out of the city, and took his seat in front of it, ἕως οὗ ἀπίδῃ τί ἔσται τῇ πόλει.

A, B*, D*, F, G have ἀφίδω here, and so Lach., Tisch., Alf., Ellicott, and Winer (p. 43), who ascribes the aspirate form to the influence of the digamma. Cp. Acts iv. 29, where Lachmann has received ἔφιδε. In these cases it seems hazardous to follow a few MSS., lest on similar authority we should be constrained to admit such readings as ἀφελπίζοντες Luke vi. 35, οὐχ ὄψεσθε Luke xvii. 22, οὐχ ὀλίγος Acts xii. 18, ἐφ' ἐλπίδι 1 Cor. ix. 10, οὐχ Ἰουδαικῶς Gal. ii. 14.

25. Ἀναγκαῖον δὲ ἡγησάμην] For the reason of this necessity, see the Introduction to this Epistle.

— Ἐπαφρόδιτον] See iv. 18. Probably this Epistle was carried by Epaphroditus to Philippi.

— ἀπόστολον] your Apostle; perhaps he was the chief Pastor of the Church at Philippi, and chosen, as such, to be their messenger to St. Paul. (Theodoret.) See above, i. 1. In primitive times it was usual for the Churches to communicate with Martyrs and Confessors by means of their respective Bishops and Clergy. Martyr. Ignat. 3, and Ignat. ad Trall. 3. Magn. 2.

26. ἠσθένησε] was sick nigh unto death, to my sorrow particularly, because it appears from the context that the sickness of Epaphroditus, which was almost fatal, was incurred in his zeal to visit St. Paul at Rome, and to aid him in his troubles there.

A frank avowal on the part of the Apostle himself that he himself had no commission or power to heal all sickness, and that he could not heal his dearest friends when sick for his sake.

Similarly we hear from him of the frequent sicknesses of his dearly beloved Son in the faith (1 Tim. v. 23), and of his leaving Trophimus at Miletus sick. (2 Tim. iv. 20.)

A strong proof hence arises that the miracles which are ascribed to his agency were really wrought. (Acts xix. 12. xxviii. 7—10.)

As to the question why the Apostle who wrought so many cures on others did not heal Timothy, Epaphroditus, Trophimus, and other friends, see note on 1 Tim. v. 23.

27. ἐπὶ λύπην] So the best authorities. Elz. ἐπὶ λύπῃ.

30. παραβολευσάμενος] having staked. So A, B (see Mai), D, E, F, G, and Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Meyer, Ellicott, Alf. —Elz. has παραβουλευσάμενος, in the sense of having 'consulted amiss for his own life.'

But παραβολευσάμενος appears to be the true reading, and signifies 'having staked his life.' The word παραβολεύομαι is derived from the substantive Παραβόλιον. The metaphor is from a legal process of appeal (ἔφεσις). Παραβόλιον, or Παράβολον, was the pignus, sponsio, or stake, which the appellant deposited (παρεβάλλετο), and which, if he was cast in his appeal, he forfeited. See the authorities in Lobeck, Phryn. p. 238. Pollux, viii. 62, 63. Meyer, Att. Proc. 767. 772.

Hence the propriety of the figure here. Epaphroditus came from Philippi to minister to St. Paul's needs in his imprisonment and trial. In the Apostle's Appeal before Cæsar, Epaphroditus made his Παράβολον, not with a small sum of money, but risked what was most dear to him: he put, as it were, his own life in pawn for me; he παρεβολεύσατο with his life.

On this figurative use of the word παραβολευσάμενος, see the quotations from Hesychius, Œcumen., Theophyl., and others in Wetstein, p. 273.

Ch. III. 1. Τὸ λοιπόν] Finally—more expressive here, because this Epistle to the Philippians was probably the last Epistle written by St. Paul to any Christian Church. See above, the Introduction to the Epistle, p. 332, and the next note.

What follows, therefore, from these words to the end of this Chapter, in which he gives a brief summary of his former teaching in former Epistles, and to the end of the present Epistle, derives special importance and solemnity from this circumstance.

— χαίρετε ἐν Κυρίῳ] Cp. iv. 4.

— Τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν ὑμῖν] To write the same things to you.

These words have been made the occasion of much controversy;

To what do they refer? Where had St. Paul written the same things as he writes here?

Some Expositors reply—In a lost Epistle.

Others say that he here refers only to the words χαίρετε ἐν Κυρίῳ.

(1) The former of these opinions has been supported by reference to S. Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians, where he says that "Paul, in his absence from the Philippians, wrote Ἐπιστολὰς to them" (c. 3); and it is alleged that the word Ἐπιστολὰς, used there by Polycarp, shows that Paul wrote more than one Epistle to the Philippians.

But this allegation is invalidated by the consideration that Ἐπιστολαὶ (plural) often stands for a single Letter. See Acts xxii. 5. 2 Cor. x. 9, and above, note on i. 1, p. 335.

And even supposing that Polycarp uses ἐπιστολὰς, in a plural sense, we may explain this from the probability that Polycarp regarded the Epistles, which St. Paul addressed to Thessalonica, the Capital of Macedonia, and which he required to be read by all the brethren (1 Thess. v. 27), as addressed to all the Macedonian Churches, and therefore also to the Philippians. See on 2 Thess. i. 4.

(2) The other opinion, that χαίρετε ἐν Κυρίῳ is the topic which he repeats, is hardly consistent with the reason of the thing, nor with the fact, nor with the context.

He rather seems to introduce what follows, as far as to v. 14, by these words.

(3) But, it may be asked, how could the warnings which follow be said to be the same things as he had written before?

This may be explained thus;

The Epistle now before us was probably the last Epistle, in order of time, that was written by St. Paul to any Gentile Christian Church. See above, p. 332—4.

It ought to be borne in mind in reading St. Paul's Epistles, that whatever the Holy Spirit wrote by him to one Church, was written to all Churches.

Accordingly, a little after the date of the present Epistle, St. Peter, writing to the Churches of Asia, speaks of all St. Paul's Epistles as Scripture, and as doubtless well known to them as such. (2 Pet. iii. 16.)

St. Paul's Epistles were designed to be read publicly, and to be circulated from one Church to another, and to teach all Christians in every country and in all ages of the world. And what the Holy Spirit purposed to be done by St. Paul, He effected by his agency. See above on 1 Thess. v. 27. 2 Cor. i. 13. Col. iv. 16.

This important fact, which does not seem to have been sufficiently considered, affords a clue to the sense of this passage: "To write the same things to you (ὑμῖν emphatic) as I have already written to other Churches, to me indeed is not irksome, and to you is safe."

Therefore I will now repeat in this Epistle some warnings, exhortations, and doctrines, which I have already delivered (as you know) in other Epistles to other Churches; and I will bequeath these warnings, summed up together in a brief compass, as an Apostolic legacy to you, and to other Churches of the world.

He then proceeds to deliver those warnings, "Beware of the dogs," and so continues in a strain of hortatory doctrine already delivered in other Epistles to other Churches.

Accordingly, as is well worthy of remark, it will be found on examination, that whatever is added by the Apostle in this and the next chapter, had been already written by him before in other Epistles to other Churches, especially in his Epistles to the Thessalonians, Corinthians, Galatians, and Romans, as may be readily seen by reference to the marginal quotations, and to the following notes.

The repetition of the definite article here, in "the dogs," "the evil workers," "the concision," is not without its significance, as showing that he had given previous warnings, in other Epistles, against these things.

He might well say, that it was not irksome to him to write again these things; and that it was safe for them to receive them; because by thus iterating in a summary manner in this final Epistle to a Gentile Church, what he had said more at large in former Epistles, he declares to the Philippians and to the world, that he has not changed an iota of his teaching; and he thus authenticates those other Epistles, and sets his seal on what had been taught in them, and thus imparts additional assurance to their faith.

It will be seen that in v. 15, he represents this portion of this chapter (vv. 1—14) as comprising in a brief compendium or epitome, the Fundamentals of all Christian Teaching on the doctrine of Justification by Faith. See note on v. 14. See also iv. 4—7.

2. τοὺς κύνας] the dogs, those false Judaizers who despise the true Christians as unclean animals, and therefore call them dogs (cp. Deut. xxiii. 18. Matt. vii. 6; xv. 26), but who are themselves shameless and impure, and are therefore to be shunned. Cp. 2 Pet. ii. 22. Rev. xxii. 15, ἔξω οἱ κύνες.

— τοὺς κακοὺς ἐργάτας] the evil workers,—the false teachers of whom he had spoken 2 Cor. xi. 13.

These words, 'dogs' and 'concision,' bespeak the lateness of this Epistle. He had spoken more tenderly of these things in earlier Epistles (Gal. ii. 7; v. 6; vi. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 19. Rom. ii. 28). But now the Judaizers had received ample warning from him. They could not plead ignorance, and he therefore speaks more sternly of them. Cp. Birks, p. 27.

3. Ἡμεῖς γάρ ἐσμεν ἡ περιτομή] For we are the Circumcision. As he had already declared in Rom. ii. 28, 29; iv. 11, 12. Col. ii. 11. Cp. Justin M. c. Tryphon. 12, δευτέρας ἤδη χρεία περιτομῆς, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἐπὶ τῇ σαρκὶ μέγα φρονεῖτε. Elz. has Θεῷ here, but Θεοῦ has more authority.

— καυχώμενοι ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ] glorying in Christ Jesus. As he had said Gal. vi. 14.

4. καίπερ ἐγὼ κ.τ.λ.] Although I myself having ground of confidence even in the flesh, if any one else deems (1 Cor. iii. 18) that he has confidence in the flesh, I more—. The ἐγὼ repeated brings out more forcibly the strength of St. Paul's superior claim as distinguished from that of others,—if he had desired to enforce it, which he did not.

The strength of the argument, as well as the beauty of the language, is more clearly seen if the sentence is not broken up by colons, but runs on freely from ἡμεῖς in v. 3, to ἄμεμπτος in v. 6.

— εἴ τις δοκεῖ] if any one deems. As he had already said, 2 Cor. xi. 18—22.

— ἐγὼ μᾶλλον, 5. περιτομῇ ὀκταήμερος] I more than others, being, in circumcision, eight days old; i. e. my circumcision was not delayed beyond the legal time (Gen. xvii. 12), and I was not circumcised as a proselyte. As to the dative case, see Winer, p. 193. Ellicott, p. 68.

5. ἐκ γένους κ.τ.λ.] As he had already said in his Epistle to the Corinthians (2 Cor. xi. 22, and Rom. xi. 1). He mentions the tribe of Benjamin, as showing thereby that he was not descended from one of the handmaids of Israel, but from his beloved wife Rachel. And he adds that he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, to remind them that he was not a Hellenist, but of pure Hebrew blood. See on Acts vi. 1. Cp. Dean Trench, Syn. N. T. xxxix.

— Φαρισαῖος] a Pharisee, of the most rigid sect. (Acts xxiii. 6; xxvi. 5.)

6. κατὰ ζῆλος δ. τ. ἐ.] My zeal was not inactive, but displayed itself in energetic and laborious exertions. Cp. Gal. i. 13, 14. Acts xxii. 3, 4.

He thus also declares, that it was not from any personal resentment, or private interest, but out of pure zeal for God, that he did what he did as a Persecutor. Acts xxvi. 9—11. See on Acts xxiii. 1, and 1 Tim. i. 5; and Bp. Sanderson, i. p. 338.

A, B, D, F, G have ζῆλος here in a neuter form; and the Vatican MS. in 2 Cor. ix. 2, has τὸ ζῆλος: and the neuter form is used by St. Paul's contemporary and friend S. Clement, ad Corinth. c. 5, passim, and c. 9; and by S. Ignatius, ad Trall. 4. Elz. has ζῆλον. Cp. Winer, p. 61.

7. ἦν] were. Observe the tense; he does not say ἐστί. See note on v. 8, σκύβαλα.

— μοὶ] to me, privately, personally, and individually — emphatic; as distinguished from my membership in Christ. Cp. the contrast between the individual man, and the man in Christ, in 2 Cor. xii. 2—5.

The things which were a gain to me in my personal character, viz. my Pharisaism and my legal righteousness, commending me to popular esteem, and public honour, among the Jews, these I now count as loss.

— ἥγημαι] I have considered.

8. Ἀλλὰ μὲν οὖν καὶ ἡγοῦμαι] But I not only have considered them loss,—nay, I even now, after long experience, do consider all those things as loss. Elz. has μενοῦνγε, but the reading in the text is that of B, D, E, F, G, J, K.

— πάντα] them all—individually and collectively; i. e. all, and every one of the temporal advantages to which he has referred.

— σκύβαλα] dung. κοπρόν (Hesych.). So Etym. M. and other authorities in Wetstein, and several of the ancient Versions here. Hence σκύβαλον is used for any refuse or offal. This text has been made much of by the Marcionites and others, who disparaged the Levitical Law, and denied its divine origin. They alleged, that if the Law had been divine, St. Paul would never have applied such language to it as to speak of its privileges as ζημία and σκύβαλα. See Tertullian c. Marcion. v. 20, and Chrys. and Theophyl. here.

But this allegation arose from a misconception of the Apostle's words. St. Paul says, that he considers as loss not those things which are a gain to him, such as the Law is, and as he declares it to be in its moral character (see Rom. vii. 12) and in its Scriptures (Rom. iii. 2; xv. 4. 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16), but such things as were formerly a gain to him privately, personally, and individually (see on v. 7), as distinguished from his present corporate condition as a member of Christ. Such were his secular honour, and rank, and renown among his countrymen for his legal learning, and ceremonial strictness, and religious zeal, his punctual observance of the ceremonial Law, and his reliance on his own righteousness consequent thereon.

These are the things which were a gain to him personally: but which now, that he is in Christ, he regards as loss, and even as dung, and casts them away as such, in order that in their place he may win another gain; in order that he may gain Christ, Who is the end of the Law (Rom. x. 4); and in order that he may be no longer a mere isolated individual (ἐγὼ) resting on his own righteousness, but may be found in Him, and have that righteousness which was testified by the Law and the Prophets (Rom. iii. 21), which is of God through faith in Him.

See Rom. x. 3—5. Gal. ii. 16. Cp. Augustine, Ep. 40. 6.

9. εὑρεθῶ ἐν αὐτῷ] may be found (by my future Judge at the great day of search) dwelling in Him, into Whom I was engrafted and incorporated at my Baptism.

10. τοῦ γνῶναι] that I may know. Winer, p. 291. 'Ad cognoscendum.' Vulg.

The infinitive marks the design of faith,—viz. to know Christ; i. e. to love and obey Christ, and to suffer with Christ; to be made conformable to His Death by dying unto sin, and to know the power of His Resurrection, by rising again unto newness of life.

This communion with Christ in His sufferings and death, is signified and sealed in the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, by which we are made conformable to His death, and partake of its benefits. See on Rom. vi. 3. 1 Cor. x. 16; xi. 26.

Thus the Apostle takes care to guard against the Jewish objection, that the doctrine of Justification by Faith affords encouragement to sin. See Rom. vi. 1. 15.

— συμμορφιζόμενος] So A, B (see Mai), D*, and other authorities; and Lachm., Tisch., Meyer, Alf., Ellicott.— Elz. συμμορφούμενος.

As to the sense, he had already dilated on this conformation to Christ's Death in Rom. vi. 3, and Col. ii. 11, 12; and fellowship in His sufferings, 2 Cor. iv. 10.

11. τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν] the Resurrection from the Dead.

So A, B (see Mai), D, E, and several Cursives, and the majority of Versions; and so Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., Alf., Ellicott.—Elz. has τῶν νεκρῶν.

As to the objection that St. Paul does not use the expression τὴν ἀνάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν elsewhere, that is of little weight, inasmuch as it is used in Luke xx. 35. Cp. Acts iv. 2.

Indeed, there seems to be great propriety in the expression here; St. Paul could not doubt, whether he himself should have a part in the Resurrection of the dead; but (as Theophyl. observes) what he is not confident of, is, whether he shall attain to a glorious Resurrection; "ad perfectorum resurrectionem, non ad illam quam etiam inviti habebunt." Primasius.

This is fitly expressed by ἡ ἐξανάστασις ἡ ἐκ νεκρῶν,—not simply "the Resurrection of the Dead," but "the Resurrection which is from the Dead."

So Irenæus, v. 13. 4: "In Resurrectione eam, quæ à Spiritu datur, capiunt vitam; de quâ Resurrectione Apostolus in eâ quæ est ad Philippenses, ait 'Si quo modo occurram ad Resurrectionem quæ est à mortuis.'" And so Tertullian (de Resurr. 23): "De mercede ad quam tendens et ipse cum Philippensibus scribit, si quâ concurram ad Resuscitationem quæ est à mortuis."

And our Lord Himself marks this distinction when He says, οἱ καταξιωθέντες τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου τυχεῖν, καὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως τῆς ἐκ νεκρῶν, Luke xx. 35. Cp. Mark xii. 25, ὅταν ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀναστῶσιν.

If any doubt be entertained as to the soundness of this distinction, the same sense in substance is attained by rendering τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν, His (i. e. Christ's) Resurrection from the dead.

And this construction harmonizes with what precedes: Being made conformable to His Death, if by any means I shall attain to His Resurrection from the dead; and is in unison with what follows, v. 21, μετασχηματίσει τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν σύμμορφον τῷ σώματι τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ, and is illustrated by what he had said Rom. vi. 5—8. If we have been planted in the likeness of His Death, we shall be also in the likeness of His Resurrection. If we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him. Cp. Rom. viii. 11.

11, 12.] Observe here the refutation afforded by this text to the presumptuous doctrines of personal assurance and final perseverance.

The divine Apostle himself, even at this late period of his Apostolic career, does not feel absolutely confident, that he himself will attain to the glory of the Resurrection of the Just; and he disavows the notion of being supposed to have already apprehended. Cp. 1 Cor. ix. 27, where see note.

It was not till on the very eve of his Martyrdom for Christ, that he could exclaim, as he then did, "Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of Righteousness." 2 Tim. iv. 8.

12. διώκω] I am pursuing after. Cp. v. 14, where the metaphor is more fully expanded.

St. Paul, when writing these words, was probably a prisoner on the Palatine Hill at Rome (see on i. 13), and therefore was in the immediate neighbourhood of the Circus Maximus, which lay in the Valley, on the south-western side of the Palatine Hill.

Doubtless he there often heard the loud and enthusiastic shouts of the multitude cheering on their favourite charioteers, and applauding the successful efforts of the victors in the course, which stirred so strongly the passions of the Roman people in the age of Nero, who himself entered the lists of competitors for the prize. Cp. Juvenal's description, xi. 195:

> "Totam hodiè Romam Circus capit; et fragor aurem > Percutit," &c.

St. Paul derives his imagery and language from that exciting spectacle. He has a spiritual Circus of his own. He too is a charioteer. He presses eagerly onward to the mark. He also has a prize to gain,—the palm-branch of Victory from the hand of Christ. Compare the glowing language of Tertullian, quoted above on 1 Cor. ix. 24.

St. Paul connects this imagery with that of his own conversion to Christianity.

He was then also διώκων (a pursuer), but in a different manner; as he says above, v. 6, κατὰ ζῆλος διώκων τὴν Ἐκκλησίαν. But when he was furiously racing onward in his mad career of persecution, he was suddenly arrested by Christ; his car was upset; he was flung prostrate on the ground. He was enlisted by Him in a different course. He was apprehended and laid hold on by Christ, in order that he himself might apprehend and lay hold on the prize which Christ gives. Henceforth he is a διώκων in the Christian Circus; he forgets what he has left behind, and he is continually stretching himself onward to what is before. "Præteritum laborem non computans ad potiora festinat." Primas. Cp. Augustine (de Cantico Novo, 4) on the necessity of continual progress in the Christian race. "Qui non proficit, remansit in viâ . . . . Currentem se dixit Apostolus, sequentem se dixit, non remansit, non retrospexit." See A Lapide, and Augustine in Ps. 38, Vol. iv. p. 444. 447, and Vol. v. p. 1062. 1557, "Non progredi est regredi;" and Bp. Sanderson, iii. 365.

The Apostle compares himself to an eager charioteer hanging over his horses, and urging them on to the goal; and he διώκει κατὰ σκοπὸν, pursues onward after the mark, in order to win the prize of his heavenly calling in Christ.

As to the particular phrases here, cp. Exod. xv. 9, διώξας καταλήψομαι. Sir. xi. 11, ἐὰν μὴ διώκῃς, οὐ μὴ καταλάβῃς.

Observe also that the word διώκω is used with σκοπὸν here: I pursue after the mark as if the goal itself were flying before the pursuer.

The reason of this is, because the mark itself in the Christian life is not a fixed object, but is ever receding from the racer himself, and cannot be apprehended by him while he lives.

The word ἐπεκτεινόμενος, stretching myself over, may be well explained by Virgil's vivid description of the Roman Chariot-race: "illi instant verbere torto Et proni dant lora," &c. See Georg. iii. 103—111.

The term σκοπὸς is used by the LXX for the Hebrew מַטָּרָה, or mark, especially for archers. (Job xvi. 13. Lam. iii. 12. Wisd. v. 13. 21.) Hence it is applied to that which is the aim and end of any effort, as here. "Secundùm scopum persequor ad palmam." Tertullian (de Resur. 23).

The Victory in the Circus was determined by the place gained by the charioteer after going a certain number of heats (usually seven) round the extremities (metæ), and along the side of the spina. The end of the course (or winning-post) was marked by a linea or calx, and was so called. Hence "à carcere ad calcem," and "mors ultima linea rerum." (Horat.)

On the βραβεῖον, or prize, see above on 1 Cor. ix. 24.

In the Roman Circus, the Victor descended from his car at the end of the race, and mounted the spina (or low wall, which was the back-bone of the course), and there received his bravium, or prize. Sueton. (Claud. 21.) Juvenal (Sat. vii. 243).

S. Clement of Rome (mentioned by St. Paul in the next chapter, iv. 3) connects this word βραβεῖον with St. Paul's own Apostolic career. "St. Paul (he says) gained the βραβεῖον of endurance, having worn bonds seven times for Christ (is there any allusion to the seven rounds of the course?),—having been stoned, having been a Preacher of Christ in the East and in the West, he received the splendid trophy of his faith; having taught righteousness to the whole world (i. e. not by his personal preaching only, but by his Epistles also), and having reached the limit of the west, and having borne testimony before the Rulers, he was thus released from the World, and went to the holy place, having been an illustrious pattern of patience." Clemens R. (ad Cor. 5.)

15. Ὅσοι οὖν τέλειοι] As many then as are perfect.

The Apostle had before said that he himself had not yet been perfected, τετελειωμένος, but he here claims to be τέλειος, perfect.

That is, he is perfectly initiated in the knowledge of all saving truth; he is not νήπιος (1 Cor. xiii. 11. Gal. iv. 3), but he is τέλειος, he has attained to full ripeness and maturity of manhood in Christ. As he says to the Corinthians, σοφίαν λαλοῦμεν ἐν τοῖς τελείοις, and therefore he exhorts them not to be babes in knowledge (cp. Eph. iv. 14), but to be φρεσὶ τέλειοι (1 Cor. ii.

But he has not yet been perfected, he is not yet come to the society of just men made perfect (τετελειωμένων). Heb. xii. 23. Cp. Luke xiii. 32. He is not yet able to say that he has finished his course with joy. (See Acts xx. 24.) It was not till he saw that the hour of his departure was at hand that he could say as he did, τὸν δρόμον τετέλεκα (2 Tim. iv. 7), I have finished the race, and the crown of righteousness is mine. (2 Tim. iv. 8.)

— τοῦτο φρονῶμεν] let us have this mind; which he has declared in this summary of his doctrine on Justification, beginning at v. 1, and continued to v. 12 inclusive, of this chapter (where see note). For this is σοφία ἐν τοῖς τελείοις. (1 Cor. ii. 6.)

— καί εἴ τι ἑτέρως φρονεῖτε] And then (that is, provided ye entertain this mind, which I have declared concerning the true foundation of the faith) I say, if ye hold any opinion concerning any thing else in a different light from what is right, God will reveal that other thing to you in its true light.

He does not say, εἴ τι ἕτερον φρονεῖτε, but εἴ τι ἑτέρως φρονεῖτε.

That is, he does not say, If ye entertain any different and diverse opinion concerning that which I have declared to you as the truth; but he says, If ye hold fast to that, and if, in any thing else which I have not declared to you, ye are minded otherwise, God will enlighten you.

— ἀποκαλύψει] "Ambulando in quod pervenimus, et, quò nondum pervenimus, pervenire poterimus, Deo nobis revelante, si quid aliter sapimus, si ea quæ jam revelavit non relinquamus." Augustine (de Gratiâ, 1).

God will be willing to reveal it to you, if you walk in the way of the true faith. (Primasius.)

16. Πλήν] But, moreover, however that may be, whether in things not fundamental ye see then in a different light, yet take care to bear this in mind which I am about to say. See 1 Cor. xi. 11. Eph. v. 33. Rev. ii. 25, where the sense is similar: πλὴν ὃ ἔχετε κρατήσατε.

— εἰς ὃ ἐφθάσαμεν] as far as we attained: up to that point, to which we are advanced in the Christian faith.

On the sense of φθάνω, attingo, see Matt. xii. 28. Luke xi. 20. 1 Thess. ii. 16. Rom. ix. 31. 2 Cor. x. 14.

— τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν κανόνι, τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν] walk by the same rule, mind the same thing.

The infinitive is rather preceptive than imperative: it declares what is to be done by the teacher himself, as well as by the taught. It lays down a general maxim for all. Cp Hesiod (O. et D. 391), γυμνὸν σπείρειν, γυμνὸν δὲ βοωτεῖν. Kühner (G. G. § 644). Winer (p. 283).

The words κανόνι τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν are not in A, B (see Mai), and some Versions, and have been rejected by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., Alf., Ellicott, particularly on the supposed ground that they are a gloss imported from Gal. vi. 16.

But there is a large amount of testimony in their favour, particularly for τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν. And since this chapter in his last Epistle to a Christian Church is designed to be a final summary of St. Paul's teaching on the great doctrine of Justification by Faith, as distinguished from the Judaizing dogma of legal righteousness (see on v. 1), it is no argument against the genuineness of these words (but rather the contrary) that something similar to them occurs in other Epistles, especially that to the Galatians (vi. 16; cp. there, v. 12 to v. 16, with the present chapter, 3—9), and the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians (Rom. xv. 5. 2 Cor. xiii. 11. Cp. Gal. v. 10), to which he would specially desire them to refer for further instruction on the topic treated of here.

17. Συμμιμηταί μου] Be ye followers together of me; not of the false teachers. Cp. 1 Cor. iv. 16; xi. 1.

18, 19. πολλοὶ γὰρ κ.τ.λ.] He now passes on to describe another kind of error, that other phase of Judaism, which professed to have Faith and Knowledge, but which indulged itself and others in Antinomian Licentiousness, and which had been already condemned by St. James, and to which the Apostle St. Paul himself had referred in his Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, and on which he afterwards dwelt more fully in his Epistles to Timothy and Titus, and which at length developed itself in the wild speculations and libertine extravagances of Gnosticism. See the Introductions to those Epistles.

He here points to some features of that immoral delusion; enmity to the Cross, denying the reality of Christ's human body and sufferings, thus subverting the doctrine of the Atonement, and the foundations of Faith and Holiness; love of carnal indulgence, consequent on the denial of the Incarnation and Passion of Christ, "God manifested in the Flesh;" and seeking for worldly gain (cp. 1 Tim. vi. 5. Tit. i. 10), minding the things of earth, and forgetting those of heaven, denying the future Resurrection of the body (2 Tim. ii. 18), and its assimilation to Christ's glorified body, and thus taking away the strongest motive to holiness of life.

— ἐχθροὺς τοῦ σταυροῦ] enemies of the Cross of Christ. This phrase is adopted by S. Polycarp in his Epistle to the Philippians (c. 12). On the sense, see the preceding note.

20. τὸ πολίτευμα—ὑπάρχει] We are citizens of heaven. See i. 27. The Apostle means something more than that "our city or country is heaven;" for men may dwell in a city or country, and yet have no share in its privileges. We have our πολίτευμα, or civil status, already pre-existent (ὑπάρχον) in heaven. We were citizens of heaven before we became citizens of earth. Observe the strong word ὑπάρχει. (Cp. ii. 6.) Christ, our Head and King, had ascended thither, and is there, and we, His members and subjects, are there also. Cp. Eph. ii. 6. 19. Heb. xii. 22, and the memorable passage in Justin M. (c. Diognetum) describing the Christian life (§ 5), ἐν σαρκὶ τυγχάνουσιν, ἀλλ' οὐ κατὰ σάρκα ζῶσιν, ἐπὶ γῆς διατρίβουσιν ἀλλ' ἐν οὐρανῷ πολιτεύονται, and Frag. 7 and 9, ἐν οὐρανῷ ἡ κατοίκησις ἡμῶν ὑπάρχει.

The words of St. Paul are well paraphrased by Tertullian (de Coronâ Mil. 13), "Tu, Christiane, peregrinus es mundi hujus, civis supernæ Hierusalem. Noster, inquit (sc. Paulus), municipatus in cœlis. Habes tuos census, tuos fastos, nihil tibi cum gaudiis sæculi." And again Tertullian says, referring to this passage, to the Martyrs (c. 3), "Vobis corona æternitatis, brabium angelicæ substantiæ, politia in cœlis, gloria in sæcula sæculorum."

Our Divine Head is gone into Heaven, and has carried our Humanity thither, and has given us the freedom of the heavenly city, and has prepared a place for us there. (John xiv. 2, 3.)

Many boast the privilege of having the freedom of Rome, and it is sold for a great price. (Acts xxii. 28.) But we have been enrolled in the Census of heaven. We, the Members of Christ, are already in heaven by virtue of the exaltation of our Head. (Cp. Eph. i. 20.) We live and act as subjects of Christ, and fellow-citizens with the Angels (Eph. ii. 19); and therefore we are not at home when we are on earth; we have here no continuing city (Heb. xiii. 14), but are journeying to our home in heaven.

21. μετασχηματίσει τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως] will change the body of our abasement, so as to be conformed to the body of His glory. Hence Tertullian says (de Resur. Carnis, 55, and ad Marcion. v. 20), "Transfigurabit corpus humilitatis nostræ conformale corpori gloriæ suæ." And so Irenæus (v. 12. 3), with the exception that he uses the word 'conforme,' and not 'conformale.'

The genitives of the substantives ταπεινώσεως and δόξης are more expressive than adjectives (ταπεινὸν and ἔνδοξον) would have been, as showing that the abasement of the body comes from us, but the glory of the body comes from Christ.

The Fathers rightly argue from this text for the identity of the risen body under a change of condition. Thus Tertullian, l. c., "In resurrectionis eventu mutari licebit cum salute substantiæ: resurget hoc corpus nostrum quod humiliatur. Quomodo enim transfigurabit, si nullum erit?" And Irenæus, l. c., "Quod est humilitatis corpus quod transfigurabit Dominus? Manifestum est, quoniam corpus quod est caro, quod et humiliatur cadens in terram." As St. Paul himself says, "It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory." 1 Cor. xv. 43, and see there, v. 51—54.

After ἡμῶν Elz. has εἰς τὸ γενέσθαι αὐτὸ, which is a gloss.

The construction is illustrated by Rom. viii. 29, προώρισεν συμμόρφους. Cp. Winer, p. 550 (who compares Matt. xii. 13), and Kühner, § 560. Matthiæ, § 414, 3.

— τῷ σώματι τῆς δόξης] Wonderful transformation! This frail body of ours, if it is conformed to the body of Christ in suffering on earth, will be also conformed to His body in glory, even to that body which is adored by Angels, and sits at the right hand of God. If all the world could weep, it would never shed tears enough for him who is excluded from that glory and consigned to everlasting shame. (Chrys., Theoph.)

Christ, at His own Transfiguration, gave a pledge and glimpse of the future glorious transformation of the risen Body, and thus prepared the Apostles to suffer with Him on earth, in order that they might be glorified for ever with Him, in body and soul, in heaven. See on Matt. xvii. 2, 3.

CH. IV. 3. Ναί] Yea. So the best authorities. Elz. has καί.

— σύζυγε γνήσιε] true yoke-fellow. St. Paul might, if he had pleased, have handed down this person's name to the praise of the world in all generations by adding a single word. But he has not done so. And now it cannot be determined who this person was. It cannot be his wife, as some have imagined. Both grammar and history (1 Cor. vii. 7) refute such a supposition. He may, perhaps, be referring to St. Luke, who cannot have been now at Rome (see ii. 20), and who appears to have been specially conversant with the Philippians. Cp. on 2 Cor. viii. 18.

But such particulars as these are doubtless left in uncertainty for a wise purpose, in order that we may not pretend to be wise above what is written (1 Cor. iv. 6), and also to remind us, that it is of little importance, whether our names are found recorded with honour in the world's history, provided they are found hereafter written "in the book of life." Compare what is said above, Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles, pp. xii, xiii.

— αὐταῖς] them, i. e. Euodia and Syntyche.

— Κλήμεντος] Clement; probably the same person who was afterwards Bishop of Rome, and whose Epistle to the Corinthians is still extant. So Origen in John i. 29. Eusebius, iii. 4, and iii. 15, and S. Jerome, de Viris Illust. 15. S. Irenæus says (iii. 3, 3), that the blessed Apostles (Peter and Paul) having founded the Church of Rome, committed the Episcopate of it to Linus, whom St. Paul mentions in his Epistles to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21), and that Linus was succeeded by Anencletus, and that after him, in the third place [S. Jerome says the fourth, and Tertullian says, de Præscr. 32, "Clementem à Petro ordinatum"], Clement was appointed to that Episcopate, who had beheld the blessed Apostles, and had been conversant with them, and who had their preaching still ringing in his ears, and their tradition before his eyes; and in this respect he was not single, for others were then surviving, who had been taught by the Apostles. In the time of this Clement, no small dissension arose among the brethren at Corinth; and the Church of Rome sent to the Corinthians a letter, very adequate to the occasion, constraining them to peace, and renovating their faith, and declaring to them the tradition which he had recently received from the Apostles. Clement was succeeded by Evarestus. (Irenæus.)

On the succession of the earlier Bishops of Rome, see Bp. Pearson, Minor Works, ii. p. 461—468, with the additions of his learned Editor, p. 469—473. Bp. Pearson places the Episcopate of Linus, A.D. 55—67; that of Anencletus, to 69; that of Clement, from 69 or 70—83.

It has happened providentially, that while the names of so many helpers of St. Paul are not specified, the names of Linus and Clemens were commemorated by him. The support of St. Paul's Apostolic authority was thus given to them and their public acts, as Bishops of the Church, after his death. It is not unworthy of remark, that these commemorations of them are found in Epistles written by him from Rome, of which City each of them was Bishop; and in his farewell Epistle, viz. in the Philippian Epistle, the last that he wrote to a Church, and that is addressed to a Colony of Rome; and in the second to Timothy, the last of all his Epistles.

— ἐν βίβλῳ ζωῆς] in the book of life. It need not, therefore, to be recorded by me.

That this saying does not imply any assertion concerning the certainty of their salvation, appears from Exod xxxii. 32. Ps. lxix. 28. Rev. iii. 5, where names once written in the book of Life are represented as liable to be blotted out.

4. ἐρῶ] I will say.

4—7.] Compare these verses with what he had before said, in his first Epistle. 1 Thess. v. 16—23. See above on iii. 1.

5. Τὸ ἐπιεικές] See 1 Tim. iii. 3.

— ὁ Κύριος ἐγγύς] The Christian Watchword. (1 Pet. iv. 7, compared with 2 Pet. iii. 8.)

6. τῇ προσευχῇ] Cp. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2.

7. ἡ ὑπερέχουσα πάντα νοῦν] "Pax ista præcellit omnem intellectum nostrum, neque sciri à nobis nisi cùm ad cœlestia venerimus potest." Augustine (de Fide, 16).

8. Τὸ λοιπόν] Finally. He repeats the word (see iii. 1), like one who still lingers, and is loth to bid farewell.

— ὅσα εὔφημα] 'quæcunque bonæ famæ.' St. Paul does not think it beneath him to pay regard to things of 'good report.' He who keeps his life clear of sin does good to himself; he who keeps it clear of suspicion, is merciful to others. Our life is necessary to ourselves, but our good name is necessary to others. Therefore the Apostle commands us to provide things honest, not only in the sight of God, but also in the sight of men (2 Cor. vi. 7, 8). And in this exhortation he does not omit to mention things of 'good report,' as necessary to be minded by us. I suppose the Apostle did not over-value the praise of men; for he says, If I pleased men I should not be the servant of Christ (Gal. i. 10; cp. 1 Cor. iv. 3. 2 Cor. i. 12). But he endeavoured not only to live a good life, but also to keep a good name—the one for his own sake, the other for the sake of other men, as well as for himself. Bp. Sanderson (in his excellent Sermon on Eccles. vii. 1. Vol. i. p. 1—32).

— εἴ τις ἀρετή] Not to be rendered, 'if there is any virtue' (for this could not be questioned), but 'whatever virtue there is.' Cp. εἴ τις θέλει, whosoever desires, Luke xiv. 26; and the phrase, εἴ τις ἔχει ὦτα ἀκούειν, whosoever hath ears to hear, Mark iv. 23; vii. 16, which is equivalent to ὁ ἔχων ὦτα ἀκούειν: and Rom. xiii. 9, εἴ τις ἑτέρα ἐντολὴ, whatsoever other commandment there is; 1 Cor. iii. 14, εἴ τινος ἔργον μενεῖ, whosesoever's work shall remain; and viii. 3. See also John iii. 3. 5; vi. 53, where this phrase introduces very important doctrinal declarations.

10. ἀνεθάλετε τὸ ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ φρονεῖν] ye put forth fresh sprouts of your care for me; 'repullulastis sapere pro me' (Aug.); 'refloruistis sentire pro me.' (Vulg.)

He rejoices that they had sprouted forth afresh in their care for him, now that he was relieved by their alms, as in a second spring. Cp. Aug. (Conf. xiii. 26.)

Ἀναθάλλω is used here in an active sense, as in Ezek. xvii. 24. Ecclus. i. 18. Ye had the mind of tender affection for me always, but ye now displayed it; like a tree which has life in it in winter, but which puts forth evidence of that inner life by its foliage in spring.

The Christian, in his almsgiving, is like a tree planted by the water-side, whose leaf does not wither, and which brings forth its fruit in due season. (Ps. i. 3.)

The former germinations of their loving care for the Apostle had shown themselves when he was at Thessalonica, on his first visit to Greece (v. 15), and probably when he was afterwards at Corinth. See on Acts xviii. 5, and on 2 Cor. xi. 9.

— ἠκαιρεῖσθε] ye had not a season. It was not from any barrenness on your part, that you did not put forth buds and sprouts of affection, but you had no favourable season for such spiritual vegetation.

11, 12.] On these verses, see Bp. Sanderson's Sermon, Vol. i. 113—171.

12. Οἶδα καί] I know both, &c. Elz. has δὲ instead of καί, which is more expressive, and is in the best MSS.

— ἐν παντὶ καὶ ἐν πᾶσι] in each thing (taken singly), and in all (collectively).

13. ἐνδυναμοῦντί με] So Ignatius (ad Smyrn. 4) looking forward to martyrdom, ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς τὸ συμπαθεῖν αὐτῷ πάντα ὑπομένω αὐτοῦ με ἐνδυναμοῦντος. Cp. 1 Tim. i. 12. 2 Tim. iv. 17. Elz. adds Χριστῷ, not in A, B, D*.

15. ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου] at the beginning of the Gospel preached by me. He makes it a subject of praise to the Philippians, that at the beginning of his Apostolic career, when he was little known in Greece, and had rendered comparatively little service to the Churches of that Country, they, a poorer Church, had come forward, and stood alone in ministering to his needs, and had twice sent pecuniary supplies to him, even when he was in the wealthy City of Thessalonica—the capital of Macedonia.

Clement of Rome says to another Greek Church, that of Corinth (c. 47), "Take the Epistle of the blessed Paul into your hands. What did he write to you first of all, ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, i. e. at the beginning of his preaching to you?" He then refers them to the first Chapter of the first Epistle (1 Cor. i. 10). In that case the word εὐαγγέλιον seems to be used (as Cotelerius observes) of preaching by writing. Here it is said of preaching by word of mouth, and signifies 'his first preaching of the Gospel among them.' See Acts xvi. 12; xvii. 1. Cp. Sanderson (i. p. 112).

We are not to imagine (as some have done) that St. Paul's Apostolic career began at his Conversion. It is not to be dated from his Conversion at Damascus, but from his Ordination at Antioch. See Acts xiii. 3, 4.

This mention here of the kindness of the Philippians at the beginning of his Apostolic Ministry, is more striking, as a record of his thankful remembrance of them, because it is made in this Epistle, almost at the end of his Ministry.

It is observable that there is a similar retrospect in the last Epistle of all that he wrote—the Second to Timothy.

There he goes back, with grateful reminiscence, to the earliest period of his own Ministry—the persecutions he endured at Antioch, and Iconium, and Lystra (iii. 11), and to the commencement of his intercourse with Timothy (i. 5).

At the close of his career, he takes a review of the whole, from the beginning, in order that he may be duly sensible of God's continual care and love towards him. So here. An exemplary pattern of thankfulness to all—especially at the end of life.

There is a difficult passage, hitherto unexplained, in the Epistle of S. Polycarp to the Philippians, which illustrates, and is illustrated by this text.

In the Old Latin Version of S. Polycarp's Epistle, sect. xi. (the original Greek of that section is lost), we read, "Nihil tale sensi in vobis, in quibus laboravit beatus Paulus, qui estis in principio Epistolæ ejus."

This clause has been usually supposed to mean that the Philippians are mentioned in the beginning of his Epistle; but this is unintelligible. The true meaning seems to be, that they themselves are his Epistles (compare 2 Cor. iii. 2, ἡ ἐπιστολὴ ἡμῶν ὑμεῖς ἐστε) in the beginning (ἐν ἀρχῇ) of his ministry.

— ὅτε ἐξῆλθον ἀπὸ Μακεδονίας] when I went out of Macedonia.

This circumstance is mentioned, because he was driven out of Macedonia by the inveterate rancour of the Jews, persecuting him first from Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 5—10), then following from Berœa, and expelling him also thence; and thus he was forced to go out of Macedonia. Yet, he says, ye Philippians did not desert me, but succoured me even then.

— εἰς λόγον δόσεως καὶ λήψεως] for an account or reckoning (see v. 17), of giving on one side, and of taking on the other. "In ratione dati atque accepti." Augustine.

No other Church gave, and I took from no other Church but from you.

It may be said, that there could be no taking, if there was no giving.

But it is to be remembered, that the word λαμβάνειν, as applied to ministerial maintenance, signifies to take as a due. See 2 Cor. xi. 8. 20, εἴ τις λαμβάνει. The minister of God λαμβάνει by right under the Gospel, as under the Law. See on 1 Cor. ix. 14, and Irenæus iv. 8. 3, who shows the unity of both Testaments in this provision.

16. καὶ ἐν Θεσσαλονίκῃ] even in Thessalonica, that great and wealthy City, where it might be expected that some would befriend me. Ye sent and succoured me even there.

17. τὸ δόμα—τὸν καρπόν] Observe the definite articles. The gift is not the thing that I seek for, in your love, but the fruit that aboundeth to your account, not to mine. "Non ut ego explear, sed ne vos inanes remaneatis." Aug. (Serm. 46.)

I have learnt from Thee, O Lord, to distinguish between the gift and the fruit. The gift is the thing itself, which is given by one who supplies what is needed, as money, or raiment. But the fruit is the good and well-ordered will of the giver. It is a gift, to receive a Prophet, and to give a cup of cold water; but it is fruit, to do those acts in the name of a Prophet, and in the name of a Disciple. The raven brought a gift to Elias, when it brought him bread and flesh; but the widow brought fruit, because she fed him as a man of God. Augustine (Confess.

18. ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας] See Eph. v. 2.

— θυσίαν—Θεῷ] An offering, therefore, not made to me, but to God, Whose Apostle I am. Cp. Prov. xix. 17. Matt. xxv. 35. Heb. xiii. 16. This is the true character of Christian almsgiving. Cp. i. 17, and see Irenæus, iv. 18. 4, where he shows that the Jews are no longer able to offer oblations acceptable to God; which are offered in the Church, through Christ, and there only, and by Him alone, and explains what those oblations are. An important lesson to those who imagine, that provided money is given, it signifies little from whom it comes, and with what motive it is given.

22. μάλιστα οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας] Specially the Christians of Cæsar's household—probably freedmen, and other domestics of the Palace. Cp. Lightfoot, Journal of Philology, Vol. iv. p. 57—79.

St. Paul says, "specially they of Cæsar's household," and thus shows that he had special means of intercourse with them. In his confinement on the Palatine (see on i. 13) he had become acquainted with some members of the Imperial Household. Perhaps some of them had been employed in ministering to him, as a state-prisoner, in his detention; and he had gained influence over some who were appointed to guard him.

At Philippi, a Colony of Rome, the Apostle had preached to the Jailor who guarded him, and to all his household (τῇ οἰκίᾳ αὐτοῦ, Acts xvi. 32), and they all were baptized by him. He is now at Rome, and has made converts of Cæsar's household, who salute the Philippians as their brethren in Christ. Such a greeting as this must have been specially welcome to the Philippians. See above, i. 13.

The Gospel was first preached to the poor (Matt. xi. 5), and God chose the weak things of this world (1 Cor. i. 26—28), and the Apostle had shown his Christian tenderness for the large and despised class to which Onesimus belonged, by his letter to Philemon (Philem. 16). Now Christianity has found its way into the household of Cæsar. At length, after it had been persecuted by the Cæsars, it won Emperors to Christ. Thus the mustard-seed of the Gospel grew, and stretched forth its branches, and overshadowed the world. (Matt. xiii. 31. Luke xiii. 19.)

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

On the Authorship of the Epistle.

THIS Epistle has been ascribed to different persons. The names of those to whom it has been assigned may be conveniently taken into consideration in the following alphabetical order.

Apollos has been regarded as its author by many learned writers in ancient times[1]. But to this opinion there are several insurmountable objections.

Apollos was of Alexandria[2]; and it may be safely affirmed, that, if Apollos had written the Epistle, his Christian fellow-countrymen would have been cognizant of the fact, and would have been moved by a sense of justice, as well as national zeal, to vindicate its authorship to him.

The ancient Church of Alexandria was the most learned Church of Christendom. In its Catechetical School, founded by St. Mark, it reared a succession of men eminent for erudition and literary research. The early Christian Teachers of Alexandria would not have allowed that distinguished Alexandrine Teacher to be despoiled of his due honour.

Apollos had many devoted adherents[3]; and if he had been the writer of the Epistle, some of them would have come forward in his native country, and elsewhere, to claim for him the credit of so signal a service to the cause of the Gospel, as the composition of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

But, as will be shown hereafter, the Christians of Alexandria, from the earliest times, unanimously ascribed this Epistle to another person. Not one Alexandrine writer can be cited as having assigned it to the Alexandrine Teacher Apollos.

Nor is this all. The fact is, that not a single Author of any note, in any part of Christendom for fifteen centuries, attributed it to Apollos. That opinion first appeared in the world in the sixteenth century[4].

It is clear from the Epistle itself, that the author was known by his friends, especially those to whom it was first sent[5]; and few persons, it may be supposed, will be induced to imagine, that the authorship remained a secret for so long a time, and that it was first discovered fifteen hundred years after Christ[6].

St. Barnabas has been supposed by others to be the author of the Epistle.

This opinion has been maintained by many able advocates with much learning and ingenuity[7].

The most important argument in its favour is, that the Epistle is ascribed to Barnabas, without hesitation, by one of the most learned writers of the second and third centuries, Tertullian[8].

In one of his Montanistic treatises, urging the necessity of a severe penitential discipline towards those who have lapsed into deadly sin, and having cited passages from the writings of St. Paul in support of his own opinion, he says: "I am willing, by way of supererogation, to add the testimony of one who was a companion of the Apostles; and who is qualified, by the nearness of his own rights, to confirm the discipline of his masters. There is extant a writing of Barnabas to the Hebrews,—a man sufficiently authorized by God [1], inasmuch as Paul associated him with himself in the maintenance of self-denial [2], and verily the Epistle of Barnabas is more generally received among the Churches than the apocryphal Pastor [3] of adulterers."

Tertullian proceeds to quote from the Epistle to the Hebrews that memorable passage which was the occasion of so much controversy in ancient times between the writers of the Church on the one side, and the partizans of the severe penitential discipline of Montanus and Novatian on the other [4]. He then adds: "The writer who received this doctrine from the Apostles, and taught this with them, had never learnt, that a second repentance was promised by the Apostles to an adulterer or fornicator."

This certainly is a strong testimony; and it derives additional cogency from the consideration, that Tertullian, who was distinguished by the extent of his learning, does not seem to have entertained any doubt as to the authorship of the Epistle; and that, if he had heard it attributed to any person of superior dignity to St. Barnabas, he would probably have mentioned the fact, in his desire to procure the highest sanction in his power for the testimony which he adduced from the Epistle in favour of his own tenets.

On the other hand, it is to be remembered, that in the age of Tertullian, there was but little erudition among the Christians of the West. The Latin Church had no literature before his time [5]. And Tertullian,—as this passage and many others in his writings show,—was accustomed to speak dogmatically, in an arbitrary, self-confident, and magisterial tone (a frailty incidental to learned men standing alone among their contemporaries), and to promulgate his own private opinions as oracles for the Church.

The ascription of this Epistle to Barnabas may be reckoned among the private opinions of this great African Father. It never took root in Christendom [6]. It was almost unknown in the East. It was not received in Cyprus, the country of St. Barnabas. Epiphanius, the learned Bishop of Salamis in Cyprus in the fourth century, who was by origin from Palestine, and therefore an important witness on this subject, knew nothing of it. He ascribed the Epistle to another author [7].

Nor was Tertullian's opinion accepted in Africa, his own country. S. Augustine, the ablest writer of the African Church, attributes the Epistle to another,—the same person as Epiphanius [8]. So does Primasius, a learned African Bishop of the sixth century, and an excellent commentator on St. Paul's Epistles [9], who discusses the question of the authorship. And what is of even greater importance, the Bishops of the African Church, in several Synods, ascribe it to another author [10].

Besides, if Barnabas had written the Epistle, he would, in all probability, have prefixed his name to it. Barnabas had taken part with Peter at Antioch in the debate concerning the Ceremonial Law [11], and his name would have commended it to the favourable acceptance of the Jewish Christians. He would probably have followed the example of the Apostles St. Peter and St. James, who, in writing to Jewish Christians, placed their own names at the beginning of the Epistles which they wrote.

Yet further; it is a constant tradition of the Church that Barnabas wrote one Epistle; and that Epistle is not reckoned by the ancients among the Canonical Scriptures [12]. Whether that Epistle is the

[1] The true reading (as Oehler and Delitzsch have pointed out) is, "à Deo satis auctorati viri," not "adeò satis auctoritatis viri."

[2] That is, in not claiming ministerial wages from the Churches (1 Cor. ix. 6).

[3] He so calls the work entitled the "Shepherd of Hermas," the discipline of which was regarded by him as too lax, and as affording encouragement to sin.

[5] Evidence has been given of this fact in another place, in the Editor's volume on "S. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome," chap. ix.

[6] This statement is not contravened by the testimony of S. Jerome concerning the Epistle: "licet plerique eam vel Barnabæ, vel Clementis arbitrentur" (Epist. ad Dardan. 129), where "plerique" does not signify "most persons," but "many," and is designed to comprise those who ascribed it to S. Clement; and is to be explained by what S. Jerome says in another place (Cat. Eccles. Script. 5), "Epistola quæ fertur ad Hebræos non Pauli creditur, propter styli sermonisque dissonantiam, sed vel Barnabæ juxta Tertullianum, vel Lucæ Evangelistæ juxta quosdam, vel Clementis, Romanæ postea Ecclesiæ Episcopi, quem aiunt ipsi adjunctum sententias Pauli proprio ordinasse sermone." S. Jerome's own opinion will be stated hereafter.

same as the Epistle now extant which is ascribed by some to Barnabas, is doubtful[1]. If it is, then the great difference in power and authority between it and the Epistle to the Hebrews, refutes the supposition that the latter is due to him. At any rate, it is certain that the one Epistle which the ancient Church attributed to Barnabas, was not the Epistle to the Hebrews.

On the whole, it may be affirmed that no other ancient writer of any note can be specified as having ascribed this Epistle to Barnabas. Tertullian's opinion, however it may have arisen[2], is not ofsufficient weight to counterbalance the arguments, positive and negative, on the other side.

S. Clement, Bishop of Rome[3], is supposed by others to be the writer of this Epistle.

If, however, the ancient testimonies on this subject are examined, it will be found that they only go so far as to intimate that some persons were of opinion that the language of the Epistle was from him, and that they ascribed the substance to another person[4], and said, that Clement either translated the Epistle from Hebrew, or clothed the thoughts of another in the dress which they now wear in the Epistle.

Our present inquiry is concerning the subject-matter of the Epistle.

There is no ancient authority in favour of its ascription to Clement of Rome.

On the other hand, there is a peculiar circumstance in his relation to the Epistle, which appears to refute the opinion that Clement was its author.

An Epistle of Clement himself has come down to us. In it he often quotes or refers to the Epistle to the Hebrews[5], as has been already observed by S. Jerome[6].

The use which S. Clement has made of the Epistle to the Hebrews is very important, as proving the primitive antiquity of that Epistle, and the high esteem in which it was held. It also seems to afford a strong presumption that Clement himself was not the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. He would hardly have quoted it as he does, blending passages from it with citations from Holy Scripture, if he himself had written it. And if he himself had written the Epistle to the Hebrews, which was received as Canonical Scripture by the Eastern Churches from the earliest times, it seems probable that the other Epistle, which Clement afterwards wrote when Bishop of Rome, in the name of the Roman Church to the Church of Corinth, would have been characterized by similar spiritual endowments, and would have attained a no less dignity than the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The Epistle of S. Clement to the Corinthians is (as S. Jerome calls it) a "very useful Epistle." It breathes a spirit of genuine Christian charity, and is dictated by an earnest desire for Christian unity. It is in every respect worthy of an Apostolic Bishop and Father. But the Epistle to the Hebrews has far higher titles; and we need not hesitate to say, that the writer of the Epistle, still extant, which was sent in the name of the Church of Rome to that of Corinth, and is universally ascribed to S. Clement, was not the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

St. Luke has been named by others[7] as the writer of this Epistle.

But the same observations which have already been made with regard to S. Clement may be applied also to St. Luke. Those ancient testimonies which mention his name in connexion with the Epistle, do not ascribe to him the substance of the Epistle, but only the form[8].

St. Luke did not, according to them, conceive the plan of the Epistle, or furnish the thoughts and ideas, but only attired them in their present dress. And even this supposition is confessedly put forth as an expedient for removing a difficulty, and to account for the phenomena of the style of the Epistle, supposed to differ from that of the received Epistles of St. Paul.

[2] If a conjecture may be allowed in this matter, perhaps the Epistle to the Hebrews may have been read by Tertullian in a Manuscript commencing with the Epistle ascribed to Barnabas (to which Origen refers c. Celsum, i. 63; Clem. Rom. Hom. i. 18; and Euseb. vi. 13), and the Epistle to the Hebrews not having any name prefixed to it, may therefore have been supposed by Tertullian to have been written by him. The practice of binding together MSS., the compositions of different authors, was very ancient. The Epistle of S. Clement is contained in the Alexandrine MS. of the New Testament. The old Latin Version of the Epistle of Barnabas was discovered in a MS. of a work of Tertullian.

Sed et multis de eâdem Epistolâ non solùm sensibus sed juxta verborum quoque ordinem abutitur; omnino grandis in utrâque similitudo est."

[7] Particularly by Grotius, Köhler, and last of all, though not confidently, by Delitzsch, in his learned Commentar zum Briefe an die Hebräer, Leipzig, 1857, p. 701—706.

[8] See for example Euseb. iii. 38; vi. 25.

There appear to be insuperable objections to the opinion which ascribes the Epistle to him.

St. Luke was not of Hebrew origin [1], nor is there any evidence that he was even an Hellenistic Jew. It is most probable that he was a Gentile Christian; and the testimony of Christian Antiquity derives his origin from the city of Antioch [2], the capital of Syria, the centre of Gentile Christianity.

It is by no means probable that a Gentile Christian, or even a Jewish Hellenist, would have ventured to undertake the task of writing an Epistle to the Hebrews.

Such an act would have savoured too much of presumption, and would not have been in accordance with the characteristic modesty of the Evangelist.

Besides, if St. Luke had been the author of the Epistle, it can hardly be doubted that the Christians of Syria, of Asia, and of Greece, would have known the fact, and would have attributed it to him.

But we find, on examination, that the Church of Antioch unhesitatingly assigned the Epistle to another person.

The Bishops assembled in a celebrated Synod in that city in A.D. 269, to examine the heretical teaching of Paul of Samosata, quote the Epistle [3], and ascribe it not to St. Luke, but to St. Paul.

Thus then we are brought to the question—

I. Was the Epistle to the Hebrews written by St. Paul?

II. Is the language of the Epistle from him, or only the substance; or both?

These questions may be considered with reference—

(1) To external testimony,

(2) To internal evidence.

The external testimony divides itself naturally into two branches, that of the Eastern Church, and that of the Western.

The Epistle was addressed to the Hebrews of the East, especially of Jerusalem and Palestine.

Although the Author of the Epistle writes anonymously, yet those persons, to whom the Epistle was primarily and specially addressed, were acquainted with the name and person of the Author. He thus speaks to them: Pray for us, for we are persuaded that we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honourably; but I beseech you the rather to do this, in order that I may be restored to you the sooner . . . And again, Know ye that our brother Timothy has been set at liberty, with whom, if he come soon, I will visit you [4].

These and other similar expressions bespeak an individual well known personally to the friends whom he addressed.

The question therefore arises here—

What is their testimony concerning the writer? To whom did they ascribe the Epistle?

To this inquiry it may be replied, that the Churches of Jerusalem, Palestine, Syria, Asia, and Alexandria concurred in ascribing the Epistle to the Apostle St. Paul.

From Jerusalem and Palestine we have the testimony of a celebrated Bishop of Jerusalem in the fourth century, S. Cyril, who attributes the Epistle to him without any hesitation [5].

The same may be said of Eusebius, Bishop of that city in Palestine, in which St. Paul was confined for two years, Cæsarea [6], and who ascribes the substance of the Epistle to St. Paul.

The testimony of Eusebius is of more value, because the Epistle to the Hebrews has ever been regarded by the Church as one of its best safeguards against the heresy of the Arians, who sometimes appealed to Eusebius as favourably inclined to their tenets. If (says Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus [7]) the Arians are not willing to listen to us concerning the benefits which the Church has received from the Epistle to the Hebrews, let them listen to Eusebius of Palestine, to whom they appeal as an advocate of their own dogmas. For Eusebius confesses that this Epistle is the work of the divine Apostle St. Paul, and that all the ancients entertained this opinion concerning the authorship of the Epistle[1].

It ought to be added, that Eusebius elsewhere inclines to the opinion that the substance of the Epistle was St. Paul's, but the diction from another hand. See E. H. iii. 38.

The testimony of the Church of Antioch, the capital of Gentile Christianity, and the centre of St. Paul's missionary labours[2], has been already referred to. It ascribed the Epistle to St. Paul[3].

Testimonies to the same effect may be adduced from competent witnesses of the Churches of Asia and Greece.

The Council of Nicæa received it as a genuine work of St. Paul[4]. Gregory Thaumaturgus[5], Gregory of Nazianzum, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, Theodore of Mopsuestia in Cilicia St. Paul's own country, S. Chrysostom at Antioch and Constantinople, Epiphanius of Salamis in Cyprus, Theodoret of Cyrus, the Synod of Bishops assembled at Laodicea (A.D. 363), all agreed in assigning it to St. Paul[6].

In a word, to cite the expression of S. Jerome, "All the Greek writers received it as his[7]."

The witness of the important Church of Alexandria is entitled to special attention.

That Church was of primitive origin, it was founded by St. Mark, who was with St. Paul in his first imprisonment at Rome[8], and perhaps also at his martyrdom[9]. Its tradition was probably derived from that Evangelist.

The ancient Alexandrine Church was also distinguished by an uninterrupted succession of writers eminent for ability, for learning and enterprising research, who were reared in, or presided over, the Catechetical School of that city, even from the days of St. Mark[10]. One of the Principals of that School, in the second century, was Pantænus[11], the master of the learned[12] Clement of Alexandria, another Teacher in that Institution.

Pantænus (as is commonly believed) ascribed the Epistle to St. Paul, and endeavoured to explain the reason of the absence of the Apostle's name from the commencement of the Epistle[13].

The Epistle was also assigned to St. Paul by the successor of Pantænus, S. Clement[14].

The testimony of Origen, the scholar and successor of S. Clement, is substantially the same as that of his predecessors.

He says in one place that he has arguments to prove that it is a genuine work of St. Paul[15]; and in another he declares, "whatever Church[16] receives it as St. Paul's, let it be commended for doing so; for (he adds) it is not without reason that the primitive writers[17] have delivered it to us as Paul's[18].

It is true, that Origen in one place adverting, as S. Clement had done before him, to the difference of style between this Epistle and the acknowledged Epistles of St. Paul, offers another solution in explanation of that phenomenon; and expresses an opinion, "that the thoughts of the Epistle are from the Apostle, and the composition and phraseology in which they are clothed, are from some other person, who recorded the apostolic materials, and committed to paper what was dictated by his master . . . . but who it was that reduced the Epistle to writing God knows; but the story which has reached us from some persons is, that Clement, Bishop of Rome, committed the Epistle to writing, and from others that it was St. Luke[19]."

On these testimonies two observations may be made;

First, it thence appears, that there was an uniform and consistent tradition at Alexandria in the second and third centuries, that the substance of the Epistle was from St. Paul.

[1] It is quoted as St. Paul's by Eusebius in extant works; e. g. de Mart. Palæst. c. 11. Demonst. Evang. v. 3, in Ps. ii. Cp. Davidson's Introduction, iii. p. 192.

[12] Euseb. vi. 13.

[13] See the testimony of Clement in Euseb. vi. 14, where the "blessed Presbyter" is generally supposed to be Pantænus. If it is not Pantænus, yet the witness of a man to whom so learned a person as Clement refers with so much veneration as his senior, will still command great respect. And the opinion of Pantænus, his master, may be inferred from Clement's own testimony as to the authorship of the Epistle.

[14] See Euseb. vi. 14. Clement conjectured that it was written originally in Hebrew by St. Paul, and translated into Greek by St. Luke, and he constantly quotes it as St. Paul's; e. g. Stromat. ii. p. 420; vi. p. 645.

[15] Origen, Ep. ad African. Vol. i. p. 19.

[16] εἴ τις ἐκκλησία. This is the meaning of the phrase (see note above on Phil. iv. 8), and not 'if any Church,' as it is sometimes rendered.

[17] οἱ ἀρχαῖοι ἄνδρες, 'the primitive men,'—not (as it has been sometimes translated) 'ancient men;' the expression is much stronger than that.

[18] Origen, in Euseb. vi. 25. It has been observed by Kirchofer, p. 244, that Origen quotes the Epistle to the Hebrews about 200 times, and often cites it expressly as St. Paul's; and never attributes the substance of it to any other writer.

[19] Origen, ap. Euseb. vi. 35.

And, secondly, it is thence also clear, that there was a discrepancy of opinion concerning the person who put the materials of the Apostle into writing. In the earliest account, that of Pantænus, there is no hint that the diction of the Epistle was not from St. Paul, as well as the matter; although his attention was evidently called to the question, inasmuch as he suggests a reason for the absence of St. Paul's name from this Epistle [1].

S. Clement puts forth a private opinion, that the Epistle is a translation from a Hebrew original written by St. Paul [2].

Origen propounds a different hypothesis,—that the materials of St. Paul were arranged by another writer who was unknown; but some mentioned S. Clement, and others St. Luke, as the person who gave it its present dress.

The inconsistency of these various suppositions concerning the language of the Epistle imparts greater force to the consistency of the tradition concerning its substance. They show, that the question concerning its authorship had even then been discussed and examined. And this uniformity of independent witnesses, who differ from each other as to the minor matter of its phraseology, and whose testimony reaches back to primitive times, and comes from the most learned school of ancient Christendom, will not easily be shaken by any conjectural theories of later criticism.

It may also be here remarked, that the variety of ancient Alexandrine speculations concerning the person to whom the language, apart from the substance, is due, affords a presumption that the substance and language are not from different hands, but from one and the same. This conclusion is confirmed by the succeeding testimony of the Alexandrine Church.

For, the tradition concerning the authorship of the subject-matter of the Epistle continued to maintain its consistency. But the various floating speculations concerning the author of the diction, as distinct from the substance, gradually vanished away. The author of the matter and the language was thenceforth generally regarded as one and the same person—St. Paul.

This appears from the testimony of the celebrated Dionysius, a scholar of Origen, and Bishop of Alexandria (A.D. 247), who ascribes the Epistle to St. Paul; and of Theognostus, the Head of the Catechetical school there (A.D. 282), and of Peter, the celebrated Bishop of that city (A.D. 300 [3]), and of his successor Alexander in 313 [4], and, finally, of the two great Bishops of that see, namely, S. Athanasius and S. Cyril [5]. All these ascribed the Epistle—both in substance and form—to St. Paul.

Before we pass from the testimony of the East to that of the Western Church, we may observe that the most ancient Greek Manuscripts, now extant, of St. Paul's Epistles, place the Epistle to the Hebrews among St. Paul's Epistles. They do not place it after the Pastoral Epistles (as is done in the Vulgate and in our own Authorized Version), but before them.

In the Alexandrine Manuscript, and in the Codex Vaticanus, and in the Codex Ephrem, and in the Codex Coislinianus, and also in some Cursive Manuscripts [6], the Epistle to the Hebrews follows immediately after the Epistles to the Thessalonians [7].

It is also deserving of remark, that in still more ancient Greek Manuscripts than any which we now possess, the Epistle to the Hebrews was placed immediately after that to the Galatians, and before that to the Ephesians [8].

From this testimony of ancient Manuscripts, it is evident that at the time when those Manuscripts were written, the Epistle to the Hebrews was reckoned among those of St. Paul.

Let us now turn to the testimony of the West.

S. Clement, Bishop of Rome,—whom St. Paul himself mentions with affection as one of his own fellow-labourers whose names are in the book of life [9],—quotes the Epistle, as has been already observed, but he does not say that it was written by St. Paul.

[9] See Phil. iv. 3.

On the other hand, he does not ascribe it to any one else. He does not specify the name of the Author.

This mode of dealing with the Epistle on the part of S. Clement, who doubtless knew the author, does not indicate an opinion on his part, as some seem to think, that St. Paul was not the Author.

The Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, whoever he was, had written anonymously; and doubtless he had good reasons for doing so. If the writer was St. Paul, then S. Clement, who was an intimate friend of the Apostle, and wrote soon after his decease, would know and respect those reasons, and would be guided by them. As a fellow-labourer and follower of the inspired Apostle, he might well be inclined to quote the Epistle, in order to show his reverence for it as a part of Canonical Scripture, and to commend it as such to the reverent use of the faithful; and the more so, because the Epistle was anonymous, and could not commend itself, as the other Epistles of St. Paul do, by his Apostolic name prefixed to them. But, in his love for the Author, he would not do what the Author himself had not done; he would not betray the secret, and publish his name to the world at large, at that early date, when the reasons for not divulging it were still in force. He would quote the Epistle to the Hebrews as divinely-inspired Scripture, and would leave it to Time to make known the name of the Author.

This is precisely what is done by S. Clement.

The testimony of Tertullian, ascribing it to Barnabas, has been already considered.

It must, however, be noticed again, because it seems to afford some explanation of the manner in which the Epistle was regarded by some in the Roman Church in the age of Tertullian, that is, the second and third centuries.

Tertullian, we have seen, refers to the earlier portion of the Sixth Chapter of the Epistle. It is observable, that he does this in one of his Montanistic treatises, in which he is denouncing in no measured terms what he regarded as the lax and dissolute discipline of a branch of the Western Church, most probably the Roman [1].

In this treatise Tertullian ascribes the Epistle to Barnabas.

The Western Church at that time possessed no writers that could be compared with Tertullian in learning. Indeed, with the single exception of Minutius Felix, no Latin Christian writer of any note belongs to that period.

Besides, the Latin Church was then harassed by the Montanists from the East, and afterwards by the Novatians from Africa.

Both of these sects found, as they imagined, a strong testimony in behalf of their rigorous penitential discipline in that portion of the Sixth Chapter of the Epistle which had been cited by Tertullian in his Montanistic Treatise, "de Pudicitiâ."

The Roman Church, in the stress of controversy for which she was then little qualified, and in the lack of time for research, and of critical aid and resources, may probably have been so much influenced by Tertullian's bold and peremptory assertion (ascribing the Epistle to Barnabas), together with her own desire to get rid of the inconvenient argument which he and her Montanistic adversaries invoked against her from that Epistle, that she may have not been very reluctant to allow the authorship of the Epistle itself to be regarded as doubtful; and some of her controversialists may have thus been led even to accept Tertullian's assertion, and to affirm that it was written by some other Author than St. Paul [2].

Accordingly we find that one of her champions is signalized as having omitted the Epistle to the Hebrews from the catalogue of St. Paul's Epistles.

This was Caius. It is observable that he was celebrated for his strenuous efforts against Montanism, and it is expressly recorded, that "he mentions only thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, not enumerating the Epistle to the Hebrews with the other Epistles," and that he does this in a treatise against Montanism [3].

It does not follow from this statement, that Caius and his friends actually denied that the [2] It does not indeed appear that Novatian himself laid much stress on that passage of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The Novatians certainly did so; and this circumstance led to its disparagement by some Western writers. See the express testimony of Philastrius (Bp. of Brescia A.D. 380), who says (de Hæresibus, lxxxix.) that "there are some persons who do not regard the Epistle to the Hebrews as St. Paul's, and that it is not publicly read by them .... on account of the Novatians." He then proceeds to vindicate the sixth chapter (v. 4—6) from the Novatian misconstruction.

Epistle was St. Paul's. He may have thought only that it was doubtful, whether it was St. Paul's or no, and therefore in enumerating his Epistles, he did not set it down in the list. But it must be carefully borne in mind, in arguments concerning the authorship of books of Scripture, that there is a very wide difference between doubts and denials.

The same remark may be made on the ancient Latin Canon of Scripture, first published by Muratori, and dating from the second half of the second century [1].

The Epistle to the Hebrews is not mentioned in this Canon; and it says that St. Paul wrote only to Seven Churches [2].

But this document is in a fragmentary condition. It does not mention some Epistles which were generally received as canonical, namely, the first Epistle of St. Peter and St. John. And the canonicity of the Epistle to the Hebrews cannot be doubted, whatever may be said of the authorship.

Therefore the authority of this document is not of much weight in the present inquiry.

Thus then, though doubts existed in the Western Church concerning the Pauline origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews, yet we have little evidence of any distinct assertions that it was not written by the Apostle.

There are two eminent Greek writers who lived in the second and third centuries, and who were connected by many associations with the Latin Church, whose testimony deserves attention—S. Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, and his disciple, S. Hippolytus, Bishop of Portus, near Rome.

It is said by some [3], that Irenæus and Hippolytus asserted that the Epistle to the Hebrews was not by St. Paul.

As to Irenæus, he knew the Epistle, and quoted it [4], and if the fragments discovered by Pfaffius are genuine, he ascribed it to St. Paul [5].

With regard to S. Hippolytus, there is no positive testimony on either side in his extant writings; and it is certainly worthy of remark that he does not quote the Epistle.

Nor does S. Cyprian quote it in any of his surviving works [6].

Perhaps both of these writers, especially the latter, were deterred from doing so by the confident assertion of Tertullian, that it was a work of Barnabas, while others ascribed it to St. Paul; and they may have thought it wiser to suspend their own judgment, and may therefore have abstained from appealing to it, as being, in their opinion, of doubtful origin.

But this abstinence, with regard to this Epistle, seems rather to show that the writers who abstain from quoting it, were not qualified to give evidence concerning it.

For, whatever may be thought of its Authorship, no one can doubt of its Inspiration. And, as an inspired writing, it was entitled to be quoted, whoever might be its author; and it was as much entitled to be quoted, as any book whose author was known.

Let it also be supposed, for argument's sake, that Cyprian and others in the west, not only entertained doubts concerning its authorship, but even denied that it was written by St. Paul.

Then we may add, that the judgment of the Western Church after their times, more strongly confirms the Pauline origin of the Epistle;

Their doubts—for they did doubt,—and their denials—if they did deny—must certainly have led to a careful examination of its authorship.

Its claims to be a work of the Apostle St. Paul must have been minutely scrutinized and severely tested.

What, then, was the result?

Did the doubts or denials of the Western Church overrule the affirmatory tradition and judgment of the Eastern Churches?

Or, did the assertions of the East prevail over the hesitations and negations of the West?

The answer to these questions is easy;

[1] See Routh, R. S. iv. p. 26. Westcott on the Canon of N. T., p. 236. 557.

[2] This assertion, however, on which much stress has been laid by some, does not exclude the Epistle to the Hebrews; for the Hebrews could hardly be said to be a Church in the sense that the Romans, Corinthians, and others residing in specific cities, and addressed as such by St. Paul, are Churches.

The doubts of the West were dispersed in the fourth century, and did not appear again, till they were revived by one or two persons in the sixteenth.

The Epistle to the Hebrews was received as a genuine work of St. Paul by S. Hilary, Bishop of Poictiers (A.D. 368[1]), by S. Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, by S. Jerome, and by S. Augustine (not, however, without some hesitation), by Innocent, Bishop of Rome[2], by Primasius, Isidore, Haymo, Alcuin, and Aquinas[3], and by the general consentient voice of the Western Church; and it was accordingly inserted as a genuine Epistle of St. Paul in the Canon of the Councils of Hippo, Carthage, and, lastly, of the Council of Trent[4]; and was received by the Church of England as such in her Authorized Version of Holy Scripture[5].

All the Churches of Western Christendom agreed with all the Churches of the East in receiving the Epistle to the Hebrews as the work of St. Paul.

This result is the more convincing and satisfactory, even on account of the doubts and denials which the Church had to traverse, and through which she pursued her course, till she arrived at her conclusion.

The doubts and denials of former ages prove that the question was diligently sifted at a time when ample evidence was at hand for settling the question. Doubts existed; therefore the question was examined, and decided; and the doubts disappeared. And so those doubts themselves have been of great service. They are like the doubts of St. Thomas concerning Christ's Resurrection[6]. He doubted, and was convinced; and we are convinced by means of his doubts. The result of such doubts is—that we need never doubt.

As to the internal evidence afforded by the Epistle itself, it is true that the absence of St. Paul's name from its commencement seems to present a presumption in the first instance against its ascription to him.

But on examination, this circumstance may appear rather to be in favour of its Pauline origin.

The Epistle was written by some inspired person in the Apostolic age. Whoever its author may be, the Epistle itself is a part of Canonical Scripture.

The author, whoever he is, in writing anonymously, deviates not only from the usage of St. Paul, but from that of the other writers of Epistles in the New Testament[7].

The questions therefore arise—

What divinely-inspired person would be most likely to write, and to write anonymously, to the Hebrews? Would St. Paul, or would any one else?

The Epistle was designed primarily for the Jewish Christians of Palestine[8], who were tempted to relapse into Judaism, and for other Jewish Christians, and also for the benefit of Jewish readers throughout the world, and lastly for universal use.

It was designed for enemies as well as for friends, for Judaizing Christians, and for unchristianized Jews.

Of all the Apostles or Apostolic men of the primitive age, no person would be better qualified, and no one would be more desirous, to write such an Epistle to such parties as these, than St. Paul. He was a Hebrew of the Hebrews[9], an Israelite of the seed of Abraham[10]; he had been brought up at the feet of Gamaliel; he was a Pharisee, the son of Pharisees[11]; he had been made an instrument in the hands of the Jewish Sanhedrim for persecuting the Church. Therefore he owed to them and to the Church a debt of Christian reparation. He was consumed by a fire of zeal and love for the souls of his brethren, his kinsmen according to the flesh; so that, if it were possible, he could wish himself to be anathema for their sakes[12]. He had made collections in Asia and Greece for the temporal needs of his poor brethren at Jerusalem[1]; and his last visit to that city had been paid for the purpose of bringing alms to his nation[2]. How much more desire would he feel to provide spiritual food, such food as is provided in the Epistle to the Hebrews, for their immortal souls!

[7] The Epistles of St. John form no exception. The first words of them sufficiently bespeak the Author, though he does not name himself.

[8] As was the opinion of Chrysostom, Theodoret, Jerome, and the Alexandrine Fathers (see Credner, p. 562), and has been satisfactorily proved by Stuart, in his Introduction, §§ 4. 10.

But if he had prefixed his name to the Epistle, he would have run the risk of marring his own labour of love.

The name of Paul was obnoxious to Judaizing Christians on account of his uncompromising conduct at Antioch[3], and for his bold assertion of the doctrine of Universal Redemption by Christ. And he had been constrained to use stern language, and to utter solemn warnings against those of the concision in the last Epistle which he wrote in his first imprisonment at Rome, the Epistle to the Philippians[4]. His name was still more offensive to the Jews; he was abhorred by them as a renegade and an apostate. The last time that he had been at Jerusalem, when he declared to them that he had been sent to preach to the Gentiles, they cried out, "Away with him, it is not fit that he should live[5]." And more than forty of them banded themselves under an oath, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul[6].

In a word, though as a Hebrew, a Pharisee, and a former persecutor of the Church, and as a divinely-inspired Apostle, St. Paul was specially competent to write such an Epistle, yet as he was the Apostle of the Gentiles, and the author of such Epistles as those to the Galatians and the Romans, the name of Paul could not be acceptable to many of those for whom the Epistle to the Hebrews was designed.

Suppose that in writing an Epistle to the Hebrews he had followed his usual practice, and had prefixed his name to it. What bitter feelings of rancour would the sight of that name have excited in the minds of many whom he desired to win to Christ! They would have recoiled from it with disdain and execration. The very first word of the Epistle would have deterred many of them from reading it; it would have almost frustrated the purpose for which the Epistle was written, and would have stirred in their hearts those angry passions, which he, who had taught others to put no stumbling-blocks in another's way, and to give no offence to Jews or Greeks, would have been the last to awaken[7].

The Apostle St. Paul, acting in conformity with the precepts of love, which he himself had delivered, would not expose any to such temptations as these; he would not provoke the jealousy and malignity of any, and so cause them to sin; he would not gratuitously excite the least prejudice against himself, and still less against the Gospel of Christ; he shrank from no necessary avowal of the Truth; he had suffered the loss of all things for the Gospel; and finally he shed his blood in its cause. But in a spirit of holy wisdom and divine charity, which he had learnt from his Master, Christ[8], he did all in his power to make that Truth lovely and attractive, even to its worst foes.

He would not, indeed, withhold his name where it was needed; but he would not obtrude it where it would provoke hatred, and repel any from that Gospel which he was sent to preach.

On the whole, then, as to the present point, we may thus conclude:—

The Epistle to the Hebrews was written by some person in the Apostolic age. It is anonymous. It is a part of Canonical Scripture. The divinely-inspired Author, whoever he was, whose consummate wisdom is apparent from the Epistle itself, was guided by God's Spirit, not only in writing the Epistle, but in not prefixing his name to it. And if St. Paul had written such an Epistle as this, we recognize strong and sufficient reasons why he should have been restrained from following his usual practice, and that of other writers of Epistles, and from inserting his own name at its commencement.

But we do not see similar reasons of equal force for the suppression of the name of Apollos, or Barnabas, or Clement, or of any other person, to whom the Epistle has been ascribed.

Therefore the non-appearance of the Author's name in the Epistle to the Hebrews does not diminish, but rather increases, the probability that its Author was St. Paul[9].

[9] The above reasons were well urged in early times by Augustine, Exposit. Epist. ad Rom. sect. 11; and more at length by another African Bishop, Primasius, in the sixth century, in his Preface to this Epistle.

But are we, therefore, to imagine that the Epistle was not known to be his by his friends, to whom it was sent? No; doubtless the bearer of the Epistle communicated to them the quarter from which it came. And the Epistle itself, as has been already observed [1], bears evidence that the Author was known to them. He desires their prayers, and promises to visit them [2]. The mention also of the name of our brother Timothy, who had been St. Paul's associate from his youth, for many years, and is called "his brother" in several of his Epistles [3], would suggest to his friends the name of St. Paul.

Let it also be remembered that there was a special token by which his Epistles were to be discerned by his friends.

Each of the Thirteen Epistles, to which St. Paul's name is prefixed, contains near its close his Apostolic Benediction, "Grace be with you." And, in one of the first Epistles which he had written, he had announced that this would be the token in every Epistle, and that so he would write [4]. And no other writer of Scripture uses this token during St. Paul's lifetime [5]. It was reserved to him as his special badge and cognizance.

And this Apostolic Benediction, found at the close of each of the acknowledged Thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, is found also at the close of the Epistle to the Hebrews [6].

We may now advert to some objections that have been made to this conclusion.

1. On the ground of discrepancy of style between this and St. Paul's received Epistles.

In his acknowledged Epistles, the Apostle speaks with authority, and rebukes with sternness. But the language of the Epistle to the Hebrews is, for the most part, mild, gentle, and subdued.

The style of his undisputed Epistles is vehement and abrupt, and, as he himself says, he does not use excellency of speech, or enticing words of man's wisdom, but is rude in speech [7].

But, as Origen [8] and others have observed, the Epistle to the Hebrews has more of a Grecian air in its composition than those other Epistles; its periods flow in smoother and more harmonious cadences, its arguments are arranged with systematic exactness, and the Epistle resembles the work of a practised orator.

But these phenomena are not inconsistent with the conclusion already stated.

In the first place, the Epistle to the Hebrews hardly admits of being compared with the received Epistles of St. Paul. It partakes rather of the character of an address spoken than written; it is rather an oration than an Epistle. It is like a voice of warning and exhortation uttered by one of God's Ancient Prophets to His Own People. It is the utterance of a Christian Isaiah. Being formed, as it seems, on such a prophetical model, it naturally assumed a different tone and character from an Epistle, and can scarcely be compared with such a composition.

Next, it can scarcely be supposed, that the divinely-inspired Apostle St. Paul could not write in different styles on different occasions, and to different persons. Even uninspired men can do this. Great Masters can paint in different manners; and great Authors can write in different styles.

What more different, than S. Cyprian's Epistle to Donatus [9], and the rest of his works? What more different, than the beautiful lyrical effusions of Aristophanes [10], and his comic raillery? What more different, than the exuberant luxuriance of Lycidas and Comus, and the sober severity of Samson Agonistes and Paradise Regained?

An eminent ancient critic, Longinus [11], speaking of the different styles of the Iliad and the Odyssey, has some remarks which are relevant to this question. He compares the genius of Homer, as displayed in the Iliad, to the sea in its full strength; and in the Odyssey, to the same sea gently subsiding in a quiet calm. It is the same Sea in both, but in different states. There are, says he, signs of old age in the Odyssey, but it is the old age of Homer.

The mind of the great Apostle must have been in a very different condition when writing the Epistle to the Hebrews (supposing him to have been the Author) from what it was in when he wrote his earlier Epistles. He was now "Paul the aged[1]." This Epistle was the last great effort of his mind. Even, therefore, on the ground of a change of physical temperament, we might expect some change of style.

But, waiving such considerations as these, as being perhaps less applicable to inspired writers, we may reflect, whether there were not some special circumstances in the condition of the writer (supposing him to be St. Paul), and of those persons whom he addressed in the Epistle to the Hebrews, which would necessitate such a modification of style, as has been described.

The Author has purposely concealed his name, and for the same reasons he might be unwilling to discover himself to all by his style.

He does not speak in the same authoritative tone as in his other Epistles. No; for he was speaking to a very different class of persons.

St. Paul might well speak with authority to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Corinthians, for they were his spiritual children; and even to the Romans, for he was the Apostle of the Gentiles.

But in writing to the Hebrews, especially the Hebrews of Jerusalem, he could not forget what he himself was, and what they were.

At Jerusalem he had shed the blood of St. Stephen. He had been a blasphemer and a persecutor, and injurious[2]. He could not write to the Hebrews without feelings of penitential self-humiliation, and compassionate forbearance, which must subdue his spirit, and chasten his style. He would write to them as one who would "deal gently with the ignorant, and with those who were out of the way[3]."

Besides, among the Hebrews were some, who were to be regarded by him with dutiful veneration, as the fathers of the Ancient Church of God, the descendants of Abraham, the representatives of Moses and Aaron, and of the august line of Priests and Prophets of the old Dispensation. How could he address such personages as these, except in a reverential tone of quiet reserve, and measured self-control?

Again; he had deliberately and purposely adopted an energetic and vigorous, a plain and unadorned style, in writing to the other Churches, lest any one should allege that he had fascinated them with bewitching words of man's wisdom, and had converted them to Christianity by the allurements of an artificial Rhetoric[4]. He had studiously done this, in order that their faith might not "stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God."

But the Hebrews were a different class. They could not be spoilt by the graces of polished language. There was no danger that it should be said, that he had enchanted them by harmonious diction, and charmed them into belief by Grecian eloquence.

And when the Epistle to the Hebrews came to be disseminated, as it would be, and as it was, among the Greeks, and Romans, and Asiatics, they would derive great pleasure and profit from the proof which it brought with it, that St. Paul had been able, if he had been willing, to write with equal beauty and harmony of diction to them, and that he had abstained from doing so, because he preferred God's glory, and their salvation, to any applause that could accrue to himself, from the splendour of human Eloquence.

It is true, that the Epistle to the Hebrews differs in style from the undisputed Epistles of St. Paul to other Churches. But it is also true, that the Hebrews differed much from them, and that St. Paul's condition in addressing the Hebrews was very different from his position in writing to others. These differences in the condition of the writer and of the parties to whom he writes, seem amply sufficient to account for the difference of style[5].

Further, as has been shown by others, together with this circumstantial difference of form and expression, there is a substantial similarity of thought and matter[6], and frequently even of words[7], between the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the acknowledged Epistles of St. Paul.

As to the objections raised from Heb. ii. 3, "confirmed to us by those who heard him;" and on ix. 4, as to the θυμιατήριον, see notes there.

The objections raised by some upon supposed inaccuracies as to the Temple-worship, proceed from inadvertence to the fact that the writer is speaking of the Levitical Tabernacle; and they who urge such objections are impugning not only the Pauline origin, but the Canonicity of the Epistle, which was universally acknowledged, and is firmly established.

This objection seems to be grounded on a misapprehension of the name Hebrews, prefixed as a title to the Epistle.

The word Hebrew is not there used, as sometimes it is[1], in opposition to Hellenist; but it is designed to comprise all, of whatever class, who had passed from the Synagogue to the Church, or who still adhered to the religion of the Temple. The word Jew had now become offensive, as being opposed to Christian[2].

By what name could they who are here addressed be designated? There was no other so appropriate and attractive as Hebrew[3].

Doubtless, many of those whom the writer addressed understood Hebrew, and could read the Old Testament in the original tongue. But the great majority could not, but used the Septuagint Version; and the Epistle was designed eventually for the common use of all Christendom.

Even in St. Stephen's speech, spoken at Jerusalem before the Sanhedrim, the quotations from the Old Testament are given in the words of the Septuagint Version[4]. The speech of St. Stephen to the Jewish council, is, as it were, a prelude to the Epistle to the Hebrews; and the form in which that speech is presented in Holy Scripture to the Church and to the World, may serve to explain and illustrate that of the Epistle in this and in other respects.

Besides, it is to be carefully borne in mind, that the Apostle, writing to the Hebrews, had special reasons for using the Septuagint Version.

That Version had been executed by Jews; its execution had been honoured by the Jews with the institution of an annual Festival to celebrate it[5]; it had been received by the Jews, and was publicly read in the Jewish synagogues where the Greek language was spoken. The Septuagint Version was, in a word, the Authorized Jewish Version of the Old Testament[6].

Therefore, the Apostle, in quoting from the Septuagint, in this Epistle to the Jewish Nation, is quoting from a Jewish Version of the Jewish Scriptures; he is quoting from a Version, against which the Jews could not make any objection; he is quoting from a Version, which had received the public sanction of their own Hierarchy, and was authorized by their own religious use in all parts of the world.

But if the Author, writing to the Hebrews, had substituted some private Greek translation of his own in the place of this publicly received Version of the Jewish Nation, then the Jews would probably have excepted against his interpretations of their own Scriptures, as erroneous; they would have alleged, that he had some private ends and sinister purposes to serve, in this deviation from the public standard; and then all his reasonings, in this Epistle, grounded upon his quotations from the Old Testament, would have fallen idly to the ground.

3. With regard to the hypothesis, that the matter of the Epistle is due to St. Paul, but the diction to another person, this is tantamount to a theory that the Epistle to the Hebrews is to be ascribed to two different authors. This theory is refuted by the Epistle itself, which plainly points to one person as its author, in the following passages;—

"Pray for us; for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly. But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner . . . . I beseech you, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation, for I have written a letter unto you in few words. Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty, with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you[7]."

4. The other supposition of some persons in ancient and modern times, that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written by St. Paul in the vernacular Hebrew of his age[8], and was afterwards translated into the Greek form in which it is now extant, by St. Luke or S. Clement, is simply conjectural. No such Hebrew original now exists, or (as far as we know) ever existed.

St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, and St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, wrote their Epistles in Greek. St. Paul, it is true, wrote primarily for the Hebrews in Palestine, but he wrote also for all Jews, and for all men; and the probability seems to be, that he would write in the common language of all in that age,—namely, in Greek.

[2] The full development of this feeling is seen in the last Gospel, where the term "the Jews," οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, occurs in numberless places to designate the enemies of Christ (see John v. 16. 18; vi. 41; vii. 1; x. 31; xi. 8), which is never the case in the first three Gospels.

Besides, it has been rightly argued from external evidence, particularly from the constant use of the Septuagint Version in the Epistle, and the frequency of paronomasias [1] in the Epistle,—a figure of speech very common with St. Paul [2],—and from verbal allusions and arguments [3], that the Greek form of the Epistle is original, and not a translation [4].

On the whole, then, after a review of external testimony from the Eastern and Western Churches, and of the internal evidence supplied by the Epistle itself, we arrive at the conclusion, that the Epistle to the Hebrews, both in its substance and its language, is from one and the same person, the Apostle St. Paul.

If this conclusion is sound, then we may determine very nearly the date of the Epistle.

The Author was then at liberty, for he promises to come to Palestine shortly [5]. He is not any longer at Rome, or he would have specified that city in his salutation, which is, "They of Italy salute you [6]."

The Author is expecting Timothy, who had probably been sent by St. Paul to Philippi in Macedonia, according to his promise, immediately on his own release from his two years' imprisonment at Rome [7], and who, it seems, had himself been imprisoned, perhaps as a well-known friend of the Apostle, and therefore obnoxious to the Jews, and had now been set at liberty [8].

The Epistle, therefore, appears to have been written some time after the release of St. Paul from his first imprisonment at Rome, perhaps after his journey to Spain [9], when he was attended by some friends from Italy, and was on his way westward toward Palestine, and for that last missionary circuit by Crete, where he placed Titus as Chief Pastor, to Jerusalem, and to Philippi in Macedonia, in his way to which country he left Timothy at Ephesus [10], and so to Colossæ and Miletus, which terminated with his apprehension, and with his final imprisonment, and martyrdom at Rome.

The Epistle to the Hebrews was therefore probably written A.D. 64.

The Design of the Epistle to the Hebrews may be regarded as a confirmation and completion of the argument commenced by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians, and continued in that to the Romans.

It is observable, that there is the same prophetic key-note in these three Epistles, The Just shall live by Faith [11]; and it is also worthy of remark, that this text is quoted in all three with a variation from the original, and that the variation is the same in them all [12]. This is a confirmation of the Pauline origin of this Epistle.

In the Epistle to the Galatians, he had endeavoured to recover Gentile Christians, who had lapsed, or were lapsing, from the foundation of Justification by Faith in Christ to reliance on the ritual observances and ceremonies of the Levitical Law, as necessary and conducive to salvation [13].

In the Epistle to the Romans, he had taught the Jewish Christians that all needed a Redeemer, and that a Redeemer had been provided for all, Gentiles as well as Jews, on equal terms, in Christ, and in Him alone; and that this plan of Universal Redemption, and of Justification by Faith in Him, and not by means of the Mosaic Law, had been preannounced by the Law and the Prophets, and had been designed from Eternity by God [14].

In the Epistle to the Hebrews he now completes his work.

He is constrained to write to them by his fervent love, and ardent zeal for God's glory; feelings which derived additional earnestness and intensity from his foreboding, that the period of the probation allowed to Jerusalem was now drawing near to its close.

The Apostle, therefore, comes forward to rescue the Jewish Christians from the impending doom. He is like the Angels sent from heaven to Sodom with a message from God to the Patriarch, "Arise; escape for thy life, lest thou be consumed in the iniquity of this city [1]."

The Christian Jews of Jerusalem were subject to severe trials; they had lately lost their Chief Pastor, their Apostle and Bishop, St. James, by a violent and cruel death [2], who had been seized by the Jews, in their vindictive fury and exasperation, on account of the rescue of St. Paul from their hands.

St. Paul, therefore, might well desire to pay to the flock of the Apostolic Martyr, and to his blessed memory, a debt of pastoral solicitude and affection. Their Jewish persecutors, hardened by sin, given over to a reprobate mind, like Pharaoh, had become more reckless and ruthless in their resentful rage against the Church, in proportion as their own destruction approached.

Some of the Christians of Judæa, perplexed by doubt, appalled by fear, and wearied out by affliction, taunted by their insulting adversaries with the scandal of the Cross, and with the ignominy of a suffering Messiah, and with the reproach of worshipping a dead Man, who had perished by a death which their Law had pronounced to be accursed [3], and with disparaging the majesty of Jehovah, the Living God; and perhaps disappointed by the frustration of their hopes of a speedy re-appearance of Christ to Judgment, had been tempted to forsake public worship [4], and even to renounce their Baptism, and to apostatize from Christ, and to relapse into Judaism [5]; which specially commended itself to them at Jerusalem, by the still unimpaired magnificence of its august Temple, and by the stately pomp and dazzling splendour of its solemn Ritual; and by the awful traditions of the Levitical Dispensation delivered by God from Mount Sinai by the ministry of Angels, amid thunderings and lightnings, and by the miraculous agency of Moses, and by the voices of Patriarchs and Prophets sounding from a remote antiquity of two thousand years. How could they resist the torrent of such influences as these?

Here the Apostle comes forth, to remind them that the same God, Who had spoken in times past in divers portions, and divers manners, to the fathers of the Hebrew race, had now spoken in these last days, in the Gospel, to themselves "by His own Son, Whom He hath appointed Heir of all things, by Whom also He made the worlds, Who, being the brightness of His Father's glory, and the express Image of His Person, and upholding all things by the word of His Power, after He had Himself purged our sins, sat down at the Right Hand of the Majesty on High [6]."

He thus proclaimed, that the Gospel is not at variance with the Levitical Law, as the Jews alleged, but that they are both from the same God; and that the Gospel is the consummation of the Law. And he prepares the way for the demonstration, that Christ, Who preached the Gospel, and Who purged away our sins by His own blood, is far higher than the Angels, by whose ministry the Law was given; and is no other than God, and is far greater than Moses, who was His servant; and that therefore disobedience to Christ, and to His Gospel, will be attended with far worse punishment than was ever inflicted on those who rebelled against Moses in the wilderness, and who were excluded from the Promised Land—the type of heaven—for their rebellion [7].

He thus disposes of the objections which might be alleged to the disparagement of the Person of Christ, from the consideration of His suffering Humanity; and shows the necessity of that Humanity, and of those sufferings, to constitute Christ, what He is, a merciful and compassionate, as well as an Everlasting and All-prevailing High Priest; and to qualify Him for that place of Glory and Power at God's Right Hand, within the Veil of the Heavenly Holy of Holies, into which He is entered with the pure and spotless sacrifice of His own blood, shed once for all on the Cross for the sins of the whole world; and where He ever pleads the meritorious efficacy of that blood, and where He ever liveth to make intercession for us.

Let them not be staggered and perplexed by the Manhood and Death, and sacrificial blood-shedding of Christ. For all the ritual ceremonies of their own Levitical Law, and all the solemn services of the Tabernacle and Temple, proclaim with one voice, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission" of sins [8].

He shows, that the Gospel of Christ is far more excellent than the Law, not only because Christ is far greater than Moses, but also because His Priesthood, in which He offered Himself, is far more excellent than the Priesthood of Aaron, and of all his successors, whose ministrations, which so dazzled by their splendour the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem, were only faint figurative shadows of the transcendent glory of the Priesthood of Christ, and were preparatory to His Sacrifice.

He proves this from the Hebrew Scriptures themselves, in which the Holy Ghost describes Christ as a Priest solemnly consecrated with the intervention of an oath of God, and consecrated to be a Priest for ever; a Priest not after the order of Aaron, but after the order of Melchizedek[1], who gave a priestly benediction to Abraham himself, and so was greater than Abraham, and to whom Abraham paid tithes; and who was therefore greater than all the Priests of the Levitical dispensation, who came from Abraham[2].

If Melchizedek, the type of this future Priest, who is to remain for ever, and therefore to supersede the Levitical Priests, was so great, how great must be the Antitype! Thus, therefore, the majesty of Christ appears even from His office in that Human Nature, which qualified Him to be a Priest, and to offer a sacrifice once for all, for the sins of all mankind, on the Cross.

Nor let it be imagined, argues the Apostle, that we preach a new religion. Christianity is the religion of the Law. It is the religion of all the Worthies of old; of all the holy men who lived under the Law, and before the Law. They all looked forward with Faith to what we now see. They saluted our blessings from afar, like mariners greeting a wished-for shore. They suffered affliction gladly for the sake of what they believed. They are our forefathers in the faith; they are our examples in patient endurance, and in valiant conflicts, and in glorious victories.

Wherefore, "seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is before us, looking unto JESUS, the author and finisher of our faith; Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the Cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds[3]."

The Author, according to the manner of St. Paul, follows up his sublime statement of doctrinal verities with the sober inculcation of moral duties.

At the conclusion of the Epistle to the Hebrews the same thing is done, as is done at the close of the great dogmatic Epistle to the Jewish Christians, the Epistle to the Romans.

If we may venture so to speak, the Writer, having presented to the eye of his readers the form of Faith fashioned by his heavenly art, like a beautiful statue chiselled by the hand of some skilful sculptor, weaves a graceful garland of Christian Proverbs, and crowns that divine form with a fair chaplet of Christian virtues.

He then concludes the whole, with some personal greetings, as was also usual with the Apostle St. Paul. He assures the Hebrews, that he bears no ill-will to the inhabitants of the Holy City, although he had been violently assaulted and arrested there by them in the Temple, and was in danger of death at their hands. He expresses an earnest desire to visit it again; and he asks their prayers, that he may be enabled to do so the sooner, and he speaks of that wished-for visit under the affectionate and endearing terms of a "restoration" to his own home[4].

He assures the Hebrews of his own love and the love of his friends, especially those "of Italy," whose salutations he sends to them. And, finally, he concludes the Epistle with the Apostolic benediction of St. Paul[5].

On the whole, we may regard these Three Epistles, to the Galatians, the Romans, and the Hebrews, as an Apostolic Trilogy from the hand of the same writer, and composed on one plan.

There is the same Divine Personage, the central figure of them all, Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever[6]. Justification by faith in Him is declared to be the only method of salvation provided by God; that plan of salvation was conceived in the divine mind from eternity, and it extends to all nations, countries, and ages of the world. The Levitical dispensation

[5] On the principle stated by the author himself, that "without contradiction, the less is blessed by the greater" (Heb. vii. 7), the adoption of this Benediction seems itself to imply, that the Author was greater than those whom he addressed; that is, was an Apostle, not a mere Presbyter or Evangelist, and therefore it excludes the names of Apollos, Luke, or Clement from a claim to the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

delivered by God from Mount Sinai through the ministry of Angels, and by the hand of Moses, was subordinate and ministerial to that plan, which is now at length fully revealed by the same God to all in the Gospel, which is the final consummation of all other dispensations, and which seals, and sanctifies them all "by the blood of the everlasting covenant[1]."

This doctrine of Justification by Faith in Christ is cleared from all difficulties and objections alleged by the Jews,—arguing for the dignity of their own Law, and from the Humanity and Crucifixion of Christ,—by the Apostolic demonstration in this Epistle, that Christ, Whom he had presented to the Jews in the two former Epistles, to the Galatians and the Romans, as the object of Faith, and as procuring and bestowing Justification freely on all by His Death, is far greater than Moses and the Angels; that He is the Creator of the World, as well as its Redeemer; that He is co-equal and co-eternal with Jehovah; that He is God as well as Man; and that, while by becoming man, He was able to suffer, He is also, as God, ever able and ever ready to save.

Thus the Apostle completes his labours for the salvation of "his brethren, his kinsmen, according to the flesh[2]."

He who had once persecuted Christ in his zeal for the Law, endeavours to win them to Christ, Who is the "end of the Law." He endeavours to reclaim the erring, to uphold the falling, and to confirm the strong. He has provided for the Church Universal of every age and country a divine safeguard against all the attacks of her ghostly Enemy assaulting the Gospel by means of Marcionite or Manichæan objections to the Gospel as if it were at variance with the Law; or by Arian and Socinian allegations, disparaging the Divinity, or denying the Atonement of Christ. He has provided in this Epistle an exhaustless supply of hope, comfort, peace, and joy, for every Christian soul, looking to the Cross of Christ, and thence raising its eyes to heaven, and beholding Him seated as our King at God's right hand, ever living as our Priest to make intercession for us, and coming hereafter in His glorious Majesty to judge the quick and dead, and to put all enemies under His feet, and to reward all true Israelites, who believe in Him, obey Him, and suffer for Him, and who regard Him with the eye of faith as no other than God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God, of one substance with the Father, existing before the worlds, creating and sustaining all things with His power; and to welcome them to the everlasting mansions of the only continuing City, the heavenly Jerusalem, whose builder and maker is God[3].

Πρὸς Ἑβραίους] So A, B, D, K.

On the argument of this chapter, and of the Epistle generally, it may be observed, that the Jewish Christians were specially exposed to afflictions and temptations (1 Thess. ii. 14. Heb. x. 34); that they were denounced by their fellow-countrymen as apostates from Jehovah and from Moses, as traitors to their own Polity, and renegades from the Law and from the Traditions of their Forefathers, and were charged with having deserted the religion of the Living God for the worship of a dead man. Hence the Apostle takes occasion to show in the beginning of the Epistle, that Christ is greater than the Prophets,—that He is coeternal with the Father and Creator of the world. He then compares Him with Angels, and proves from the Jewish Scriptures that He is the Son, and God, and that they are His creatures and servants. Next he shows that the blessings which Christ bestows are greater than what Moses gave. He then compares the Levitical Priesthood with that of Christ, and shows the superior excellency of the latter; and, finally, he proves that all the holy men under the Law and before the Law, were cheered to do and to suffer what they did and suffered, by Faith in Christ. Thus he encourages the Hebrews to remain stedfast in their profession unto the end. Theodoret.

See above, Introduction to the Epistle, p. 366—9.

CH. I. 1.] All the other Epistles of St. Paul begin with his name, Paul; and to most of them he presents himself as Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ. Why does he not commence this Epistle in the same way?

Because he was writing to Hebrews, and because he knew that his name was obnoxious to many of them, and would deter them from reading what bore it; and because he was not their Apostle, but the Apostle of the Gentiles. Gal. ii. 8. (Augustine, Primasius.) See above, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 360—2.

— Πολυμερῶς καὶ πολυτρόπως] In many parts and in many manners; or, in many pieces or parcels, and in many fashions. (Bp. Andrewes, i. 103, 104.) Πολυμερὴς is that which is not displayed fully and entirely at once, but is divided into many portions (Hesych.), and πολύτροπος is that which is presented in various forms; as in the Jewish dispensation, by types, sacrifices, prophecies, Urim and Thummim; and so both words are distinguished from what is ἁπλοῦν. Maxim. Tyr. xviii. 7. Valck. p. 356.

The Apostle vindicates God from the charge of leaving Himself without a witness. He did not confound the Israelites by one great manifestation of Himself, but taught them as children gradually, with line upon line and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little (Isa. xxviii. 10), "as they were able to bear it," and He also instructed them in various ways. I have spoken by Prophets, and multiplied visions, and used similitudes, Hosea xii. 10 (Theophylact), and He thus led them up, by a course of gradual preparatory training, to Christ.

St. Paul thus marks the transcendent excellence and pre-eminent privileges of the Christian Dispensation, by contrasting it with all preceding ones;

To the Fathers of the Jewish Nation God spake

(1) πολυμερῶς, 'by many pieces;' but to us He speaks entirely and fully, at once.

(2) To them He spake πολυτρόπως, 'after sundry fashions;' but to us uniformly, in the same Church, and Word, and Sacraments, and Ministry, for all.

(3) Lastly, to the Fathers He spake by His servants, but to us by His Son.

The Paronomasias in πολυμερῶς and πολυτρόπως, and in v. 8, ἔμαθεν ἀφ' ὧν ἔπαθεν, seem to show that this Epistle is not a translation from Hebrew (as some have supposed), but that the Greek form of it in our hands is the Original. See above, p. 366.

— ἐπ' ἐσχάτου] at the end. So A, B, D, E, I, K, M, and Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., Lünemann. — Elz. has ἐπ' ἐρχάτων.

God speaks to the world at the end of these days,—that is, at the end of this world's existence, as distinguished from the world to come. The Gospel is the final revelation of God to man, and the days of the Gospel are the Last Days. See Acts ii. 17. 1 Pet. i. 20. 1 John ii. 18.

The term 'last days' was commonly used by the Rabbinical writers to describe 'the Days of the Messiah.' R. Nachman on Gen. xlix. 1. Stuart, p. 15.

— ἐν Υἱῷ] His Son, or the Son, not a Son. Cp. Winer, § 19, p. 109 and 114.

The ancient author of The Shepherd, Hermas, who wrote in the middle of the second century, appears to refer to this passage in the following remarkable words;

"Petra vetus est, Porta autem nova; quia Filius Dei omni creaturâ antiquior est, ita ut in consilio Patri adfuerit ad condendum creaturam (cp. Coloss. i. 15). Porta autem propterea nova est, quia in consummatione novissimis diebus (ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν) apparebit, ut qui assecuturi sunt salutem per eam intrent in regnum Dei." Hermas (Pastor. lib. iii. Similitud. ix. xii. p. 540, ed. Dressel).

2. τοὺς αἰῶνας] the universe (see xi. 3), all things that were created in time,—a sense of the word αἰῶνες equivalent to the later meaning of the Hebrew עֹלָמִים (olamim). Delitzsch, p. 4. As to the sense, cp. Col. i. 15—19. John i. 3. 10. Athanas. i. p. 181—3. Bp. Pearson, Art. ii. p. 212, and Stuart and Lünemann here.

The Apostle here, refuting the common opinion of the Jews, makes three assertions;

(1) That the same God Who had spoken of old by the Prophets, has now spoken to us by His Son.

(2) That this Son is the Creator of the World; and he affirms,

(3) That Jesus Christ, by Whom He has spoken, is God as well as Man.

3. ὤν] existing from everlasting; a declaration of the Eternity of Christ, which is coupled in v. 4 with His Humanity, by means of the word γενόμενος, having become. Cp. Rom. ix. 5.

It must be borne in mind, that in the common opinion of the Jews of the Apostolic age, the Messiah, or Christ, was reτῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, φέρων τε τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, δι' ἑαυτοῦ καθαρισμὸν ποιησάμενος τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἐκάθισεν ἐν δεξιᾷ τῆς μεγαλωσύνης ἐν ὑψηλοῖς, 4 [d] τοσούτῳ κρείττων γενόμενος τῶν ἀγγέλων, ὅσῳ διαφορώτερον παρ' αὐτοὺς κεκληρονόμηκεν ὄνομα.

garded as a great King and Conqueror, but not as a Divine Person Co-equal, and Consubstantial with God. Also, that in their opinion the Messiah was to be a human Person, but not subject to human sufferings; a Redeemer from captivity by conquest, but not by the sacrifice of Himself.

The introductory verses of this chapter are a Christian Apology against the Jews in these two particulars; and in confuting them, the Apostle has supplied convincing arguments against the Arians and Socinians, who in many respects symbolize with the Jews. See on Acts ii. 36.

— ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης] the splendour of His glory. Ἀπαύγασμα is light flowing from a luminous body (ἔκλαμψις). Wisdom is described as ἀπαύγασμα φωτὸς ἀΐδιον in the Book of Wisdom, vii. 26; and Man is described by Philo (de Mundi Opif. i. p. 35) as κατὰ τὴν διάνοιαν ᾠκειωμένος ΘΕΙΩι ΛΟΓΩι, ἀπαύγασμα γεγονώς.

This word is interpreted as equivalent to the expression "Light of Light" of the Nicene Creed, by Chrys., Theophyl.; and, as Theodoret observes, it affirms the co-eternity of the Son with the Father; and asserts, that He is "the everlasting Son of the Father, as the ray of light from the sun is coetaneous with the sun, from whence it flows by a natural process." Tertullian. Cp. Clemens Rom. ad Cor. 36, who adopts St. Paul's argument and language,—ὃς ὢν ἀπαύγασμα τῆς μεγαλωσύνης αὐτοῦ τοσούτῳ μείζων ἐστὶν ἀγγέλων, ὅσῳ διαφορώτερον ὄνομα κεκληρονόμηκεν,—and who admirably describes the effect of this Light of God in Christ upon us. See above on 2 Cor. iii. 18.

The use made of the Epistle to the Hebrews by S. Clement, St. Paul's fellow-labourer, whose name is in the book of life (Phil. iv. 3), is a circumstance of great importance in regard to the authorship and authenticity of this Epistle, and was noticed accordingly by early writers. "Clement wrote a very useful Epistle to the Corinthians in the name of the Church of Rome (of which he was Bishop). That Epistle bears a great resemblance, both in thought and language, to the Epistle, which bears St. Paul's name, to the Hebrews." Jerome (Scr. Eccl. 15).

— δόξα] = כָּבוֹד (cabod), 'glory.' Luke ii. 9; ix. 31. Acts vii. 55.

— χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως] the image of His essence. χαρακτὴρ is effigies, figura,—as the impression of a seal, or figure formed in a mould, or an effigy engraved or stamped upon a coin. Cp. Philo (i. p. 332), ἡ λογικὴ ψυχὴ τυπωθεῖσα σφραγῖδι Θεοῦ, ἧς ὁ χαρακτήρ ἐστιν ἀΐδιος λόγος.

Ὑπόστασις does not here mean Person (which is a post-Nicene sense of the word), but Essence. So the Vulgate and Syriac Versions, and cp. Delitzsch, p. 11.

In these two phrases, the Son is characterized as the Effluence of His Father's Glory and the Image of His Essence, which is eternal, invisible, and divine.

The Apostle thus declares τὸ συναΐδιον καὶ τὸ ὁμοούσιον αὐτοῦ—the co-eternity and consubstantiality of the Son. Theodoret.

God the Father hath communicated to the Eternal Word the same divine essence by which He is God; and consequently, the Word is of the same nature with the Father, and thereby He is the perfect image and similitude of Him, and therefore He is His proper Son .... whence Christ is called the Image of God, the brightness of His Glory, and the express Image of His Substance. Cp. Primasius here, and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 258; and see notes above on Col. i. 15, and Phil. ii. 6.

— φέρων] φέρω = נָשָׂא (nasa), Isa. xlvi. 3; lxvi. 12, upholding, supporting, maintaining; κυβερνῶν, συγκρατῶν. Chrys. Christ not only created the world, but He also ever upholds it. Cp. Col. i. 17, τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνέστηκεν.

— τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ] by the word of His power. The phrase is more emphatic than 'His powerful word;' it means that His Power works by His word, and therefore it is a declaration of the divine manner of His working. Cp. Eph. vi. 10, τῷ κράτει τῆς ἰσχύος.

This expression is remarkable, as being apparently quoted by Irenæus (ii. 30. 9), "verbo virtutis suæ." See above, Introduction, p. 359.

The Apostle declares the Divinity of the Son, by saying that His word is sufficient for the creation and government of the universe. Theodoret.

— δι' ἑαυτοῦ] through Himself; by His own act, in voluntarily taking our nature, and laying down His life for us. See on Phil. ii. 7.

These two words are cancelled by Bleek, De Wette, Lachm., and are not found in A, B, D, and some Cursives, and in Vulg. and some Fathers; but they are in D*, E, K, L, M; and this reading is confirmed by the Syriac and Arabic Versions, and by the Coptic and Æthiopic, and the majority of Cursives and Fathers; and Theodoret has δι' αὐτοῦ, and they are retained by Griesb., Matth., Scholz., Bloomf., and are restored by Tisch. in his last edition, 1858.

In this verse the Apostle affirms the union of the Human Nature with the Divine in the One Person of Christ, and then proceeds, in a natural order, to speak of His exaltation and Session in Glory in that Nature. The Son of God, being God most High, humbled Himself and became Man; and as Man He received that glory which He had ever possessed as God. (John xvii. 5.) Theodoret.

— καθαρισμόν] cleansing. He is speaking here, not of the λύτρον, but the λουτρὸν of our sins by Christ's blood. See Rev. i. 5. For a full and excellent exposition of these three introductory verses, see Bp. Andrewes (Sermons, i. 102—117).

4. τοσούτῳ κρείττων γενόμενος] having become, in His human nature, so much greater than the Angels; for, in His Divine Nature, He always was greater than the Angels, from Eternity. See v. 3; and cp. Eph. ii. 6, where it is shown, that by Christ's exaltation and Session in glory in our human Nature, that Nature has been raised above the Nature of the Angels. Cp. Phil. ii. 9—11.

This assertion is apologetic.

The Apostle, in affirming the superiority of Jesus to Angels, refutes two errors common among the Jews;

(1) That the world was created by the aid of Angels.

(2) That Angels are entitled to worship from men.

The prevalence of these errors among the Jews may be shown from the Rabbinical writings quoted by Schöttgen (Hor. Hebr. p. 906). See on Col. ii. 8. 18.

Clemens Romanus (i. 36) shows from this passage, which he quotes, that by Christ's Incarnation, we men have been made capable of seeing the glory of God.

— διαφορώτερον—ὄνομα] He has inherited a far more excellent name than they; the title, namely, of 'Son of God,'—a title acquired by Him at His Incarnation, v. 6, at His Resurrection, v. 4.

The Apostle is here proving the glory acquired by Christ as God-Man; and not the glory which He always possessed as the Everlasting Word. See v. 3, ἐκάθισε, and v. 4, γενόμενος,—neither of which could be predicated simply of the divine Logos.

5. σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε] to-day have I begotten Thee. Ps. ii. 7, where the words are spoken by Jehovah to Christ, as Man, after His Passion and Resurrection; and this text is applied to the Resurrection of Christ, as the First-begotten of the dead, by St. Paul. Acts xiii. 33, where see note.

It is allowed by the Jewish Rabbis that this Psalm relates to the Messiah. See Surenhus. p. 592.

— Ἐγὼ ἔσομαι αὐτῷ εἰς πατέρα] I will be to Him for a Father. 2 Sam. vii. 14, LXX.

These words were spoken by God primarily concerning Solomon, the Son of David, and builder of that Temple which David desired to build, but was not permitted by God; and were spoken by God, in reference to that desire. See 2 Sam. vii. 5. 1 Chron. xvii. 1.

But the words were spoken in a secondary sense concerning Christ, the promised Son of David, the builder of the Christian Church.

This is clear from the inapplicability of some portions of the promise to Solomon, especially that portion which assures to him an everlasting kingdom.

The Apostle, inspired by the Holy Ghost, teaches us to make this transfer from the type to the antitype.

And such a transfer was commonly regarded by the Jewish Rabbis as a legitimate one. See Surenhus. pp. 592, 593. It is well observed by Stuart (p. 26) that the Apostle in applying ἔσται μοι εἰς υἱόν; 6 [f]Ὅταν δὲ πάλιν εἰσαγάγῃ τὸν Πρωτότοκον εἰς τὴν οἰκουμένην λέγει, Καὶ προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ.

7 [g]Καὶ πρὸς μὲν τοὺς ἀγγέλους λέγει, Ὁ ποιῶν τοὺς ἀγγέλους αὐτοῦ πνεύματα, καὶ τοὺς λειτουργοὺς αὐτοῦ πυρὸς φλόγα· 8 [h]πρὸς δὲ τὸν Υἱόν, Ὁ θρόνος σοῦ, ὁ Θεὸς, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ αἰῶνος· ῥάβδος εὐf Ps. 97. 7. Rom. 8. 29. Col. 1. 18.

h Ps. 45. 6, 7.

these quotations to the Messiah, must have supposed, that they whom he addressed, would readily admit the propriety of the application; otherwise he would not have ventured to make it.

We derive also this benefit from the Apostle's words. We are assured, on his authority, that we are right in regarding Solomon as a type of Christ. And thus we have a clue to the right understanding of a book of the Old Testament, viz. the Book of Canticles, or the Song of Solomon, as representing the love and espousals of Christ and His Church.

6. Ὅταν δὲ πάλιν] And, in another place, when He shall have brought the only-Begotten into the World, He says, And let all the Angels of God worship Him.

Πάλιν is used here, as commonly in this Epistle (see ii. 13; iv. 5; x. 30), and in the previous clause, to introduce a new quotation.

As to the position of πάλιν, see similar examples of trajections in Winer, p. 488. Cp. 2 Cor. ii. 1.

There is a climax in the Apostle's argument.

Even at Christ's Incarnation, when Christ was humbling Himself, and condescending to become a little Child, even then Jehovah declared His glory; He proclaimed even then the supremacy of the First-Begotten (Col. i. 15) over the Angels of God. For even then, when He introduced Him into this lower world (οἰκουμένην, cp. Luke ii. 1), He gave a command to the Angels of Heaven to worship Him.

Ὅταν εἰσαγάγῃ = cum induxerit; literally, 'when He shall have introduced.' The ὅταν with conj. aorist is equivalent to cùm with the futurum exactum in Latin. See Winer, § 42, p. 275.

This mode of speech is to be accounted for here by the consideration that the writer puts himself in the place of a Prophet contemplating the pre-existence of Christ, and considering the event of the Incarnation as future.

The introduction into the habitable world (οἰκουμένη) was at the Incarnation, ὅτε ἐσαρκώθη. Greg. Nyssen, Cyril, Chrys., Theodoret, Theophyl., and so Primasius, and Bp. Fell, and others. Cp. below, x. 5, εἰσερχόμενος εἰς τὸν κόσμον, which is said of the Incarnation.

This Exposition seems preferable to the recent Expositions, which refer this introduction of the Son, to His Resurrection, or to His Second Advent, as Böhme, Tholuck, De Wette, Lünemann, Delitzsch, p. 24.

— προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ] let all the Angels of God worship Him. Probably a quotation from Ps. xcvii. 7, where the LXX have προσκυνήσατε αὐτῷ (Cod. Alex.); whence the LXX seem to have adopted, in Deut. xxxii. 43, προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ.

In both these cases there seems to be a plurality of Persons; the Angels are introduced as the Angels of One Person, and they are commanded by Him to worship another Person; and that Person must also be God; for Divine Worship can be paid only to God.

The Angels of God are commanded by the Holy Spirit, speaking by the Psalmist, to worship some other Person, who manifests the glory of God to all people (see v. 6), and of Whom it is said, that a "Light is sprung up to the righteous," v. 11 (φῶς ἀνέτειλε τῷ δικαίῳ), and that "Sion heard and rejoiced thereat" (v. 8), and that "the multitude of the Isles is glad" at His appearance (v. 1), and that "He hath declared His Salvation, and His Righteousness hath He openly showed in the sight of the Heathen, and hath remembered His Mercy and Truth toward the house of Israel, and all the ends of the world have seen the salvation of God" (Ps. xcviii. 1—4).

The Song of Zacharias, the Father of the Baptist, who is said in the Gospel to be "filled with the Holy Ghost," takes up the language of these Psalms, and associates them with the Incarnation of Christ. See Luke i. 67—79.

The ninety-seventh Psalm begins with a declaration that "The Lord reigneth;" and the same affirmation is repeated in this Group of Psalms, which, as the Jewish Rabbis allow, relate to "Messiah the King," and to the beginning of His Monarchy, the last Monarchy of Daniel. (Dan. ii. 44; iv. 3. 34; vii. 14. 27. Cp. Rev. xi. 17.) Ps. xciii.—ci., or, according to LXX, xciii.—c. See Ps. xciii. 1; xcv. 3; xcvi. 10; xcviii. 7.

The hopes expressed in this Psalm are Messianic. The appearance of Christ was of the nature of a Judgment . . . and the Grace which He revealed is brought forth in the preceding Psalm.

The exclamation, "The Lord reigneth," the theme of these psalms, began to be fulfilled at the Incarnation and First Advent, and will reach its full consummation when all the Kingdoms of this World shall have become the Kingdom of the Lord and of His Christ. See Hengstenberg in Ps. xcvii.

We, who are Christians, shall thankfully receive through St. Paul such an exposition from the Holy Spirit, Who inspired the Psalmist, and Who guides us, by the hand of St. Paul, to see in this, and the other Psalms with which it is combined, and which illustrate its meaning (viz. the ninety-third to the one hundredth Psalms), a prophecy concerning the Judgment and Mercy, the Glory and Grace, of God, manifested to all the world in the Incarnation. And we may rest satisfied, that St. Paul would not have treated this psalm as prophetical of the First Advent of Messiah, unless the Holy Ghost had designed it so to be, and the Ancient Church of God had rightly regarded it as such.

Happily for the Christian Church, the Septuagint Version, which the Apostle quotes, was made by Jews, and was read in Jewish Synagogues; it is in fact the Hellenistic Targum of the Old Testament, and its interpretations may be regarded as exponents of the sense of the most learned of the Jewish Nation before the coming of Christ.

No exception therefore could be made by the Jews against the Apostle's quotations from the Septuagint Version; and he is therefore careful to follow as closely as possible the language of that Version in this Epistle, and not to substitute for it any private Interpretation of his own, against which the Jews might have excepted as incorrect. See above, Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles, p. xviii.; and also, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 364—6.

Thus, if any should object that ἄγγελοι here is not a correct rendering of the Hebrew אֱלֹהִים (elohim), it was enough for the Apostle to answer, that it had been so rendered by Jews themselves in the Septuagint Version, here, and in Ps. viii. 6; cxxxvii. 1.

Here is clear evidence of Christ's Divinity. Jehovah (as the Apostle expounds the words) commands the Angels to worship Christ. See Waterland, Vol. iv. p. 360, "On the Divinity of Christ proved from His claim to be worshipped."

7. πρός] in regard to; the Hebrew ל or אֶל. Luke xx. 19. Acts xii. 21. Rom. x. 21. Lünemann.

— Ὁ ποιῶν—φλόγα] Ps. civ. 4, LXX. Cod. Alex. The sense is not "Who maketh His Angels Spirits," nor is it "Who maketh the Winds His Angels," but it is "Who maketh His Angels to be Winds (רוּחוֹת, ruchoth), and His Ministers to be a flaming fire;" that is, who employs His Angels in the government of the natural world and in the visible phenomena of the Universe. Cp. Stuart, p. 30. The Angels are His Ambassadors and Servants in the material world which is inhabited by man. This view was familiar to the ancient Jewish Church. See the quotations from the Rabbinical writers (in Wetstein and Schöttgen), who use the same words as the Apostle, "facis Angelos Tuos Ventos, aliquando Ignem;" and their report of the answer of the Angel to Manoah, "nonnunquam Deus facit nos ignem, aliàs ventum."

This text opens to us a sublime and magnificent revelation of the invisible agency employed by Almighty God in the operations of Nature. Angels are employed by Him as servants in them; but the Son is Creator and Lord of all.

From this Apostolic citation we learn therefore—

To interpret Nature aright; and

To interpret this Psalm aright.

S. Clement of Rome adopts St. Paul's argument upon it (ad Corinth. i. 36).

8, 9. Ὁ θρόνος σοῦ, ὁ Θεὸς—μετόχους σου] From Ps. xlv. 6, 7, almost verbatim from the LXX.

Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever! Christ is here invoked as God.

The words ὁ Θεὸς, used here by the LXX, are employed as a vocative commonly in that Version. See Ps. iii. 7; iv. 1; v. 10; vii. 1.

This use is the best illustration of the words of St. Thomas to our Lord, who is addressed by him as God, "My Lord, and my God," Θεός μου. John xx. 28. Cp. Luke xviii. 11. 13. Mark xv. 34. Winer, pp. 59. 164.

This Psalm is entitled by the LXX "a Song for the Beloved One," ᾠδὴ ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἀγαπητοῦ, and it has generally been understood by the best Jewish Expositors (as Aben Ezra, Kimchi, and others), and by all the ancient Christian Interpreters, to refer to the Messiah as King, and Head, and Husband of His Church.

The use here made of it by St. Paul may suffice to assure us of the correctness of that application by the Church in her services for Christmas Day, when St. Paul's words expounding the Psalm are appointed to be used as the Epistle.

9. ἔχρισέ σε ὁ Θεός] Some expositors regard ὁ Θεὸς here also as a vocative. So Primasius, Theophyl., and even Symmachus, who renders the word here (which is Elohim) by θεέ. A remarkable confession from him. And so Lünemann.

It appears that the LXX and St. Paul rather intended it as a nominative; and so the Syriac, Arabic, and Æthiopic Versions, and our English Translators, who have, however, placed "O God" in the margin.

— ἔχρισέ σε—ἔλαιον] On the double accusative, see Rev. iii. 8.

This Unction is predicated of the Son as Man in His threefold character of Prophet, Priest, and King, and Who is thus the Messiah Christ, or Anointed of God. See Theodoret here, and Bp. Pearson, Art. ii. pp. 150. 179, and above on Matt. i. 1.

10—12. Σὺ κατ' ἀρχὰς—ἐκλείψουσι] Ps. cii. 25—27. Almost verbatim from LXX.

12. ἑλίξεις] Thou shalt fold or roll them up. The Hebrew word here signifies 'thou shalt change;' whence, in the Alexandrine MS. of the LXX, we have ἀλλάξεις here. The heavens are called in Hebrew rakia, an expanse (Gen. i. 6, 7, and passim), whence the figure. Cp. Isa. xxxiv. 4; li. 6. 2 Pet. iii. 10. Stuart, p. 34.

— αὐτούς] Lach. adds ὡς ἱμάτιον, with A, B, D*; but this is probably only a marginal gloss, for ὡς περιβόλαιον, imported into the text.

13. Κάθου ἐκ δεξιῶν] Sit thou on My Right Hand. Ps. cx. 1, LXX; a Psalm applied by Christ to Himself as God and Man. See Matt. xxii. 44. Cp. Acts ii. 34, and St. Paul's reasoning on this text, 1 Cor. xv. 25—28.

14. Οὐχὶ πάντες ε. λειτουργικὰ πνεύματα κ.τ.λ.] Are they not all ministering Spirits? The Angels are πνεύματα λειτουργικὰ, Spirits ministering to God in His Heavenly Sanctuary, as the Cherubim in the earthly λειτουργία, or divine-service, of the Holy of Holies. On this sense of λειτουργικὸς, see viii. 6; ix. 21. Num. iv. 12, LXX. Angels are God's λειτουργοὶ, and man's διάκονοι.

In the argument of this Chapter concerning the nature of Angels and their subordination to Christ, and as doing service to man, the Apostle had doubtless before his eye that erroneous tenet of Judaistic Gnosticism, which he had encountered in his Epistle to the Colossians, and which represented the Angels as co-operating with God in Creation, and as Mediators between God and Man, and as entitled to receive worship from man, and which thus undermined the dignity, and contravened the worship, of Christ. See above on Col. ii. 18. Cp. Eph. i. 21.

The argument is followed up by St. Paul's contemporary, Clement of Rome, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, c. 36.

On the existence of the Holy Angels, and their office of ministering to the faithful, see Bp. Bull's two admirable Sermons, xi. and xii. Vol. i. p. 260—325.

Observe that this chapter, designed as an argument in the first instance against the errors of Judaism, is a storehouse of authorities against the Marcionite, Arian, Sabellian, and other Heresies, which impugn the truth concerning the two Natures, and the One Person, of Christ; as has been shown by the ancient expositors upon it, Chrys., Theodoret, Primasius, Theophyl., and others, cited in the valuable Catena from Cod. Paris. 238, ed. Cramer, p. 279—381.

CH. II. 1. Διὰ τοῦτο] Because the Gospel is delivered to us by Christ Himself in person; Who is so much greater than the Angels, through whom men received the Law; therefore, we ought to give more diligent heed to it.

— μή ποτε παραῤῥυῶμεν] lest we fail; 'ne forte perefluamus,' Vulg. Παραῤῥυῶμεν is the 2 aor. conj. passive from παραῤῥεῖν, Matt. G. G. § 248. Kühner, § 176, § 196, § 230.

The metaphor is from a stream—and a beautiful and appropriate one it is, especially in an address to the dwellers in Palestine, a land of temporary torrents. The nature of a stream is to flow by, and therefore the sense cannot be, lest we flow by, that is, continue to flow; but the meaning is, 'ne delabamur, ne deficiamus,' lest we be dried up by the scorching rays of the sun, in the heat of trial and affliction, like a brook which glides away and disappears in the drought of summer, when it is most needed. See Job vi. 15. Jer. xv. 18.

The word is derived from the LXX, Prov. iii. 21, where it corresponds to the Hebrew נוּז (luz), to depart, rendered ἐκλείπειν, to fail, as water does (Prov. iv. 21), and the word is rightly explained by μὴ ἐκπέσωμεν, by Chrys., and by 'ne forte evanescamus,' by Primasius. (John vii. 38. Prov. xviii. 4.)

The Apostle exhorts them not to suffer themselves to be dried up by the heat of persecution, and to flow away, through fear, and apostatize from Christ, and so be utterly lost; but to hold fast to the words of Him Who is the fountain of Living Waters; and to be like perennial streams flowing from Him Who will be to them a never-failing Well of Water springing up to Everlasting Life. (John iv. 14.)

2. δι' ἀγγέλων] On the giving of the Law from Mount Sinai by the Ministry of Angels, see above on Acts vii. 53. Gal. iii. 19. Augustine, Serm. 7, and Delitzsch here, p. 49.

There is no express mention of the intervention of Angels in the Mosaic account of the Delivery of the Law on Mount Sinai. But the words in Deut. xxxiii. 2. Ps. lxviii. 17, combined with the declarations above cited in Acts vii. 53, and Gal. iii. 19, and with the assertion in the preceding chapter (i. 7), that God "maketh His Angels winds, and His Ministers a flaming fire," suggest a belief that the Thunderings and the Lightnings, and the Cloud, and the Voice of the Thunder, exceeding loud (Exod. xix. 16), which accompanied the delivery of the Law on Mount Sinai, were Angelic Ministrations to God in his Temple of the Universe.

— ἐγένετο βέβαιος] became, and was proved to be, stedfast and inviolable, by the infliction of penalties for its infraction or neglect.

— παράβασις καὶ παρακοὴ] transgression and disobedience; that is, every sin of commission, and every sin of omission also.

3. ἡμεῖς] we Christians: "jungit personam suam illis" Paulus, more suo." Primasius.

— σωτηρίας] salvation—an argument from the grace of the Gospel, as distinguished from the terrors of the Law. Cp. Jude 3.

— ἀρχὴν λαβοῦσα λαλεῖσθαι] which having received the beginning of its utterance through Him who is the LORD Jehovah Himself; and not like the Law which came to the Jews through a Mediator and by Angels. See on Gal. iii. 19.

It is observable, that the writer of this Epistle uses the word Κύριος thus, as an appellation for CHRIST, here and in vii. 14, and this has been alleged by some as inconsistent with St. Paul's usage, and as an argument against the Pauline origin of the Epistle. Davidson, p. 244.

But St. Paul also employs Κύριος in this manner in his received Epistles, 1 Thess. iv. 15, 16. 2 Thess. ii. 1. 2 Tim. iv. 18. And this expression was very appropriate in an Epistle to the Hebrews, as reminding them that the Jesus of the Gospel is no other than the Jehovah of the Old Testament. See Luke ii. 9.

The same may be said concerning the objection raised by some on the fact that the words Ἰησοῦς and Χριστὸς are often used absolutely, and not often in combination (though sometimes, as x. 10; xiii. 8. 21) in this Epistle. The Writer of it is professedly and specially treating of Our Lord's Humanity as Jesus, and of His Priesthood as Christ.

— εἰς ἡμᾶς ἐβεβαιώθη] was conveyed stedfastly to us (Theophyl.), so that we were assured of its truth. On the use of εἰς, see 1 Thess. i. 5. 2 Cor. viii. 6. Col. i. 25. 1 Pet. i. 25, and on this sense of βεβαιοῦν, see 1 Cor. i. 7.

No argument can be hence deduced against the Pauline origin of this Epistle, as if this statement were at variance with Gal. i. 12, where he speaks of direct revelations from God, and not from man, to himself. It is usual with the Apostle, in his condescension and charity, to divest himself of his own personal individuality, and to identify himself with those whom he addresses, and indeed with classes of persons generally to whom he does not personally belong. See on Rom. vii. 7, and Stuart, Introd. § 27 (17), and above, v. 3.

4. Πνεύματος ἁγίου μερισμοῖς] Gifts which the Holy Ghost distributed (ἐμέρισε). See 1 Cor. vii. 17; xii. 11, and 2 Cor. x. 13, and Rom. xii. 3.

This interpretation seems preferable on the whole to that which regards the Holy Spirit as μεριζόμενον, and not as the Agent in the distribution of His own Gifts.

The argument of the Apostle appears to be enforced by an appeal to all the Three Persons of the Trinity, as co-operating in the preaching of the Gospel.

— κατὰ τὴν αὐτοῦ θέλησιν] according to His own Will, the will of the Spirit Himself. See on 1 Cor. xii. 11, and so Primasius and Œcumenius.

5. Οὐ γὰρ ἀγγέλοις] For not to Angels (emphatic) did He subject (aorist) the future world of which we are speaking.

An answer to the Judaistic objection, that Jesus, being Man, is inferior to the Angels, the Mediators of the Law.

The Manhood of Jesus is acknowledged by the Apostle (vv. 6—18), and it is shown that the Jewish Scriptures testify to the elevation of Human Nature above the Angels, and that those Scriptures are fulfilled in Christ, Who is God from Everlasting, but was made Man, and suffered death as Man, in order to fulfil those Scriptures, and to reconcile God to Man, and to exalt Human Nature above the Nature of Angels, even to the Right Hand of God.

— τὴν οἰκουμένην τὴν μέλλουσαν] the future world, the world which was looked for by the Jews, as the Time of the Messiah, and by them called αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων, עוֹלָם הַבָּא (olam haba), and the Messiah was thence called by them πατὴρ μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, the father of the world to come. Cp. below, vi. 5, δυνάμεις μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, and 1 Cor. xv. 26. Rom. viii. 21. 2 Pet. iii. 13.

This assertion of the Apostle is designed to meet the objection of the Jews, derived from the Old Testament, that God has subjected the World to Angels, Whom He made to be Rulers of Provinces. See the passages in Dan. x. 13. 20, 21.

Be it so, replies the Apostle; but these are only particular lordships of this present world, which will soon have an end, with all its kingdoms and dominions, to be succeeded by One Universal Kingdom, that of Christ, which (as the same Prophet testifies, Dan. ii. 44; iv. 34; vi. 26; vii. 14. 27) will consume all other kingdoms, and never be destroyed.

6. τις] some one—of great dignity and authority, whom you know and revere, and to whose words you will defer. On the accent, see Tisch. p. 559.

6—8. τί ἐστιν—ποδῶν αὐτοῦ] Verbatim from the Septuagint Version of Ps. viii. 5—7, already applied by St. Paul to the Messiah, 1 Cor. xv. 27.

The words καὶ κατέστησας—σου are omitted by B, D, I, K, and many Cursives, and Griesb., Scholz., Tisch., Bleek, De Wette, Lünemann, Delitzsch; they are found in A, C, D*, E*, M, and Vulg., and Syriac, Arabic, and Æthiopic Versions; and are admitted into the text, in brackets, by Lachmann.

7. Ἠλάττωσας αὐτὸν βραχύ τι] Thou madest man to be only a little (מְעַט, mĕat) lower than the Angels (Elohim, see i. 6). That is, although the heavens are so glorious, yet Thou didst make man to be more glorious still. That this is the meaning of the text, is evident from the Hebrew original. Cp. Gen. i. 26—29.

The word Elohim, in this Psalm, is rendered by Angels in the Chaldee Paraphrase of the Psalms, as well as in the Septuagint Version—both of unquestionable authority with St. Paul's readers.

8. πάντα ὑπέταξας] Thou didst put all things without exception in subjection to Man. This prophecy, says the Apostle, finds its fulfilment in the Man Christ Jesus, and in Him alone. Cp. 1 Cor. xv. 27.

8, 9. Νῦν δὲ οὔπω ὁρῶμεν κ.τ.λ.] But at present we do not yet see all things made subject to Man—οὔπω ὁρῶμεν, we do not yet see this with our bodily eyes. But we βλέπομεν Ἰησοῦν, with the eye of faith we do look up to and do contemplate JESUS (the Man so called as being our Saviour), Who had been made a little inferior to Angels, now having been crowned (ἐστεφανωμένον) with glory and honour on account of the suffering of the death which He endured, in order that by the free favour of God, and not by any merits of ours, He might taste death in behalf of every man. On this sentence it is to be observed that ὁρῶμεν is contrasted with βλέπομεν, which expresses a more intent, earnest, spiritual contemplation than ὁρῶμεν. Cp. Acts iii. 4. 1 Cor. i. 26; iii. 10; viii. 9. Heb. x. 25. The words διὰ τὸ πάθημα ἐστεφανωμένον, 'crowned on account of suffering,' are explained in the following verse by διὰ παθημάτων τελειῶσαι, to make perfect by means of suffering; and the argument is more fully expounded by the Apostle in Phil. ii. 5—7, which is the best comment on this passage. Cp. Winer, § 49, p. 355.

This assertion is designed by St. Paul to be a reply to the Jewish objection, that the Messiah was to be a Conqueror, and not to be a sufferer; and to refute their allegation, that those Hebrews who had passed from Judaism to Christianity, had deserted the worship of the Living God, for the religion of a Man who had died an accursed death.

He shows that the sufferings of Christ were purposely λους ἠλαττωμένον βλέπομεν Ἰησοῦν διὰ τὸ πάθημα τοῦ θανάτου δόξῃ καὶ τιμῇ ἐστεφανωμένον, ὅπως χάριτι Θεοῦ ὑπὲρ παντὸς γεύσηται θανάτου. [10] [h] ἔπρεπε γὰρ αὐτῷ, δι' ὃν τὰ πάντα, καὶ δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα, πολλοὺς υἱοὺς εἰς δόξαν ἀγαγόντα τὸν ἀρχηγὸν τῆς σωτηρίας αὐτῶν διὰ παθημάτων τελειῶσαι. designed by God to be His path to Victory. The Cross of Christ was like the Car of Triumph and Royal Throne of His Exaltation; and it is that by which He saved and exalted our Nature; and when we look up to Jesus with the eye of faith, sitting at the Right Hand of God, we see ourselves, His members, crowned with honour and glory in Him our Head. See above on Eph. ii. 6. Col. ii. 13—15, and Chrys. and Primasius here, and the Vulgate, Arabic, and Æthiopic Versions, which render this passage correctly.

9. ὅπως—γεύσηται] in order that He might taste of death. Cp. Winer, § 53, p. 410.

The phrase 'taste of death,' means more than to die; it signifies to taste the bitterness of death. See on Matt. xvi. 28. John viii. 52, which explain the sense here; which is, that Christ tasted the bitterness of death for every one individually, and not only for all collectively, in order that no one who believes in Him might taste it.

But on what word does ὅπως depend?

By some Expositors it has been made to depend on ἠλαττωμένον (Aug., A Lapide, and Craik). By others, on διὰ τὸ πάθημα τοῦ θανάτου.

And this seems to be the true construction. Christ submitted to the suffering of death (τὸ πάθημα τοῦ θανάτου) in order that by the grace of God He might taste death for every man.

The Apostle is replying to the objections of those who would not accept the doctrine of a suffering and dying Messiah. In their opinion, the Messiah was to be a Conqueror, and one who was not to die, but to 'abide for ever.' See John xii. 34.

St. Paul states the reasons and the results of Christ's death. He suffered death in order that by the free grace and gift of God (cp. Rom. v. 15—20), and by no merit of men, He might taste death for every individual man; and in order that every one who believes on Him might never taste of death. See John viii. 51, 52. Cp. John v. 24; vi. 40; xi. 26, and note above on Matt. x. 28. Luke ix. 27.

The sufferings of Christ, therefore, so far from being a stumbling-block to you Hebrews, ought to be regarded as a reason for great gratitude, for His wonderful grace and favour to you, in freely providing a Deliverer for you from the bitter pains of that Death to which all of you were subject on account of sin; and of thankfulness and love to Christ, Who condescended to endure such shame and anguish for you, and to die upon the Cross, in order that you might live for evermore.

But do not imagine, therefore, that Christ is not a Conqueror, or that He does not abide for ever. Behold Him crowned with the Crown of Victory (ἐστεφανωμένον στεφάνῳ, not διαδήματι: see on Rev. vi. 2; xix. 12), in that Nature of yours in which He suffered for you on the Cross. Behold Him crowned as Conqueror on account of (διὰ) those very sufferings, which He endured there, and by which He has procured peace and pardon, liberty and joy eternal for you. He conquers by the Cross, and enables you to conquer by it.

Thus, then, His sufferings (against which some of you make an objection) are seen to redound to His everlasting glory, and to the eternal happiness of every child of man.

See Chrysostom's excellent comment here.

This divine declaration affords a complete refutation of all partial and exclusive notions concerning the efficacy of Christ's death;

The Apostle says that Christ tasted death for every one; for each individual man, ὑπὲρ παντός. He died (says Chrys. here) not only for those who believe, but for all the world. What, although some do not believe? Yet Christ has done His part. And so another ancient Expositor here. Christ is like a Physician who offers health to every one that will accept His spiritual medicines. They who hearken to Him receive them, and are saved. He proffers them to all, but the medicines profit those only who accept them. "Ita et Christus quantum pro se fuit, pro omnibus mortuus est, quanquam non prosit Ejus Passio nisi solummodò iis, qui in eam credere volunt." Primasius. On this doctrine of the Universality of the Redemption by Christ, see above on Rom. viii. 30.

Instead of χάριτι Θεοῦ, which is the reading of A, B, C, D, E, K, L, and most Cursive Manuscripts, some copies mentioned by Origen, and some Fathers, read χωρὶς Θεοῦ (apart from God), a reading which was employed by the Nestorians in favour of their tenet of a double personality in Christ. See Œcumen. Caten. p. 395. Tisch. p. 559. Delitzsch, p. 65, 66. That reading is probably only a marginal Gloss on ὑποτάξαι αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα, to harmonize it with 1 Cor. xv. 27, and was afterwards imported from the Margin into the Text.

10. ἔπρεπε—αὐτῷ] it was seemly for Him. πρέπει τῷ Θεῷ φυτεύειν ἐν ψυχῇ τὰς ἀρετάς. Philo i. p. 48.

— δι' οὗ] through Whom—God the Father Almighty. "Propter Patrem vivit Filius quod ex Patre Filius est; fons Pater Filii, radix Pater Filii est." Ambrose (de Fide iv. 5). "Pater de nullo Patre, Filius de Deo Patre Filius; et quod Filius est, propter Patrem est, et quod est, à Patre est." Augustine in Joann. Tract. 19. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. i. p. 65.

This text, in which διὰ is applied to God the Father, is a refutation of the heretical notion, derived by some from its application to the Son, in such passages as i. 2, that it argues inferiority in Him. See Basil, in Caten. p. 397.

— ἀγαγόντα—τελειῶσαι] having brought, not 'bringing.' See Winer, § 45, p. 307.

The sense of the word τελειῶσαι, to make perfect, extends forward even to the future, full, and final accomplishment of the number of the Elect. See the use of the verb in xi. 40. Christ is indeed already perfected in His own Person (v. 9), but His members are not yet perfected (xi. 40). When the whole Number of the Elect shall be perfected, who, as Members of Christ, derive their τελείωσις from the sufferings of Him Who is the Leader and Author of their salvation; and when they are all brought to glory, then their Head will be perfected in them.

His sufferings are effectually applied to the glorification of every member of His mystical Body, at the dissolution of every one who falls asleep in Jesus; and they will be effectual toward the perfection of His own Mystical Body, even to the final consummation of all things in the universal triumph of the Church glorified, which is His Spouse and Body.

Hence, therefore, the verse may be rendered thus:—

It was seemly for God, for Whom and through Whom are all things, having brought many sons to glory (by means of the Only-Begotten Son), to make the Leader of their salvation perfect through sufferings.

11. Ὅ τε γὰρ ἁγιάζων] For He that sanctifieth, and they that are being sanctified (present tense), are all from One, God.

The Apostle here obviates a Jewish objection. They alleged that the Messiah would never die, but abide for ever. (John xii. 34.) The Apostle replies here, Do not be staggered by what I have said, that God should show such favour (χάριν, see v. 9) to men as to give up His own Son to die, even by the death of the Cross, for every man, and that the way He appointed for His and their perfection was by suffering. The reason of this is, that man, for whom Christ suffered, is also a son of God. God is our Father, and loves us as His Children, and desires that we should be sanctified in order that we may be glorified.

We are all sons of God by nature, and God sends his Son to take our nature, and suffer in it, in order that we may become sons also by adoption and grace, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, that He may be the First-born among many brethren. See Gal. iv. 4—7. Rom. viii. 29. For both He that sanctifieth, and they who are being sanctified, are all of one Father—God. Chrys., Theodoret, Theophyl. Bp. Pearson, Art. i. p. 55.

The words ἑνὸς, from one, are to be explained from the preceding υἱοὶ, sons. It was fitting that God, the universal Father, Who brought many sons to glory, should make their Leader,—their Elder Brother, His only beloved Son,—perfect through suffering.

He Who makes us holy, and they who are being made holy, are all sons of one and the same Father, and therefore are brethren; and He Who is holy must take their nature, which, by the Fall of the first Adam, was tainted by sin, in order that it may be consecrated to God, and so be glorified.

The word ἁγιάζω, as used here, is best explained by our Lord's own language in John xvii. 17—19; and see S. Cyril here in Catenâ, p. 401.

— δι' ἣν αἰτίαν—καλεῖν] He that sanctifieth, that is Christ, and they who are being sanctified, that is faithful Christians, are all of one, the same Father, God; for which cause Christ is not ashamed to call them brethren. But they are not all sons of God in the same manner as He is. The many sons are not on an equality with the Captain of their salvation. But Christ is the Beloved, the First-Born, the Only-Begotten Son: the many sons exist in a relation of dependence on His Sonship, as given unto Him, and as being sons of faith in Him; for we are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus (Gal. iii. 26), and we receive the right of Sonship from Him, for as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God (John i. 12). Cp. Gregory Nyssen here (in Catenâ, p. 406).

12. Ἀπαγγελῶ—σε] From Ps. xxii. 22, LXX..

The Twenty-second Psalm is referred to the Messiah by some Jewish Expositors (see Stuart, p. 59; Wetstein, p. 392; Schöttgen, p. 933), and by the whole Christian Church in ancient times, following the teaching of Christ, Who adopted the first words of it on the Cross. (Matt. xxvii. 46. Mark xv. 34.) Cp. Justin Martyr, Dialog. c. Tryph. c. 106, showing how this prophecy was fulfilled by Christ in the Gospel; and Hengstenberg on the Psalms, i. p. 362.

13. ἐγὼ—ὁ Θεός] From Isa. viii. 17, 18.

The Messiah is introduced as speaking, and saying that He will put His trust in the Lord; and this is an evidence of His Manhood. And He adds, that He and the Children, whom the Lord hath given Him, are for signs and wonders in Israel. And thus He speaks of a seed given to Him by God.

This progeny of Christ, made man, is said by Him to be "a sign and wonder in Israel," because the Jews were staggered by the manner of its generation, which was by the Incarnation and Passion of Christ, from Whose side, pierced on the cross, the Church was formed, as Eve was from Adam sleeping in Paradise, and thus He is able to say, "Behold I and the Children which the Lord hath given Me."

14. κεκοινώνηκε—μετέσχε] Observe the change of tense. Since the children have communicated, and do communicate, in the same blood and flesh, He, therefore, at the time of His Incarnation, and by it, took part in the same. Cp. Winer, § 40, p. 243.

Elz. has σαρκὸς καὶ αἵματος, but the reading in the text is authorized by A, B, C, D, E, M, and received by Griesb., Lachm., Bengel, Tisch., Lünemann. Perhaps the Apostle studiously placed αἵματος first, with reference to the blood-shedding of Christ, the true Paschal Lamb, upon the cross, the Victim typified by all the sacrifices of the Law.

— παραπλησίως] Not in appearance and figure, but in truth. Chrys. "Modo simillimo." Valck.

The Angels are like men, and appear in human form (see Acts i. 10); but Christ took really and substantially our human flesh and blood; and by our union with the Divine Logos we are become heritors of Immortality. Cp. S. Cyril and S. Athanasius here, p. 408—413.

15. ἔνοχοι—δουλείας] captives of bondage; held by its grasp. There is a paronomasia between μετέσχε and ἔνοχοι. He became μέτοχος, that we might cease to be ἔνοχοι. See on 1 Cor. xi. 27, and Gal. v. 1, μὴ ζυγῷ δουλείας ἐνέχεσθε.

16. Οὐ γὰρ δήπου ἀγγέλων ἐπιλαμβάνεται] For, I trow, He is not laying hold of Angels, in order to raise up and help them by His death. No; they are not subject to bondage, they are not under the dominion of the Devil, but man was. They have no weaknesses and passions as man has. Christ takes hold of us in our frailties, and He is made like to us in our weakness, in order that He may feel with us, and save us.

See the full exposition in Bp. Andrewes' Sermons, i. p. 1—17.

Δήπου, only found here in New Testament, and never in LXX. I wot, and you allow, equivalent to Latin 'opinor.' See Hartung, i. p. 285. Lünemann, p. 87. Delitz. p. 87. Also, δήποτε is used only once in N. T. John v. 4.

— ἀλλὰ—ἐπιλαμβάνεται] but he is laying hold of mankind by the hand, in order to lift it up from the ground, and to raise it from a state of bondage and death to life and glory.

The word ἐπιλαμβάνεται is best explained by its use below in chap. viii. 9, ἐπιλαβομένου μου τῆς χειρὸς αὐτῶν, derived from the Septuagint, Jer. xxxi. 32, cp. Sirac. iv. 2, and by its use in the Gospels, where it is employed to express the action of our Lord in stretching out His Hand to heal the sick and blind. Matt. xiv. 31. Mark viii. 23; ix. 36. Luke xiv. 4.

So Christ comes, and is taking hold of Human Nature, as it were, by the hand, and delivers it out of the grasp of the Devil, and assists and raises it up from bondage, blindness, disease, and death. See Isa. xlii. 6, 7; and below on iii. 5.

This sense of ἐπιλαμβάνεται is most in harmony with the reasoning of the Apostle. Christ is not taking hold of Angels, in order to succour them, but He is ever taking hold (present tense) of men; and in order that He may do this, it was requisite that He should be made like to them in all things.

There is also another cognate and derivative meaning in ἐπιλαμβάνομαι, which was probably in the mind of the Apostle.

This word represents the office and act of the Goël, or next of kin (ἀγχιστεὺς, Ruth iii. 12), who, by taking hold of a family by proximity of relationship ('attingens consanguinitate'), did the work of a Redeemer of property for the maintenance of its inheritance. See Ruth iv. 14.

Christ is our Goël, Redeemer, by becoming next of kin to us all by His Incarnation.

A Jewish Commentator, in expounding Ps. lx. 9, says, "Here is meant that mighty Goël Who is to come of the seed of David." Schöttgen.

— σπέρματος Ἀβραάμ] the seed of Abraham. A double act of Christ's love is thus implied,—

(1) That He was made Man,

(2) That He was made under the Law, and so redeemed us from the curse of the Law. See this explained, Gal. iv. 4, where he observes in the same way, that Christ was made man, and also made under the Law; i. e. that He takes hold of the seed of Abraham, both in its human infirmity and legal obligations, in order to assist and deliver it from both.

Besides this, doubtless, the Apostle, in using the word Abraham, refers to the promise of God to Abraham, that in him all Nations should be blessed. (Gen. xxii. 18.)

St. Paul says, He takes hold of the seed of Abraham rather than the seed of man, in order to remind them of the promise made to Abraham. (Theodoret.)

Thus these words have also a large and comprehensive sense. Christ takes hold of all who take hold of the promise by faith. And thus St. Paul himself expounds the words Abraham's seed, for he says "to the Galatians, so doing, that though they were heathen men, as we be, yet that they are Abraham's seed, and should be blessed together with him." See Bp. Andrewes' Sermons, i. p. 31.

The seed of Abraham. St. Paul does not determine whether he uses this term here in a spiritual or a literal sense. Either sense will suit his purpose. He leaves it to the readers to choose. The present tense (ἐπιλαμβάνεται) confirms the spiritual sense; and the Christian reader will interpret the words 'seed of Abraham' to mean, all those of every Nation who are Children of Abraham's faith. See Gal. iii. 7—9. 29. Rom. iv. 12—18; xi. 16. Christ is ever helping them all.

St. Paul's Jewish readers would understand 'seed of Abraham' in a literal sense; but since Abraham and his seed are members of the human family, this sense would not weaken the force of the Apostle's argument.

It is a groundless supposition of some, that this expression must be limited to the literal Israel; and that therefore this Epistle could not have been written by St. Paul.

17. ὁμοιωθῆναι] to be made like, not only in His humanity, but in its weaknesses and sorrows,—poverty, pain, hunger, thirst, tears, and death. An answer to the Jews, who objected to the sufferings of Jesus as inconsistent with the office of the Messiah.

— πιστὸς ἀρχιερεύς] a faithful High Priest. See Clem. Rom. i. 58, διὰ τοῦ προστάτου καὶ ἀρχιερέως ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

— ἱλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας] to cover the sins. Cp. Dan. ix. 24. 1 Sam. iii. 14. Sirach iii. 3. 29; xx. 28; xxviii. 5; xxxiv. 21, LXX.

This use of the word ἱλάσκεσθαι is derived from the Septuagint, where it is equivalent to the Hebrew כִּפֶּר (kipper), 'to cover.' See Exod. xxxii. 29. Levit. iv. 20.

In Classical Writers the word ἱλάσκεσθαι signifies, 'to propitiate a person.' But it is remarkable, that the writers of Holy Scripture never use this word in that sense, as applied to God. Neither in the Septuagint, nor in the New Testament, do we find the expression ἱλάσκεσθαι Θεὸν, to propitiate God, or ἱλάσκεσθαι ὀργὴν Θεοῦ. See Delitzsch, p. 94.

This reserve of Scripture as to the use of this word ἱλάσκεσθαι may, perhaps, be designed to be a silent refutation of the notion of Heathens, and of some among the Jews, that they were able to propitiate God by expiatory sacrifices offered by themselves: a notion expressly contradicted in Scripture. (Ps. xlix. 7, 8. Heb. x. 4, 5.) And it may be intended to be instrumental in teaching the true doctrine, that it is not man who can propitiate God, but it is God Himself Who provides an offering for the appeasing of His own wrath. It is 'God in Christ' Who reconciles the World to Himself. See 2 Cor. v. 18, 19. It was God Who set forth for Himself (προέθετο) an ἱλαστήριον in Christ. Rom. iii. 25. Cp. Col. i. 20. Eph. ii. 16.

God is said in Scripture (ἱλασθῆναι) to be merciful to man (see Luke xviii. 13); and Christ is called an ἱλαστήριον, and an ἱλασμὸς περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν (1 John ii. 2; iv. 10); and Christ, as our High Priest, is said ἱλάσκεσθαι ἁμαρτίας here; but it is of God's own free grace and mere mercy towards us, that He is propitious to us; and it is of His infinite love, that He has provided a propitiation for Himself, that He reconciles the World to Himself in Christ, His only-begotten Son, in Whom He is well pleased. See x. 4, 5.

CH. III. 1. ἀδελφοὶ ἅγιοι] Holy brethren. An address never used by St. Paul in any of his Epistles. But it would be unreasonable to allege this as an argument against the Pauline origin of this Epistle. It is rather an evidence in confirmation of the opinion that this Epistle is addressed to a peculiar class, viz. those who dwell in the Holy City (Matt. iv. 5; xxvii. 53), and came of the holy seed (Rom. xi. 16), separated from ancient times by special consecration as a holy people to God. Cp. 1 Pet. ii. 5. 9.

St. Paul himself calls those of Jerusalem ἁγίους, κατ' ἐξοχήν in I Cor. xvi. 1. 15. 2 Cor. viii. 4; ix. 1. Rom. xv. 31. So that this expression is quite in harmony with his language.

— κλήσεως ἐπουρανίου μέτοχοι] partakers of the heavenly calling: uttered by God to our Fathers by the Prophets, and now to us by His own Son. See i. 1. It is one and the same calling, from the same God, speaking from Heaven, and inviting us to Heaven.

— τὸν ἀπόστολον] the Apostle, being sent of God as Moses was. (Exod. iii. 10—15.) Christ is called an Apostle, because the Father sent Him; and as the Father sent Him, so sent He the Twelve. (John xx. 21.) The Heavenly Householder first sent His Servants the Prophets, but last of all He sent His own Son. (Matt. xxi. 33.) Cp. John iii. 34; v. 36; vi. 29. 57; vii. 29. 1 John iv. 10. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. i. p. 66.

Cp. Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 12, ὁ ἡμέτερος διδάσκαλος καὶ τοῦ πατρὸς πάντων καὶ δεσπότου υἱὸς καὶ ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦς Χριστός.

Justin Martyr says also, Apol. i. 63, "The WORD of God is His Son, and He is also called an Angel or Messenger (ἄγγελος), or Apostle, for He announces (ἀναγγέλλει) whatever we need to know; and He is sent (ἀποστέλλεται) to declare whatsoever things are announced, as He Himself says (to His Apostles), He that heareth Me, heareth Him that sent Me (Luke x. 16)."

Christ is the Son of God, and His Apostle. He was sent as God's Apostle, but He pre-existed as the First-begotten Logos of God, and as God, λόγος πρωτότοκος ὢν τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ Θεὸς ὑπάρχει.

— ἀρχιερέα] High Priest. So the Messiah is named, Ps. cx. 4; and He was typified by the High Priest under the Law.

Thus St. Paul points to Christ as uniting the office of Moses and Aaron in His own Person.

This phrase supplies the clue to the order and treatment of the subject;

He first compares Christ with Moses, and proves His superiority to him (iii. 3); then he contrasts the Priesthood of Christ with that of Aaron, and shows its pre-eminence (iv. 14).

— τῆς ὁμολογίας ἡμῶν] our Christian Profession as distinguished from Judaism (iv. 14; x. 23. 1 Tim. vi. 12. Rom. x. 9). So Philo (i. 654) calls the Divine Logos, τὸν μέγαν ἀρχιερέα τῆς ὁμολογίας, if the text be genuine. See Mangey and Bleek.

2. τῷ ποιήσαντι] to Him Who constituted Him. See 1 Sam. xii. 16, and on Mark iii. 14, ἐποίησε δώδεκα, and cp. Acts ii. 36, Κύριον καὶ Χριστὸν αὐτὸν ὁ Θεὸς ἐποίησε. Chrys., Theodoret, Theoph.

The interpretation, "to Him Who created Him," has less authority (though it is applied by some of the Fathers, as Athanasius and others, in Cat. pp. 437, 438, to the human generation of the Son), and is not consistent with the argument, and would make the Apostle speak a language which is not in harmony with that of Scripture, and was perverted by the Arians to serve their purpose, whence some persons had scruples as to the genuineness of the Epistle. See Philastr. Hæres. 89, p. 84, ed. Oehler.

— πιστὸν—ὡς καὶ Μωϋσῆς] Clem. Rom. i. 17 and 43, who has ὅλῳ in both places; omitted by B, and formerly by Tisch., but restored in his last Edition, 1858.

Οἶκος αὐτοῦ is not the house of Moses, but of God. See Numb. xii. 7. Cp. Acts vii. 38. And the word αὐτοῦ intimates that Moses himself was in God's house, and not in his own house; and that He, in whose house Moses was as a steward, was He Who constituted Jesus to be a Priest and Apostle.

3. Πλείονος—αὐτόν] This Jesus has been deemed by God to be worthy of greater honour than Moses, insomuch, or in proportion as, he who built a house has more honour than the house itself.

There is, therefore, as much difference between Moses and Christ, as there is between a house and its architect. Theodoret.

Christ has been deemed worthy of greater honour by God, for by Christ God made the worlds (i. 2; cp. ii. 5—8).

Elz. has πλείονος γὰρ δόξης, but the reading in the text is that of the best MSS.

4. πᾶς γὰρ οἶκος] for every house: and therefore that house in which Moses was a faithful steward, is builded by some one, and does not build itself; but the Person Who builded all things (as you know from the writings of Moses, Gen. i. 1) is God.

It is God who made all things, He is Lord of all; but He made them by His own Son, co-equal and co-eternal with Himself; whom He set over the House He had builded, not as a servant, but as a Son. Cp. Delitzsch here, p. 110.

Elz. has τὰ πάντα, but πάντα = all things, is the true reading.

The word κατασκευάζω, here used, means something more than 'build;' it is equivalent to construo, instruo, 'to build and to furnish,' 'adornare, apparare' with σκεύη. Cp. Luke i. 17, λαὸν κατεσκευασμένον, 'populum præparatum.'

It is used by the LXX for the Hebrew עָשָׂה (asah), to make (Numb. xxi. 27. 2 Chron. xxxii. 5. Prov. xxiii. 5), and is ex-

Josh. i. 1; viii. 31. Barnabas (Epist. 14): Μωσῆς θεράπων ὢν ἔλαβε (τὰς πλάκας)· αὐτὸς δὲ ὁ Κύριος ἡμῖν ἔδωκεν εἶναι εἰς λαὸν κληρονομίας δι' ἡμᾶς ὑπομείνας [θάνατον], ἐφανερώθη δὲ ἵνα . . . . τὰς ἤδη δεδαπανημένας ἡμῶν καρδίας τῷ θανάτῳ, καὶ παραδεδομένας τῇ τῆς πλάνης ἀνομίᾳ, λυτρωσάμενος ἐκ τοῦ σκότους διάθηται ἐν ἡμῖν διαθήκην λόγῳ. And the author then cites Isa. xlii. 6, 7; lxi. 1, 2, which illustrates the word ἐπιλαμβάνεται in ii. 16.

— λαληθησομένων] to be spoken by Christ. See Deut. xviii. 5.

6. τὸ καύχημα] the subject-matter of the glorying of your hope, which does not faint in present afflictions, but looks forward to the future bliss. Rom. viii. 24. Cp. vi. 11; x. 35.

— μέχρι τέλους βεβαίαν] Omitted by Tisch. and others on the authority of B. But the words are in A, C, D, E, K, L, M, and are retained by Lachmann.

7—11.] Ps. xcv. 7—11, from the LXX. Observe here the direct assertion of the Apostle, that the Psalms were spoken by the Holy Ghost (cp. Acts i. 16), as was the belief of the Jews,—a belief sanctioned by Christ Himself. Matt. xxii. 43.

This Psalm was, probably, made for, and sung at, the Feast of Tabernacles,—the annual Commemoration of the Sojourning in the Wilderness. The Rest of Canaan after that wandering in the Arabian Desert already past, was typical and suggestive of the future rest, that of Heaven, after our mortal pilgrimage in the wilderness of this World.

7. ἐὰν — ἀκούσητε] If ye shall have heard; 'si audieritis,' Vulg. The aorist after ἐὰν generally has the force of the futurum exactum. See Winer, § 41, p. 262.

This is important to observe, because the Apostle's warning is to those who have been permitted to hear, and are in danger of falling away; and his main design is to exhort to constancy and perseverance to the end. See iii. 6. 12. 14; iv. 4; vi. 6.

8. ἐν τῷ παραπικρασμῷ] the contention, מְרִיבָה (meribah). Exod. xvii. 7. παραπικραίνω in the LXX = הִכְעִיס (hikeis), to provoke, exacerbate; from root כָּעַס (kaas), angry, provoked, irritated. Jer. xxxii. 29. Hence it has also the rendering of מָרַד (marad), to rebel, Ezek. ii. 3, and is connected with מְרִי (meri), rebellion, Ezek. ii. 5—8; and is interpreted by παροργίζω by Hesych.

9. ἐπείρασαν] they tempted Me. Πειρασμὸς = Hebr. מַסָּה (massah). Exod. xvii. 7. Deut. vi. 16; ix. 22.

Elz. adds με, against the best authorities, and has ἐδοκίμασάν με. But A, B, C, D, D*, have ἐν δοκιμασίᾳ, and so Lachm., Tisch., De Wette, Bleek, Lünemann.

— τεσσαράκοντα ἔτη] Forty Years,—a term which gives a remarkable significance and propriety to this warning as applied here by the Apostle to the Jews of his own age.

For, the time of probation of Jerusalem and of the Jewish Nation, between the Crucifixion of Christ and the Taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, lasted just Forty Years. See Euseb. iii. 7; and above, Chronological Synopsis prefixed to the Acts, p. xli.

That term of trial was very near its expiration when this solemn warning was spoken by St. Paul. Cp. below on v. 10.

10. προσώχθισα] I was offended with. Literally, 'I stumbled at;' as a ship impinging, πρὸς ὄχθῃ, on a sand-bank. προσέκοψα (Hesych.), προσέκρουσα (Suid.); hence προσοχθίζω is a word frequent in the LXX. Cp. Valck. p. 465.

— ταύτῃ] this. So A, B, D*, M, and Bengel, Böhme, Griesb., Lachm., Bleek, De Wette, Tisch., Lün. This reading illustrates what has been said on the term of Forty Years on v. 9. He might well say This generation; for the Jews in the forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem were identifying themselves by their sins with the generation that perished for disobedience in the Wilderness; and thus it was true accordingly to our Lord's prophecy, that "all these things would come on this generation," and that "this generation should not pass away till all would be fulfilled." Matt. xxiii. 36; xxiv. 34. Elz. has ἐκείνῃ.

11. ὡς] so that. Winer, § 53, p. 410.

— εἰ εἰσελεύσονται] if they shall enter in; i. e. they shall not enter it; an elliptical expression or aposiopesis of indignation, in which εἰ = Hebr. אִם (im). Winer, § 53, p. 444. See on Mark viii. 12. Cp. 1 Sam. iii. 17; xiv. 45. 2 Sam. xi. 11.

— τὴν κατάπαυσίν μου] My Rest, the Rest of God, the Everlasting Rest of Heaven.

There are three Rests,—

(1) The Rest of the Sabbath, on which God rested from His works.

God does not here speak of that Rest, for that Rest was now past (see iv. 4), and He is here speaking of some future Rest.

(2) The Rest of Canaan, into which Joshua brought the people after their wanderings in the Wilderness.

God is not speaking of that Rest here, for it also was past when David wrote, by whom God here speaks. (See iv. 8.)

(3) The future and never-ending Rest of heaven, which was typified by the two former Rests, and is properly God's Rest, and is described by Him as "My Rest,"—the Rest of Him Who is Everlasting. This is the κατάπαυσις (Resting) of which God is speaking here. Theophyl.

12. Θεοῦ ζῶντος] the Living God. He who falls away from Christ, does not fall away, as some of you perhaps may imagine, and as your Jewish fellow-countrymen blasphemously affirm, from a dead man, but from the Living God.

13. ἑαυτούς] one another. 1 Thess. v. 13. 1 Cor. vi. 7. Col. iii. 16.

— ἄχρις οὗ τὸ σήμερον καλεῖται] so long as the 'to-day' (observe the article) mentioned by God in the Psalm is still named or mentioned; that is, so long as that to-day lasts; and God's voice is still speaking to you, and you are yet able to hear it. καλεῖται = Hebr. נִקְרָא (nikra).

14. μέτοχοι γὰρ τ. Χ. γ.] for we have been made and are partakers of Christ in reality, only if we hold the beginning of our assurance firm unto the end.

The order of the words in the text is that of the majority of the best MSS., including B. (See Mai's Table of Errata, p. 503.) Elz. has μ. γ. γ. τ. Χ.

15. Ἐν τῷ λέγεσθαι] In its being now said by God (in that solemn warning uttered by Him, which I have quoted and will now repeat, on account of its awful importance, and which I, who now speak to you by His command, will apply to you), To-day if ye shall have heard His voice (see on v. 7) harden not your hearts, as in the provocation,

For, who were they that, when they heard, provoked God?

Yea verily (ἀλλὰ), was it not even all who came out of Egypt by Moses? that is, the main body of those who came forth in the Exodus, provoked God. For, only two remained loyal, and did not provoke the Lord. See Numb. xiv. 1—10. 26—39.

This is doubtless the true rendering of this passage. Tίνες is interrogative, who? and not indefinite, as in the Vulgate, which has 'quidam.' And Ἀλλ' οὐ—Μωϋσέως is also interrogative, and not affirmative. Cp. Bengel and Delitz. p. 127.

From the sentence thus pointed and interpreted, the Apostle's argument is clear, that no multitude of numbers will protect the Jews, and others with them, who reject Christ, from God's chastisements for their sin. Their own History shows this. All who heard Him speak in the Wilderness provoked Him, and all who provoked Him fell in the Wilderness, and failed of His Rest.

On this passage it is to be observed, that the γὰρ (for) in v. 16, introduces the question put by the Apostle. Such a position of γὰρ is easily explained from the expediency of not breaking up the long clause (σήμερον—παραπικρασμῷ); and the conjunction γὰρ is often employed to give force and sharpness to interrogations, as here. Matt. xxvii. 23. John vii. 41. Acts viii. 31; xix. 35. 1 Cor. xi. 22. Lünemann, p. 107. Winer, § 53, p. 396. Delitz. p. 129.

The ἀλλὰ, but, yea verily (cp. 1 Cor. iv. 3. 2 Cor. vii. 11), gives great life to the second question, as much as to say, whatever you might have thought to be probable, and notwithstanding God's love (shown by His warnings and promises, miracles and revelations) to your fathers; and notwithstanding their vast numbers, which you might imagine would have saved them, yet nevertheless I ask of you, Did not all that vast multitude of 600,000 persons, who were led out of Egypt by the ministry of Moses, provoke God? And with whom was He wroth? Whom did He consume? Whom did He exclude from His Rest in Canaan? Was it not even that immense multitude who came out of Egypt under the guidance of that holy Leader, Moses? And why were they consumed in the Wilderness, and excluded from Canaan? Was it not even for their unbelief?

Here then is a fearful warning for yourselves, as to the dreadful consequences of provoking and disobeying Christ, Who is far greater than Moses. Here is a solemn admonition to you that severer chastisements are now hanging over Jerusalem for rejecting Him, than were ever inflicted on your forefathers for rebelling against Moses. Cp. 1 Cor. x. 2—5. 10—12.

As to the interpretation of this passage as thus expounded, see Theodoret and Chrysostom, and the Syriac, and (in part) the Arabic Version here.

The Vulgate, by rendering τίνες 'quidam' instead of quinam, has obscured the sense, and has hindered the right interpretation; and its influence is seen here in our own Authorized Version, in this passage.

17. ὧν τὰ κῶλα] Cp. Numb. xiv. 29, ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ ταύτῃ πεσεῖται τὰ κῶλα ὑμῶν, and see 1 Cor. x. 3—8.

Ch. IV. 1. κατάπαυσιν αὐτοῦ] His Rest, the Rest of God. The Apostle grounds an important argument on the Pronoun His. The Rest of God cannot be a mere earthly temporal Rest; it cannot be the Rest of Canaan. It must be heavenly and Eternal.

— δοκῇ τις ἐξ ὑμῶν ὑστερηκέναι] Lest any of you should appear to have failed, or fallen short, of it. He uses the word δοκῇ, appear, because no one could as yet predicate, what the final condition of any of them would be. The fact of their failure or attainment would not be determined and declared till the day of doom. He says, let us fear, lest any of you should seem to have fallen short of it; for, he is about to speak of the great difference between those who refuse to hearken, and therefore fail, and himself and others who believe, and therefore enter into the Rest of God. See v. 3.

2. ὁ λόγος τῆς ἀκοῆς] Not simply the word preached, or the word of preaching, but much rather, the word of hearing; i. e. which was uttered in order to be heard. The stress is laid on the necessity of hearing what God was pleased to speak. See above, note on 1 Thess. ii. 13. Rom. x. 17. This expression conveys the wholesome admonition, that, however important may be the office of preaching, the work of hearing is no less so.

In the present passage, stress is to be laid on ἀκοὴ in its true sense of hearing, hearkening to that which is spoken by God; because an error has been propagated in many translations of this verse from non-advertence to the true sense of τοῖς ἀκούσασιν, which probably means those persons who did hearken to the word of hearing, and received and obeyed it; see next note.

— μὴ συγκεκραμένους τῇ πίστει] The reading of this passage is controverted. Elz. has συγκεκραμένος, in the singular number nominative case, with the Peschito, some Cursives, and the Vulgate and Arabic Versions; and so Tischendorf, Lünemann, Delitz.

(1) This reading gives a very good sense. The Word spoken did not profit them, not being mingled with their Faith. The Word spoken is compared to wine poured into a vessel, according to our Lord's own comparison (Matt. ix. 17); but it did not profit them because it was not mingled with Faith in the recipients. The metaphor derives clearness from the ancient practice of mingling wine with other fluids. Compare James i. 21, "Receive with meekness the engrafted Word."

(2) But there is an almost overwhelming amount of MS. testimony in favour of the accusative plural, which is found in A, B, C, D*, D, E, I, K, M. And even the slight discrepancy of these MSS. as to the form of the accusative,—some having συγ- or συν-κεκερασμένους, others συγκεκραμμένους,—some συγκεκραμένους, others συνκεκραμένους,—gives additional force to their testimony, as showing its independence, and that they are not mere transcripts from the same copies.

The accusative is also confirmed by the authority of Theodor. Mops., Cyril, Macarius, Chrys., Theodoret, Photius, and a large number of Cursive Manuscripts, and the Coptic, Æthiopic, and Armenian Versions; and so the Catena lately published by Dr. Cramer, p. 450, and so Lachmann and Bleek.

If this be the true reading, the sense may be thus paraphrased: They ought all to have been tempered together (συγκεκραμένοι) by Faith and Charity into one harmonious body; but only a few hearkened to the Word, emphatically the Word of Hearing, because all were bound to hearken to it. The others were not tempered with them, but rebelled against Moses and Aaron, and were ready to stone Caleb and Joshua, who did hearken to the Word. Numb. xiv. 10. Cp. Exod. xvii. 4.

Therefore the word spoken did not profit them.

No more will the word now spoken by Christ profit you, unless you comply with the conditions He requires of you. He has said, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear" (Matt. xi. 15; xiii. 19), and "Take heed how ye hear" (Luke viii. 18), and παυσιν οἱ πιστεύσαντες, καθὼς εἴρηκεν, Ὡς ὤμοσα ἐν τῇ ὀργῇ μου, εἰ εἰσελεύσονται εἰς τὴν κατάπαυσίν μου, καίτοι τῶν ἔργων ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου γενηθέντων. 4 [b] Εἴρηκε γάρ που περὶ τῆς ἑβδόμης οὕτω, Καὶ κατέπαυσεν ὁ Θεὸς ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ἑβδόμῃ ἀπὸ πάντων τῶν ἔργων αὐτοῦ. 5 Καὶ ἐν τούτῳ πάλιν, Εἰ εἰσελεύσονται εἰς τὴν κατάπαυσίν μου.

c Ps. 95. 7. ch. 3. 7, 15.

"He that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi. 16). His Word will not be profitable to you, unless you are blended together in faith with those who have hearkened to Christ's Word, and who believe in Him, and have been incorporated into His Church, and who dwell together as fellow-members in unity in His mystical body, of which He has tempered all the members together as one man in Himself. Cp. Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Hammond here, and the examples in Wetstein, p. 397, of the use of the word συγκεράννυσθαι, as applied to persons harmoniously combined together with one another, and the use of a similar metaphor in Jewish writers. See also particularly, 1 Cor. xii. 24, ὁ Θεὸς συνεκέρασε τὸ σῶμα, where the word συνεκέρασε, expounded in its spiritual sense by the Apostle (1 Cor. xii. 12—27), may serve as a clue to the meaning of συγκεκραμένους τοῖς ἀκούσασι in the present passage (if this is the true reading), and as a comment upon it. And thus, by means of the two words (συγκεκραμένους πίστει), the Apostle has combined here the two great doctrines of Faith and Unity: the one, Faith, as the Foundation on which the fabric of the Church rests; the other, Unity, the Cement which binds all the members of the Church together as living stones in the House of God (iii. 6).

3. οἱ πιστεύσαντες] We, who have professed our faith in Christ, and abide together in His Body, are entering by faith into the rest of God.

The words οἱ πιστεύσαντες explain τοῖς ἀκούσασι in the preceding verse, and confirm the interpretation of it there given.

— καίτοι κ.τ.λ.] although His works were done from the foundation of the world, yet God still speaks by the Psalmist of His Rest as a thing still future: and therefore the Rest of which He speaks by David is not the Seventh-Day Rest, or Sabbath, following immediately on the Hexämeron of Creation (see v. 4), but it is some future Rest; and being God's Rest, is an everlasting one. See v. 5.

4. Εἴρηκε] He has spoken, as of a thing past. (Gen. ii. 2.) Observe the formula by which the Author of this Epistle introduces quotations from the Old Testament. He cites them as spoken, and not as written.

St. Paul, in his speeches recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, does not quote the Old Testament in one and the same manner to Jews and Gentiles.

He observes a difference according to his audience. To Felix, the Roman Governor, he says of himself, "believing all things which are written in the Law and the Prophets" (Acts xxiv. 14). But to the Jewish King, Agrippa, "saying none other things than those which Moses and the Prophets did say should come" (Acts xxvi. 22). See Dr. Townson (Works, i. 99).

In his Epistles to Gentile or to mixed congregations he rarely uses any other form than, "It is written," or the "Scripture saith." But in the Epistle to the Hebrews, though the Old Testament is often quoted, yet in no instance is it quoted as written.

Here then is a discrepancy of manner between the universally acknowledged Epistles of St. Paul and that to the Hebrews.

At first sight this discrepancy might seem to present an argument against the Pauline origin of this Epistle; and it has been alleged as such by some Critics (De Wette, Davidson, p. 244). But on examination we find that it is a discrepancy precisely similar to that which exists (as has just been observed) in his speeches as recorded in the Acts.

It is, therefore, an argument in favour of the Pauline origin. And this characteristic discrepancy may serve to explain other discrepancies (by which some Critics have been staggered) between the manner of this Epistle and the other Epistles of St. Paul. See Introduction above, p. 362, 3.

It may be added, that in the particular respect just noticed, there is the same difference between the Evangelist St. Matthew on the one hand, and St. Mark and St. Luke on the other.

St. Matthew, writing specially for the Hebrews, always introduces the words of the Old Testament as spoken; for he was writing for that favoured people with whom God had communicated by word of mouth. But St. Mark and St. Luke, writing for Gentile use, generally quote the Old Testament as written.

The Old Testament was a living oracle to the Hebrews; it was a written Book to the rest of the world.

5. Καὶ ἐν τούτῳ πάλιν] And again in this Scripture. Πάλιν here, and in v. 7, introduces a new quotation. See i. 6.

— Εἰ εἰσελεύσονται] They shall not enter in; literally, I am not the God of truth if they shall enter in. See iii. 11.

— κατάπαυσίν μου] My Rest. The emphatic word is Μου, which betokens that it is the Rest of God, and therefore not a mere rest on earth in time, like the seventh-day Sabbath, but in Heaven and for Eternity. It is therefore a future Rest, and concerns you (says the Apostle) and all men even to the end of time.

6. δι' ἀπείθειαν] because of disobedience. Rom. xi. 30. 32. Eph. ii. 2; v. 6.

7. πάλιν τινὰ ὁρίζει ἡμέραν] again, He limits, or appoints, a certain other day, saying, "To-day," even in and by David, who lived after so long a time, viz. about 500 years after the date of the entrance into Canaan, and who himself was living in Canaan. Theodoret.

The word πάλιν, again, introduces a new argument, intimating that those persons, to whom the former offer of entering into rest had been made, failed of attaining that Rest, and that God, therefore, made a second offer to others living in another day.

God, in his great long-suffering and tender mercy, appointed another "to-day," even 500 years after the Rest of Canaan, into which those persons, to whom the word was first preached, failed to enter.

The term ὁρίζει (ἱστησιν, ὅρον δίδωσιν, Hesych., defines, limits) intimates that this day has its end, its horizon, beyond which the time of probation will not extend. Cp. Acts xvii. 26.

Since then, God, Who is Eternal, is speaking by David, and since He uses the word to-day, and warns the people living even at that later day, not to harden their hearts, lest they should be afterwards excluded from some future rest, as their fathers who died in the wilderness had been excluded from the rest of Canaan for disobedience, it is evident that some other rest remains, which was not attained even by those Israelites who were admitted under Joshua into the promised Land; for they never attained to any other Rest since the time of David; nor has any other Rest been offered beside the rest of God, the heavenly and Eternal Rest, of which He spake by David. Therefore God's "To-day" remains still to us.

This To-day, limited for the Jews, was now drawing to its close. Soon after this Epistle was written the day of probation was over, and the sun of its glory set in darkness in the fall of Jerusalem.

The probationary period of the Forty Years' sojourn in the wilderness was reproduced, as it were, in the Forty Years of trial, allowed to Jerusalem and the Jewish Nation, between the rejection and crucifixion of the Messiah, and the execution of the penalty due to that national sin in the destruction of their City by the Gentiles.

The Forty Years' sojourn in the wilderness is also a type of the time allowed to every one in his mortal pilgrimage in the wilderness of this world, after his baptismal passage of the Red Sea, in his journey, in the wilderness of this World, toward the Everlasting Rest of the Heavenly Canaan.

To every one God says, To-day, if thou hast heard My voice, harden not thy heart. He reiterates that warning every day.

Well therefore and wisely has the Church of England inserted the Ninety-fifth Psalm in her office of Daily Prayer.

In that Psalm God speaks to every child of man even to the day of doom, and points to the example of the Israelites who had His promises, and whose carcases fell in the wilderness, as an awful warning of the bitter fruits of disobedience.

That Psalm is supposed by some to have been sung at the Feast of Tabernacles (see Bp. Fell, p. 359, note), in which the Ancient People of God commemorated their sojourn in the wilderness. And the Church of Christ, who is a Pilgrim journeying to her heavenly inheritance, and who has received a precept from the Apostle to exhort her people "daily, while it is called to-day," has rightly provided that this divine warning should sound daily in the ears of her people, and remind them of the certainty of God's judgments, by the example of the Israelites, who were excluded from the earthly Canaan, and prepare them by its salutary admonitions to enter into that Rest which "remaineth to the people of God."

This Warning has a more awful character as addressed to us than it had even when spoken to the Hebrews by St. Paul.

They looked back upon the Forty Years in the Wilderness, and the death of the disobedient there. But we look back, not only on that period, and on that judgment, but on the like period of Forty Years between the Crucifixion of Christ and the utter desolation of Jerusalem by the Roman Armies, and the scattering abroad of the Jews into all lands, where they have remained as outcasts for nearly twenty centuries. And thus we have a twofold warning on the awful consequences of Disobedience.

8. Ἰησοῦς] Joshua, the Son of Nun. See Acts vii. 45, and cp. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 142—146.

— οὐκ ἂν—ἐλάλει] He would not have been now speaking. Observe the imperfect tense. He does not say, οὐκ ἂν ἐλάλησε, "He would not have spoken."

9. Ἄρα ἀπολείπεται σαββατισμὸς τῷ λαῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ] There remaineth therefore a Sabbath-rest to the people of God. Observe the word here used, σαββατισμός. He had used the word κατάπαυσις, cessation, before (iii. 11. 18; iv. 1. 3. 5. 10, 11), but he now employs the word sabbatism, to show that the Sabbath, שַׁבָּת, on which God rested from His own works (Gen. ii. 2), was typical of that future Rest of God into which all they who are truly 'His people' will enter, when they "rest from their labours." Rev. xiv. 13.

Are we the "people of God?" Do we look for that eternal Rest? Do we hope to enter into it? Does it remain to us? Then we may be sure that the Law which God gave to His People, concerning the duty of a religious rest on one day in seven,—a Law which dates from the Creation, and reaches beyond the Day of Doom even to Eternity, a Law modified indeed to us as to the position of the day, but confirmed (even by that modification) as to the proportion of time,—does concern us, who are Christians; and if we do not hallow God's Sabbaths on earth, we cannot hope to enjoy His eternal Sabbath in heaven.

On the obligation of the Christian Sabbath see above, Matt. xxviii. 1. Luke xxiii. 56; xxiv. 1. John xx. 26. Acts xx. 7.

10. ὁ γὰρ κ.τ.λ.] A Sabbath-rest remaineth to the people of God; and it is truly so called, for (γὰρ) every one who has fallen asleep in Jesus, and has entered into His rest (i. e. the rest of God, the never-ending rest), he also, when he was delivered from the burden of the flesh by death, ceased from his labours, he also has his Sabbath, as God has His. (Cp. Theodoret and Chrys.) The Rest of Christ in the grave has made Death to be a Sabbath to us. See on Luke xxiii. 56.

11. ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ τις ὑποδείγματι πέσῃ τῆς ἀπειθείας] That is, so as to be an example to others of the bitter fruits of disobedience, in like manner as the Israelites of old are to us.

This warning will be recognized as having a remarkable propriety and prophetic significance, when it is remembered that it was addressed to that Nation, which was soon after to become an example of the terrible consequences of Rebellion against God, and which has remained a proverb and by-word among the Nations from the time of the destruction of Jerusalem to this day.

12. Ζῶν γὰρ ὁ Λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ κ.τ.λ.] For the Word of God is living, and effectual, and more able to cut than any two-edged sword, and piercing through and through even to the severance of the soul and of the spirit, and of the joints and the marrow, and a discerner of the inward emotions and thoughts of the heart. And there is no creature which is not manifest in His sight, for all things are bare and opened, even to the back-bone, to the Eyes of Him to Whom our account is to be given.

What is the meaning of the term, ὁ Λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the Word of God," here?

This declaration has a comminatory design. The Apostle is putting before his readers the consequences of disobeying Christ.

He could hardly hope to effect this purpose of alarming the conscience of the Hebrews by referring them to the Word of God only as something written or spoken by Him.

But his argument becomes much more cogent, as well as harmoniously coherent, if he be understood to remind them that He, Whose Gospel they have heard, is the Discerner of their hearts, and will summon them to render an account to Himself as Judge of Quick and Dead.

Besides, the tenour of his language seems to point rather to a living and energizing Person, than to an inanimate thing.

Further, though the Christian Law itself, by which all are to be judged, may in a certain sense be regarded as a living Power by us, yet this was hardly the case with those to whom St. Paul was now writing. They were not to be awed by the written declarations of Christianity, but by the personal Majesty of Christ.

Besides, in other similar passages, where the Apostle is drawing a parallel between the pilgrimage of the Israelites and the probation allowed to Christians in this life, he introduces the Person of Christ as executing judgment on the guilty. See 1 Cor. ix. 22.

He adds also, in the following verse, that there is no creature which is hidden in His sight, but every thing is naked, and laid open to the back-bone, to the eyes of Him to Whom our account is to be given.

These words clearly point to a PERSON, a Divine, Omnipresent, Omniscient Person, the Judge of Quick and Dead.

Hence it was the general sense of Christian Antiquity that St. Paul is here speaking of Christ, the Everlasting Word of God.

S. Clement (Ep. § 21), the friend and fellow-labourer of St. Paul (see Phil. iv. 3, and Bp. Pearson's dedication of his Exposition of the Apostles' Creed), applies these words to a Person, even God Himself, ἐρευνητὴς γάρ ἐστιν ἐνθυμήσεων καὶ ἐννοιῶν. Eusebius, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Gregory Nyssen, Cyril, and Isidorus, in the very valuable ancient Catena printed by Dr. Cramer, p. 458—467, and Theodoret and Theophylact, apply the words to CHRIST, the Eternal Word of God, the Judge of Quick and Dead. So also S. Ambrose (de Fide, iv. c. 7) and Primasius, who has an excellent comment on this text.

The Hebrews, and Hebrew Christians, and Hellenists had already been made familiar with the term "Word of God," as applied to a Divine Person, in their Chaldee Paraphrases, and also in the writings of the Alexandrine School of Theology. See above, note on John i. 1.

Therefore St. Paul, in writing to the Hebrews, was very likely to use this term, in order to show to them, that what had been predicated, in their Paraphrases and other writings, concerning the Divine Person called the "Word of God," was to be understood of no other than Christ.

Further. St. Paul here speaks of the Word as being able to cut more sharply than a two-edged sword, an instrument of Judgment and Justice. (Rom. xiii. 14.)

It is observable, that in another place of Holy Scripture, where the two-edged sword is mentioned, it is assigned to the Person Who is Judge of all, Christ. Out of His mouth goeth a two-edged sword (Rev. i. 16); and again, see Rev. ii. 12. 16, where Christ Himself speaks. And further, He Who is described as executing Judgment with the two-edged sword, is designated f 2 Chron. 16. 9. Job 26. 6. Ps. 33. 13—15. & 34. 16. & 90. 8. & 139. 11, 12. Eccles. 15. 19.

τε καὶ μυελῶν, καὶ κριτικὸς ἐνθυμήσεων καὶ ἐννοιῶν καρδίας, 13 f καὶ οὐκ ἔστι κτίσις ἀφανὴς ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, πάντα δὲ γυμνὰ καὶ τετραχηλισμένα τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς αὐτοῦ, πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος.

by that very title which is used here, "the WORD OF GOD." (Rev. xiii. 15. 21.)

It has indeed been alleged by many in recent times, that the name "Word of God" is never applied to Christ by any writer of Holy Scripture but St. John. But such assertions as these, concerning the Person of Christ, are of a questionable character. There seems to be an antecedent probability against them, as having a tendency to represent the divinely-inspired writers as fettered by rigid rules, like material machines, and not as living Persons and Powers, animated by One Divine Spirit.

And these assertions do not seem to be borne out by fact. See note below on Titus i. 3.

There was indeed good reason, why the Apostle, when writing to Gentiles, should not use such an expression as "the Word of God" for an appellation of Christ. And therefore we need not wonder that this expression, "Word of God," does not occur often in this sense in the Apostolic Epistles.

But there was no reason, why St. Paul should abstain from its use in writing to the Hebrews, or Hellenists, or to Christians well grounded in the truth.

On the contrary, it might well be matter for surprise, that he and the other Apostles should leave this expression, embodying such solemn truths, to the solitary use of St. John, and should not rather have prepared the way for his use of it, so that it might be seen, that the general teaching of the Apostles is in harmony with itself, and with that of the Ancient Jewish Church, in the great doctrines concerning the Name and Offices of Christ.

Accordingly, some of the best Divines of the Church of England have adopted the ancient exposition of this passage.

The following may be cited:

If I mistake not, the true understanding of the phrase in Heb. iv. 12—39, is spoken of the Essential Word of God, the Second Person of the Ever Blessed Trinity. Bp. Sanderson (iii. 20).

Is the importance of this name (the WORD of GOD), or the emblem by which the power of it is emblazoned, to wit, His sharp and glittering sword (Deut. xxxii. 41, 42), any where literally expressed in the Apostle's writings? It is, most fully and most emphatically in Heb. iv. 12, 13. "Vivus est sermo Dei." The Word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, &c. Yet is it questioned by some (whose names I conceal) whether by the Word of God in that place, the Eternal Word Himself, be literally and directly meant; and whether St. Paul by the Word of God means the self-same that St. John doth in his Gospel, chap. i. 1, In the beginning was the Word; and again, v. 14, The Word was made Flesh.

It is a very weak exception which some have made to the contrary, viz. Because the author of that Epistle no where else instyles the Son of God the Word of God.

But to this exception the answer is very easy—Because the author of that Epistle had no where else the like occasion thus to instyle Him.

The same exception (were it warrantable) might be taken against the literal meaning of St. John, or against the ordinary interpretation of the first verse of his Gospel; because St. John no where else, besides in the two verses before mentioned, instyles the Son of God by the same name.

[Rather, only in the Apocalypse does St. John call Christ "the Word of God," and in his Gospel only the Word. See on Titus i. 3. The argument, therefore, is even stronger than this author, Dean Jackson, here puts it.]

But the complete subject, either of the first proposition, "The Word of God is lively," or of the second, "The Word of God is powerful," or of the third, "The Word of God is sharper than any two-edged sword;" the Word written or preached cannot be: nothing can be besides God Himself, or that Word which St. John saith, was in the beginning, in Whom was life, and whose life was the light of men.

Nor are the peculiar and special attributes of God any where set forth in a more full and majestic character of words than in these words of St. Paul.

The propositions are in number seven or eight. Ὁ Λόγος, the WORD, is the same: and for this reason, if any of these attributes be literally meant of the Son of God, or of the Son of God only completive, all the rest must be completely meant of Him. He only it is, "qui tanti mensuram nominis implet," Who rightly fills the importance of this title, Λόγος, or Word, in that place. Admit then, the Word written or preached may truly be said to be quick and powerful, and in some sort, not more sharp, but more piercing, than any two-edged sword (for a sword with one edge may be as sharp as a sword with two edges, but not so piercing); but admit the Word of God preached might be more piercing than any sword, yet could it not properly be said to be a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, or that there is no creature which is not manifest unto it; nor can it possibly be imagined to be the logical subject of the two last propositions; for the Apostle plainly speaks of a living Person: neither is there any creature that is not manifest in His Sight, but all things are naked and open unto the eyes of Him, πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος, with Whom we have to do, as our English renders it. As Beza and Calvin had before better expressed it than Erasmus, who renders it, of whom we speak; or than the Vulgar Latin, "ad quem nobis est sermo." But the Syriac of all most fully: All things are opened unto the eyes of Him, to whom men must render an account. Every one that hears the Word preached, must give an account of the Word which he hears; but this account we must not, we cannot give unto the Word preached, but unto Him Whose Words they are which we hear, or from Whom the Word preached must derive all the efficacy, force, and power which it hath. (Dean Jackson on the Creed, xi. chap. xii. Vol. x. p. 216—218. See also the same author, book vii. chap. xxvi. and xxvii., and book xi. chap. xlvii.).

It is plain to him that hath carefully read St. Paul's Epistles, and is acquainted also with the writings of Philo, that the holy Apostle well understood that cabalistical Theology of the Jews, and retained so much of it, as by the direction of the Divine Spirit in him, he found to be sound, good, and genuine. In the tenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, St. Paul expounds the manna showered on the Israelites in the wilderness, and the rock that gave them water to quench their thirst, to be significations of our Saviour Christ; and shows, moreover, that the angel going before the people of God in their pilgrimage, and tempted by them, was our Lord Christ. And all this Philo likewise understands of the Λόγος, the Word, or Son of God, which we Christians know to have been in the fulness of time made man, and called by the name of Jesus Christ. The Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the fourth chapter of that Epistle, v. 12, 13, speaking of the Λόγος, the Word of God, useth almost the very same expressions, but altogether the same sense, that Philo hath, discoursing of the same matter in his writings, as hath been observed by the learned Grotius on the place; who, from that and other indications, conjectures that the divine author had read the books of that learned Jew. Bp. Bull (Serm. x. Vol. i. p. 243).

— τομώτερος] more able to cut (Hesych.): τμητικώτερος (Gloss. Alberti).

This office of cutting, applied as an attribute to the Supreme God Himself, is described by Jewish Hellenists, e. g. Philo on Gen. xv. 10 (Quis hæres. &c., p. 491, Wetstein), ἵνα ἐννοῇς Θεὸν τεμόντα τὰς σωμάτων καὶ πραγμάτων ἡρμόσθαι καὶ ἡνῶσθαι δοκούσας φύσεις. Philo adds that this work of cutting is performed τῷ τομεῖ τῶν συμπάντων αὐτοῦ λόγῳ. And it was much to St. Paul's purpose to remind these Jewish Christians that this Λόγος is Christ.

— ψυχῆς καὶ πνεύματος] of the animal life, and of the spirit, or higher principle. "Animâ (ψυχῇ) vivimus, spiritu (πνεύματι) intelligimus; vita nobis carnalis cum bestiis communis est, ratio spiritalis cum Angelis." Primasius. See above on 1 Thess. v. 23.

Primasius observes that Christ cuts more sharply than any two-edged sword, for that can only kill the body, but cannot touch the soul, as Christ Himself says, Matt. x. 28; but He is our Judge, and can cast both body and soul into hell.

He can pierce and penetrate, even to the separation of the animal soul and the rational spirit, and of the joints, and marrow contained in the hidden joints themselves.

This last expression may be taken either literally or figuratively. Cp. μυελὸς ψυχῆς in Eurip. Hippol. 257. But perhaps it is better to understand it literally, and to consider the whole sentence as referring to the triple division of the human frame into body, soul, and spirit (1 Thess. v. 23). Christ our Judge can search out and discern the inmost secrets of them all, and can sever these elements critically, and anatomize each with precision, and determine what sins are due to the weaknesses of the flesh, what to the lusts of the animal man, what to the pride of the spirit. He will regulate the Judicial Balance with the most scrupulous exactitude, and will apportion, adjust, and dispense each man's punishment, and award each man's recompense according to an unerring scale of retributive Justice.

— κριτικὸς ἐνθυμήσεων καὶ ἐννοιῶν] He is a Discerner and Judge of our imaginations and thoughts of the heart, of our secret desires and motives, and of our never-executed intentions, as well as of our overt acts.

A warning against the doctrine of the Pharisees, which dwelt on the letter of the commandment, and cared little for the spirit; and taught, that if a man did not sin with the hand, it was of little importance what he did with his heart. Cp. the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. v. 22. 28.

On ἐνθύμησις, see Matt. ix. 4; xii. 25. Acts xvii. 29.

13. ἀφανὴς] non-apparent; for we must all be made apparent before the Judgment-seat of Christ. See on 2 Cor. v. 10, φανερωθῆναι.

— γυμνὰ καὶ τετραχηλισμένα] bare, and laid open to the neck, throat, and back-bone. The metaphor is from sacrificial victims, first flayed naked (γυμνὰ), and then dissected and laid open by the anatomical knife of the priest, so that all the inner texture, the nerves, and sinews, and arteries of the body, were exposed to view.

So the secrets of our hearts and reins will be revealed at the Judgment-seat of Christ. His two-edged sword will pierce us through and through, and dissect and anatomize, and lay us bare and open, even to the back-bone. See Chrys., Isidorus (in Caten.), Theophyl., Œcumen. p. 6. τετραχηλισμένα = πεφανερωμένα (Hesyc.). φανερὰ καὶ ἀνακεκαλυμμένα (Phavorin., and so Cyril). See Suicer in voce, Bp. Sanderson, ii. 17, and an excellent note of Hammond here, who observes that it was the special duty of the Priests to examine, by anatomical inquisition, whether the victims to be offered to God had any blemish or no. Cp. Philo, de Agricult. i. p. 320. Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. § 18. This was called μωμοσκοπεῖν, δοκιμάζειν. Cp. Prov. xx. 27, "the candle of the Lord searcheth the inner parts of the belly."

So Christ our great High Priest has also a judicial function, and scrutinizes each of us, whether we are fit Sacrifices to be offered up unto God. Cp. Rom. xii. 1.

This exposition is confirmed by the Apostolic Fathers, S. Clement (i. 41), and especially S. Polycarp (ad Phil. 4), who says of widows, "Let them know that they are the altar of God, and that every thing is scrutinized as a victim by Him, whether it has any blemish (πάντα μωμοσκοπεῖται), or is ἄμωμος (see on ix. 14); and nothing escapes His notice, either of reasonings, or thoughts, or any of the secrets of the heart, λέληθεν αὐτὸν οὐδὲν οὔτε λογισμῶν οὔτε ἐννοιῶν, οὔτε τι τῶν κρυπτῶν τῆς καρδίας," where S. Polycarp seems to refer to the present words of St. Paul.

— πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος] with Whom we have to do, with Whom our reckoning is, to Whom we are to render up our account. See on v. 12.

14. Ἔχοντες οὖν ἀρχιερέα μέγαν] Having then a great High Priest. This mention of the High Priesthood of Christ seems to have been suggested to the writer by the metaphor just employed by him concerning the Judicial Inquisition of Victims to be offered to God. Every man is to be offered as a sacrifice to God. We must present ourselves, our souls and bodies, and substance to Him (Rom. xii. 1, 2. Phil. ii. 17; iv. 8. 1 Pet. ii. 5). And Christ is our High Priest, by Whom we ourselves, and every offering of ours, is to be presented to God, if it is to be an acceptable sacrifice unto Him (cp. Clemens R. i. 59). Christ is our High Priest, and offers us. But, as our Priest, He also examines us, He anatomizes us as Victims, He probes our hearts and reins, He scrutinizes our inward parts, our very joints and marrow, our thoughts, affections, motives, and designs. He thus tests us, whether we are fit victims for the altar of God. Cp. Clemens R. i. 41, who says, "Sacrifices are not offered in every place, but at Jerusalem, and there only before the Sanctuary at the Altar; and that which is offered has been carefully scrutinized by the High Priest."

The Rabbis enumerate no less than seventy-three kinds of blemish which vitiate a sacrifice, and render it unfit to be offered to God. Maimonides.

— τοὺς οὐρανούς] The heavens, not the material veil of the Holy of Holies; though typified by it, ix. 11—26; x. 19, 20.

15. πεπειρασμένον] tempted. So A, B, D, E, Origen, Chrys., Elz., Wets., Scholz., Lachm., Lünemann. Cp. ii. 18; xi. 17. 37.

Others have received the reading πεπειραμένον from C, J, K, but this does not seem consistent with the sense.

16. τῷ θρόνῳ τῆς χάριτος] to the Throne of Grace, typified by the Mercy-Seat of the Ark, called the seat of God, where the Shechinah of the Divine Presence was enthroned in the Holy of Holies between the Cherubim. (Ps. lxxx. 1.) See Rom. iii. 25; Mather on the Types, p. 408. 411. 454; and Schöttgen here, p. 947.

Ch. V. 1. Πᾶς γὰρ ἀρχιερεὺς, ἐξ ἀνθρώπων λαμβανόμενος] For every High Priest, being taken from men, and not from Angels. The emphasis is on men. The writer is accounting for Christ's Manhood. So rightly Theodoret; and see in Catenâ, p. 472. There ought therefore to be a comma after ἀρχιερεύς.

St. Paul is explaining the reason of Christ's Incarnation, and why He, Who is so high, stooped so low. He is answering the objection, that Christ cannot be supposed to possess those divine attributes which the Apostle had just ascribed to Him (iv. 12). For, if He were so mighty and majestic a Person, He would not have taken human flesh, been subject to human infirmity, and would not have needed a call to the Priesthood; but would have appeared in divine power and majesty, and have presented Himself to the world on His own independent authority.

St. Paul shows, that this condescension of Christ was required by the nature of the Priestly Office, to which Christ was anointed by God.

He is also refuting the error of those among the Jews who addressed themselves to Angels as Mediators. See Col. ii. 18.

Λαμβανόμενος—λαμβάνω = לָקַח (lakah), to choose and take for appointment to an office. Cp. Acts xv. 14, λαβεῖν ἐξ ἐθνῶν λαόν.

2. μετριοπαθεῖν] to deal gently; not to be without feeling, according to the Stoic ἀπάθεια,—nor yet to be violent and excessive in the display of emotions, but to be mild and moderate in feeling toward them.—μετριοπαθῶ, 'moderor.' Gloss. Vet.

— δυνάμενος—ἀσθένειαν] Being able to deal gently with those who are ignorant and out of the way, because he himself is compassed with infirmity. God did not appoint Angels to be Priests and Mediators under the Old Law, but Men. The Priest's ability to discharge his office is derived from his infirmity. His power is from his weakness. He is clothed with the priestly robe, even because he is clothed with the human garb of suffering. So Christ, Who is gentle—τοῖς ἀγνοοῦσι καὶ πλανωμένοις—to those who sin from ignorance, as well as those who err from negligence or wilfulness. Cp. 1 Tim. i. 13. On the use of the dative after μετριοπαθεῖν, see Delitz. On the sense of περίκειται with an accusative, see Kühner, § 565.

3. δι' αὐτὴν] sc. ἀσθένειαν. On account of this very human infirmity. Elz. has διὰ ταύτην. But αὐτὴν is in A, B, C*, D*, and is received by Lachm., Bleek, De Wette, Tisch., Lünemann.

— περὶ ἑαυτοῦ] for himself, which was not the case with Christ (see iv. 15); and if it had been, His offering would not have been, what it was, a full satisfaction for the sins of the world. Cp. Theophyl.

— περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν] Elz. has ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτιῶν, but περὶ is in A, B, C*, D*, and is received by Lachm., Tisch., and others.

4. Καὶ οὐχ ἑαυτῷ] And no one takes this priestly honour to himself. The second reason for Christ's condescension. A Priest λαμβάνεται (see v. 1), is taken, οὐ λαμβάνει, and does not take. Christ did not come on His Own Divine Authority, because every Priest is taken from Men; He came as a Man, and as a Priest; and no one is a lawful Priest who takes the office on himself, and comes without a due Call and Ordination. If He had not been duly called and sent, He would have been like Korah (Numb. xvi. Jude 11), and not like Aaron (Exod. xxviii. 1. Numb. xvi. 39. 1 Chron. xxiii. 13).

— ἀλλὰ καλούμενος] but being called of God, as Aaron was; He does take the office, nor does He refuse to receive it. Here are two distinct propositions. No one, except he is called of God, presumes to take the Priesthood; and no one who is called of God declines to take it. Christ showed His obedience to God in both respects. These propositions are brought out by the reading in the text received from A, B, C, D, E, K, L, with Bengel, Griesb., Matth., Knapp, Scholz., Lachm., Bleek, De Wette, Tisch., Lünemann, instead of the reading of Elz. ὁ καλούμενος.

5. οὐχ ἑαυτὸν ἐδόξασε] He did not glorify Himself. He waited till the legal age, and was publicly invested in His Priestly Office by the Unction of the Holy Ghost, and by the Voice of the Father from heaven. See above on Matt. iii. 16, and on Luke iii. 22.

Melchizedek. For a more particular explanation of the typical analogy, see on vii. 1.

7. Ὃς—προσενέγκας] An open avowal and profession of Christ's human affections and infirmities,—proving that He is qualified, in that respect, to be a High Priest for men; which He would not have been if He had been an Angel, and not really and truly a man. See v. 1, and Theodoret here.

— ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆς σαρκός] in the days of His Flesh; that is, in the brief time of His weakness and subjection to mortality as Man; especially that time which He called His Hour, as distinguished from His Eternity as God. See on John ii. 4. But that time of suffering in the flesh is now past, and He now reigns in His flesh, exalted and glorified at the Right Hand of God. And that Glory in this Flesh is due to His sufferings in the flesh.

— δεήσεις τε καὶ ἱκετηρίας] prayers and supplications (cp. 1 Tim. v. 1),—the former expressing a need (ἔνδειαν), the other implying a resort (ἱκετεία from ἱκνέομαι) to another person for its supply; both words, therefore, proper to the human nature of Christ.

— μετὰ κραυγῆς ἰσχυρᾶς καὶ δακρύων] with strong crying and tears in His agony at Gethsemane. Matt. xxvi. 42—44. Luke xxii. 44. (Theodoret, Œcumen., Dean Jackson on the Creed, ix. 3); and on the cross, when He cried twice with a loud voice (Matt. xxvii. 46. 50. Luke xxiii. 46); and His tears over Jerusalem and at the grave of Lazarus (Luke xix. 41. John xi. 35).

— καὶ εἰσακουσθεὶς ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας] and also having been heard (by God) for His reverence toward Him,—"et pro suâ reverentiâ exauditus." The Apostle is affirming the true humanity and consequent dependence and weakness of Christ. Hence He prayed. And this sense of the weakness of His humanity, and His consequent reverence toward God, was so far from being a reason for disparagement, that it was the very cause why His prayers prevailed. Here also His Weakness is His Strength. Let us not therefore be ashamed to confess His infirmities, for thus we proclaim the Power of His Intercession. (See Chrys., Theophyl., Primasius.) On this use of ἀπὸ see A Lapide here; Winer, § 47, p. 332. Matt. xviii. 7. Luke xix. 3; xxii. 41; xxiv. 42. Acts xii. 14; xx. 9; xxii. 2.

On the sense of εὐλάβεια, religious fear or awe, see examples in Wetstein here, and Trench, Syn. N. T. § x. xlviii. and Delitz. p. 190.

Our Lord received an evidence of love, in reply to His reverential prayer in His Agony, from His heavenly Father, Who sent an Angel to strengthen Him. (Luke xxii. 43.) Also His Prayer on the Cross obtained a reply of love from His Father, Who received His Spirit (Luke xxiii. 46), and restored it again to His Human Body, which He raised in triumph from the grave.

8. καίπερ ὢν Υἱὸς ἔμαθεν] although, being the Son (not a Son) of God (and so full of all knowledge and wisdom from all eternity, see Col. ii. 3), yet He learnt obedience by experience of what He Himself suffered as Man. The contrast is between Υἱὸς and ἔμαθεν.

Υἱὸς here and i. 2, does not signify (as it is sometimes interpreted) a Son, but the Son of God. See Theodoret, Gregor. Nazianz., Cyril (in Catenâ), and others.

There would be no force in the assertion that a Son learnt any thing, and particularly that a Son learnt obedience. Every son ought to learn it. But what the Apostle dwells on is, that He, Who is the Everlasting Son, learnt obedience by His own sufferings in His Human Nature; and by this learning was perfected and glorified, and became "the Author of everlasting salvation" to all who imitate His obedience (ὑπακοήν), and are dutiful to Him as God, as He as Man was to the Father. See Phil. ii. 8—11 (the best exposition of this passage), γενόμενος ὑπήκοος μέχρι θανάτου κ.τ.λ.

On the proverbial paronomasia, ἔμαθεν ἀφ' ὧν ἔπαθε, see on Herod. i. 207; and Blomf. on Æschyl. Ag. 170, τὸν πάθει μάθος θέντα κυρίως ἔχειν, and for other paronomasias in N. T. see Wetstein here, p. 401, and note above on Luke xxi. 11. Philem. 20. Winer, p. 560.

The frequency of paronomasia (a favourite figure with St. Paul) occurring in this Epistle, confirms the evidence of its Pauline origin, and of its being an original work, and not a translation. See above, Introduction, p. 366.

On the attraction in ὧν ἔπαθε see John vi. 29; xvii. 9. 1 Cor. vii. 1. Rom. x. 14.

The Apostle says that Christ learnt obedience, τὴν ὑπακοήν. We may not weaken this saying, but rather we may thankfully accept it, in all its mysterious fulness, as proclaiming,

(1) The true Manhood of Christ, in a human soul as well as a human body; in which soul, according to the words of the Holy Ghost Himself, He increased in wisdom, as well as He increased as to His body in stature. See above, note on Luke ii. 52.

(2) The perfect union of the two natures in the One Person of Christ. Being the Son of God, co-equal and consubstantial with the Father, yet He learned obedience as Man, from the sufferings He endured.

Thus this Scripture is a safeguard against the Heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches, who divide the Personality or confound the Natures of Christ; and of Apollinarius, who denied His reasonable soul, capable of learning; and of the Monothelites, who denied His human will, capable of subjection and obedience to God.

The Apostle is speaking here of Christ's Mediatorial Kingdom, which He holds in subjection to the Father, and which, when He has put all enemies under His feet, He will deliver up, and God will be all in all. See above on 1 Cor. xv. 24—28.

10. προσαγορευθεὶς] addressed as an Everlasting Priest by God Himself; and therefore indubitably a Priest, and one of greater eminence than any of the Levitical Order.

11. Περὶ οὗ] Concerning Whom as an Everlasting Priest, according to the order of Melchizedek, we have a long discourse to make, and hard to be interpreted to you, since you have now become dull of hearing.

— δυσερμήνευτος] hard to be interpreted to you. He therefore interprets it for them. See vii. 2, ἑρμηνευόμενος.

— νωθροὶ γεγόνατε ταῖς ἀκοαῖς] ye have become (not 'ye are') dull in your ears. Cp. Prov. xxii. 29, where νωθρὸς is contrasted with ὀξὺς, sharp. It is combined in the Glossaries with βραδεῖς and ὄπτιοι, slow and supine: 'hebetes, pigri.' See Wets. Ye have lost the keen edge of your spiritual senses, and have become obtuse, and stupid, and sluggish in your hearing. Ye were once sound and vigorous in the faith, ye have now become inert and languid. Cp. Chrys.

Justin Martyr, in his Exposition of this same Psalm, and of the same verse in it, says to the Jews, "These words were spoken of our Jesus, as they themselves declare, but your ears are stopped and your hearts hardened." Justin M. c. Tryphon. c. 33. See also capp. 32—34, which deserve a careful comparison with the passage of St. Paul.

12. διὰ τὸν χρόνον] by reason of the length of time that ye have professed Christianity.

— χρείαν ἔχετε τοῦ διδάσκειν ὑμᾶς τινα τὰ στοιχεῖα] ye have need that some man (τινα) should teach you the elements. Τινα is not a neuter plural agreeing with στοιχεῖα, but it is the accusative singular preceding the infinitive διδάσκειν. So the Æthiopic Version, and Œcumen., Lachm., Bleek, Ebrard, Lünem., and others. Ye ought to be teachers of others, but ye have need that some man (τινα) should teach you. Ye have not need that any one should teach you what the elements are (for ye know that well, by reason of the long time that ye have professed the Gospel); but ye have need that some one should teach you in them; should remind you of them, and so make you learn them, and hold them fast. This therefore I am now desirous to do.

This clause thus understood affords an easy transition to the commencement of the next chapter, which has been frequently misunderstood.

— τὰ στοιχεῖα] the rudiments or elements of the Christian Faith, which are enumerated in vi. 1, as long familiar to his readers.

— γεγόνατε] have become. Observe this repetition of the word from v. 11. He lays stress on the fact of their declension and degeneracy from their first standard of Christian faith, and thus prepares the way for the solemn declaration which he is about to make.

— στερεᾶς τροφῆς] solid food.

12—14.] St. Paul uses very similar language 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2.

13. νήπιος] a babe, opposed to τέλειος, one of mature age in Christ. Cp. Gal. iv. 3. 1 Cor. ii. 6; iii. 1; xiv. 20. Eph. iv. 14, with Col. i. 28. Eph. iv. 13.

14. πρὸς διάκρισιν καλοῦ τε καὶ κακοῦ] From the Hebrew יָדַע טוֹב וָרָע (yada tob vara), to discern good and evil. Gen. ii. 17. Deut. i. 39. Cp. Isa. vii. 15, 16. (Stuart.) Hence the absence of the article.

CH. VI. 1. Διό] Wherefore. Since you have been for so long a time admitted to the privileges of the Gospel, and ought therefore to be now advanced to the full ripeness (τελειότης, see above, v. 13, 14) of spiritual manhood; and since you will be in danger of reducing yourselves to the weakly and puny condition of spiritual childishness and infancy (νηπιότης), if you do not shake off that spiritual lethargy which now benumbs your senses; and since there is good reason to hope for God's grace and blessing on the efforts of persons, who, like yourselves, have brought forth the fruits of good works and labour of love towards His Name (v. 10); therefore let me now stir you up to awake from your slumber, and quicken your course. Cp. Chrys. and Theophyl. here, and Dr. W. H. Mill's Prælection on this passage, p. 11, Cantabrigiæ, 1843.

— ἀφέντες] having left; past tense. He supposes them to have long since started from the beginning (ἄφεσις) of the Christian race-course; and he urges them now to hasten their steps, and to run on (φέρεσθαι) to the goal of Christian Perfection.

1, 2. μὴ πάλιν θεμέλιον—αἰωνίου] not laying again the foundation of Repentance from dead works, and of Faith toward God, and of the Doctrine of Baptisms, and of Laying on of Hands, and of the Resurrection of the Dead, and of everlasting Judgment. St. Paul here enumerates the first Principles, or elementary Rudiments, of the Doctrine of Christ (v. 12), which the Hebrew Christians had been taught as Catechumens. He does this by way of reminding them of what they had already long since learnt, and so stimulates them, by a sense of shame, to awake from their lethargy.

Dead Works are Works done without lively Faith in Christ. See Bp. Beveridge and Prof. Browne on Art. XIII. on Works before Justification. They who receive the Christian Faith, they abhor such works as these; and exercising Repentance for them, come to Holy Baptism, and receive the Grace of the Holy Ghost by the Laying on of Hands, and receiving in Baptism the type of the Resurrection, wait for the Universal Resurrection of the Dead, and the Judgment to come. Theodoret. Cp. Augustine, de Fide, 20, et passim.

In your Baptism ye renounced the Devil, and professed Repentance from dead works; and by the Laying on of Hands ye received the Gift of the Holy Ghost. Chrysostom, Theophyl. See notes above, on Acts viii. 14—17; xix. 6.

2. βαπτισμῶν διδαχῆς] doctrine of Baptisms (or Washings): that is, the doctrine concerning the difference and superiority of the Baptism instituted by Christ, as compared with all other Baptisms.

The difficulty, which many persons have found in these words, will disappear, if it be considered that these words are not addressed to Gentiles, but to Jewish Christians.

In their elementary training, it had been requisite for their teachers to speak to them, not only of "the One Baptism" instituted by Christ, but also of Baptisms in the plural; in order that they might be able to distinguish between the Baptism they were to receive on their admission to the Church (the Baptism of Christ, to be administered once, for the remission of sins, to all of all nations in every age), and those other Baptisms with which they were familiar; such as the Baptism administered to Proselytes, and the Baptism lately administered in Judæa by John the Baptist (see Theodoret here, p. 579), which some persons among themselves might already have received; and in order that they might not confound Christian Baptism with those other Baptisms, or with any of the numerous and frequently reiterated βαπτισμοὶ, or washings and lustrations, of the Levitical Law (see Mark vii. 4. 8. Heb. ix. 10); or imagine that Christian Baptism could be repeated, or be succeeded by any other Baptism.

There was great danger in their case of such a confusion; and there was a great need therefore of careful discrimination, lest the Baptism of Christ should be only supposed to be like one of many other Baptisms; as is evident from the dispute about purifying in John iii. 28. 36 (where see note at end of the chapter), when the difference between Christ's Baptism and John's Baptism came into discussion; and see John iv. 1, 2; and compare the remarks of St. Paul himself, Acts xix. 4, discriminating Christian Baptism from that of John the Baptist.

b Matt. 12. 31, 45. ch. 10. 26, 27. 2 Pet. 2. 20. 1 John 4. 10. & 5. 16.

4 b Ἀδύνατον γὰρ τοὺς ἅπαξ φωτισθέντας, γευσαμένους τε τῆς δωρεᾶς τῆς ἐπουρανίου, καὶ μετόχους γενηθέντας Πνεύματος ἁγίου, 5 καὶ καλὸν γευσαμένους

Observe therefore, that St. Paul here not only uses the plural number, but he also uses the word βαπτισμὸς, which he never would have used, if he had been speaking only of the Christian Sacrament of Baptism, which is never called βαπτισμὸς, but always βάπτισμα, in the New Testament.

The reading in Col. ii. 12, where B, D*, F, G have βαπτισμῷ, is at least doubtful; and even if it be correct, then in that passage, the addition of the definite article τῷ serves to bring out distinctly Christian Baptism as the Baptism to be distinguished from all others.

On the different kind of Baptisms see Greg. Naz., Orat. xxxix. 17.

— ἐπιθέσεώς τε χειρῶν] and Laying on of Hands. The Apostle places Confirmation among the first Principles, or Fundamentals, of Christianity. "Impositionem manuum appellat, per quam plenissimè creditur accipi donum Spiritûs Sancti, quod post Baptismum, ad Confirmationem Unitatis in Ecclesiâ, à Pontificibus fieri solet." Primasius here. Cp. Bingham (xii. 6), and Dr. Mill's Prælection (p. 13), who refers to Theodoret's Commentary above cited, and observes, that "the Apostle's enumeration here is illustrated by the History of the Acts of the Apostles, which reveals, that, in the system of Apostolic Teaching, the first place was assigned to the Doctrine of Repentance, Faith, Baptism, Resurrection, Judgment (Acts ii. 32—41; x. 38. 47; xiii. 26—41; xvi. 30—33; xxiv. 24, 25; xxvi. 8. 22, 23), with the Gift of the Holy Ghost in Confirmation." (Acts viii. 14—17; xix. 5, 6.)

See also the candid avowal of the learned Lutheran Delitzsch here, who says, concerning Confirmation: "Can we suppose that the Apostolic writer of this Epistle would represent the Laying on of Hands, following after Baptism, as among the Fundamentals of Christianity, if it were not an holy Ordinance, and had not a divine promise annexed to it? And even though it be true, that not the Laying on of Hands, as such, but the Prayer which accompanies it, is the principal thing, is there not such a thing as a Prayer of Faith, under special circumstances, to which a special promise is made? (James v. 14, 15.) Unhappily, the Church of the present lacks many things, in comparison with the Church of the first century; but that deficiency will only become greater, if it forms thereon mere theories, not to say empty dreams." Delitzsch, Komment, p. 218.

Such language as this conveys a salutary admonition to the Church of England.

She, by God's blessing, possesses the Apostolic Rite of the Laying on of Hands, of which this pious writer speaks, and of which he regrets the loss. She has great reason to show her thankfulness to God by endeavouring to maintain it, and to communicate it to those who have it not.

Especially has she cause to pray and labeur, that by a provision of a sufficient number of chief Pastors for its due administration, her own children may not be deprived (as now they are to a very great degree) of that elementary spiritual blessing, which the holy Apostle reckons among "the first principles of the Doctrine of Christ." See above on Acts viii. 14—18.

— κρίματος αἰωνίου] everlasting Judgment: that sentence which will take effect for Eternity.

He does not say κρίσεως, but κρίματος, and combines it with the same word as is used by our Future Judge. Matt. xxv. 41. 46.

On the topics above specified, as holding the first place in the Teaching of the doctrine of Christ, see above, Introduction to the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, pp. iv. v., whence an argument arises in support of the Pauline origin of this Epistle.

3. ποιήσομεν] we will do. A, C, D, E have ποιήσωμεν, and so Lünemann. But the reading in the text, which is that of B, J, K, and is received by Tischendorf, seems preferable; and the o and ω are so often confused in MSS., that internal evidence is the best guide here. See above on 1 Cor. xv. 36. 49. Rom. v. 1.

4. Ἀδύνατον γὰρ—παραδειγματίζοντας] Having stated that they, who have been long since admitted to the privileges of the Gospel, ought not any longer to be children, but to grow in grace to the full stature of Christian maturity, he next displays the fearful consequences of falling back from Christ, and warns his readers of the danger, to which they will be exposed, of utter rejection, unless they proceed onward in their Christian course.

The difficulty which has been felt by some persons in apprehending the sense of these verses, may be cleared by observing—

(1) That the impossibility of renewal unto repentance, of which the Apostle speaks, is an impossibility on the part of man, but that nothing is impossible with God. Matt. xix. 26. Mark x. 27. Luke xviii. 27.

(2) That it is impossible to renew unto repentance the persons here described as ἀνασταυροῦντας, crucifying afresh the Son of God, and putting Him to open shame. That is, it is impossible for man to renew such persons unto repentance as long as they persevere in such a desperate course of wilful and presumptuous sin against the Son of God.

Observe, that the participles here used are in the present tense (ἀνασταυροῦντας, παραδειγματίζοντας). And this usage may be compared with that in x. 26, ἑκουσίως ἁμαρτανόντων κ.τ.λ., as long as we continue to sin wilfully, after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there is no more sacrifice for sin, but only a fearful looking for of Judgment. And we may also compare the phrase, There is joy over one sinner repenting (μετανοοῦντι), Luke xv. 7. 10; that is, there is joy over him when he ceases from sin, and turns to God by repentance. (See note there.) So the sense is here, It is impossible to reclaim the sinner when he is crucifying Christ afresh, i. e. as long as he continues to do so.

The present tense of these participles is to be noted the more carefully, because in the previous part of the paragraph the Apostle had used the aorist or past tense in the four other participles (φωτισθέντας, γευσαμένους, γενηθέντας, and twice παραπεσόντας); and by the change to the present tense he studiously marks that he is now speaking of a continued state, and not (as he had done before) of any single act.

(3) Observe also, that he uses throughout in this address the first person plural, and not the second person. He does not say, "Go ye on to perfection," but "Let us go on to perfection, not laying again the foundation;" which act of laying the foundation is an act of the Teacher even more than of the taught. And he adds, "This will we do, if the Lord permit."

(4) On the whole, then, the sense may be thus expressed. Ye have been for a long time believers in Christ. Ye have also been admitted to enjoy the blessed privileges of the Gospel. Ye might now be teachers of others (v. 12); but ye have become languid (v. 11, 12) and lukewarm in your Christian profession; ye have become dull of hearing; and ye have need that some one teach you the first principles of the doctrine of Christ (v. 12). Ye are in danger of falling back into spiritual infancy, instead of being what ye ought to be, mature and complete in Christ. Ye have reduced yourselves to the state of requiring milk, and not solid food (v. 12). This is a subject for grief and shame, both for you and me, for the teachers and for the taught.

Wherefore (διὸ) let us, having left behind us (as already taught and learnt) the first elementary principles of the doctrine of Christ, go forward to ripeness and perfectness of knowledge and faith. Let us not lay again the foundation. Let not me be reduced to toil in this work which has been already done; but let us all labour together in building up the spiritual superstructure. And this will we do with the help of God. We cannot hope to do it without His grace; but He freely offers it to us. Woe, therefore, to us if we do not do it. Woe to me if I do not endeavour now to arouse you; and woe to you if you do not listen to the warning which I now deliver. If you go not forward, you will go backward. You will fall away from Christ. And then it will be too late for me, or for any other human Teacher, to endeavour to arouse, and reclaim, and recover you in that desperate state. For it is impossible for any man to renew unto repentance those who have once been enlightened, particularly by that spiritual illumination vouchsafed to them at their φωτισμὸς, or Baptism (see on Eph. v. 8, and the Syriac Version here, which renders the word φωτισθέντας by baptized. Justin Martyr, i. 62. 65, and Theophyl., and other ancient expositors here; and cp. x. 32). It is impossible for any one to renew unto repentance those who have been enlightened, and have had the taste of the heavenly gift, and have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come; and who then, after all this spiritual nurture from God, have fallen aside from the right way. It is impossible, I say, for any human power to renew such persons unto repentance while they continue in such a state as this, crucifying to themselves afresh the Son of God, and putting Him to open shame.

In this clause we must notice the word γευσαμένους, twice used, in the former instance with the genitive case (δωρεᾶς ἐπου-ραυίου), in the latter with the accusative (ῥῆμα and δυνάμεις). Cp. John ii. 9.

The former denotes that they were admitted to have the taste of, that is, a spiritual perception of, and relish for, the sweetness of the heavenly gift, first bestowed upon them when they were illuminated and made partakers of the Holy Ghost.

The accusative signifies the regular habit of feeding on, as their daily bread. Cp. Kühner, § 526; Delitz. p. 227; and note above on Acts x. 10, ἤθελε γεύσασθαι. xx. 11.

There is a regular gradation and series from the words φωτισθέντας to δυνάμεις μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, i. e. from the mention of the initiatory illumination of the Sacrament of Baptism to the habitual communion with God in His Word and in the other Sacrament, and constant feeding upon them, and communion with the Powers of the World to come (see ii. 5), as opposed to the hostile Powers of the Devil, who has so great power in this World (see Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12); namely, those miraculous operations of the Spirit of Christ (cp. ii. 4. Gal. iii. 5) which have their beginnings here, but will be fully consummated hereafter.

6. παραπεσόντας] having fallen aside from the truth.

The word παραπίπτω is used by the LXX for Heb. מָעַל (maal). Cp. 2 Chron. xxix. 19, where the LXX represent the cognate Hebrew substantive by ἀποστασία.

— ἀνακαινίζειν πάλιν] to renew again; i. e. to renew, so as to bring back again to their original state.

— ἀνασταυροῦντας ἑαυτοῖς κ.τ.λ.] crucifying afresh, not to His injury, for He is now impassible, but to themselves and to their own perdition; and putting Him to open shame, by denying Him Whom they formerly confessed, and exposing Him as a Malefactor and Impostor to the malice and scorn of His enemies, especially in the City of Jerusalem, where He was crucified; and by doing this in a far more guilty and impious manner than was done by those who actually crucified Him, and reviled Him in the hour of His humiliation when hanging on the Cross, because this act of apostasy from Christ, and wilful resistance to His Grace, is done to Him Who has now manifested fully His Divine Majesty and Glory by His Resurrection and Ascension into Heaven, and by His sending the Holy Ghost from Heaven, and Who has incorporated us as members in Himself, and has given us the gift of the Holy Spirit; so that, in our case, Apostasy from Him is rebellion against the Son of God seated on His heavenly throne, and not hanging on the Cross on Calvary; and it is also a sin against the Holy Ghost. Cp. below, x. 26–31; xii. 14—17. 25. 29. 2 Pet. ii. 20—22.

Here we may see a terrible Malediction pronounced by Almighty God against those Nations of the Earth, which, having received the Gospel, do not make His Word the Rule of their Public Policy, and do not make the promotion of His Glory, and the advancement of His Kingdom, the main aims and ends of their Public Acts; but apostatize from Christ, now enthroned in Heaven King of Kings and Lord of Lords, and break His bonds asunder, and cast away His cords from them (Ps. ii. 3).

(1) For the History of Christian Doctrine, and

(2) For that of the Canon of Holy Scripture.

(1) It was used as an argument in favour of the rigid system of Montanus and Novatian (following Tertullian, de Pudic. c. 20), admitting only Remission of sins in Baptism, but denying Absolution to those who fell into sin after Baptism. See Cyprian, Epist. 55. Euseb. vi. 43. Ambrose, de Pœnitentiâ, ii. 2. Athanas. c. Serapion. iv., cited in Catenâ on St. Luke xii. 8. Epiphan. lix. μετὰ τὸ λουτρὸν μηκέτι ἐλεεῖσθαι δύνασθαι τὸν παραπεπτωκότα. Socrates, H. E. iv. 28. Cp. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. x. p. 685. Dr. W. H. Mill, Prælect. p. 18, and Bp. Beveridge and Professor Browne on the XVIth Article, "Of Sin after Baptism;" and note above on Acts viii. 20; and Routh, Reliquiæ, i. 367; iii. 13. 53; cp. vi. 410. 416, on this text.

(2) In the earlier stages of this controversy, the authority of this Epistle seems to have been questioned by some writers of the Western Church, on the erroneous supposition that the doctrine here enunciated could not have proceeded from St. Paul. See above, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 358, and Kirchhofer, Quellensammlung, pp. 240. 247, and the present Editor's Lectures on the Canon of Scripture, Lect. ix.

But in course of time the true sense of this passage was cleared and vindicated, and the Epistle recovered the place which it had originally held in the judgment of the Western Church, as is evident from the use made of it by the Apostolic Father, S. Clement, Bishop of Rome. In the Eastern Church its authority was never questioned. See above, Introduction to the Epistle, p. 355—7.

(3) This Text is also of great importance in regard to the Question concerning Final Perseverance. It clearly shows (against the upholders of the Calvinistic Scheme) that it is possible for those who have been once justified, to fall away totally and finally. See Dr. Hammond in Bp. Sanderson's Works, v. p. 330; and also the writers on Art. XVI.

Therefore this text is to be defended against the misinterpretation of the Montanists and Novatians on the one hand, who deny the "grant of repentance to such as fall into deadly sin after Baptism;" and against the dangerous misconstructions of later sectaries on the other, who say, that after they have received "the gift of the Holy Ghost they can no more sin as long as they live here;" and that if once they have felt an inward assurance of God's favour, and of their own predestination to life, they cannot fail of salvation.

St. Paul's own dealings with the incestuous Corinthians (see on 1 Cor. v. 5), and with Hymenæus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20), afford the best expositions of his mind in this passage.

(4) This text also teaches the need of constant and heartfelt Repentance for the sins committed against the Law of Nature, Reason, and Conscience, and against the clear Light of the Gospel, and the supernatural gifts, and graces, and heavenly motions of God the Holy Ghost, stirring our hearts and speaking within us; sins therefore to be bewailed with proportionate shame, poignant sorrow, and godly fear, lest God should hide His Face from us, and cast us off in our sin; and lest the Holy Spirit, Whom we have resisted, provoked, and grieved, should leave us to ourselves, and to the dominion of the Evil Spirit, whose works we have done in disobedience to Christ, Who has purchased us with His own Blood; and with fervent yearnings and prayers accompanied with practical proofs of contrition by works meet for Repentance, in order that we may obtain the mercy and pardon of Him, Who alone can cleanse us from our sins, and restore us to the favour of God.

7. Γῆ] Land, any piece of ground; not 'the earth.'

— ἡ πιοῦσα] that has drunk in; as you have in your Baptism, and in the other means of Grace.

— εὔθετον ἐκείνοις δι' οὓς καὶ γεωργεῖται] serviceable for those (viz. God and Christ) for whose sake it is also tilled by us, the husbandmen in the vineyard.

There is a reference here to the practice of letting out land to Husbandmen (γεωργοῖς), who were bound to till (γεωργεῖν) the land let, and to make a payment for the use of it, from its fruits (καρποὶ), to the Landlord, for whose benefit (δι' ὃν) it was cultivated. See Matt. xxi. 33—41. Mark xii. 2, and note on Luke xvi. 6. Luke xx. 10. God is the universal Landlord, for whom the Whole Earth is tilled; and all men are γεωργοὶ under Him, and owe Him the fruits thereof.

9. τὰ κρείσσονα] the better things. Cp. Luke x. 42, τὴν ἀγαθὴν μερίδα.

— ἐχόμενα σωτηρίας] clinging hold of salvation. He thus prepares the way for the metaphor of the Anchor of Hope in v. 19. On ἔχεσθαι = to hold oneself on to, to cleave to, to be near, see on Mark i. 38. Acts xxi. 26.

guage of two acknowledged Epistles of St. Paul. See 2 Thess. i. 3, and 2 Cor. viii. 24; ix. 1. Col. i. 14.

10. οὐ γὰρ ἄδικος] Having worked on their feeling of shame (v. 12; vi. 1—3), and of fear (vi. 4—8), he now proceeds to encourage them with hope, grounded on faith in the equity of God remembering their good works in relieving the needs of their poorer brethren.

Before τῆς ἀγάπης Elz. has τοῦ κόπου, not in A, B, C, D*, E*.

— διακονήσαντες τοῖς ἁγίοις] having ministered to the Saints, probably the poor Christians at Jerusalem and in Judæa, who were exposed to special dangers and difficulties, and suffered special afflictions, consequent on their position. See on Acts ii. 44; xi. 28—30. Gal. ii. 10. Cp. 1 Cor. xvi. 1. 2 Cor. viii. 4. 9. Rom. xv. 25, πορεύομαι εἰς Ἰερουσαλὴμ διακονῶν τοῖς ἁγίοις. And cp. note above on iii. 1.

11. τὴν αὐτὴν—σπουδήν] the same earnestness. We earnestly desire that each one of you would show forth the same earnestness and zeal for the full assurance of your own Hope of everlasting Salvation unto the end, as you have done in the work of Love for the relief of the temporal wants of your poorer brethren.

12. ἵνα μὴ νωθροὶ γένησθε] that you may not become sluggish in Hope, as you have become in spiritual intelligence. See v. 11.

13. Τῷ γὰρ Ἀβραάμ] Look to Abraham, your Father; follow his faith and patience. And, for your own comfort, remember that the promise which God made to him He made with an oath (Gen. xxii. 16. Luke i. 73), and made it to his seed, namely, to you, as well as to Abraham himself; and that Abraham, having quitted his own country at God's command, hoping against hope, and, in spite of many difficulties, remaining stedfast unto the end, at length, after waiting patiently for many hundred years, obtained the promises, first of the land of Canaan, and next of the coming of Christ (cp. John viii. 26), and so became a pattern to you his children. Therefore imitate him.

14. Ἦ μήν] The MSS. here have three various readings, εἰ μή, εἰ μήν, and ἦ μήν. Of these three, εἰ μή, unless (= Heb. אִם לֹא, im lo), which is a form frequent in assertions in the LXX, is to be explained on the same principle as εἰ in iii. 11; iv. 3: that is, May I no longer be called true, unless I bless thee. And from this formula εἰ μή, and from the direct assertion ἦ μήν, Verily (Gen. xxii. 16, 17), seems to have arisen the third composite variety, εἰ μήν, which is found here in A, B, D. The LXX have ἦ μήν in the place to which St. Paul is referring. (Gen. xxii. 17.)

16. καὶ πάσης αὐτοῖς ἀντιλογίας—ὁ ὅρκος] and of all controversy to them, an end for confirmation and assurance, is an Oath. A very important text in reference to the theological question concerning the nature and obligation of Oaths. See above on Matt. v. 34.

17. Ἐν ᾧ] On which principle, or in which respect. Cp. Winer, p. 346.

— ἐμεσίτευσεν ὅρκῳ] intervened, as a Mediator, with an Oath, between Himself and Abraham.

If the covenant had been between a man and Abraham, the man who was a covenanting party would have called God to witness, that what he, the covenanting party, promised to Abraham, was true.

Almighty God, therefore, condescending to Abraham, and conforming Himself to human usage with regard to oaths, called, as it were, Himself to Witness, and so He came between Abraham and Himself with an Oath, for greater assurance to Abraham.

18. διὰ δύο πραγμάτων] through two things; i. e. the Promise and the Oath. Theodoret.

— ἐν οἷς ἀδύνατον ψεύσασθαι Θεόν] Οὐδὲν ἀδύνατον παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ, εἰ μὴ τὸ ψεύσασθαι. Clem. Rom. 27.

— παράκλησιν] comfort.

— τῆς προκειμένης ἐλπίδος] the Hope lying before us. Not the thing hoped for, but the Hope itself, the Christian Grace.

The sense of the whole is, God, desiring to show more abundantly to us, the heirs of the Promise, the immutability of His Counsels, intervened between Abraham and Himself with an Oath, in order that by means of two things, in which it was not possible for Him, Who is God, to lie, we, who have fled, as it were, for refuge from a Storm, to take hold of the Hope lying before us, as of an Anchor laid out of the Ship in which we are, the vessel of the Church, may have strong comfort.

The Metaphor is evidently derived from Navigation. The Apostle represents himself and other Christians, as Mariners in a Ship tossed in a tempest, such as that through which he himself had passed in his voyage toward Rome; and as laying out Anchors by cables from the ship, so as to steady her in the storm, and to prevent her from falling upon rocks. See note on Acts xxvii. 29, 30, where the words ἀγκύρας ἐκτείνειν, to lay out anchors from the Ship, afford the best illustration of the phrase προκειμένην ἐλπίδα here, i. e. the Hope laid out as an Anchor by cables from the Ship.

This metaphor from Navigation is quite in harmony with the manner and usage of the Apostle St. Paul, who had now made so many voyages in his missionary labours (cp. 2 Cor. xi. 25, written some years before), and often derives his illustrations from maritime affairs (see on Acts xx. 20, and above, 2 Thess. ii. 2; iii. 6. 2 Cor. viii. 20); and it confirms the belief of the Pauline origin of this Epistle.

Hope is represented on Ancient Coins by the symbol of an Anchor. Westein: and see Blomf. on Æschyl. Ag. 488, πολλῶν βαγεισῶν ἐλπίδων μιᾶς τυχών. Porson, Eur. Orest. 68.

19. ἣν ὡς ἄγκυραν κ.τ.λ.] which Hope we have as an Anchor of the Soul, unfailing, and stedfast, and reaching, as it were, by a cable laid out of the Ship, and not descending downward to an earthly bottom beneath the troubled waters of this world, but, what no earthly Anchor can do, extending upward above the pure abysses of the liquid sea of pure ether, and stretching by a heavenward cable even into the calm depths and solid moorings of the waveless harbour of Heaven, whither our Forerunner Jesus has entered, and to Whom the Church clings with the tenacious grasp of Faith (see on John xx. 17), as a Vessel is moored by a cable or an Anchor firmly grounded in the stedfast soil at the bottom of the sea.

Christ, our Forerunner, has carried our nature above the skies.

The Jewish High Priest went alone into the Holy of Holies, and had no followers. But Christ, our High Priest and Head, is gone into the Heavenly Oracle; and where our Head is, there the Members are already in Hope, and will be for ever in deed.

By means of Christ's Ascension we have cast anchor—the Anchor of Hope—in heaven.

The Anchor, of which the Apostle speaks, with its cable stretched upward from earth, and firmly grounded in Heaven, and safely mooring the Bark of the Church riding on the billows of this world, and tossed by the Storms of Earth, is indeed a bold metaphorical figure of Christian Hope: but his readers would be indeed νωθροί, if they did not acknowledge its beauty. It has been well paraphrased by two earlier Commentators, quoted by Delitz. p. 259: "Nostram ancoram mittimus ad interiora cœli, sicut ancora ferrea mittitur ad inferiora maris" (Sedulius). "Spem nobis à cœlo porrexit Christus tanquam funem à throno Dei ad nos usque demissum ac pertingentem, et rursus à nobis penetrantem usque ad interiora cœlorum et Dei sedem" (Faber Stapulensis).

Compare the examples of the figurative language of Ancient Christian Writers, derived from the equipments of a ship, in the note above on Acts xxvii. 40.

— τοῦ καταπετάσματος] the Inner Veil which separated the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place (Exod. xxvi. 31—35; xxvii. 21. Levit. xxi. 23. Numb. iv. 5. See Matt. xxvii. 51. Philo, de Vit. Mosis, iii. pp. 667. 669), through which the High Priest alone passed once a year with blood (Levit. xvi. 2), which he sprinkled on the Mercy-seat on the Great Day of Atonement, on which, though it was a day of Humiliation, the Jubilee (whenever it occurred) was to be proclaimed (Levit. xxv. 9); and thus typified Christ, the true High Priest, passing from this World, which was typified by the Courts of the Temple, into the Heavenly Holy of Holies, where God sits enthroned. See below, ix. 1—12. Joseph. Ant. Jud. iii. 7. 7, where the Author dwells on the typical character of the Tabernacle. Compare Primasius here, and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. vi. p. 505, and the valuable work of Mather on the Types, p. 450, Lond. 1705.

20. κατὰ τὴν τάξιν Μελχισεδέκ] according to the order of Melchizedek. The writer here returns from his digression on the sin and danger of Apostasy, to the argument introduced in connexion with the main topic of the Epistle, concerning the Priesthood of Christ, as typified by Melchizedek, and so, superior to the Levitical Priesthood (v. 10).

It has been well observed, that there is in the style of St. Paul a characteristic species of digression, which Dr. Paley calls "going off at a word" (on Eph v. 12—15). Examples of it occur in 1 Cor. xv. 27. 2 Cor. ii. 14. Eph. iv. 8—11. Forster, p. 379.

There is a similar episode here: and also in ii. 7—9; iii. 2; xii. 18—29.

The mention of their spiritual insensibility had started a train of thoughts in his mind concerning the fearful sin and punishment of Apostasy, which had hurried him aside by the violence of its current; but he now returns to the point from which he had digressed.

This sudden transition, by which he is carried from the main stream of his argument, shows in a forcible manner the vehemence of his own emotions, and the overwhelming importance of the subject by which he was so powerfully affected.

The digression and return here, are (as Dr. W. H. Mill has observed, Prælect. p. 10) entirely in the manner of St. Paul, and confirm the ascription of the Epistle to him.

CH. VII. 1. Οὗτος γὰρ ὁ Μελχισεδέκ] For this Melchizedek, King of Salem, Priest of the Most High God.

The Apostle proves the superiority of Christ's Priesthood to that of the Levitical Dispensation, by Christ's relation to Melchizedek, as declared by God Himself—the Lord sware, and will not repent; Thou art a Priest for ever after the Order of Melchizedek—in Ps. cx. 4.

That Psalm was written when the Ark of the Covenant, and the seat of government, had been brought to Mount Sion (v. 2), from which His Kingdom was to be extended. David had then received the promise through Nathan of the eternal duration of his Seed. (2 Sam. vii. 12—16.)

Christ, as Universal King, and as Conqueror of all His enemies, and as seated at God's right hand, is the subject of the Psalm. But this Universal King and Conqueror is also a Priest for ever—not after the order of Aaron, but after the order of Melchizedek. And this everlasting Priesthood is assured to Him by God with an Oath.

The Psalm opens with a declaration of Christ's Divinity, in the words, My LORD, as expounded by Christ Himself (Matt. xxii. 44, 45). It proclaims Him as a Judge and a Conqueror (vv. 5, 6), and no less clearly proclaims His Manhood and His sufferings, as His path to Glory. He shall drink of the brook in the way, therefore shall He lift up His head (v. 7).

This Psalm, therefore, is one of the most comprehensive prophecies of the Messiah contained in Holy Writ. Our Lord attests that it was written by the Holy Ghost, and there is no portion of the Old Testament so often quoted in the New. Cp. Hengstenberg on Ps. cx.

The question here arises—Who was MELCHIZEDEK?

Melchizedek was not Christ Himself (as has been supposed by some), for he is said to have been made like to Christ (v. 3), and no one is like himself.

Nor was he (as some have imagined) the Holy Spirit, nor an Angel; for he was a Priest, and Every Priest is taken from among men (v. 1).

Besides, Melchizedek had a local residence at Salem. Cp. Cyril, in Catenâ, p. 525, and Epiphanius, on the Heresy of the Melchizedecians, Hæres. lv.

Nor was he Shem (as has been said by some), for Shem has a genealogy recorded in Scripture; but Melchizedek is without any such pedigree (v. 3).

All that is known of Melchizedek personally, is contained in Gen. xiv. 18—20, where he appears, as it were, suddenly, as King of Salem, bringing forth Bread and Wine, and pronouncing a blessing on Abram in the Name of the Most High God; and praising God for Abram's victory over the Kings; and Abram gives him tithes of all.

In what respects was Melchizedek a type of CHRIST?

(1) As a King; and in the names he bore as such, viz. Melchi-zedek (מַלְכִּי־צֶדֶק) = King of Righteousness, and also King of Salem (שָׁלֵם) = King of Peace.

So Christ is the Lord our Righteousness (Jer. xxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16. Cp. Ps. xlv. 6, 7. 2 Cor. v. 21), and the Prince of Peace. Cp. Isa. ix. 6; xxxii. 17.

(2) As also a Priest (Gen. xiv. 18) anointed with oil after the Levitical ordinance, but yet "a Priest of the Most High God." So Christ.

(3) Melchi-zedek was distinguished from the Aaronical Priests, as being also a King. They had no royal power. And the Jewish Kings might not intermeddle with the Priest's office. Uzziah was smitten with leprosy for doing so (2 Chron. xxvi. 18—21). But Melchizedek was both a King and Priest. And so is Christ.

(4) As "Priest of the Most High God, Possessor of Heaven and Earth," not for any particular nation, as the Levitical Priests were; but for all nations; and as blessing Abram the "Father of the Faithful," in whose Seed "all Nations are blessed;" and as blessing him before he had received Circumcision.

So Christ is the One Universal Priest of all Nations and Ages of the World, and blesses them.

(5) In not offering the bloody sacrifices of slain animals, but in bringing forth Bread and Wine (Gen. xiv. 18), the fruit of the soil, for the refreshment of Abram and his people. Cp. Philo-Judæus, Sacr. Leg. Allegor. ii. p. 106.

So Christ is ever bringing forth Bread and Wine; He is ever refreshing His faithful people in the Holy Sacrament of His most Holy Body and Blood, by means of the Creatures of Bread and Wine which He has appointed and instituted for that purpose. Cp. Cyprian, ad Cæcilium, Ep. lxiii. Clemens Alex., Stromata, iv. 25, p. 637, Potter. Tertullian, adv. Judæos, c. 3. Dean Jackson on the Creed, ix. c. x. Dr. Waterland's Charge on the Distinctions of Sacrifice, § 11, who says that the most ancient Fathers of the Christian Church regarded Melchizedek as giving to Abraham holy food,—a symbol of the true food from heaven, and a prelude to what our Lord Himself would afterwards do in the institution of the Holy Eucharist. See also Professor Blunt, Early Fathers, p. 565.

(6) As blessing Abram, and so exercising a spiritual pre-eminence over him and his seed; and as receiving Tithes, in token of homage, and in recognition of his Priesthood, from Abram; and in him from Levi himself, and from the Levitical Priesthood who would afterwards proceed from his loins.

So Christ, the Great Universal Everlasting High Priest, in ascending from this world into heaven, lifted up His Hands over the Apostles, the Heads and Patriarchs of the Spiritual Israel, ὑψίστου, ὁ συναντήσας Ἀβραὰμ ὑποστρέφοντι ἀπὸ τῆς κοπῆς τῶν βασιλέων, καὶ εὐλογήσας αὐτὸν, [2] ᾧ καὶ δεκάτην ἀπὸ πάντων ἐμέρισεν Ἀβραὰμ, πρῶτον and blessed them, and so was parted from them (Luke xxiv. 50, 51), and He ever liveth in heaven as our Priest to make intercession for us. (Heb. vii. 25.)

And He claims our homage and the offering of our substance in recognition of His Priesthood, for His honour and service, and for the maintenance of His Ministry. See on Gal. vi. 6. 1 Cor. ix. 4.

(7) In that shadow of Eternity which the Holy Spirit in the Book of Genesis casts upon him. Unlike other great personages in the early records of Holy Writ, Melchizedek is introduced without any previous notice of his ancestry, or subsequent commemoration of his progeny. He stands alone. There is no mention of his father or mother, of his birth or death. He, the King of Righteousness and of Peace, appears only once for all, in the Volume of God's Word. He has no Predecessor or Successor; he has remained a Priest for ever; he has a typical Eternity. Chrys., Theophyl., Œcumen. Cp. Jackson on the Creed, Vol. viii. p. 232. So Christ. In so far as He is a Priest He has no pedigree; but He remaineth a Priest for ever.

The Holy Spirit speaks only once in Holy Scripture concerning Melchizedek and his Priesthood; so Christ offered Himself once for all (Primasius); and by offering Himself on the cross, and by entering into the true Holy of Holies with His own Blood, He exhausted all the legal sacrifices of the Aaronical Priesthood, and became both Priest and Victim for all, even to the end of time (cp. Tertullian c. Jud. c. 14, and c. Marcion. v. 9); and also being made perfect through sufferings, He was inaugurated and enthroned as King of the world at the Right Hand of God, where He now sitteth till all His enemies are made His footstool. (Ps. cx. 1.)

On this subject see the exposition of Chrys., Theodoret, and Theophyl. here; and Cyril Hierosol. (Caten. p. 144), and the interesting discourse of S. Cyril of Alexandria in Catenâ, p. 524—545.

— βασιλεὺς Σαλήμ] King of Salem. Another question occurs here.

Where is SALEM, of which Melchizedek was King?

(1) Many learned Expositors have maintained that it is the same place as Jerusalem.

This opinion is supported by the authority of ancient Hebrew and some Christian Interpreters.

See Joseph. (Ant. i. 10. 2), and the authorities quoted by Jerome (Ep. 126, ad Evagrium, Vol. ii. p. 570), who however was not persuaded of the truth of that opinion. Cp. Wetstein, in Smith's Dict. of Geog. ii. p. 17. Winer, R. W. B. ii. p. 78. Mill's Prælect. p. 32, and Lünemann here.

(2) But this opinion seems liable to grave objections. Jerusalem is never called Salem in the Book of Genesis, nor in any of the historical books of the Old Testament.

Nor does Jerusalem appear to have been called Salem in the Patriarchal times, or before the age of David. Its ancient name was not Jerusalem, but Jebus (Judges xix. 10, 11. Josh. xviii. 16. 28), and the Jebusites continued to dwell in it during the time of the Judges; and it was not finally taken from them till the time of David. (Cp. Josh. xi. 3; xv. 63. Judges i. 8. 21; xix. 10. 2 Sam. v. 6.) We do not find the word Salem applied to Jerusalem till the age of David, and that only once (Ps. lxxvi. 2),—not in history, but poetry,—if, indeed, it means Jerusalem there, which is not certain.

It is not surprising, that later Jewish Historians and Targumists should desire to identify the Salem of Melchizedek with Jerusalem.

But they are not trustworthy in such a matter as this. It is remarkable, that in their jealousy of the Samaritans they endeavoured to deprive Sichem in Samaria of the bones of the Patriarchs. (See on Acts vii. 16.)

And if Salem was in Samaria, then, under the influence of the same spirit, they would be ready to rob it also of Melchizedek, so eminent a type of Christ.

(3) Melchizedek was not priest of the Jews, nor of any particular family, but "of the Most High God, the Possessor of heaven and earth," the universal Father of all; and he was a type of Christ, not as a priest of the Jewish race after the order of Aaron, but as the Everlasting Priest and Universal King of all.

In this respect, it would not seem fitting, that Melchizedek should have been connected with the Jewish capital Jerusalem, where the Aaronical Priesthood ministered, and where the Levitical sacrifices were offered. It would seem to be more appropriate, that he should have been associated with some other place, especially some place which might be regarded as a Gentile Jerusalem,—a religious sanctuary of all nations.

The surest method of arriving at the truth in this matter, is to examine what place is called Salem in that portion of the sacred record which alone records the history of Melchizedek,—namely, the Book of Genesis.

(4) In that Book he is not called King of Jebus, the ancient Jerusalem, nor does he present himself to Abram, near the site of that city.

In that Book, the name Salem (שָׁלֵם), in LXX Σαλήμ, as here, occurs twice: once in the history of Abram and Melchizedek, — the passage referred to by the Apostle here, Gen. xiv. 18.

Again, in the history of Abraham's grandson Jacob (Gen. xxiii. 18), where it is said that he came to Salem, near Sichem, and bought a parcel of field there, and built an altar there, and called it El-Elohe-Israel.

(5) Therefore the Salem of the Book of Genesis appears to have been at, or near, Sichem. And it is called Sichem by S. Jerome, who lived in Palestine: "Salem civitas Sicimorum quæ est Sichem." See also Dr. Robinson's Biblical Researches in Palestine, who describes a site still called Salim, not far from Sichem, in the following words (Vol. iii. sect. xiv.): "Shechem was a very ancient place, though we do not find it mentioned as a city until the time of Jacob. Abraham indeed first came, in the land of Canaan, 'unto the place of Shechem, unto the plain of Moreh' (Gen. xii. 6); and Jacob, on his return from Padan-Aram, came to Shalim, a city of Shechem, 'and pitched his tent before' (east of) the latter city. This corresponds to the present village of Sâlim, which lies east of Nâblus, across the great plain. In this plain the Patriarch encamped, and purchased the 'parcel of ground' still marked by his well and the traditional tomb of Joseph. The whole valley of Nâblus is full of fountains, irrigating it most abundantly, and for that very reason not flowing off in any large stream. The valley is rich, fertile, and beautifully green, as might be expected from this bountiful supply of water. The sides of the valley too, the continuation of Gerizim and Ebal, are studded with villages, some of them large, and these again are surrounded with extensive tilled fields and olive-groves; so that the whole valley presents a more beautiful and inviting landscape of green hills and dales than perhaps any other part of Palestine. It is the deep verdure arising from the abundance of water which gives it this peculiar charm,—in the midst of a land where no rain falls in summer, and where of course the face of nature, in the season of heat and drought, assumes a brown and dreary aspect."

(6) Now, as has been shown before (in the note on Acts vii. 16, and on John iv. 5), this place, Sichem or Sychar, is the most remarkable of all the sites mentioned in the Old Testament in connexion with the History of the Patriarchs.

There it was, that "the Most High God" vouchsafed to make His first manifestation of Himself to Abram, when that Patriarch came into Canaan. See Gen. xii. 6, 7.

There it was, that Abram built his first altar to God.

There it was, that he purchased a plot of ground for a burial-place. (Acts vii. 16, and note.)

Sichem also was the first place, to which Jacob repaired, after his return from his banishment.

There also it was, that he purchased a plot of ground, and built an altar, which he called El-Elohe-Israel. (Gen. xxxiii. 18—20.)

There it was, that Joseph and his brethren were buried,—even in preference to Machpelah or Hebron, the burial-place of Abraham.

St. Stephen lays special stress on that circumstance, as showing that the God of Abraham designed to reveal Himself to all nations, and to sanctify all places by His presence. (See note on Acts vii. 16.)

Finally (which is very important to be observed), when the Everlasting WORD of God took our flesh, and dwelt among us, He came to the same place in which Jehovah had revealed Himself to Abraham. It was at Sichem, that Christ chose to make the first revelation of Himself as the MESSIAH, or Anointed One of God, —the Priest and King of all people. He there manifested Himself as such to a woman, a Samaritan woman; a woman who had had many husbands; a woman, however, who hearkened to Christ, and professed her faith in Him, and brought her own fellow-citizens to Christ; a woman, therefore, who has always been regarded by ancient Christian Expositors as a signal type of the Church Universal,—coming to Christ from the Gentiles, and from the lords many of Heathenism, and believing in Him Whom the Jews rejected, and as bringing the world to Christ. See above on John iv. 7. 26—42.

There it was,—at Sichem, where God first showed Himself to Abram in Canaan, and where Abram had built his first altar,—that the Son of God declared that "the hour was coming when not at Jerusalem only, nor on that mountain Gerizim, but in all places, men should worship the Father." (John iv. 21.)

There it was, near the plot of ground which Jacob gave to Joseph, and where he dug a well of water (John iv. 5, 6. 12), that He revealed Himself as the true source of Living Water to all nations. (John iv. 10—14.)

There He proclaimed the truth of the prophecy, that "from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same," God's name should be great among the Gentiles, and in every place incense should be offered unto His name, and a pure offering; for My name shall be great among the Heathen, saith the Lord of Hosts. (Mal. i. 11.)

We need not therefore travel beyond the limits of the Book of Genesis for the site of Salem, of which Melchizedek was king.

He was king of that place which is called Salem in that book. And the facts mentioned in that book, that Sichem was near Salem, and that Abram had received a revelation from Jehovah at Sichem, and had erected an altar there, explain the circumstance that Abram was well known to Melchizedek, king of Salem, which was in the neighbourhood of Sichem, and that he therefore came out to bless Abram. And there is something of special interest in this circumstance, as showing that Melchizedek, the Priest of the Most High God, did not look on Abram as an intruder, and on his altar as schismatical, but acknowledged Abram's God as his own God, and blessed Abram as a worshipper of that God, Whose Priest he himself was.

He by his own name was King of Righteousness, and was king of a City whose name is Peace, and he was Priest of the Most High God. He brought forth Bread and Wine, and blessed Abram, the Father and Representative of the Faithful of every age, returning from victory over heathen kings; and received from him Tithes of the spoil, in homage and acknowledgment of his Priesthood. He did all this to Abram, as Father of all true believers, before Abram was circumcised. He did this near that same place which the Most High God Himself had chosen in order to make the first manifestation of Himself to Abram,—not at Jerusalem, but Sichem. He did this, near that place at which Abram built his first altar, and which was the first to which Jacob came after his return from Padan-Aram, and to which the bones of the twelve Patriarchs,—the types of the twelve Apostles, and of the Universal Church of Christ,—were brought out of Egypt, and where they still rest in peace.

Melchizedek did these things near that place, to which He, of Whom he was a type, Jesus Christ, the Lord our Righteousness, the true Prince of Peace, came from Judæa, and in which He made the first revelation of Himself as the Messias,—not to the Jews, but to a Samaritan Woman, the type of the Gentile Church, which is to be gathered from all Nations, and which looks for Righteousness and Peace alone from Him Who is our Righteousness and Peace.

Melchizedek blessed Abram in that place, where the true Melchizedek lifted up His hands and blessed all Nations, and invited them all to Himself, by proclaiming that He has spiritual refreshment for all true Israelites; that whosoever drinketh of the water that He will give, shall never thirst, but the Water that He will give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life (John iv. 14); and by declaring, that God is a Spirit, present every where, and that He seeketh true worshippers not at Jerusalem merely (as the Jews supposed), nor at Gerizim, but in every place; and that He Himself is the promised Messias, the Anointed One of God, the King, the Priest, the Prophet, the World's Everlasting Melchizedek. He it is, in Whom alone all the seed of Abraham are blessed; it is He Who stretches His divine hands from Heaven over them all, and blesses them. He it is, Who is ever feeding them all with Bread and Wine. He it is Who ever liveth to make intercession for them; He, Who brought forth from the hearts and lips of those who heard Him at Sichem that good confession, "We have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the World" (John iv. 42).

3. ἀπάτωρ, ἀμήτωρ] without father, and without mother, recorded in Holy Scripture. So Sara is called ἀμήτωρ by Philo (i. 365), because her mother's name is not mentioned in the Bible. As man, Christ has no father; and as God, Christ has no mother. See the preceding notes on this chapter.

— ἀγενεαλόγητος] without genealogy. Melchizedek has no pedigree in Holy Writ. In this respect he differs from the Levitical Priests, who derive their lineage from Aaron, and are studious to prove it. He has no predecessor or successor in his priesthood in Scripture. So Christ. Who shall declare His generation? See Acts viii. 33.

On the mode of arguing here used by the Apostle, it is to be observed, that the Hebrew Rabbis rightly inferred, that there is something significant in what is not said, as well as in what is said, in Holy Scripture. There is eloquence in its silence. There is inspiration in its secrecy and reserve. Thus the absence of any scriptural mention of the death of Cain was construed into an intimation of the duration of evil in this world. (Philo, i. 555.) Thus also the absence of any mention of an evening of the Seventh day has been regarded as an intimation of the duration of the Sabbath of Eternity. See Augustine, Serm. 4, and de Civit. Dei, ad finem.

The Apostle expressly declares here that there was a divine meaning in the Silence of Scripture, not recording the birth, parentage, and death of Melchizedek, as compared with the Priests of the line of Aaron, and that this silence prophesies of Christ.

This important Apostolic declaration opens to our view a new field of biblical research—the Inspiration of the Silence of Scripture. This is a subject which deserves careful consideration. It will, perhaps, be one of the blessed employments of a higher state of existence to recognize and admire the Wisdom of God, not only in what He has revealed in His Holy Word, but also in what He has kept secret from men on earth, in order that He may unfold it to them in heaven.

— εἰς τὸ διηνεκές] continually; extending forwards perpetually. See x. 12. διηνεκὲς (from διὰ and ἐνείκω, ἐνέγκω) ἐπιμηκές, Etym. Mag. in Ps. xlviii. 15, where the LXX have εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. Symmachus has εἰς τὸ διηνεκές.

Melchizedek abides a Priest continually, because he stands alone in Scripture, without any mention of any successor in his Priesthood; and because his Priesthood is continued in the Priesthood of Christ, Who ever liveth to make intercession for us.

4. πηλίκος] how great. See Gal. vi. 11.

— καὶ δεκάτην] even a tithe.

— ἐκ τῶν ἀκροθινίων] from the prime spoils; i. e. the 'spolia opima,' regarded as first-fruits, the best and chiefest spoils, which fell to the share of Abram and the kings as captains of the host. Τὰ τοῦ πολέμου ἀριστεῖα, καὶ τὰς τῆς νίκης ἀπαρχάς. Philo, in Caten. p. 549.

— ὁ πατριάρχης] Observe the measured rhythm of the sentence, and the gravity and dignity of its structure, reserving the last place for the emphatic words ὁ πατριάρχης. Cp. the similar instances in St. Stephen's speech, Acts vii. 16. 43.

5. Καὶ οἱ μὲν ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν Λευὶ] St. Paul is declaring the various points in which the Levitical Priesthood was inferior to that of Melchizedek.

(1) They tithe their brethren, those of the same family and rank.

But Melchizedek tithed Abram, the Patriarch of the whole Jewish race. See v. 8.

(2) The Levitical Priests are mortal.

But Melchizedek's Priesthood is immortalized in Christ.

(3) Melchizedek tithed the Levitical Priesthood itself in Abram.

6. δεδεκάτωκε—εὐλόγηκε] hath tithed, and hath blessed. Cp. v. 9, δεδεκάτωται. Observe this use of the perfect tense, intimating that the act was done by Melchizedek, but its effect remains for ever in Christ typified by Melchizedek. See on v. 8.

Such seems to be the force of that tense here. See on 1 Cor. xv. 4. Cp. 2 Cor. i. 19. Col. i. 16. 1 Tim. vi. 17. Cp. Winer, who gives, however, a somewhat different interpretation of the present text.

8. μαρτυρούμενος ὅτι ζῇ] attested (in Holy Scripture) that He liveth; that is, is not dead officially, as other Priests die, who are made after the order of Aaron, but liveth for ever. Christ, Who is made after the order of Melchizedek, and so, as it were, continues for ever the sacerdotal life and functions of Melchizedek.

9. ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν] so to speak; 'ut ita dicam;' a phrase used to soften and qualify what may seem a paradox. Chrys., Theophyl.

10. ἔτι ἐν τῇ ὀσφύϊ τοῦ πατρὸς ἦν] Levi was as yet in the loins of his father Abram when he was blessed by Melchizedek; for Isaac had not yet been born or conceived. Theodoret.

11. ἐπ' αὐτῆς] in its time, and under its influence and sway. On this use of ἐπὶ, see on Mark ii. 26; and above, i. 2, ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν. 1 Pet. i. 20. 2 Pet. iii. 3.

Elz. has αὐτῇ, but αὐτῆς is in A, B, C, D*, E*, and is received by Lach., Bleek, Tisch., Lünemann.

— νενομοθέτηται] has received the Law. Cp. viii. 6. Matt. xi. 5, πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται. Winer, § 39, p. 333. Elz. has νενομόθητο, but the reading in the text is in A, B, C, D*, and so Lachm., Bleek, Tisch., Lünemann.

— τίς ἔτι χρεία] what need would there have been any longer for that which the Holy Spirit, speaking by David, who lived under the Law, declared to be needful, namely, that a different (ἕτερον) Priest should arise, according to a different order from that of Aaron?

— οὐ—λέγεσθαι] to be called not according to the order of Aaron, but of Melchizedek. The negative οὐ is not to be joined with the infinitive, but with the words immediately following it, which it denies. Cp. Winer, p. 428.

12. μετατιθεμένης γὰρ τῆς ἱερωσύνης] For when the Priesthood is being changed (observe the tense), a change also of the Law takes place, because the Law limits the Priesthood to the family of Aaron alone.

And this change certainly would not take place unless such a change were needful. For the Law is confessedly from God, and could not therefore be changed, unless He, Who is all-Wise, so willed it. The Cessation of the Law had therefore been announced by the same Prophecy which proclaimed the failure of the Priesthood by preannouncing the succession of a different Priest, not to be constituted after the order of Aaron, but after a different order, that of Melchizedek. And the Priesthood which was preannounced in that Prophecy is the Priesthood of Christ.

13. Ἐφ' ὃν] He with regard to Whom these things are spoken, namely, The Messiah.

He proceeds with the proof—

That the Levitical Priesthood was to be superseded, and

That Jesus Christ is the Priest preannounced by David.

This is evident, because—

(1) The Messiah, or Anointed Priest, preannounced by David in the 110th Psalm, was not to be of the order of Aaron, and therefore not of the Tribe of Levi, but after the order of Melchizedek, who was both a Priest and King.

(2) The Messiah was to be of the tribe of Judah, the Kingly Tribe. So Micah had prophesied, v. 2.

(3) These Prophecies have been fulfilled in Jesus Christ. He was not of the Tribe of Levi, but He has arisen from the tribe of Judah. Matt. i. 2; ii. 4, 5.

14. ἐξ Ἰούδα ἀνατέταλκεν ὁ Κύριος ἡμῶν] our Lord has arisen, like a Star, or Day Spring. Ἀνατολὴ is the word used in the LXX in Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15. Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12, and is said with reference to His Name, "Vir Nomen Ejus Oriens" (see on Luke i. 78), and also to His name as the Branch. See on Matt. ii. 23.

— περὶ ἱερέων οὐδέν] nothing concerning Priests, but much concerning Kings. (Gen. xlix. 10.) Elz. has οὐδὲν περὶ ἱερωσύνης, but ἱερέων is in A, B, C*, D*, E, and is received by Lach., Bleek, Tisch., Lünemann, &c.

No promise was made of the Priesthood to Judah. Uzziah, the King, was stricken with leprosy for invading the Priest's office. Theodoret.

He has arisen from Judah. Probably the two Gospels (of St. Matthew and St. Luke) containing the Genealogies of Jesus had now been published; and therefore it was manifest to all that our Lord had sprung of Judah.

15. Καὶ περισσότερον ἔτι κατάδηλόν ἐστιν] And it is still more abundantly manifest, that the Levitical Priesthood is imperfect, and therefore transitory, and liable to be superseded (see v. 11) if, as is the case, a different (ἕτερος) Priest arises, i. e. is preannounced as arising like to Melchizedek. On this use of the present tense, see Matt. ii. 4, ποῦ ὁ Χριστὸς γεννᾶται;

16. σαρκίνης] So A, B, C, D, I.—Elz. σαρκικῆς. See 1 Cor. iii. 1. 2 Cor. iii. 3. The reading in the text is also preferable, because it is not to be supposed that St. Paul could condemn the Law as if it were carnal, indeed he expressly disclaims such a notion. (Rom. vii. 14.) But what he means is, that the Law is σάρκινος (carneus), temporary, liable to change, and so is not to be compared to the Priesthood of Christ, which is Eternal.

17. μαρτυρεῖται] So A, B, D*, E*.—Elz. μαρτυρεῖ.

19. ἐπεισαγωγὴ δέ] but it is the bringing in of a better covenant upon the Law, which went before as our guide. It is the superinduction of a better hope, through which we approach near to God. Observe the contrast between προάγουσα, applied to the Law, and ἐπεισαγωγὴ (superinduction), applied to the Gospel.

20. Καὶ καθ' ὅσον] Another evidence of the permanence of Christ's Priesthood. Aaron was consecrated by Moses, but Christ was consecrated by God Himself with the solemnity of an Oath.

22. διαθήκης] Covenant; not Testament.

— ἔγγυος] sponsor, surety, spokesman (Sirac. xxix. 15, 16), who answers for us, and by whom we ἐγγίζομεν τῷ Θεῷ (v. 19).

23. Καὶ οἱ μὲν πλείονες] They indeed are more Priests made. Another proof of the superiority of Christ's Priesthood is to be recognized in its permanence. There is a double contrast between the Εἷς ὢν Ἱερεύς, and the πλείονες ἱερεῖς γεγονότες. Christ, the One Priest, is, exists for ever. They, the many Priests, are made from time to time.

24. ἀπαράβατον ἔχει τὴν ἱ.] hath His Priesthood never passing by; not transitory, like that of the Levitical Priests.

25. εἰς τὸ παντελές] The παντελὲς, of Christ's one offering, is opposed to the ἀτελὲς of the Law. (vv. 11. 19.)

26. καὶ ἔπρεπεν] also became us. Καὶ, restored from A, B, D, E, adds to the force of the sentence. His preceding reasons for the permanence of Christ's Priesthood were derived from the nature of the case considered objectively. He now adds a very powerful and affecting argument from the peculiar suitableness of that Priesthood to us,—our sorrows, our weaknesses, and our sins.

27. καθ' ἡμέραν] daily. Ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς εὐχὰς καὶ θυσίας τελῶν καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν. Philo, ii. p. 321.

— ἐφάπαξ] once for all, 'semel et simul.' "Einmal für allemal" (Schleusner). Cp. Rom. vii. 9; and below, x. 12; x. 10.

The Levitical Priests offered sacrifices often, and they offered for themselves as well as for the people; but Christ did none of these things, because He was without sin, and because the One Sacrifice offered by Him is sufficient for salvation.

They offered other sacrifices, but He offered Himself. Theodoret. "Unum est sacrificium Christi, et semel oblatum; et sufficit in sempiternum ad tollenda omnia peccata credentium." Primasius.

28. Τὸν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τετελειωμένον] The Son Who is perfected for evermore.

The word τετελειωμένος, as applied here to Christ's Everlasting Priesthood, is to be explained from the Septuagint Version, where it describes the consecration and inauguration of the Priest. See Lev. xxi. 10, τετελειωμένου ἐνδύσασθαι τὰ ἱμάτια.

CH. VIII. 1. Κεφάλαιον] The sum total which results, or accrues, as an aggregate upon what is being said by us.

The κεφάλαιον of a numerical account is the sum total, which collects together and combines, as in a head, all the constituent members or items. See Thucyd. iv. 50, Aristot. Metaph. vii. 1, and the ancient Expositors on Eph. i. 10.

So the sum total of our discourse concerning the Priesthood of Christ may be represented in the following proposition, τοιοῦτον ἔχομεν ἀρχιερέα κ.τ.λ. Κεφάλαιον is not an accusative, but nominative, in apposition with the following sentence. Cp. Winer, § 59, p. 472.

2. τῶν ἁγίων] of the Holy of Holies. See ix. 8. 12. 25; x. 19; xiii. 11.

— λειτουργός] See on Acts xiii. 2.

— ἀληθινῆς] true, real, as distinguished from what is figurative or ideal. See Luke xvi. 11; and on John xvii. 3. 1 Thess. i. 9.

4. Εἰ μὲν οὖν (so A, B, D*,—Elz. γὰρ) ἦν ἐπὶ γῆς] If, however, Christ had been upon earth, He would not even have been a Priest now, while there still exist those who offer the appointed gifts according to the Law. That is, If Christ had not entered into the true Holy of Holies, namely, into Heaven itself, He, Who is of the Tribe of Judah, and not of the sacerdotal Tribe of Levi, would not even have been a Priest at all, much less would He have been, as He is, our great High Priest; because there still exist, not as yet visibly superseded and discharged by God, Priests of the Tribe of Levi, to which God in the Law limited the Priesthood; and they still minister in His Temple on earth at Jerusalem, and offer those sacrifices which God has prescribed in the Law.

If He had been on earth, that is, if He had not died, and been taken up into heaven after His Resurrection, He would not have been a Priest; for there were other Priests still existing, and a schism would have arisen between Him and them. But He died, in order to offer the sacrifice of Himself; and having risen from the dead, He ascended into heaven, in order that He might have Heaven as His Sanctuary wherein to officiate as a Priest. Chrysostom.

The Apostle says this by way of self-defence, in order that he may show to the Hebrews that he does not disparage the Levitical Law, but rather regards it with veneration, as being a figure of heavenly things. Hence he admits, that it would have been superfluous to call Christ a Priest, if He were on earth, inasmuch as there are still Priests who discharge the priestly function according to the Levitical Law. Theodoret.

But here (adds Theodoret) the following question may be asked;

Since the Levitical Priesthood has now come to an end (by the total destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem, and the cessation of its Ritual), and since He, Who is the High Priest according to the order of Melchizedek, has offered His sacrifice, and has made other sacrifices to be needless, how is it that the Priests of the New Covenant perform the Mystical Ministration (i. e. of the Holy Eucharist)?

The answer is this. It is well known to all who have been instructed in divine things, that we do not offer any other sacrifice; but we execute the commemoration of that one saving sacrifice, which Christ offered on the Cross (οὐκ ἄλλην τινὰ θυσίαν προσφέρομεν, ἀλλὰ τῆς μιᾶς ἐκείνης καὶ σωτηρίου τὴν μνήμην ἐπιτελοῦμεν). For the Lord Himself commanded us to do this, saying, "Do this in remembrance of Me." And this we do, in order that by contemplation we may call to mind the figure (τύπον) of the sufferings which He underwent for us, and may stir up our love toward our Benefactor, and await the fruition of the good things to come. Theodoret.

See below on x. 12.

Elz. has τῶν ἱερέων before προσφερόντων, but these words are not in A, B, D*, E*, and are a gloss, and have been rejected by Lach., Bleek, Tisch., Lünemann, on the authority of those MSS. and some ancient Versions.

5. κεχρημάτισται] has been commanded by the divine voice. See Matt. ii. 12. 22. Luke ii. 26. Acts x. 22.

6. τέτυχε] So A, D*, I, K, Athan., Œcum., Theophyl., and Lach., Bleek, Tisch., Lün. Cp. Lobeck, Phryn. p. 395. Winer, p. 82. Elz. has τέτευχε.

— μεσίτης] a Mediator. A word applied to Moses (Gal. iii. 19, 20), and to Christ, 1 Tim. ii. 5, and below (ix. 15; xii. 24).

7, 8. Εἰ γὰρ ἡ πρώτη—καινὴν] Compare Justin Martyr in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, c. 34.

8—12. Ἰδοὺ—μνησθῶ ἔτι] From Jer. xxxi. 31—34, or xxxviii. 31—34, in LXX, with scarcely any variation, except that of λέγει Κύριος for φησὶ Κύριος, as the reading is in Cod. Vat. of the LXX; but the Codex Alexandrinus has λέγει, as cited in v. 8, not in v. 9.

For συντελέσω LXX has διαθήσομαι. The original has כָּרַת. Cp. x. 16, 17, where the text is quoted with the reading διαθήσομαι.

9. κἀγὼ ἠμέλησα αὐτῶν] On the accuracy of this rendering, see Bp. Pearson, Præfat. in LXX, Minor Works, ii. p. 261, ed. Churton.

11. οὐ μὴ διδάξωσιν] they shall not teach at that season. See Winer, § 56, p. 450.

— πολίτην] his fellow-citizen. So the best authorities. Elz. has πλησίον. The Cod. Alex. of LXX has ἀδελφὸν in the first member of the sentence, and πλησίον in the second.

13. πεπαλαίωκε] has made old; which God, its author, could do. And so the sense is more forcible than 'He declared it to be old.' By speaking of a new Covenant He ipso facto antiquavit, or superannuated, the former Covenant. His Word, which first made it, has also unmade it.

CH. IX. The Apostle proceeds to show the excellency of the One Sacrifice offered once for all by Christ, and presented by Him to the Father in the Heavenly Temple; and its superiority over all the Levitical Sacrifices offered in the Tabernacle and Temple on earth, which were shadows of that One Sacrifice.

1. Εἶχε μὲν οὖν] The first covenant also had indeed, it is true, &c. He does not disparage what the first covenant possessed; on the contrary, he acknowledges that its ritual and furniture were from God. But he shows that they were designed by Him to serve a purpose which is now fulfilled.

He therefore uses the past tense, εἶχε, 'it had.' Chrys.

This is carefully to be borne in mind, because it has been objected by some writers in modern times (e. g. Bleek) that the Author of this Epistle is chargeable with inaccuracies in this chapter, in his description of the Temple Service.

Hence they have inferred, that the Author cannot be St. Paul, who was brought up at Jerusalem at the feet of Gamaliel, and was deeply versed in all that concerned the Law and Ritual of his own Nation. And by the same reasoning, it would also follow that the Author cannot have been inspired by God, Whose worship He misrepresents; and that therefore this Epistle is not a part of God's Word. But the fact is, that the Author is not describing the worship of the Temple, but of the Tabernacle, and he shows his knowledge of his subject, by not confounding one with the other. See below on v. 4.

— ἡ πρώτη] The first, i. e. Covenant.

Elz. adds σκηνὴ, not in the best MSS. Besides, the word πρώτη does not agree with Σκηνὴ, or Tabernacle, understood, but with Διαθήκη, Covenant, referred to in the preceding verse.

— δικαιώματα λατρείας] ordinances of worship. δικαιώματα are literally what has been regarded as right and just, δεδικαίωται, by a superior authority, and has been commanded as such, and therefore it corresponds in LXX to the Hebrew חֹק (chok) or Statute. (Exod. xv. 25, 26. Lev. xxv. 18.) Hence δικαιώματα = νόμος. Suid. See above on Rom. i. 32; ii. 26; v. 16; viii. 4.

— τό τε ἅγιον κοσμικόν] and the holy place which was worldly, i. e. a figure of this visible world; as distinguished from, and yet introductory to, the invisible Heavenly region typified by the Oracle, or Holy of Holies, parted off from the Holy Place by the Veil. μεσον τοῦ ἁγίου (the Holy Place) καὶ ἀνάμεσον τοῦ ἁγίου τῶν ἁγίων. Cp. Exod. xxvi. 31. 33—37.

The Holy Place was an image of our Earthly Πολιτεία, or Conversation; the Holy of Holies represented the future Life in Heaven. Theodoret, Œcumen. See also Joseph. Ant. iii. 6. 4, and iii. 7. 7; B. J. v. 5. 4.

The Holy Place is also called κοσμικὸν, worldly (cp. Titus ii. 12), as being visible and material, and so temporary, and distinguished from the Heavenly Sanctuary. See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, as quoted above, vi. 9.

2. Σκηνὴ γὰρ κ.τ.λ.] For a Tabernacle was constructed, namely, the first, or anterior portion of it. Ἡ πρώτη here signifies the anterior court, or Holy Place (see vv. 6, 7), where it is contrasted with the δευτέρα σκηνὴ, or Holy of Holies. On this use of πρῶτος, as primus, in Latin, for prima pars, see Valck. p. 550.

— λυχνία—τράπεζα] The Golden Seven-Branched Lamp, and the Table. See the marginal references, and Jahn, Arch. Bibl. §§ 327, 332; and, on their typical character, Mather on the Types, p. 388—411.

— ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν ἄρτων] the (weekly) setting forth of (twelve) loaves on the Table, in two rows of six each, before the Lord. See Exod. xxv. 23. Lev. xxiv. 5. Cp. Winer, § 67, p. 559.

— ἅγια] Holy Place. Neuter plural, and therefore to be accentuated on the antepenultimate syllable, and contrasted with the neuter plural, ἅγια ἁγίων, immediately following. Theodoret.

In the Septuagint, and also in the works of Philo Judæus, the word ἅγια in the plural is often used synonymously with ἅγιον in the singular, to signify the Holy Place.

3. τὸ δεύτερον καταπέτασμα] the second veil, namely, the Veil of purple—blue, purple-red, and crimson wool, and twisted byssus, and embroidered with Cherubim, and supported on four columns of acacia-wood, with silver feet, which parted off and concealed the Holy of Holies from the Holy Place, and was rent in twain at the Crucifixion. See on Matt. xxvii. 51. Mark xv. 38. Luke xxiii. 45; and cp. above, vi. 19.

It is called the second veil, to distinguish it from the other curtain at the entrance of the Holy Place. Cp. Philo, Vet. Mos. iii. p. 669, where he calls the Holy Place the Πρόναον εἰργόμενον δυσὶν ὑφάσμασιν. Τὸ μὲν ἔνδον ὃν καλεῖται καταπέτασμα, τὸ δ' ἐκτὸς προσαγορεύεται κάλυμμα. The second veil, or καταπέτασμα was made, he says (iii. p. 667), ἵνα ἐπικρύπτηται τὸ ἄδυτον, that it might conceal the inner Shrine, or Oracle, the ἅγια ἁγίων, or Holy of Holies.

4. χρυσοῦν θυμιατήριον] a golden censer, or thuribulum, in which the High Priest offered incense on the great day of Atonement in the Holy of Holies. On other days he used a silver censer. Ioma, iv. 4. Wetstein, p. 414. Cp. Lev. xvi. 12—14. And so Maimonides and Abarbanel. Cp. in Buxtorf, Hist. Arcæ, p. 76.

The word θυμιατήριον is not to be rendered 'Altar of Incense,' with some Expositors; but it is to be rendered 'Censer,' with the Vulg., Syriac, Arabic, and Æthiopic, and English Versions, and with Theophylact (on v. 7), Anselm, Aquinas, and with Villalpandus, Grotius, Wetstein, Bengel, Reland, Deyling, J. G. Michaelis, Böhme, Stuart, Klee, Stier, and others. For

(1) This is the sense which the word θυμιατήριον bears in the Septuagint Version, the best exponent of the Apostle's words. (2 Chron. xxvi. 19. Ezek. viii. 11.)

(2) But the Golden Altar of Incense is called both in the Old and New Testaments the θυσιαστήριον τοῦ θυμιάματος. (Exod. xxxi. 8. Luke i. 11.)

(3) Besides, the Golden Altar was not in the Holy of Holies, but it stood before the Veil, between the Table of Shewbread and the Golden Candlestick. (Exod. xxx. 1—10. 34—37; xxxvii. 25—29; xl. 5. 26. Josephus, Ant. iii. 6. 8. B. J. v. iii. 5.)

(4) The allegations of some recent writers (Bleek, and even Lünemann, p. 232), that the writer of the Epistle was not acquainted, from personal knowledge, with the ritual and sacred furniture of the Temple, or that this Epistle is not an original work, and that the supposed inaccuracy is to be attributed to his Translator (Jahn, Arch. § 332), serve only to invalidate the conclusions grounded on such suppositions.

(5) It is true, that there is no mention of a Golden Censer to be specially used on the Day of Atonement, in the description of the furniture of the Holy of Holies, in the Old Testament. But the existence of such a Censer may be inferred as probable from Lev. xvi. 12—14, describing the ritual of that great Day of Expiation; and it appears to be very likely, that some particular Censer should have been set apart and reserved (as the Rabbis affirm) for the religious service of that solemn Anniversary. Cp. Reland, Antiq. i. 5.

(6) The Incense, which was offered before the Mercy-Seat by the High Priest when he entered with blood into the Holy of Holies, and sprinkled the Mercy-Seat with blood, and which covered the Mercy-Seat with a cloud, was a type of the Prayers to be offered in Heaven by Christ, having entered into the true Holy of Holies with His Own Blood. Cp. Rev. v. 8; viii. 3, 4. Ps. cxli. 2.

And the uses of such a Golden Censer as here described, seem to be specially typical of the work of Christ, our great High Priest and Mediator, ministering within the Veil, in the Heavenly Holy of Holies, where He ever liveth to make intercession for us (vii. 25), and is ever offering the Incense of our Prayers in the Golden Censer of His own merits, by which they are made acceptable to God. "In sanctis Sanctorum erat Thuribulum, quia Christus in secretis patriæ cœlestis consistit, per Quem Orationes nostras ad Deum Patrem dirigemus." Primasius.

(7) It has indeed been said by some, that it is a strange thing that no mention should be made here of the Golden Altar of Incense, and therefore it is alleged that θυμιατήριον ought to be understood as specifying that Altar.

But neither is there any mention here of the great Brazen Altar of Burnt Offering.

The fact is, the Author has his eye fixed on one great sacerdotal Act, viz. the entrance of the High Priest into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement, as foreshadowing Christ's Perpetual Intercession in Heaven.

He therefore dwells mainly on what was done by the High Priest within the Veil. And inasmuch as it is remarkable, that the Incense to be offered on the Day of Atonement was not to be kindled on the Golden Altar of Incense before the Veil, but was to be taken by the Priest in his hand into the Holy of Holies, and to be first kindled within the Veil (see Lev. xvi. 12), therefore most fitly the Author waives all mention of the Golden Altar of Incense in reference to that Act, and speaks only of the Golden Censer in which the Incense was kindled within the Veil in the Holy of Holies. Cp. Lightfoot, Temple Service, chap. xv., where a striking proof is given of the sin of kindling the Incense outside the Veil.

On this question, cp. Stuart, Excursus xvi., and Davidson's Introduction, p. 223—225.

— ἐν ᾗ] i. e. in the Ark, that is, originally; as may be inferred from Exod. xvi. 34; xxv. 16. Num. xvii. 10, as the Jews themselves assert. See R. Levi, Ben Gerson, on 1 Kings viii. 10, in Wetstein, Schöttgen, p. 973.

The fact that these things were not in the Ark in later times, is no proof of any inaccuracy in the writer, but rather it is an evidence of his knowledge and of his candour. He is describing the Holy of Holies in the Tabernacle, as it was constituted by Moses, and not as it existed in the Temple in his own day; and the circumstances here mentioned prove that he was well acquainted with the differences between the two, and that he was not desirous of disparaging the dignity of the Levitical Priesthood; but, on the contrary, gave it credit for ornaments which it had originally possessed, but which it did not now retain.

It is a fortunate circumstance, that Jewish Writers themselves bear witness to the accuracy of the Apostle in this matter, and their evidence may suffice to refute the charges of ignorance and error brought against him in this place by some professors of Christianity, who assume that they themselves are better informed, concerning the Ritual of the Ancient Worship of God, than an Author whose work has been received by the Church of God, as written by the Inspiration of God.

It is observable, that Josephus uses both the masculine and feminine article with the word Χερουβεῖς, but Philo says always τὰ Χερουβίμ. Delitz.

6. εἰς μὲν τὴν πρώτην] into the first court. The Jewish Historian thus writes—"All persons who have seen the construction of our Temple know of what sort it was, and that its holiness was inviolable. It has four courts round it, and each of these had their peculiar guardians assigned to them according to our Law. Into the outermost court all strangers might enter. Into the second, all Jews and their wives when free from legal impurities. Into the third, male Jews, if pure. Into the fourth (the πρώτην σκηνὴν in the present verse), the Priests alone, in their sacerdotal attire. Into the inmost shrine (ἄδυτον), the High Priest only, clad in his robes of office." Josephus, c. Apion. ii. 8. Cp. Lightfoot on the Temple Service, chap. i. Vol. i. p. 898.

7. εἰς δὲ τὴν δευτέραν] See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, p. 406, 407, Art. iv., near the end, for an excellent Exposition of the Christian sense of these Levitical provisions.

8. μήπω πεφανερῶσθαι τὴν τῶν ἁγίων ὁδὸν] that the way into the Holiest of all had not yet been made manifest. The entrance to the Holy of Holies was obstructed and intercepted by the Veil, which was rent in twain at the Crucifixion, in order to show that the way to that which was typified by the Holiest Place, namely, the way to Heaven itself, had now been laid open by the sacrifice of Christ, Who is "the Way" (John xiv. 6). See above on Matt. xxvii. 51.

On τὰ ἅγια, the Holy Place, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, that is, the Holiest of all, see above, v. 1, and below, v. 12. 24, 25; x. 19; xiii. 11; and on the genitive, cp. Matt. x. 5, ὁδὸν ἐθνῶν.

10. μόνον κ.τ.λ.] The sense of this sentence is to be cleared up by the restoration of δικαιώματα with Scholz., Lachm., Bleek, Lünemann, for δικαιώμασιν, the reading of Elz., and by the rejection of καὶ after βαπτισμοῖς.

The meaning is, that the gifts and sacrifices offered in the Tabernacle, being only parabolical of a higher and spiritual Ritual, could not make the worshipper perfect; that is, could not bring him to spiritual manhood, but were designed as accommodations to his unripe condition in a state of spiritual childhood (see above, v. 13, 14, on the sense of the word τέλειος), and being merely δικαιώματα σαρκὸς, ordinances of the flesh (not of the spirit), ordinances of an external, corporeal, fleshly kind, and dealing only with the outer man, and being in respect to, or upon, meats, and drinks, and divers washings, and imposed and imperative on the people only until the season of reformation. Cp. Winer, p. 559. The word ἐπικείμενα is used with reference to the burdensome character of these enactments. Œcumen. See Acts xv. 10. 28, and cp. Lünemann here.

The genitive σαρκὸς expresses the characteristic property and element of the δικαιώματα.

11. ἀγαθῶν] But Christ having now come, a High Priest of the future good things, i. e. of the good things that were prefigured by the Law, and were looked for as future by the holy men who lived under the Law. Observe the article here, and in the following words, τῆς μείζονος καὶ τελειοτέρας σκηνῆς, of the greater and more perfect Tabernacle which was typified by the Tabernacle in the wilderness. Christ has passed through the Heavenly Holy Place into the true Holy of Holies, not made by human hands (see the use of χειροποίητα in v. 24), nor of this earthly building, even to the Right Hand of God.

— οὐ χειροποιήτου] Cp. Acts vii. 48; xvii. 24; and below, v. 24.

— δι' αἵματος τράγων] by blood of goats: the means with which and by which the High Priest was permitted to enter into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement. Lev. xvi. 14, 15.

— ἐφάπαξ] once for all; in accordance with that eternal redemption (αἰωνίαν λύτρωσιν), that purchasing, which is to be valid for ever, being effected with the infinite cost of His Own Blood, paid as the price of our redemption from that captivity and imprisonment in which we were held, as insolvent debtors, for our sins; and for our admission to our heavenly inheritance. See on Matt. xx. 28. Eph. i. 14.

Christ is said, in these and other passages of Scripture, to have paid our ransom (λύτρον), in order to redeem us from captivity. See above on Eph. i. 7. 14.

To whom was this ransom paid?

Some of the Ancients said to Satan, who held us in bondage. Origen, in Matt. tom. xvi. p. 726. See Delitz. here, p. 385.

But though we through our sins had reduced ourselves into bondage and captivity to Satan, yet it is not to be imagined that Satan derived any advantage from the price paid by Christ for our deliverance. The prison in which we were held, though Satan was its gaoler, was not the property of Satan. All things are God's. Tophet is His (Isa. xxx. 33); the instruments of death are His (Ps. vii. 13. Prov. xv. 11). Compare note on 1 Cor. xv. 26.

By sin we contract a debt to God. We are held as His prisoners till we pay that debt. We are His bondsmen. And the payment, which Christ, of His own free will, makes for our deliverance, with the infinite price of His own Blood, is paid to God. God Himself, in His infinite love, provides this payment, in order that we may be delivered, at the same time that the immutable Attribute of His own Divine Justice is fully satisfied. And therefore Christ is said in Scripture to offer Himself to God; and God (see v. 14) is also said to have delivered up His own Son. (Rom. viii. 32.) See below on v. 22.

The feminine form αἰωνία is found only here, and in 2 Thess. ii. 16, and is one of the connecting links of this Epistle with the received Epistles of St. Paul.

On the form εὑράμενος, see Winer, p. 79.

The Apostle uses the middle form εὑράμενος, 'having procured for himself,' to intimate that, as Christ's death was voluntary, so the effect of it was glorious to Himself, as well as to us. He thus obviates the Jewish objection, that it was inconsistent with the Messiah's dignity to die.

13. Εἰ γὰρ τὸ αἷμα τράγων] Cp. Justin M. c. Trypho. c. 13, who hence argues for the virtue of Christian Baptism deriving its efficacy from the Blood of Christ, and cleansing those who come to it with Repentance and Faith in His Blood; and he therefore calls it τὸ σωτήριον λουτρὸν τοῖς μεταγινώσκουσι, καὶ μηκέτι αἵμασι τράγων καὶ προβάτων ἢ σπόδῳ δαμάλεως, ἢ σεμιδάλεως προσφοραῖς καθαριζομένοις, ἀλλὰ πίστει διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ τοῦ θανάτου αὐτοῦ.

14. διὰ Πνεύματος αἰωνίου] through the Everlasting Spirit, the Holy Spirit.

So Theodoret and other ancient Expositors, and the Syriac, Vulgate, and Coptic Versions, and D, which has ἁγίου here.

The truth of this ancient interpretation appears from the following considerations:—

The Apostle is here speaking of the atoning, sanctifying, and cleansing efficacy of Christ's Blood. The emphatic words here are ἄμωμον, spotless,—a word specially applied to Victims which were examined (μωμοσκοπούμενα) by the Priests to see whether they had any blemish (see on iv. 12, and the passages of Philo quoted here by Loesner, p. 437),—and καθαριεῖ, shall cleanse.

Now, this efficacy was due to the operation of the Holy Ghost.

Christ, as Man, derived His sanctity, and His consequent ability to offer to the Father a spotless sacrifice, and to cleanse us from all sin, from God the Holy Ghost.

Thus then we recognize a testimony to the distinct Personality of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and to the great Truth that each of the Three Persons of the Ever Blessed Trinity had His proper office, and that they all co-operated, in the work of our Redemption.

This important doctrine has been well expressed by Theodoret here as follows: Ἄμωμον ἐκεῖνο τὸ σῶμα τὸ Θεῖον ἀπετέλεσε Πνεῦμα· πάντα γὰρ εἶχε τοῦ Θειοῦ Πνεύματος χαρίσματα, καὶ ἐκ τοῦ πληρώματος αὐτοῦ ἡμεῖς πάντες ἐλάβομεν. (John i. 16.) The Holy Ghost, Who filled Him as Man in the Virgin's Womb, preserved Him from all sin, so that He might be for us an Immaculate Victim, and a sweet-smelling sacrifice to God. Primasius.

To which we may add the words of our learned English Expositor of the Creed:—

The belief of Christ's conception by the Holy Ghost is necessary to prevent all fear or suspicion of spot in this Lamb; of sin in this Jesus. Whatsoever our original corruption is, however displeasing unto God, we may be from hence assured there was none in Him, in whom alone God hath declared Himself to be well pleased. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean (Job xiv. 4)? saith Job,—a clean and undefiled Redeemer out of an unclean and defiled nature? He whose name is Holiness, whose operation is to sanctify, the Holy Ghost. Our Jesus was like unto us in all things as born of a woman, sin only excepted, as conceived by the Holy Ghost.

This original and total sanctification of the human nature was first necessary to fit it for the personal union with the Word, Who, out of His infinite love, humbled Himself to become flesh, and at the same time, out of His infinite purity, could not defile Himself by becoming sinful flesh.

Secondly, the same sanctification was as necessary in respect of the end for which He was made man,—the redemption of mankind; that, as the first Adam was the fountain of our impurity, so the second Adam should also be the pure fountain of our righteousness. God, sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, condemned sin in the flesh (Rom. viii. 3); which He could not have condemned had He been sent in sinful flesh. The Father made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him (2 Cor. v. 21); which we could not have been made in Him, but that He did no sin (1 Pet. ii. 22), and knew no sin. For whosoever is sinful wanteth a Redeemer; and he could have redeemed none, who stood in need of his own redemption. We are redeemed with the precious blood of Christ; therefore precious, because of a Lamb without blemish, and without spot (1 Pet. i. 19).

Our atonement can be made by no other High Priest than by Him Who is holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners (Heb. vii. 26). We cannot know that He was manifested to take away our sins, except we also know that in Him is no sin (1 John iii. 5). Wherefore, believing it is so, it is necessary to believe the original holiness of our human nature in the person of our Saviour; it is as necessary to acknowledge that by which we may be fully assured of that sanctity, His conception by the Holy Ghost. Bp. Pearson, Art. iii. p. 314.

— ἀπὸ νεκρῶν ἔργων] from dead works; not done from faith in Christ, Who is Our Life, and without Whom we are dead. See vi. 1.

The Vatican Manuscript (Codex B) fails in the middle of the word καθαριεῖ here. It does not contain the remainder of this Epistle, nor that to Philemon, nor the Pastoral Epistles. Cardinal Mai, in his edition, has supplied Heb. ix. 14—27 from a MS. of the fifteenth century; and Heb. x.—xiii., and the Epistle to Philemon and Pastoral Epistles, from Cod. Vat. 1761 of the tenth century. See his note, p. 441.

15. διαθήκης καινῆς] of a Covenant that is New. Observe the order of the words. Cp. viii. 8, the only places in the New Testament where διαθήκη precedes καινή. Cp. xii. 24. Observe also the absence of the article.

The Emphasis is to be laid on the newness of the Διαθήκη, not on its exact resemblance to the Old. The sense therefore is, And for this reason He is a Mediator of a Covenant which is New; i. e. He succeeds and supersedes Moses, the Mediator of the Old Covenant (Gal. iii. 19), in order that, a Death having been effected for the Redemption of the Transgressions committed upon the First Covenant, they who have been called may receive the promise of the Everlasting Inheritance covenanted by God to Abraham and his seed in Christ.

On the sense of καινὸς, as distinguished from νέος, see Eph. iv. 23.

16, 17. Ὅπου γὰρ διαθήκη] For wheresoever a Testament (properly so called) is, there a Death must of necessity be brought to pass (in order to give it force), namely, the death of the Testator. For a Testament is of force, on the parties, who make it, being dead; since it is never valid while the Testator liveth.

On φέρεσθαι, compare the use of the word φέρεται, as applied to extant writings contrasted with what are lost.

It may also have a forensic sense, like constare, said of what is brought forward judicially, and is established by legal evidence. See Hammond and Elsner.

On μήποτε, never, used subjectively as here, see Winer, § 55, p. 426.

This is a controverted passage;

Some have ventured to allege, that the Apostle here resorts to "mere Hellenistic play upon words." Others have charged him with sophistry; others even with "feebleness of logic."

Some Expositors have maintained, that διαθήκη ought to be here rendered by Covenant, and not by Testament; and that διαθέμενος means, 'the person included in the Covenant;' and that φέρεσθαι is equivalent to be borne, or endured. But such renderings as these do violence to the language, and have no foundation in ancient authorities.

Consider the scope of the Apostle's argument;

He is obviating an objection, and comforting those who were staggered by Christ's Death; and he shows that His Death was necessary, in order to give effect to His merciful dispositions in their behalf. Theodoret.

But how, it may be asked, can the Old Covenant, בְּרִית (Berith), be called a Testament?

Because it conveyed an inheritance.

The reference to a Testament naturally follows from what he had just said concerning their Inheritance. In His Covenant with the Israelites God is, as it were, a Testator, Who devises, on the conditions of their obedience, the possession of a large and fruitful territorial Estate—the Land of Promise; the type of the heavenly Inheritance procured by Christ. Cp. Stuart and Delitz.

He is comparing the two Διαθήκαι; and it is only the New, which is expressly called by him a Διαθήκη in the twofold sense of Testament and Covenant.

He says that the latter Διαθήκη is New, καινὴ, not νέα. It is New in this very sense of being promulgated as a Testament as well as a Covenant, and so differing from the Old.

The former was not originally promulgated as a Testament, although it had something of a testamentary character, and bore a typical witness to the Testamentary Character of the New Covenant; and was also itself, in a modified sense, a Testament; as conveying an inheritance; and as will be explained below.

Therefore, in v. 18, he does not repeat the word διαθήκη after ἡ πρώτη; and in v. 19 he calls it an ἐντολὴ, or commandment, and introduces the person from Whom, and by whom (namely, God and Moses), the commandment came; and says, This is the blood of the Διαθήκη (not the blood of any Testator, but) which God commanded; not which He devised as a Testament.

He was writing in Greek to readers of Greek, and he shows that the Gospel was a Διαθήκη in a larger and more proper sense of the Greek word, than the Law was, as originally promulgated.

He also explains the inner prophetical meaning of the dedication of the First Covenant with Blood, and of the speech then uttered by Moses. Exod. xxiv. 5—8.

This exposition of the word Διαθήκη, which, in its proper Greek significance, means Testament (see Hesych., Suid., and other ancient Lexicographers, quoted by Schleusner and Suicer in voce), and only in a derivative sense signifies Covenant (συνθήκην), was the more reasonable, because it was a return to the primary meaning of the word; and also because Our Blessed Lord Himself, in the Gospels, uses the word Διαθήκη, just before His death, in instituting the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and in bequeathing to the Church that last legacy, which derives its force from the Death of the Testator, and where by speaking of a New Testament He implies the existence also of an Old one. See Matt. xxvi. 28. Mark xiv. 24. Luke xxii. 20.

It may, therefore, be suggested for consideration, whether there is not a profound meaning in the Apostle's words here;

In the Divine Mind the Gospel is prior to the Law. Christ is the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. xiii. 8. 1 Pet. i. 20). All the virtue of the Levitical Sacrifices was derived from the Death of Christ. He "came by Water and Blood" to the Faithful in every age. (1 John v. 6.)

Thus the Levitical Covenant was dependent on, and was subsequent to, the Death of Christ, in reason, power, and effect, although not in time.

Accordingly, St. Paul declared, that the Scriptures of the Old Testament were able to make Timothy wise unto salvation, through Faith in Christ Jesus. See 2 Tim. iii. 15.

The Levitical Covenant viewed in this light, as founded on the sacred ground of the pre-ordained and pre-supposed sacrifice of Christ's Death, and as deriving all its efficacy from it, may, in a profound spiritual sense, be called a Testament.

In the Counsel and Decree of God, to Whom all things are present at once, Christ was already slain, when the Law was delivered from Mount Sinai; and all the Faithful, who were accepted by God, were foreseen and accepted in Christ from the beginning of the world. Hence the Apostle says (xi. 26) that Moses preferred the reproach of Christ to the riches of Egypt. Christ was the Paschal Lamb, by whose blood the Israelites were delivered from the sword of the destroying Angel. He was the Rock smitten in the Wilderness, from which the water flowed. (1 Cor. x. 4.) They who rebelled in the desert, tempted Christ. (1 Cor. x. 9.)

Christ Himself was the Διαθέμενος Who covenanted with the Israelites. As God He could not die; but in the fulness of time He was to become Man, and as Man He was to die. The Covenant was grounded on His Death, foreseen and presumed; and all the virtue of the Covenant, which He made with the Israelites, flowed from His death. It would have been of no avail, if Christ had never died; it derived all its force from that death.

Thus the Old Covenant was itself a Testament. Christ was its Testator. He is the giver of Both Testaments; they are both sealed by His Blood, and derive all their virtue from it.

It is not, therefore, without reason that the Church of Christ, following the suggestion of the Apostle, calls the Hebrew Scriptures the Old Testament.

They, as well as the Gospel, are a Testament from Christ; they receive all their saving efficacy from His Death. And whenever we speak of the Old Testament, we declare a solemn truth, we profess a fundamental article of Faith, which distinguishes us alike from Jews and Heathens; we declare that Both Testaments are from One and the Same Author, Who gives Laws to the world as God, and makes His Covenant to become a Testament by dying for us, in order that all who enter into covenant with Him, and live as His children, may enjoy the heavenly inheritance, bequeathed to them by Him, and purchased for them by His blood.

19. αὐτό τε τὸ βιβλίον—ἐρράντισε] He sprinkled the very Book itself of the Covenant (see v. 21). Moses sprinkled with Blood the Tabernacle and all the Vessels of the service, as well as the People. (Exod. xxiv. 6—8.) By thus sprinkling the very things by which the people sought to be cleansed, Moses, the Mediator of the Old Covenant, declared the imperfection of that Covenant, and he proclaimed that it could not cleanse, but needed itself to be cleansed by Blood, namely, by the Blood of Christ; and that, therefore, the bloody sacrifices enjoined in that Covenant, prefigured some other sacrifice, some other bloodshedding, by which that Covenant was to be sanctified.

20. Τοῦτο τὸ αἷμα τῆς διαθήκης, ἧς] This is, or (as it is in the Hebrew), Behold the blood of the Covenant which God made with you.

St. Paul argues with great force of reason, that this act of Moses, and these words, were typical and prophetical of some future Διαθήκη.

The Old Covenant testified its own insufficiency by being sprinkled. It thus confessed that it could not cleanse, but required itself to be cleansed. And in being itself sprinkled, and in the sprinkling of the People with the blood of goats and calves, animals inferior to man, who could not be cleansed as to his conscience by their blood, it bore witness to a future cleansing by some other blood, which could cleanse the people, who, in the sprinkling of themselves, and of the Covenant, confessed their need of being cleansed.

The speech, therefore, of Moses was prophetic.

The blood of goats and calves is the blood of the Covenant which God has made with you, or (as the Apostle expounds the words) which God commanded you; but you see the imperfection of this Covenant in this sprinkling of the Book, and of the Tabernacle, and all the vessels.

But God does nothing imperfectly. Therefore you may be sure, that this Covenant, though imperfect in itself, is not imperfect in its tendencies, but leads to something that is perfect; and that this Blood, which sprinkles you and the Covenant itself, is typical of some other Blood, and therefore of some other death which will have sufficient power to cleanse you perfectly from all your sins. That Blood, to be shed and sprinkled hereafter, is typified by this Blood which has been shed and sprinkled now.

That the Blood, to which Moses thus referred by way of contrast and inference, is no other than the Blood of Christ, might well be assumed by St. Paul, from the declaration made by Christ Himself when instituting the Lord's Supper, when he took up the words of Moses and applied them to Himself. (Matt. xxvi. 28. Mark xiv. 24. Luke xxii. 20.) And they had been already so treated by the Apostle in 1 Cor. xi. 25.

22. χωρὶς αἱματεκχυσίας οὐ γ. ἄφεσις] without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins, as the Jews themselves confessed. Schöttgen, p. 976.

Jesus has not only revealed to us, but also procured for us, the way of salvation. We were all concluded under sin,—and, since the wages of sin is death (Rom. vi. 23), we were obliged to eternal punishment, from which it was impossible to be freed, except the sin were first remitted. Now this is the constant rule, that without shedding of blood is no remission. It was therefore necessary that Christ should appear, to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself. (Heb. ix. 22, 23. 26.) And so He did; for He shed His blood for many, for the remission of sins (Matt. xxvi. 28), as Himself professeth in the Sacramental Institution: He bare our sins in His own body on the tree; as St. Peter speaks (1 Pet. ii. 24), and so in Him we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins. (Col. i. 14.) Again, we were all enemies unto God, and having offended Him, there was no possible way of salvation but by being reconciled to Him. If then we ask the question, as once the Philistines did concerning David, Wherewith should we reconcile ourselves unto our Master? (1 Sam. xxix. 4,) we have no other name to answer it but Jesus. For God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them. (2 Cor. v. 19.) And as, under the Law, the blood of the sin-offering was brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the Holy Place (Lev. vi. 30), so it pleased the Father through the Son, having made peace by the blood of His cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself. (Col. i. 20.) And thus it comes to pass, that us, who were enemies in our mind by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled in the body of His flesh through death. (Col. i. 21, 22.) And upon this reconciliation of our persons must necessarily follow the salvation of our souls. For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life. (Rom. v. 10.) Furthermore, we were all enslaved by sin, and were brought into captivity by Satan,—neither was there any possibility of escape but by way of redemption. Now it was the Law of Moses, that, if any were able, he might redeem himself (Lev. xxv. 49); but this to us was impossible, because absolute obedience in all our actions is due unto God, and therefore no act of ours can make any satisfaction for the least offence. Another Law gave yet more liberty, that he which was sold might be redeemed again; one of his brethren might redeem him. (Lev. xxv. 48.) But this, in respect of all the mere sons of men, was equally impossible, because they were all under the same captivity. Nor could they satisfy for others, who were wholly unable to redeem themselves. Wherefore, there was no other brother, but that Son of man, which is the Son of God, Who was like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, which could work this Redemption for us. And what He only could, that He freely did perform. For the Son of man came to give His life a ransom for many (Matt. xx. 28); and as He came to give, so He gave Himself a ransom for all. (1 Tim. ii. 6.) So that in Him we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins. (Eph. i. 7.) For we are bought with a price (1 Cor. vii. 23); for we are redeemed not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot. (1 Pet. i. 18, 19.) He then which hath obtained for us remission of sins, He Who through Himself hath reconciled us unto God, He Who hath given Himself as a ransom to redeem us, He Who hath thus wrought out the way of salvation for us, must necessarily have a second and a far higher right unto the name of Jesus, unto the title of our Saviour. Bp. Pearson (on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 140).

24. χειροποίητα] Made by human hands. See v. 11.

26. ἔδει] it was necessary: that is, in the case supposed. The imperfect indicative is used, as in Latin, 'optimum erat,' 'longum erat,' &c. Cp. Winer, p. 254.

27, 28. καθ' ὅσον] inasmuch as. The Apostle thus removes the scruples and stumbling-blocks of the Hebrew Christians, who were taunted by the Jews with believing in a dead Christ.

Christ, as Man, is the Second Adam. He unites all men in Himself. All men are destined to die once; therefore Christ died, but He died only once—once for all. But He is also their future Judge. All must appear before His judgment-seat; and then He, Who died once to bear the sins of all, will appear again, apart from sin.

28. χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας] apart from sin. He does not say ἄτερ, but χωρὶς: he does not entertain the notion that Christ had ever been with sin, in the sense of 'blemished by sin;' but he means, that He will appear again, without sin, or apart from sin, in another very different sense; that is, as no longer supporting the heavy weight of the sins of others, even of the whole world, on His own shoulders, but bringing salvation to all who look for, and love, His appearing; and then He will say to the wicked, "Depart from Me, ye cursed; Depart from Me, all ye that work iniquity." (Matt. xxv. 41; vii. 23.)

To appear the second time without sin is this,—not to appear any longer in the likeness of sinful flesh (Rom. viii. 3), nor to bear the sins of the world in His own Body on the tree (1 Pet. ii. 24), as He did at His First Advent; and not to intercede any more for sins, but to exercise Judgment upon sinners. Primasius.

From a neglect of the true meaning of the adverb χωρὶς here, this text has been perverted by some (e. g. the Irvingites) into an argument for the heretical notion, that Christ was not perfectly sinless in His Human Nature, while He was yet upon earth. Others have incorrectly regarded ἁμαρτίας as equivalent to a sacrifice for sin. Compare above, Rom. vi. 10, which illustrates this text.

— ὀφθήσεται—εἰς σωτηρίαν] He will appear to them who are patiently expecting Him for their salvation. He will come to save them and destroy their enemies. But in the mean time they must wait for Him; they must be ever expecting Him. A lesson to the Hebrews, and to all, of Patience, and of watchful Preparation for the Second Advent of Christ. See Matt. x. 22. Mark xiii. 37.

CH. X. 1. Σκιὰν—τῶν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν] a shadow, or sketch, of the future good things in heaven. See ix. 11, and the next note here.

— οὐκ αὐτὴν τὴν εἰκόνα τῶν πραγμάτων] not the very image, or rather picture, of the things. According to the mind of ancient Expositors, the word σκιὰ would best be rendered here by sketch or outline (and not shadow); and the word εἰκὼν by picture (not image).

There are three things considered here.

1. The reality of the future good things—in Heaven and Eternity.

2. The εἰκὼν, or clear picture of them, in the Gospel.

3. The σκιὰ, or dim outline of them, in the Law.

"Umbra in Lege; Imago in Evangelio; Veritas in Cœlo."

St. Paul designates here the future life as the things themselves; and he calls the Gospel the εἰκόνα, or picture, of those things; and he terms the Old Dispensation the σκιὰν, or sketch, of the picture. For the εἰκὼν, or picture, exhibits the objects more clearly, but the shaded outline (σκιαγραφία) delineates them more obscurely than the εἰκὼν does. Theodoret.

The Law is the mere σκιὰ of the future, and is not the picture. Until the painter puts in the colours in the painting, it is only a sketch (σκιὰ),—but when he lays on the hues, it becomes a picture. Such the Law was; for he calls it a sketch of the future good things. Chrysostom.

As the picture (εἰκὼν) falls short of the original, so do our present mysteries fall short of the future good things which are perfect. And as the sketch (σκιαγραφία) falls short of the picture (εἰκὼν), so does the Law fall short of the Gospel. Theophyl.

The picture (εἰκὼν), although it does not exhibit the reality itself, yet it is a vivid resemblance of it; but the sketch (σκιὰ) is a faint outline of the picture. Œcumen.

Our present things (under the Gospel) are a picture of the Future. In Holy Baptism we see a type of the Resurrection, but hereafter we shall behold the Resurrection itself. Here we see the Symbols of the Lord's Body, there (i. e. in heaven) we shall see the Lord Himself. Theodoret (in 1 Cor. xiii. 12). Cp. Lünemann (Kommentar, p. 216. 266), who rightly observes, that the contrast here is between the Law as giving merely a dim resemblance of future things, and the clearer exhibition of them under the Gospel.

— εἰς τὸ διηνεκές] in continuum. Cp. vii. 3; x. 12. 14.

2. οὐκ] Omitted by Elz., but found in the best authorities.

— κεκαθαρισμένους] So the preponderance of the best MSS. Elz. κεκαθαρμένους.

3. ἀνάμνησις] See Luke xxii. 19.

4. Ἀδύνατον] He had spoken of the death and sufferings of Christ as necessary, and pre-ordained for their salvation, and thus endeavoured to comfort and confirm the Hebrew Christians in their faith, against the cavils and scoffs of the Jews.

He now raises their minds to a higher elevation, by an argument drawn from the Divinity of Christ.

The following remarks on this point are from an English Theologian, who was raised up by God's Providence in the last century to defend the great doctrines of the Atonement and Divinity of Christ;—

The Apostle tells us, that "it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins" (Heb. x. 4); which words appear to resolve the satisfaction, not merely into God's free acceptance, but into the intrinsic value of the sacrifice. And while we rest it there, I do not see why we may not say, that it is not possible for the blood of any creature to take away the sins of the world, since no creature can do more than his duty, nor can have any stock of merit to spare for other creatures. In this light, the Scripture doctrine of the satisfaction infers the Divinity of Him that made it; and hence it is, that those who have denied our Lord's proper Divinity, have commonly gone on to deny any proper satisfaction also; or while they have admitted it in words or in name, they have denied the thing. Scripture itself seems to resolve the satisfaction into the Divinity of the Person suffering. It was Jehovah that was pierced. (Zech. xii. 10, compared with John xix. 37.) It was God that purchased the Church with His own blood. (Acts xx. 28). It was ὁ δεσπότης, the High Lord, that bought us. (2 Pet. ii. 1.) It was the Lord of Glory that was crucified. (1 Cor. ii. 8.) And indeed, it is unintelligible how the blood of a creature should make any proper atonement or expiation for sin, as before intimated. This again is another of those arguments, or considerations, which at once insinuate both the truth of our doctrine and the importance of it. However, if Scripture otherwise testifieth that Christ is properly God, and the same Scriptures elsewhere, independently of our present argument, declare that Christ has atoned for us, then, from these two propositions put together, results this third, —that a divine Person has satisfied for us. Consequently, whosoever impugns the Divinity of Christ, justly so called, does at the same time impugn the true notion of the satisfaction made by Him. Dr. Waterland (on the Doctrine of the Trinity, v. p. 38).

5. εἰσερχόμενος εἰς τὸν κόσμον] coming into the world, at His Incarnation. See i. 6.

5—7. θυσίαν—τὸ θέλημά σου] From Ps. xl. 6—8, almost verbatim from LXX.

5. σῶμα δὲ κατηρτίσω μοι] So LXX. The Hebrew is אָזְנַיִם כָּרִיתָ לִי (azenaim carithalli). Thou hast opened mine ears; literally, ears hast thou digged, or hollowed out, for me.

The metaphor has sometimes been supposed to be drawn from boring the ear of a servant with an awl, in token of perpetual subjection. (Exod. xxi. 6.) So Bp. Pearson (on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 230). Joseph Mede (Works, p. 896).

But it is, probably, to be deduced from the act of removing all obstructions from the ears, and unstopping the ears of the deaf (Isa. xxxv. 5), and of communicating the grace of attention, intelligence, and obedience.

The best illustration of this passage as applied to Christ is supplied by the prophet Isaiah (l. 4—6). Christ describing the complete subjection of His human body to the will of His Father, there says, "The Lord God wakeneth mine ear to hear, as the learned. The Lord God hath opened mine ear; and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back. I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; I hid not my face from shame and spitting." Cp. Stuart, pp. 250. 448.

But it may be asked, How is it that St. Paul expresses the words of the Psalmist, Mine ears Thou hast opened, by the Greek words σῶμα κατηρτίσω μοι?

The answer is,—

(1) He found this reading in the Septuagint, the Authorized Greek Version made by Jews, and used by them. The Jews were familiar with this rendering, and might have excepted against any other from him. See above, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 365.

(2) Although this rendering is not a literal one, yet it is a very just and appropriate Paraphrase. And it is to be borne in mind, that Expository Paraphrases, rather than literal Versions, were familiar and congenial to the Jews. They had their Chaldee Targums, and the Septuagint Version was their Greek Targum. It was purposely designed to explain the idioms of the Hebrew text, often obscure to Greek readers, and to render them more intelligible to them by paraphrastic interpretations. It ought to be regarded in this light by us, if we are to appreciate the Septuagint aright.

The sense and voice of the verb κατηρτίσω, as used here, is to be carefully noticed. Καταρτίζω signifies to train, to discipline, and to instruct, to mould and prepare. See Ps. xvii. 36; lxxix. 16. Luke vi. 40. Heb. xiii. 21. In the N. T. it also means to repair, reclaim, restore. (Matt. iv. 21. Gal. vi. 1.)

The middle voice καρτίζομαι is used here, and it signifies to train or prepare for oneself. Thus κατηρτίσω αἶνον, thou hast prepared praise for thyself. (Ps. viii. 3. See Matt. xxi. 16.) And here σῶμα κατηρτίσω means, Thou didst train my body for Thyself; Thou hast disciplined my body for Thy service.

This sense is expressive of Christ's complete Obedience in His Human Body, as represented by the prophet Isaiah (l. 4, 5). And this paraphrase might well be accepted by St. Paul from the hands of the Hellenistic Jews, who made the Septuagint Version, as a suitable explanation of the meaning of the words, My ears Thou hast opened, which mean, Thou hast made me subject and obedient to Thyself.

If we may venture to use the expression, our Blessed Lord's Obedience to His heavenly Father was so perfect, that in His Human Body He may be said to have been all Ear.

How far it may be right to presume, that the authors of the Septuagint Version,—a Version prepared by the ancient people οὐκ εὐδόκησας. 7 τότε εἶπον, Ἰδοὺ, ἥκω, ἐν κεφαλίδι βιβλίου γέγραπται περὶ ἐμοῦ, τοῦ ποιῆσαι, ὁ Θεὸς, τὸ θέλημά σου. 8 Ἀνώτερον λέγων, Ὅτι θυσίας καὶ προσφορὰς καὶ ὁλοκαυτώματα καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας οὐκ ἠθέλησας, οὐδὲ εὐδόκησας, αἵτινες κατὰ τὸν νόμον προσφέρονται, 9 τότε εἴρηκεν, Ἰδοὺ, ἥκω τοῦ ποιῆσαι τὸ θέλημά σου· ἀναιρεῖ τὸ πρῶτον ἵνα τὸ δεύτερον στήσῃ· 10 [d] ἐν ᾧ θελήματι ἡγιασμένοι ἐσμὲν διὰ τῆς προσφορᾶς τοῦ σώματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐφάπαξ. of God for the future use of the Christian Church, and employed by the Holy Ghost in numberless passages of the New Testament (as the present Epistle shows), had been guided by the Holy Spirit Himself, to express His own meaning by paraphrastic expressions, which might afterwards be adopted by Him in dictating the New Testament, is a very interesting and important question, which deserves more careful consideration than it has ever yet received, or is likely to receive, until we have been enabled to understand and to appreciate more justly the Septuagint Version, which stands pre-eminent and alone among all Versions of the Old Testament, as having been consecrated by the use of the Holy Ghost Himself in writing the New.

In the mean time we may here adopt the words of a learned and wise Theologian of our own:—I am not of their opinion, who think that the writers of the New Testament, who were inspired by the Holy Ghost, and almost always quote the New Testament in the words of the Septuagint, are in need of an apology,—that is too feeble a word. But my judgment rather is, that we ought to examine whether the Hebrew Text may not bear the Interpretation which they have given it, in order that the sense of the Old Testament may be more rightly understood, and the authority of the New may be more clearly confirmed. Bp. Pearson (Præf. Par. in LXX, reprinted by Archdn. Churton in his Minor Works, p. 265).

6. περὶ ἁμαρτίας] on account of sin. Cp. Rom. viii. 3. Winer, p. 366.

— οὐκ εὐδόκησας] Thou hadst no pleasure in. The verb is found with an accusative, as here, in LXX, Gen. xxxiii. 10, et passim.

7. ἐν κεφαλίδι] in the roll. Κεφαλὶς properly signifies cornu, the end of the cylindrical stick, round which the Volume, מְגִלָּה (megillah), was rolled. The megillah itself, or roll, is sometimes rendered by κεφαλὶς, its most conspicuous part. (Ezek. ii. 9; iii. 1—3.) Cp. Wetstein, Lünem.

It has been asked, In what portion of what book is this written?

The word κεφαλὶς, used for megillah, supplies the answer to this question.

The decree of God, that Christ should come to do His will, is not declared in this or that part only, but in the Volume itself taken as a whole and rolled up together; but to be afterwards unfolded in Christ. See Cyril and others in Ps. xl. and Theophylact here.

8. θυσίας καὶ προσφορὰς] So A, C, D*, Lachm., Tisch., Bleek, Lün.—Elz. has θυσίαν καὶ προσφοράν.

10. διὰ τῆς προσφορᾶς] by means of the offering of the one sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. Not as was the case with the Jewish Sacrifices, which were repeated daily; this sacrifice was offered once for all. Œcumen.

11. ἱερεύς] A, C have ἀρχιερεὺς, so Lachm., Lünem., not Tisch.

12. οὗτος δὲ (so A, C, D*, E; Elz. has αὐτὸς) κ.τ.λ.] but this man having offered one Sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down at the right hand of God.

The words εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς signify for ever, that is, available for ever. See above on vii. 3, μένει ἱερεὺς εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς, and cp. x. 14. This phrase (εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς) occurs in three other places in this Epistle, the two just cited, and x. 1. And in all these cases it is to be construed with the verb preceding, and not (as is done by some expositors) with what follows. Cp. Theopyl., who says, "Christ offered one Sacrifice for our sins, namely, His own body; a sacrifice which is sufficient for us for ever" (εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς), so that we need no other sacrifice.

And so Chrys., ἅπαξ προσηνέχθη, καὶ εἰς τὸ ἀεὶ ἤρκεσε, and so Œcumen., μίαν εἰς τὸ διηνεκὲς ἀρκοῦσαν. So Valck., Böhme, Lachm.

It is obviously inconsistent with grammatical rules, to interpret the Apostle's words as meaning "having offered one perpetual sacrifice."

(1) Observe the contrast between ἕστηκε, stands, said of the Jewish Priests, v. 11, and the aorist, ἐκάθισε, sate down, said of Christ, and declaring His dignity and continuance, sovereignty and judicature. Theophyl., Œcumen. Bp. Pearson, Art. iv. p. 522.

(2) The second contrast is between the same sacrifices offered often by the Levitical Priests, and the one Sacrifice offered once for all by Christ.

The statement of the Apostle here is of great importance in reference to the true nature of the solemn work performed in the Holy Eucharist.

St. Paul declares that Christ offered one Sacrifice for ever—once for all, v. 10.

He proves the insufficiency of the Levitical sacrifices, from the fact, that the same sacrifice was often repeated under the Law. See ix. 25; x. 1, 2.

If, therefore, it were true, that the Sacrifice of Christ can be repeated, it is evident that the Sacrifice of Christ could not be, what the Apostle affirms it is, a sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world.

His argument is conclusive against the notion, that the Sacrifice made by Christ upon the Cross may be repeated. Such a view of that Sacrifice degrades it to the level of the Levitical sacrifices, which, as St. Paul teaches, were superseded by it.

St. Paul's doctrine appears to be no less cogent against the tenet of others, that Christ's one Sacrifice is still continued in the Holy Eucharist; and that the Holy Eucharist is itself a "Sacrifice identical with the Sacrifice offered on the Cross."

St. Paul says that Christ "has offered one Sacrifice for ever," that is, one Sacrifice available for ever—as the Ancient Expositors interpret the word. He does not say, that He offered one perpetual Sacrifice. A past act cannot be perpetual. But Christ has offered a Sacrifice available in perpetuity. He says that Christ has done this, and that after He had done it, He took His seat (ἐκάθισεν) at the right hand of God.

If it were true, that the Sacrifice of the Cross is continued in the Holy Eucharist, and that the Holy Eucharist itself is a Sacrifice identical with the Sacrifice on the Cross, then, since the Sacrifice of Christ is inseparable from His sufferings, Christ's sufferings must still be continued. Then Christ is "crucified afresh" in the Holy Eucharist. Such language as this has even been adopted by some who hold this tenet; and they do not scruple to say, that the same Jesus Christ Who died upon the Cross "is again immolated on our Altars." "The Sacrifice which He offered on the Cross is every day repeated on our Altars." (See the evidence of this, cited in Notes at Paris, p. 72.)

This proposition is contrary to St. Paul's teaching, who rejects the notion of Christ offering Himself often; for then He would have often suffered; but now once for all He hath been manifested to abolish Sin by the Sacrifice of Himself; and after He has accomplished this one Sacrifice, He has taken His seat at the Right Hand of God. See ix. 25.

Indeed this proposition seems even to come under the fearful condemnation pronounced by the Apostle on those who "crucify Christ afresh," after the Crucifixion on Calvary, and who "put Him again to open shame." (Heb. vi. 6.)

The doctrine of the Apostle on this subject is thus expounded by ancient Authors:

He consecrated Wine for a memorial of Himself. Tertullian (de Animâ, 17).

The Eucharist is the memorial, in which a remembrance is made of the Passion which the Son of God has endured for Christians. Justin Martyr (c. Tryphon. c. 117. See also c. 70).

Similarly the Eucharist is called an act done "in commemorationem Domini" several times by St. Cyprian, Ep. 63, ad Cæcilium.

15 Μαρτυρεῖ δὲ ἡμῖν καὶ τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον· μετὰ γὰρ τὸ εἰρηκέναι, 16 g Αὕτη

After having done all other things, Christ having auspiciously made a marvellous Sacrifice and special immolation to the Father, offered it up for the salvation of us all; and He commanded us to offer a commemoration thereof continually, instead of a sacrifice to God. We have received a command to execute on the Holy Table the commemoration of this one Sacrifice, by means of the symbols of His Body and of His saving Blood, according to the Laws of the New Testament. We offer the incense spoken of by the Prophet (Mal. i. 11). In every place incense shall be offered unto My Name, and a pure offering, saith the Lord of Hosts. We offer sacrifice and incense, because, according to the mysteries delivered us by Christ, we perform the Remembrance of the Great Sacrifice, and present our Eucharistic sacrifice of thanksgiving (προσκομίζομεν εὐχαριστίαν) for our salvation with holy hymns and prayers to God; as also in that we are there consecrating ourselves wholly in body and soul, as a sacrifice, dedicating ourselves to Him and to His High Priest the Word. Eusebius (Demonst. Evang. i. 10).

In the holy oblation and participation of the body and blood of Christ, Christians celebrate a memory of the same Sacrifice that has been accomplished, "peracti ejusdem sacrificii memoriam celebrant." Augustine (c. Faustum, xx. 18).

Was not Christ offered once in Himself? And yet He is offered in the Sacrament daily. Nor does any one say what is false in saying that He is so offered. For unless Sacraments bore a resemblance to the things of which they are Sacraments, they would not be Sacraments. But from this resemblance they have the names of the things themselves. Augustine (Ep. 23, ad Bonifac. Serm. 220).

The awful Mystery of the Lord's Body, which is celebrated by us, is not the offering of different sacrifices, but it is the commemoration of the Sacrifice which has been offered up once for all (τῆς ἅπαξ προσενηνεγμένης θυσίας ἀνάμνησις). Eulogius, Archbishop of Alexandria (c. Novatianos, lib. ii. Bibl. Phot. 280).

The Jewish sacrifices were to be offered continually on account of their insufficiency. But (it may be said) do not we Christians offer daily? Yes, we do offer, but this we do, making a commemoration of Christ's death. And this is one sacrifice, and not many. How, you may ask, is it one sacrifice, and not many? Because it was once offered. . . . Our High Priest is He Who offered the Sacrifice which cleanses us; that Sacrifice we offer even now, that which was then offered, and is unconsumed. This which we do, is done for a commemoration of what was then done. Chrys.

We do not offer different sacrifices, as the High Priest did, but always the same. But rather we perform a commemoration of a Sacrifice. Chrysostom here.

The language of Theodoret on this subject may be seen above on ch. viii. 4.

Hence we see that the Fathers applied the word "to offer" to the Eucharist as a commemorative sacrifice; and that they speak of the Eucharist as a resemblance and a commemoration of the one Sacrifice offered on the Cross.

It is certain that a person speaking of a resemblance might designate it by the name of the thing or person which it resembles; but he never would designate a person or thing as a resemblance of himself or of itself. The Fathers might well call the Eucharist a sacrifice, if they believed that the Eucharist represents, and conveys the blessings of, the One Sacrifice offered on the Cross. But they would never have called it a resemblance of that sacrifice, if they had thought that it was identical with, or a repetition of, that One Sacrifice.

They would naturally be disposed to speak with fervour of the transcendent blessedness and glory of these Holy Mysteries, in which the Son of God gives Himself to us, and feeds us with the food of Immortality.

They had not seen the evils which have arisen since their days, from the proposition, that the Holy Eucharist is a continuation or a reiteration of the Sacrifice of the Cross. They would, therefore, not be so scrupulous in speaking on this subject, as they would be, if they lived now. This is to be borne in mind in reading their works.

The opinions of eminent Anglican Divines on this subject may be seen in Bp. Andrewes (ad Bellarmin. p. 184, and in Acts ii. 42, Vol. v. p. 66, and as quoted above on 1 Cor. v. 8). *Abp. On the whole, we may affirm on the authority of Holy Writ,—

(1) That in the Holy Communion we make a solemn recordation (ἀνάμνησιν) of Christ, according to His own command (Luke xxii. 19. 1 Cor. xi. 24), and show the Lord's Death (τὸν θάνατον τοῦ Κυρίου καταγγέλλομεν) till He come (1 Cor. xi. 25, 26).

(2) That thereto we come together in order to break bread (see on Acts xx. 7), and in the bread then broken we have a visible representation of Christ's body broken for us on the Cross (Luke xxii. 19. 30. 1 Cor. xi. 24), and given to us to be our living bread, the bread of life, the bread of heaven, the bread of God. (John vi. 35. 58.)

(3) That the Holy Eucharist is the Communion of the Body of Christ and of the Blood of Christ. (1 Cor. x. 16.)

(4) That it was instituted for the purpose of conveying remission of sins to us (Matt. xxvi. 28), and that pardon is actually dispensed and applied therein to each individual who comes thereto with the requisite dispositions of Repentance, Faith, and Love. (1 Cor. xi. 28.)

(5) That thereby we dwell in Christ, and Christ in us (John vi. 56), and that therein Christ gives us His own most blessed Body and Blood, which are meat indeed and drink indeed; and puts into our hands a pledge and earnest, as well as a mean and instrument, of a glorious Resurrection of our bodies at the last Day, and of eternal life, both to our souls and bodies. (John vi. 54. 56.)

(6) That therein we are knit together as fellow members of the Body of Christ; for we are all partakers of that one bread. (1 Cor. x. 17.)

(7) That in it we make a devout oblation and sacrifice of ourselves, and present our souls and bodies a living sacrifice (Rom. xii. 1), which is our rational worship (λατρεία), and offer an eucharistic sacrifice of our praise and thanksgiving, and of our alms (Heb. xiii. 15, 16); and, moreover, plead before God the one all-sufficient Sacrifice offered once for all by the outpouring of the blood of the Son of God, God and Man, on the Cross, and represent and exhibit it by a perpetual commemoration, according to the Lord's commandment; and that we receive from Him pardon and grace, peace, and joy unspeakable in those Holy Mysteries, which He has appointed and instituted for the perpetual conveyance, bestowal, and application of all the benefits of that one Sacrifice offered once for all, to the great and endless comfort of the soul and body of every penitent, devout, faithful, and loving receiver; whom Christ unites therein with Himself and with God, and makes him an heir of a glorious Immortality.

Cp. above notes on John vi., and on 1 Cor. v. 7, 8, and 1 Cor. x. 4, and 16—20, and below, Heb. xiii. 10.

These benefits will amply suffice for the peace, joy, and assurance of every devout and humble Christian, who will not desire to be "wise above what is written," and will not pry with inquisitive and profane curiosity into the inscrutable manner of Christ's presence and working in these Holy Mysteries (see on John vi. 25); but will joyfully receive Him into his heart, and will shrink from any thing which might tend to impair the transcendent dignity of the one Sacrifice once offered on the Cross, by reducing it to the low level of the Levitical Sacrifices, whose imperfection was proved by their repetition; and will not entertain the notion of bringing down the Adorable Saviour from His glorious Throne in Heaven to be sacrificed by human hands, and to suffer again upon earth; nor be persuaded to change that living well-spring of spiritual health and joy, which gushed from the Rock, smitten once for all on Calvary, and is to be drunk with longings and thirstings of the devout souls of all true Israelites, into a stagnant or frozen pool, to be viewed by the worshipper from afar, but not to be tasted by him, although the Lord has said, "Drink ye all of this." (Matt. xxvi. 27.)

16. τὴν διάνοιαν] So A, C, D*, Lachm., Bleek, Lünemann. Elz. has τῶν διανοιῶν.

20. ἣν ἐνεκαίνισεν κ.τ.λ.] an entrance which He newly dedicated for us, a fresh and everliving way through the veil, that is, His flesh.

The verb ἐγκαινίζω (see ix. 18) continues happily the idea of newness and dedication, and derives a special interest from the word Ἐγκαίνια, as used by the Jews. See on John x. 22.

Also the word πρόσφατος seems purposely chosen as being properly applied to a victim newly killed. (Homer, Iliad. xxiv. 757, and Wetstein here. Passow in v. Lobeck, Phryn. p. 374.) The new sacrifice of Christ, the One Victim typified by all victims, opened the new entrance to the true Holy of Holies.

The Veil hanging between the Divine Presence and Throne in the Holy of Holies was a figure of Christ's Human Nature, veiling the Godhead; and when that Veil of the body of the Second Adam was rent on the Cross by His Death, then the obstruction which was placed between God and man, by the Old Adam, was removed, and the new and living Way was opened into the Heavenly Oracle. See Chrys.

21.] And having a great High Priest over the House of God, let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed (λελουμένοι) with pure water. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith.

In these few words are pointed out

(1) The meritorious cause of our Justification, expressed by the sprinkling, viz. with the blood of Christ, in allusion to the blood of the ancient sacrifices.

(2) The instrumental mean of conveyance, namely, Baptism, expressed by the washing of our bodies.

(3) The instrumental mean of reception on our part, expressed by the word Faith.

(4) The merits of Christ applied in Baptism by the Spirit, and received by a lively faith, and effecting our Justification for the time being. See above, Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans, pp. 198, 199.

I know not whether the Apostle's here laying so much stress upon our bodies being washed with pure water, might not, among several other similar considerations drawn from the New Testament, lead the early Fathers into a thought which they had, and which has not been so commonly observed, namely, that the water in Baptism secured, as it were, or sealed the body to a happy Resurrection, while the Spirit more immediately secured the soul; and so the whole man was understood to be spiritually cleansed, and accepted of God, in and by Baptism. "Corpora enim nostra per lavacrum, illam quæ est ad incorruptionem unitatem acceperunt; animæ autem per Spiritum; unde et utraque necessaria, cùm utraque proficiunt ad vitam Dei," &c. Irenæus, lib. i. c. 17, p. 208, ed. See above on 1 Cor. x. 16—20.

25. τὴν ἐπισυναγωγήν] the gathering of ourselves together in the public assemblies of the Church. Cp. Schöttgen, p. 982. Do not omit through fear this public profession of your faith; do not forfeit the means of grace, and of mutual edification, which are bestowed by the Ministry of the Word and Sacraments on those who are "gathered together" in Christ's Name, like the Eagles of the Gospel, "gathered together" to the Body of Christ, slain for them, and giving them life and glory.

On this remarkable word ἐπισυναγωγή, see note on Matt. xxiv. 28. Luke xvii. 37; and on 2 Thess. ii. 1, which will suggest many reflections with regard to it.

34. δεσμίοις] prisoners. So A, D* (B and C are defective here), and several Cursives, and the Vulgate, Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, Armenian Versions; and Chrys., Theodoret, in their commentaries; and Valck., Griesb., Lach., Scholz., Bleek, Tisch., Lünemann. Elz. has δεσμοῖς μου, my bonds. Cp. xiii. 3.

Though δεσμίοις is in all probability the true reading, yet it is very likely that in commemorating their affection and succour to those who were in bonds for Christ, the Apostle intends to include a grateful tribute of acknowledgment for their kindness to himself, who had lately been a bondsman of Christ for four years, two at Cæsarea, and two at Rome. The word δέσμιος, applied to St. Paul in Acts xxiii. 18; xxv. 14. 27; xxviii. 17, is so used by himself, Philem. 1. 9. Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1. 2 Tim. i. 8.

— ἑαυτοῖς] for yourselves. Elz. prefixes ἐν, which is not in D, E, I, K, and is rejected by Griesb., Scholz., Tisch.

After ὕπαρξιν Elz. adds ἐν οὐρανοῖς, which is not in A, D*, nor in the Vulgate, Coptic, Æthiopic Versions, and appears to be only an explanatory gloss, but would scarcely have been corrected by a copyist.

36.] See Bp. Sanderson, i. 203. 209.

37. ὅσον ὅσον] how little, how little. Isa. xxvi. 20, LXX. Cp. Aristoph. Vesp. 213.

38.] Hab. ii. 3, 4, LXX. On the text, ὁ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως ζήσεται, the key-note of St. Paul's three Epistles to the Galatians, Romans, and Hebrews, see above on Gal. iii. 11, 12, and Gal. vi. 11, and Introduction to this Epistle, above, p. 368.

After δίκαιος, A, N* add μου, which is received by Lach. and Tisch., not by Delitz. D* has μου after πίστεως, but μου is not in D, E, I, K, N. Inasmuch as μου is found (either after δίκαιος or after πίστεως) in the Manuscripts of the Septuagint, it does not seem so probable that the copyists would have omitted it, as that they would have inserted it.

— ἐὰν ὑποστείληται, οὐκ εὐδοκεῖ ἡ ψυχή μου ἐν αὐτῷ] So the words stand in the Septuagint, where the Original has Behold, עֻפְלָה (uplah); His soul (the soul of God) is not content, or pleased, in him.

But what is the meaning of the word עֻפְלָה (uplah)?

The root substantive ophal signifies a hill, or a tower. (Isa. xxxii. 14. Mic. iv. 8. 2 Chron. xxvii. 3. Neh. iii. 27.) Hence the word uplah (the form of which is matter of controversy, whether it is to be considered as a verb, adjective, or substantive) is employed to signify a proud presumptuous reliance on self, and a departure from God, and rebellion against Him. See Numb. xiv. 44, where the word is rendered by παραβιασάμενοι in LXX, and by presumed in our Version.

Cp. Deut. i. 43, where LXX has also παραβιασάμενοι.

The act of defection, described in Numb. xiv. 44 (the only place besides Hab. ii. 4 where the word occurs), seems to offer the best exposition of its sense.

The question is, whether the Greek words ὑποστέλλομαι and ὑποστολή can bear this sense?

The proper meaning of ὑποστέλλομαι is to shorten sail, or to reef sail, with a view of declining or avoiding a danger. Hence it came to signify the act of shunning, of separating oneself from any object or person. See above on Gal. ii. 12. This act may proceed either from fear, hatred, or pride. Cp. 2 Thess. iii. 6, and the passages from Philo quoted by Loesner here, and on Acts xx. 20. The main idea is that of separation.

The words, therefore, ἐὰν ὑποστείληται, as used by the LXX, and by St. Paul, mean, If he separate himself from Me, instead of relying on Me by faith; for the Just shall live by faith in Me, and not by reliance on himself, which is shown by his act of defection. Behold that man is lifted up by pride, and has set himself against Me; and I have no pleasure in him.

But we (says the Apostle) are not of defection, unto perdition; but we are of faith, to the saving of the soul.

It is evident from this text, that he who has once been accounted just by God may separate himself, and may forfeit God's favour, and incur perdition. See on vi. 4, and 1 Cor. x. 12. 2 Pet. ii. 21; and Bp. Sanderson, v. p. 330; Bp. Pearson, Pref. ad LXX, Minor Works, ii. p. 262—264, and the Expositors of the XVIth Article of the Church of England.

Indeed, it would seem that the Apostle, who (it will be observed) has inverted the order of the two clauses as they stand in Hab. ii. 4, has done so with the purpose of rendering them more instructive, in the first place, to the Hebrew Christians, by reminding them that though they themselves had once been illuminated (v. 32; cp. vi. 4 and following verses), and therefore had been accounted just in the sight of God, yet, unless they hold their profession firm, and without wavering (see v. 23—31), they may fail of salvation; and for the sake of inculcating on all men the salutary lessons of godly fear, and watchfulness, and patient perseverance unto the end, by this serious warning, that they who have once been justified "may fall finally and totally" from the faith.

The above exposition is confirmed by a passage in the ancient Epistle ascribed to S. Barnabas, where it is said, c. 4, "Ye ought not to withdraw yourselves separately as if ye were justified, but ye ought to come together, and consider, what is most conducive and profitable to the whole body of the faithful. For 'woe to them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight'" (Isa. v. 21). Let us become spiritual; let us be a Temple perfect to God.

CH. XI. 1. Ἔστι δὲ πίστις κ.τ.λ.] Having declared the sin and penalty of falling away from the Gospel, and the blessedness of Faith, he takes up that word (in the usual manner of St. Paul, see on vi. 20), and proceeds to expatiate upon it. He declares that the true object of Faith is CHRIST; and that it is not to be imagined that His Gospel (as the Jews pretended) is a novel religion, at variance with the Law of Moses, but, on the contrary, that the Fathers under the Law, and before the Law, believed in Him; and were thus consoled under affliction, and were justified and saved by God, and thus became Ensamples to us.

He thus accomplishes a double purpose. He displays the power of Faith, and that it was able to do, what the Law could not do; and he shows the Hebrew Christians that in believing in Christ they could not be rightly charged by the Jews with abandoning the Faith of their Fathers; and, in a sublime strain of heavenly eloquence, he comforts them under their afflictions, and exhorts them to patience, by showing what their Fathers were empowered to do by Faith in Christ not then come; and excites them to consider what they themselves may do, and ought to do, by Faith in the same Christ, Who has now been clearly revealed. Cp. Theodoret, and Cyril Hieros. Catech. p. 72, on the nature of Faith; and see below, v. 33.

On the accent of ἔστι, see Kühner, i. p. 72.

— ὑπόστασις] firm trust in. See iii. 14.

— ἔλεγχος] conviction; the mental state of being convinced of their reality.

2. ἐν ταύτῃ γάρ] for in and by this. A proof that Faith looks to unseen things. For the Fathers, who died long ago, before the revelation of the Object of their Faith, were attested as just by God, because they lived in and by Faith.

The preposition signifies something more than that being in a state of faith they were attested; it means that they were attested on that account. See this use of ἐν in 1 Cor. xi. 22.

3. τοὺς αἰῶνας] the worlds (i. 2).

— τὰ βλεπόμενα] A, D*, E* have τὸ βλεπόμενον, which has been approved by Lach., Bleek, Tisch., De Wette, Lünemann, Delitz., and may, perhaps, be the true reading; but compare 2 Cor. iv. 18.

No mortal eye saw God making the world; He did not make it by the hand, but by His word. And Faith teaches us that God, Who has existed from eternity, made it out of nothing. Theodoret.

4. ἔτι λαλεῖ] he yet speaketh: he lives and preaches by his death the blessedness of faith, and doctrine of a future Resurrection. The first blood which was shed on the Earth was that of Abel, and it was shed by Cain. He, whose offering "pleased God," was slain by his brother, whose offering was not accepted by God. Thus the first Death that happened in the World proclaims the certainty of a Resurrection and Judgment to come, and of future rewards to the righteous. Thus Abel's blood cries from the ground (Gen. iv. 10). Cp. below, xii. 24.

See Chrys. and Theophyl., who says that λαλεῖται is the reading of some MSS., but is not approved by him. Λαλεῖ is in A and some Cursives, and in many of the Fathers; and is received by Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., Bleek, Bloomf., Lünem., Delitz. Elz. has λαλεῖται, with D, E, I, K.

5.] With this and the following verses the reader may compare the similar treatment of the subject by S. Clement, the fellow-labourer of St. Paul (Phil. iv. 3), in his Epistle to the Corinthians, c. 9—12, Ἐνὼχ δίκαιος εὑρεθεὶς μετετέθη . . . Νῶε . . . κόσμῳ ἐκήρυξεν . . . Ἀβραὰμ ὁ φίλος προσαγορευθεὶς κ.τ.λ. The use made of this Epistle by S. Clement is an important testimony to its authority, and to the reverence in which it was then held in the Western Church. Cp. i. 3, and Introduction above, p. 357, 8.

— Ἐνὼχ] Enoch, the seventh from Adam, taken from this world to Rest, and a type of the heavenly sabbath, or Rest, that remaineth to the people of God (iv. 9). The language of the Author here is from the Septuagint Version, Gen. v. 22. 24.

— τοῦ μὴ ἰδεῖν θάνατον] in order that he might not see death. The purpose of God in translating him is thus declared. Cp. Luke ii. 26. Lünemann.

6. ἔστι] He exists; not ἐστί. There is a contrast here between the words ἔστι and γίγνεται. God always exists, and He becomes a Rewarder of those who seek Him out.

7. εὐλαβηθεὶς] having been inspired with godly fear by the χρηματισμός. Cp. v. 7. Acts xxiii. 10. On εὐλάβεια, see v. 7.

— κατέκρινε τὸν κόσμον] condemned the world: "comparatione melioris ejus fidei et facti" (Primasius). He looked for the only city that hath the foundation that cannot be moved. A strong contrast to the tents in which they dwelt as strangers and sojourners, and which they were ever moving from place to place.

11. καὶ αὐτὴ Σάῤῥα] even Sara herself, who was before incredulous. (Gen. xviii. 12.) Sara is presented as a pattern of repentance to the Hebrew Christians, who had fallen into unbelief. Chrys.

The word ἔτεκεν, after καιρὸν, has been expunged by some as a gloss; but, it seems, without adequate reason.

13. Κατὰ πίστιν ἀπέθανον] these not only lived, but died, not according to the present world (κατ' αἰῶνα τοῦτον), through which they passed as strangers, but according to Faith, which sees what is invisible and future, and lives in and by that spiritual sight.

— ἰδόντες] Elz. adds καὶ πεισθέντες, but against the best authorities.

— ἀσπασάμενοι] having saluted them; having hailed or greeted them from afar, as a friend does to a distant friend, with whom he cannot have nearer intercourse. "Otho protendens manus adorare vulgum, jacere oscula" (Tacit. Hist. i. 36). "Blandaque devexæ jactaret basia rhedæ" (Juvenal, iv. 118). "Jactat basia Tibicen" (Phædr. 87). This salutation, when addressed to Princes, was called 'labratum,' ἀσπαστικὸν βασιλέως. See Ouzel and others on Minuc. Felix, p. 14.

There may also be a reference here to the act of προσκύνησις, as an act of reverence paid to sacred objects. See Minuc. Felix, p. 12, ed. Ouzel, "Cæcilius, simulacro Serapidis denotato, manum ori admovens osculum labiis pressit." And compare Job xxxi. 26—28. Ps. ii. 12. 1 Kings xix. 8.

Or the image may be from the practice of mariners homeward bound recognizing and saluting from a distance the promontories and features of a beloved land. Chrys., Estius, Trench.

15. ἐξέβησαν] So A, D*, E*, Lach., Tisch.—Elz. has ἐξῆλθον.

17. προσενήνοχεν] has offered. Observe the perfect tense. He has done it, in will and in God's sight, although it was not really effected. God here describes the act as done by Abraham because He knows that it would have been done by him, if He Himself had not interfered to prevent it.

— πειραζόμενος] being tried; not as if God did not know what he was. It is well said by Clement of Rome, that ἐπείρασεν ὁ Θεὸς τὸν Ἀβραὰμ, οὐκ ἀγνοῶν τίς ἦν, ἀλλ' ἵνα τοῖς μετὰ ταῦτα δείξῃ, καὶ μὴ κρύψῃ τοιοῦτον, καὶ διεγείρῃ εἰς μίμησιν τῆς ἐκείνου πίστεως καὶ ὑπομονῆς, καὶ πείσῃ καὶ τέκνων στοργῆς ἀμελεῖν, πρὸς ἐκπλήρωσιν θείου προστάγματος (Clement R. Frag. 2).

— προσέφερεν] was offering up visibly. Hence St. James speaks of the act as done, ii. 21; and so Clement R. 10, προσήνεγκεν αὐτὸν θυσίαν.

18. πρὸς ὃν] to whom, i. e. to Abraham; not "concerning whom" (Isaac).

19. ὅθεν αὐτὸν καὶ ἐν παραβολῇ ἐκομίσατο] whence he received him back even also in a parable. Observe the conjunction καί. The sense is, Abraham not only received back his son Isaac, whom in will he had already offered (see v. 17); but, as an additional reward for his faith, he received him back also in and with a parable, or likeness of some other great recovery, none other than the Resurrection of the Son of Abraham, Christ, in Whom all Abraham's seed are blessed, typified by this restoration of Isaac from the dead. Then, in faith, Abraham prophesied and said, The Lord will provide for Himself a Lamb for a burnt offering (Gen. xxii. 8); then, in faith, he called the name of the place Jehovah Jireh (v. 14); then in faith, he saw the day of Christ, and was glad (John viii. 56). Therefore he then received something more than Isaac from the dead. He saw in him a parable, a figurative vision of Christ given up by His Father to death, and raised by Him from the dead. Theodoret. Cp. Chrys., Œcumen., Theophyl., Primasius. See above on Gal. iii. 6, and Delitz. here.

Isaac was sacrificed and yet lived, to show that Christ should truly die and truly live again. In Abraham's intention, Isaac died; indeed, the Apostle does not hesitate to say that Abraham offered him up. In his expectation (v. 19) he was to rise from the dead; and therefore, being spared, Isaac was received by Abraham as from the dead. And all this was transacted, in order to presignify that the only Son of God was really and truly to be sacrificed and die, and after death to be raised to life. And thus the Resurrection of the Messiah was represented in a Parable. Cp. Bp. Pearson, Art. v. p. 476, who quotes Gregory Nyssen in Resur. Orat. i. p. 383. "Ideo immolatus Isaac non est, quia Resurrectio Filio Dei servata est." (Prosper.)

The interpretations of some learned modern Expositors (e. g. Lünemann), that παραβολὴ here means a stake, or deposit, which is risked for a greater sum, or with great peril and daring, are inconsistent with the common usage of the New Testament, where παραβολὴ occurs often, and only in the sense of a likeness, and were unknown to Christian Antiquity, and are inadmissible. The sense in which the Author of this Epistle uses the word παραβολὴ above, ix. 9, is the best exponent of his meaning here.

21. ἕκαστον τ. υἱῶν] Ephraim and Manasseh. (Gen. xlviii. 3. 5—16. 20.) Some ancient writers suppose a symbolical act in the crossing of the hands of the Patriarch in this act of benediction.

— προσεκύνησεν] worshipped God; in thankfulness for the past, and beholding in faith the blessings which hereafter would be vouchsafed to his seed.

There is no ground for the supposition, that the Patriarch Jacob did obeisance to Joseph, his son, and much less to his staff, as a type of some other person. Indeed, it is expressly recorded that Joseph bowed down before Jacob in Gen. xlviii. 12; and the word there used to describe Joseph's action at that time is προσεκύνησεν in LXX. See also next note.

— ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ] leaning on the top of his staff.

This was done by Jacob, when he had made Joseph swear that he would not bury him in Egypt, but in the burying-place of his fathers at Machpelah. Gen. xlvii. 31.

The Hebrew text here, as now printed, relates that Jacob worshipped towards the head of his bed, עַל רֹאשׁ הַמִּטָּה (al rosh hammittah).

The rendering of the LXX, adopted by the Apostle here, enables us to understand aright the original Hebrew, and appears to show that it ought to be pointed הַמַּטֶּה (hammatteh), and not הַמִּטָּה (hammittah), and that the true meaning is (as the LXX and the Apostle expound it), 'he strengthened himself upon his staff, and so, leaning forward, worshipped God.' And so Augustine, in Genesim. Yet this text has been employed as an argument for the worship of images. See A Lapide here. Cp. Surenhus. p. 646. Schöttgen, p. 986.

The Septuagint Translators have κλίνην, bed, in Gen. xlviii. 2; and their translation, ῥάβδος, in Gen. xlvii. 31, to which the Apostle here refers, is entitled to more attention on that account.

Other Expositors have supposed, that the Septuagint Translators mistook the Hebrew Original; but it is more likely that there is an error in the present Masoretic points of the word מטתה, than in the Greek text cited by St. Paul.

The staff of Jacob might well be mentioned, as suggestive of God's mercies to him, according to the Patriarch's own words, With my staff I passed over Jordan, and now I am become two bands (Gen. xxxii. 10). Besides, the staff is the scriptural characteristic of travel. Hence the Israelites were commanded by God to eat the Passover with their loins girded, and their shoes on their feet, and their staff in their hand. (Exod. xii. 11.) And this introduction of the staff into the scene of the Patriarch's last charge concerning himself, and the removal of his own body after its mortal pilgrimage to repose in the promised land, the type of heaven, may be designed to remind the reader that even in his old age he was still a pilgrim, and was travelling onward from the Egypt of this world to his heavenly rest. It is doubtful, also, whether an Eastern bed could be properly described, in the modern sense of the words, as having a head.

The two incidents recorded in the Book of Genesis (xlvii. 27—31, and xlviii. 3), as interpreted by the LXX, appear to represent a gradual decline and decrepitude. In the former, the Patriarch is represented as leaning on his staff; in the latter he is laid upon his bed. In both, he shows his faith in the promises of God. In the former, he provides for his own burial in Canaan; in the latter, he blesses the sons of Joseph. St. Paul inverts the order of the incidents, and dwells more upon the latter, because it was more relevant to his purpose, as declaring the Patriarch's hope and trust in blessings to come, and as intimately connected with the similar command which he next recounts from Joseph himself.

22. περὶ τῶν ὀστέων] concerning his bones, which were taken out of Egypt, and buried at Sychem. See on Acts vii. 16.

This command concerning his bones, was an evidence of his faith in God's promise, that the seed of Abraham would go out of Egypt, and return to Canaan. Theophyl.

It was also a prophecy of a future resurrection, and a pre-announcement of the repose of the body to be glorified hereafter in the heavenly Canaan.

23. ἀστεῖον τὸ παιδίον] that the child was fair, viz. Moses, who refused to be called the child of Pharaoh's daughter.

Compare the words of St. Stephen concerning the same person, Acts vii. 21, 22.

The Speech of St. Stephen before the Hebrew Sanhedrim at Jerusalem seems to have been in the mind of the Author of this Epistle, and its thoughts and even its phrases are reproduced here. Cp. Acts vii. 2, 3—5. 16. 20, 21. 53. Heb. xi. 8, 9. 13—15. 22—24.

It was very natural, that St. Paul, especially, writing to the Hebrews at Jerusalem, and speaking to them as he does here, of those who had died in faith, as Martyrs for the truth, should bethink himself of the first Martyr, and of the speech which he had heard him speak there, and should be desirous of giving weight to his last words. Cp. Acts xxii. 20.

26. ὀνειδισμὸν τοῦ Χριστοῦ] the reproach of Christ; the reproach borne by Moses looking in faith to Christ and to His Cross. See above on ix. 19; and below, xiii. 13.

28. πεποίηκε] has celebrated. See Matt. xxvi. 18, ποιῶ τὸ πάσχα. Cp. Winer, § 40, p. 244.

29. γῆς] land. Omitted by Elz., but found in A, D*, E, and giving force to the sense as a contrast to θάλασσαν, sea; and received by Lach., Bleek, Tisch.

31. ἡ πόρνη] the harlot; emphatic. She who once had been so, but had been reclaimed from her evil life. Cp. Matt. xxvi. 6, Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ, that Simon who was well known to have once been a leper, and had been cleansed.

So Rahab. And she by repentance and faith became a pattern to sinners; and by God's grace, she was received into covenant with Him, and was made an ancestress of Christ Himself. She was a monument of His Love to the world, and a figure of the Church recovered from Heathenism and espoused to Christ. See note above on Matt. i. 5. Cp. James ii. 25, Ῥαὰβ ἡ πόρνη ὑποδεξαμένη τοὺς ἀγγέλους, and Clement, i. 12, διὰ πίστιν ἐσώθη Ῥαὰβ ἡ πόρνη. Here is an appeal 'ad verecundiam,' and the moral is, Let it not be true of you Hebrews, that "the harlots and publicans go into the kingdom of God before you!" Matt. xxi. 31, 32.

In connexion with the history of Rahab, it may be observed, that many Fathers, dating from S. Clement (i. 12),—viz. Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Origen, Ambrose, Jerome, and Theodoret here,—regard her scarlet thread as typical of Christ's blood. Thus S. Clement says that the spies προσέθεντο αὐτῇ σημεῖον, ὅπως κρεμάσῃ ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου αὐτῆς κόκκινον, πρόδηλον ποιοῦντες ὅτι διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ Κυρίου λύτρωσις ἔσται πᾶσι τοῖς πιστεύουσι.

32. ἐπιλείψει γάρ με διηγούμενον ὁ χρόνος] So Philo Judæus (de Somn. p. 1116, D), Ἐπιλείψει με ἡ ἡμέρα τὰς διαφορὰς τοῦ ἀνθρωπείου βίου διεξιόντα. Loesner (p. 445).

— Γεδεὼν—Σαμψὼν καὶ Ἰεφθάε] Elz. has Γεδεὼν Βαρὰκ τε καὶ Σαμψὼν καὶ Ἰεφθάε. Some have supposed a chronological embarrassment here, inasmuch as Barak was before Gideon, and Jephthah before Samson.

But the names are arranged in pairs; and so stand in the Syriac, Æthiopic, and Arabic Versions. The Vulgate omits the copulas. And A omits the second and third καί. A and D* read καὶ Βαράκ. D, E, I, K have καί before Ἰεφθάε.

On the whole the sense seems to be,—The necessary time will fail me in speaking of Gideon and also of Barak (who was before him, but deserves also to be celebrated), of Samson, and also of Jephthah (who preceded him in time, but ought not to be forgotten), of David and also of Samuel, who was his senior, but deserves to be celebrated.

In each of these pairs, there is, as it were, an act of retrogression from the principal person mentioned, to another person who resembled him, or was connected with him, and ought not to be forgotten.

Such a mode of speech is peculiarly natural to persons who are compelled to hurry onward, for lack of time, and yet look wistfully back on those objects which they are obliged to leave behind.

33. εἰργάσαντο δικαιοσύνην] they wrought righteousness,—a proof that the faith of which the Apostle is here speaking is the same kind of Faith as that inculcated by St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, in his Epistle to the Jews of the dispersion.

The Faith on which St. Paul here lays special stress, is an operative Faith. Certainly this is no proof (as has been alleged by some) that this Epistle was not written by the author of the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians. Indeed, his language here is a natural corollary and necessary supplement to those two Epistles. And it is in perfect unison with the warnings and exhortations which were given in the later Epistles of the Apostle, written nearly at the same time as this Epistle,—namely, in the Pastoral Epistles, which were rendered specially necessary by the Jewish Antinomianism of this time.

See above, the Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans, p. 200—203, and p. 366—368, and below, Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles.

At the same time, the Apostle has taken good care in this Epistle to contrast the Justification by an operative Faith in Christ, of which he is here speaking, with that Justification which many of the Jews sought to establish for themselves, and against which he had contended in the Epistles to the Galatians and Romans, by the deeds or ceremonies of the Mosaic Law. See xiii. 10, and the whole of chapters vii.—x.

Gideon, Barak, Samson. Some of these persons were not exempt from failings and sins. True; but this is not the question to be considered here. Were they not also distinguished by Faith? He is not writing a history of their lives, but is reciting the triumphs of their Faith. Theophyl.

— ἔφραξαν στόματα λεόντων] stopped the mouths of lions, as Samson did, Judges xiv. 6; David, 1 Sam. xvii. 34; and Daniel, Dan. vi. 22.

34. ἔσβεσαν δύναμιν πυρός] quenched the violence of fire, as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. (Dan. iii. 20—27.) In this and the preceding verse the Apostle happily combines two cases of Martyrdom for the worship of God, from the same book of the Old Testament, the Book of Daniel; the first, the example of Daniel himself, preferring to encounter death from the lions rather than forego his private prayers to God, in obedience to the King's command; the second, the example of the three children choosing the fiery furnace rather than pay to the Golden Image, which the King had set up, that public homage which is due to God alone. The former was ready to die rather than omit the worship of Him Who is True; the latter would sooner perish than worship what is false. Two striking examples for the Hebrews at that time. See above, x. 24. They are happily united in the two Proper Lessons of the Nineteenth Sunday after Trinity.

— παρεμβολὰς] armies here, as often in LXX, as well as camps. Cp. xiii. 11. 13. Rev. xx. 9. Acts xxi. 34.

35. γυναῖκες] women; e. g. the widow of Sarepta from Elijah (1 Kings xvii. 23); the Shunamite from Elisha (2 Kings iv. 36).

— ἐτυμπανίσθησαν] were beaten to death. See the authorities in Suicer (Thesaur. in v. p. 1327—35), where is an elaborate dissertation on the word; the sense of which appears to be, to stretch and suspend the body on a rack, and then to beat it to death by repeated strokes of wooden instruments loaden with brass or leaden balls covered with leather; like the action of beating a drum (τύμπανον). Cp. 2 Macc. vi. 28. Hence it was used in a more general sense for any violent torture.

— κρείττονος ἀναστάσεως] a better resurrection of the body than that restoration of it to life in this world, which was offered them, if they recanted, after their condemnation to death. They might have risen again to life in this world, after their sentence of death; but they died with joy, in order that they might rise again in glory to life eternal. So Primasius and others.

Or, as some interpret the passage, a better resurrection than that of the two children just mentioned as restored to life in this world by the two Prophets. Theophyl.

37. ἐλιθάσθησαν] were stoned, as Naboth, 1 Kings xxi. 13; Zachariah, son of Jehoiadah, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20—22. Matt. xxiii. 37. Here is a comfortable assurance in reading their history. They died as Martyrs here, and will have their reward hereafter.

— ἐπρίσθησαν] were sawn asunder, as Isaiah by order of king Manasseh, according to the Jewish tradition. Schöttgen (p. 987). Justin M. (c. Trypho. 120). Tertullian (Scorpiac. 8. de Patient. 13). Delitz. (p. 589).

— ἐπειράσθησαν] were tempted by Satan, and by allurements of pleasure and profit from persons in worldly power, as the Prophet of Judah was tempted by Jeroboam (1 Kings xiii. 7); perhaps the most trying form of Martyrdom, and requiring the most courage and faith.

This specification of temptation to apostasy from Christ would have a special pertinency to the case of the Hebrew Christians, and is very appropriate here. The word ἐπειράσθησαν has been rejected by some Editors, but is in D*, and is quoted by Origen; and might easily have been absorbed by ἐπρίσθησαν; and is received by Tisch. in his last edition.

— ἐν μηλωταῖς] in sheepskins, as some of the Prophets. (Zech. xiii. 4.) See Clem. Rom. i. 17, who applies the words to Elijah, Elisha, and Ezekiel.

CH. XII. 1. Τοιγαροῦν—μαρτύρων] Cp. Clement. R. i. 19. On the word νέφος, nimbus, for πλῆθος, multitude, see Wetst., Lünem.

The picture seems to be drawn from the immense multitudes of spectators which the Apostle had seen witnessing the races in the Stadium at Corinth, or in the Circus at Rome. "Totam hodiè Romam Circus capit." (Juvenal.) Such a comparison is a favourite one with St. Paul. See on Phil. iii. 14.

— εὐπερίστατον ἁμαρτίαν] that sin which most readily besets us, and, as it were, begirds us. The word εὐπερίστατος is only found here. Its derivation from ἵστημι (to place, statuo, not sto) intimates that it is something readily placed around, so as to hem in and beset; and therefore it is rendered circumstans by Vulg. Cp. στατὸν ὕπνον (Hom. Il. v. 506): στατὸν ὕδωρ, stagnant water, and (what is very relevant to the Apostle's meaning) στατὸς χιτών, a long, straight, and ungirdled tunic, ὀρθοστάδιος. See Passov. Hence Chrys. here well explains the word εὐπερίστατος by εὐκόλως περισταμένη, and so the Syriac and the English Authorized Version, 'which easily besets us.' Bp. Sanderson (iv. 60) well renders it 'quæ nos arctè complectitur;' following Erasmus, 'tenaciter inhærens.' Let us cast this sin off, as a garment which encumbers us in our Christian race.

The metaphor is from the act of runners laying aside their outer garments, in order to run with more expedition.

— τρέχωμεν—ἀγῶνα] let us run the race. A Pauline figure. See Gal. ii. 2; v. 7. Rom. ix. 16. Phil. ii. 16.

2. ἀφορῶντες—Ἰησοῦν] looking to Jesus. He excites them to look with the eye of Faith through the Cloud of Human Witnesses, and to see the Sun of Righteousness standing in splendour and glory at the Right Hand of God.

The Saints are, as it were, the Cloud of Christ's Presence, which are illumined by the beams of His brightness, and by which He will be surrounded when He comes in His glorious Majesty to judge the quick and dead.

On this text see the noble Sermon of Bp. Andrewes (ii. 158); and cp. Bp. Sanderson (i. p. 401; iv. 60).

— ἀντὶ—χαρᾶς] for the joy that was set before Him, He endured the cross. The joy which He felt in the prospect of our Salvation to be effected by His sufferings was His βραβεῖον, or Prize. Looking to it, He ran His Race, and, having finished His Course, He has now taken His seat (κεκάθικε), where He is now enthroned,—not by the side of some human βραβεὺς, or Arbiter of the Race, but at the Right Hand of God. Look up to Him, follow Him.

Elz. has ἐκάθισε: but the reading of the text is far preferable as to sense, and is supported by the best authorities.

3. Ἀναλογίσασθε] On this text see Bp. Sanderson's Sermon (i. p. 401).

4. Οὔπω μέχρις αἵματος ἀντικατέστητε] Ye did not yet resist unto blood, as Christ did. Observe the aorist here, ἀντικατέστητε. Ye did not resist unto blood, as ye might have done on several occasions at Jerusalem, if ye had been animated with the courage of Martyrs; for instance, in the persecution ἐπὶ Στεφάνῳ (Acts xi. 19. Cp. xxvi. 10. 1 Thess. ii. 14); and as the Apostle St. James, the brother of John, did (Acts xii. 1, 2); and as the other St. James, your late Bishop, did very recently. Euseb. ii. 22, 23.

It is the more requisite to bear in mind the tense and the true rendering of this verb (ἀντικατέστητε), because an argument has been built by some upon an erroneous rendering of it ("ye have not yet resisted unto blood"), as if it implied that they to whom the author writes had not been exposed to any sanguinary persecution; and that therefore this Epistle could not have been addressed to the Hebrew Christians of Palestine.

It is clear from the whole tenour of the sentence, that the writer is expostulating here with many of those whom he addresses, for their pusillanimity and lack of zeal, valour, and patience, in not encountering afflictions for the Faith. See vv. 5—12: Ye did not yet resist unto blood (when ye ought to have done so), and ye have forgotten the exhortation, &c.

5, 6. Υἱέ μου—παραδέχεται] Prov. iii. 11, 12, LXX. Cp. Rev. iii. 19. Clement R. (i. 56). Augustine (iii. 2641; iv. 265. 381. 1445; v. 333. 460). Bp. Sanderson (i. 417).

7. τίς γάρ ἐστιν υἱὸς κ.τ.λ.] for who is a son, whom his father chasteneth not? That is,—who is really treated as a son, if his father denies him that corrective discipline, to which, as a son, he is entitled from his father?

This seems to be the true rendering of the words, and not 'what son is there?' The emphatic word is υἱὸς, as opposed to νόθοι. See v. 8.

9. τῷ Πατρὶ τῶν πνευμάτων] the Father of our spirits, as distinguished from the fathers of our flesh. God is the Creator of our bodies, souls, and spirits; but He is not the Father of the carnal corruptions of our nature, which we inherit through our parents from Adam, who are therefore here called πατέρες τῆς σαρκὸς ἡμῶν, as contrasted with the πνεῦμα, or highest faculty of man. (1 Thess. v. 23.)

Some early Christian writers supposed that the human spirit is created 'toties quoties' by God; e. g. Primasius, who says, "Corpus nostrum ex semine paterno et materno conficitur, anima vero semper à Deo ex nihilo creatur." But it does not seem that the Apostle designed to express any opinion here on the question which afterwards agitated the Church in the controversies between the Advocates of Creationism and Traducianism as to the origin of the Soul. Cp. Lünemann, p. 340; and Delitz. p. 619.

The birth of which the Apostle is here speaking is the new birth, the spiritual birth which is wrought by God in the Sacrament of Baptism, of which St. John speaks, when he says, that as many as received Him (the Incarnate Word), He gave power to become the sons of God .... which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. (John i. 12, 13.) And John iii. 6, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." It is therefore truly said by a great English moralist and metaphysician, that "the generation, whether of plants or living creatures, is effected by that prolific virtue which is in the seed. Answerable, therefore, unto the twofold birth spoken of in the Scriptures, there is also a twofold seed. The first birth is that of the old man, by natural generation, whereby we are born the sons of Adam. The second birth is that of the new man, by spiritual regeneration, whereby we are born the sons of God. Answerably whereunto the first seed is semen Adæ, the seed of the old Adam, derived unto us by carnal propagation from our natural parents, who are therefore called the fathers of our flesh (Heb. xii. 9); together wherewith is also derived that uncleanness of corruption, which upon our first birth cleaveth so inseparably to our nature, and is the inward principle from which all the works of the flesh have their emanation. But then there is another seed, semen Dei, as St. John calleth it (1 John iii. 9), the seed of the second Adam, Jesus Christ, God blessed for ever, derived unto us by the communication of His Holy Spirit inwardly renewing us; together wherewith is also derived a measure of inherent supernatural grace, as the inward principle whence all the choice fruits of the Spirit do flow." Bp. Sanderson (i. p. 428).

12, 13.] Isaiah xxxv. 3. Prov. iv. 26, LXX. Τροχιὰ is properly מְסִלָּה (maaghal), an orbita, a road made for, and marked by, wheels; which was to be carefully followed, in order that the draught might be more easy. He returns to the metaphor drawn from the stadium, v. 1, 2. Theophyl. Here also is an argument against the Novatian heresy. Theophyl. Cp. vi. 4—6, and below, v. 17.

13—15.] These words are almost metrical. Thus καὶ τροχιὰς ὀρθὰς ποιήσατε τοῖς ποσὶν ὑμῶν form an Hexameter verse, and οὗ χωρὶς οὐδεὶς ὄψεται τὸν Κύριον—Ἐπισκοποῦντες μή τις ὑστερῶν ἀπὸ make two Iambic verses. Cp. John iv. 35. James i. 17. 2 Pet. ii. 22. Perhaps such musical adaptations of moral precepts were designed in order to be helps to the memory, and in order that such sayings as these might easily circulate from mouth to mouth among Christians.

15. ῥίζα πικρίας] Deut. xxix. 18, LXX. Cp. Acts viii. 23.

— διὰ ταύτης] A has δι' αὐτῆς, and so Lach., not Tisch., ed. 1848.

— οἱ πολλοί] So A, Lach., and Tisch.—Elz. omits οἱ. Thus all the printed books, and the generality of MSS.; but the famous Alexandrine, and another at Oxford, have μιανθῶσιν οἱ πολλοὶ, lest the many be defiled, the multitude, the populace, the congregation,—which certainly is the more elegant, nay, the genuine reading, and ought to be assumed into the public editions. Dr. Bentley (Sermon on 5 Nov. Vol. iii. p. 246).

16. πόρνος, ἢ βέβηλος] fornicator or profane. It is noted as one of Esau's impieties, whom the Scripture hath branded as a profane person, that he grieved his parents in the choice of his wives. (Gen. xxvi. 35; xxviii. 8.) Bp. Sanderson i. 38. Some of the Fathers (e. g. Primasius) regard those marriages as censured here in the word πόρνος.

The combination of the two words intimates the connexion of gluttony and uncleanness. Cp. Bengel.

— πρωτοτόκια] the Birthright, to which was annexed the progenitorship of the Messiah, and also the Priesthood.

Before the Priesthood of Aaron was constituted by God, the Priesthood was in the Firstborn of the family by hereditary succession. The goodly raiment which belonged to Esau, and which Rebecca took, and in which she clothed Jacob (Gen. xxvii. 15) was probably the raiment which belonged to the firstborn as the Priest of the household. Primasius. See also Bp. Bilson on Perpetual Government of the Church, p. 37. Bp. Patrick and others, and on Job i. 4; xlii. 8; and as to Esau's raiment, compare Blunt's Coincidences in the Old Testament concerning the Patriarchal Church, p. 12—16.

The Birthright, which was a spiritual prerogative, is to be distinguished from the Blessing, which was dependent on the Father's will. See here v. 17. Gen. xxvii. 36, 37.

Esau is called βέβηλος, a profane person, because "he despised his birthright" (Gen. xxv. 33). And his example is here presented to the Hebrews as a warning not to despise their Christian birthright, and incur his doom.

17. ἴστε—αὐτήν] for ye know that also afterwards (i. e. after he had sold the birthright) when he was desirous of inheriting the blessing (from his father) he was rejected; for he found not any place for repentance (i. e. for change of mind) although he sought it diligently with tears.

Esau is represented as a profane person, because he sold his birthright for the gratification of a carnal appetite. His profaneness consisted in bartering away his spiritual privileges for a mess of pottage. He said, "What profit shall this birthright do me? So he despised his birthright" (Gen. xxvi. 31—34). We hear of no remorse on his part at the time when he was guilty of this act of spiritual profaneness.

It was not till afterwards, when he found that this loss of a spiritual privilege involved a temporal loss, that he grieved over it. As long as he regarded it as purely spiritual, he was careless about it. But when he found that his brother Jacob, to whom he had sold his birthright, had presented himself as the firstborn to Isaac (Gen. xxvii. 19), and in the assumed character of the firstborn had obtained the blessing from Isaac, and that Isaac declared "that he should be blessed," then Esau "cried with an exceeding bitter cry" (Gen. xxvii. 33, 34). When he heard that the blessing had conveyed to Jacob the temporal dominion and lordship over himself, and superabundance of wealth "in corn and wine," then he "lifted up his voice and wept." Then, but not till then, Esau rued what he had done in selling his birthright. Then, but not till then, he would have changed his mind with respect to his birthright, because he was desirous (θέλων) to inherit the temporal blessing (εὐλογίαν) that was annexed to the birthright; then he would have revoked the sale.

But it was now too late. The door of repentance was shut; the place of change of mind could no longer be found; the day of Retribution was come. God punished him for his profaneness in selling his birthright, and would not now allow him to change his mind (μετανοεῖν) in that respect. He had said, "What shall this birthright profit me?" He had despised it. He now regretted the sale, but it was only because it entailed temporal loss to himself, and conveyed secular supremacy to his brother. And even then, though he sought for a change of mind, as to the past sale, yet he was not truly contrite in heart. His grief was 'dolor amissi,' but not 'dolor admissi.' It was 'dolor ob pœnam peccati, non ob peccatum.' His tears were not shed for his sin, but for his suffering. They were like those of Cain: not shed for his offence, but for its penalty. They were not like the tears of Peter, but of Judas (see Matt. xxvi. 75; xxvii. 3). They were tears of a worldly sorrow that worketh death (2 Cor. vii. 10); They were tears of envy and rage, of malice and revenge against his brother, who had been blessed by God, and whose death Esau was plotting, and whose blood he desired to shed while he was shedding tears, in order that he might recover by murder what he had lost by profaneness, and what God had given to Jacob by the voice of his father Isaac.

Therefore Esau was not really penitent at all. And he was rejected by God, executing retribution upon him by the instrumentality of his father, Isaac.

Thus interpreted, this passage affords no countenance to the Novatian heresy (cp. Theodoret here, and see above on vi. 4—10); nor is there any ground for the more constrained interpretation adopted by some learned expositors in recent times, who suppose μετάνοιαν to mean "change of purpose in the mind of Isaac."

The sentence, rightly understood, contains a solemn warning to the Hebrews, as showing the sin and danger of despising their Christian Birthright, which, when it is too late, they may in vain desire to recover; and as inculcating the necessity of Repentance on their part, and as also pointing out the hollowness and futility of mere worldly sorrow; and as describing the true nature of that Repentance, by which alone they might be reconciled to God. It also coheres harmoniously with the sentences which follow, in which the Apostle exhorts to Repentance, by considerations of the excellency of the Gospel, and of the love of God manifested therein to all who are truly penitent.

18. Οὐ γάρ] Ye are not like Esau, who did not find any place for Repentance, as to the sale of his Birthright. Ye have not come to a mountain that is only felt-for in the dark with the hands of men who are blinded by clouds and darkness, like that awful gloom which enveloped Mount Sinai, when the Law was given from it. Cp. Acts xvii. 27, ζητεῖν τὸν Θεὸν, εἰ ἄρα ψηλαφήσειαν αὐτὸν, καὶ εὕροιεν, and the uses of the word ψηλαφᾶν

St. Paul especially had personally realized the meaning of this word ψηλαφᾶν, when he was struck with blindness, and was led by the hand of others (Acts ix. 8, 9), and when he saw Elymas the sorcerer also suddenly smitten with blindness, and seeking some to lead him by the hand. (Acts xiii. 11.)

Ye are not come to a mountain that is felt-for by the hands of men groping their way in a mist;

But ye have come to the noonday light, and Evangelical sunshine of Mount Sion, and to Jesus the Mediator of the New Covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling which cleanses you from your sins. Ye are therefore not like Esau. Ye may find the place of Repentance. Ye have been brought to it in the Gospel. The door of Repentance is opened to you by Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant. It is sprinkled by His Blood. Therefore do not turn away from it, or ye may incur his doom.

On the present participle ψηλαφωμένῳ, see Winer, § 45, p. 307, who compares τὰ βλεπόμενα, xi. 3.

For a similar comparison of the circumstances of the delivery of the two Covenants, see Justin M. c. Tryphon. c. 67. For ζόφῳ, the reading of A, C, D*, Elz. has σκότῳ.

20. τὸ διαστελλόμενον] that which was being commanded. Observe the present tense; referring to the awful circumstance which accompanied the delivery, and inspired the dread here described. Cp. φανταζόμενον, that which was appearing, v. 21.

After λιθοβοληθήσεται, Elz. adds ἢ βολίδι κατατοξευθήσεται —not in the best MSS.

22. προσεληλύθατε] ye have come—so much greater are your privileges than theirs. You have come to Mount Sion; they were like blind men groping for Mount Sinai. Even Moses, their Mediator, was smitten with fear and trembling. But your Mediator is Jesus, the true Joshua, the Everlasting Saviour, the Son of God, and He has ascended the Mountain of God, and has called you to Himself, to that heavenly Rest which was typified by the Earthly Canaan, and which He has purchased for you by His own Blood.

23. ἐκκλησίᾳ πρωτοτόκων] the Church of the Firstborn—the true Firstborn. He continues the reference to Esau, the elder brother according to the flesh, who was rejected for his own profaneness and impenitence. You have come to the Church of the Firstborn, made so by their adoption into Christ, the Only-Begotten Son of the Father (cp. i. 6. Gal. iv. 7. Rom. viii. 16. 29), and the First-Begotten from the Dead. (Col. i. 18. Rev. i. 5.)

— πνεύμασι δικαίων] the spirits of Just men made perfect by faith in Christ. The spirits of those who have been engrafted in Christ, and have continued stedfastly in His mystical Body, are not separated from it by Death, which severed their spirits from their own mortal bodies; Death cannot pluck them out of His hand. Their bodies are resting in the grave till the sound of the last trump, and the day of Resurrection; but their spirits are in Paradise, and hold converse with each other there, and communicate with the blessed company of all faithful people, who are united together in the Communion of Saints. Here is a joyful assurance of the blessed state of the Souls of the Just, in the interval between Death and Resurrection. See above on 1 Thess. iv. 16, and on Luke xxiii. 43. Cp. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ix. p. 664.

24. αἵματι—Ἄβελ] The blood of Abel cried from the ground for vengeance against his murderer. The blood of Christ cries for pardon for you to God. Theophyl.

28. μετὰ αἰδοῦς καὶ εὐλαβείας] Some Editors (Lach., Bleek, Tisch., Lün.) have μ. εὐλαβείας καὶ δέους. But αἰδοῦς is found in D, I, K, M, and the Peschito, and is not so likely as δέους to have been inserted by the copyists.

29. πῦρ καταναλίσκον] a consuming fire: from Deut. iv. 24, LXX.

CH. XIII. 2. ἔλαθόν τινες ξενίσαντες ἀγγέλους] some entertained Angels unawares. As Abraham, Gen. xviii. 2, Lot, Gen. xix. 1. There seems to be a paronomasia in ἔλαθον and μὴ ἐπιλανθάνεσθε—a common figure with St. Paul, especially at the close of his Epistles. See above, Rom. xii. 3, and 13, 14, note.

4. Τίμιος ὁ γάμος ἐν πᾶσι] marriage is honourable in all, i. e. in all respects (see v. 18. Col. i. 18. Titus ii. 9), as well as in all persons, as Theophyl. explains it, μὴ ἐν τούτῳ τῷ μέρει τίμιος, ἐν ἄλλῳ δ' οὔ, ἀλλ' ὅλος δι' ὅλου: and he says also, ἐν πᾶσιν, μὴ ἐν τοῖς προβεβηκόσι μόνον: so that the sense is, Marriage is honourable in all places, times, and persons. Cp. the Arabic and Æthiopic versions; the former rendering it in all respects, the latter every where. Marriage is altogether honourable. Honourable it is, on account of its institution by God in Paradise (Gen. ii. 22). Honourable, on account of its consecration by Christ (Eph. v. 22—33). Honourable, as a remedy against fornication. (1 Cor. vii. 2. 1 Tim. v. 14.) Honourable, as the appointed means for the procreation of children, and for the peopling of Heaven with saints.

A remarkable syntax:

This passage generally, xiii. 1—6, and this clause in it, are very characteristic of St. Paul, and affords evidence of the Pauline origin of the Epistle.

Dr. Barrow has the following just remark at the commencement of one of his Sermons (Serm. vi. On the Duty of Prayer, i. p. 69, ed. 1683). "It is," he says, "the manner of St. Paul in his Epistles, after that he hath discussed some main points of doctrine or discipline, to propose several good advices and rules, in the observance whereof the life of Christian practice doth consist. So that he thereby hath furnished us with so rich a variety of moral and spiritual precepts concerning special matters, subordinate to the general Rules of Piety and Virtue, that out of them might well be compiled a Body of Ethics, or system of precepts de officiis, in truth and completeness far excelling those which any Philosophy hath been able to devise or deliver. These he rangeth not in any formal method, nor linketh together with strict connexion, but freely scattereth them, as from his mind (as out of a fertile soil, impregnated with all seeds of wisdom and goodness) they did haply spring up, or as they were suggested by that Holy Spirit, which continually guided and governed him."

Such are the words of Dr. Barrow. For an example of this truth, it may suffice to refer to the ethical conclusion of St. Paul's great dogmatic Epistle, the Epistle to the Romans. At the close of its eleventh chapter, he passes from the region of spiritual doctrine, and (to adopt Dr. Barrow's figure) begins to sow the precepts of moral practice.

And now, in the structure of the present Epistle, we find precisely the same thing done. The Author has passed from doctrine to practice; the seed sown here is very much the same as in the Epistle to the Romans, and the manner of sowing it is the same. The latter parts of these two Epistles are like two gardens cultivated by the same hand.

There is also a peculiar characteristic of diction in both. In the Epistle to the Romans we read, Let love be without dissimulation, abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good. These words stand thus in our English Version, and there is nothing remarkable in such an English construction. But the construction of the original is very remarkable: ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυπόκριτος, ἀποστυγοῦντες τὸ πονηρὸν, κολλώμενοι τῷ ἀγαθῷ. Here we have two nominatives absolute; and what is more remarkable, we have a noun feminine nominative absolute (ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυπόκριτος) branching out suddenly into a participle masculine nominative absolute (ἀποστυγοῦντες τὸ πονηρὸν, κολλώμενοι τῷ ἀγαθῷ. Scarcely another instance of this construction can be found in the New Testament, except in one place. And that is the parallel practical portion at the close of the present Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. xiii. 5), where we read ἀφιλάργυρος ὁ τρόπος, ἀρκούμενοι τοῖς παροῦσιν.

Nor is this all. If we turn back to the passage in the Epistle to the Romans, we find that the precept, being joined on as it were by stalks and branches with other similar precepts, has its root in a text of Holy Scripture,—For it is written, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord (Rom. xii. 19). So the precept here, Be content with such things as ye have, for He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.

Not only, therefore, is the seed sown, and the manner of sowing, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, very like that of St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, but there is a similar mode of grafting also in the one and the other; whence we may infer, that, to the Hebrews also the Apostle St. Paul might have said, Ye are God's husbandry; we are labourers together with Him: I have planted, and God hath given the increase. (1 Cor. iii. 6. 9.)

5, 6. Οὐ μή σε ἀνῶ—ἄνθρωπος] Deut. xxxi. 8. Ps. cxviii. 6, LXX. τί = Hebr. מָה, what? a direct question.

7. Μνημονεύετε τῶν ἡγουμένων] Remember your spiritual guides. In bidding them to remember them, and to consider the end of their conversation, he is referring to those who had died for Christ at Jerusalem, particularly to St. Stephen, the First Martyr, and to his preaching (Acts vii. 1—60), and to St. James, the first Martyr-Apostle (Acts xii. 1, 2), and to St. James, their first Bishop, whose memory might well be revered by St. Paul, because the death of St. James was a consequence of St. Paul's own deliverance from the Jews, about three years (as is probable) before the date of this Epistle. See Euseb. ii. 23.

8. Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς κ.τ.λ.] Jesus Christ always the same—not changeable, like the Law.

— μὴ παραφέρεσθε] be not carried aside. So the best MSS. —Eliz. has περιφέρεσθε.

9. οὐ βρώμασιν] not by meats; of the Levitical Law (see ix. 10. 1 Cor. viii. 8); and of the Levitical sacrifices.

— οὐκ ὠφελήθησαν] they were not profited by feeding on the Levitical sacrifices, who walked in them, and did not look by faith for something beyond them. See ix. 9. The true worshippers under the Law did not walk in them, but they travelled by them and through them toward a spiritual home in Christ.

10. θυσιαστήριον] an Altar. Cp. Ignat. Eph. 5. Trall. 7.

We have an Altar of bloodless and rational sacrifices. Eusebius (Dem. Ev. 1, c. 6).

This text is important, in regard to the use of the name Altar in the Christian Church.

They which honour the Law as an image of the wisdom of God Himself, are notwithstanding to know that the same had an end in Christ. But what? Was the Law so abolished with Christ, that after His Ascension the office of Priests became immediately wicked, and the very name hateful, as importing the exercise of an ungodly function? No, as long as the glory of the Temple continued, and till the time of that final desolation was accomplished, the very Christian Jews did continue with their sacrifices and other parts of Legal service. That very law, therefore, which our Saviour was to abolish, did not so soon become unlawful to be observed, as some imagine; nor was it afterwards unlawful so far, that the very name of Altar, of Priest, of Sacrifice itself, should be banished out of the world. For though God do now hate sacrifice, whether it be heathenish or Jewish, so that we cannot have the same things which they had but with impiety, yet unless there be some greater let than the only evacuation of the Law of Moses, the names themselves may (I hope) be retained without sin, in respect of that proportion which things established by our Saviour have unto them which by Him are abrogated. And so throughout all the writings of the ancient Fathers we see that the words which were, do continue; the only difference is, that whereas before they had a literal, they now have a metaphorical use, and are as so many notes of remembrance unto us, that what they did signify in the letter is accomplished in the truth. Hooker, IV. x. 10.

The following words are from Bp. Andrewes (Vol. v. p. 66, on the names of Altar, Priest, &c.):—

The Church of Rome hath her imaginations,—

First, in that she many times celebrateth this mystery of the Eucharist, sine fractione, 'without any breaking of bread' at all. Whereas, as hath been showed out of the tenth chapter of the first of Corinthians, the eighteenth verse, it is of the nature of an Eucharist or peace-offering (compare Lev. iii. 3; vii. 15), which was never offered, but it was eaten, that both there may be a representation of the memory of that sacrifice, and together an application to each person, by partaking it.

Secondly, in that the Church of Rome hath indeed no 'breaking of bread' at all. For it being broken ever after it is consecrated, there is with them no bread remaining to break; and the body of Christ is now impassible, and cannot be broken; so that they are fain to say they break accidents, and indeed they well know not what. Contrary to St. Luke (Acts xx. 7; ii. 46), who calleth it fractionem panis, and to St. Paul, who saith, Panis quem frangimus (1 Cor. x. 16).

As these are their imaginations, so we want not ours.

For many among us fancy only a sacrament in this action, and look strange at the mention of a sacrifice; whereas we not only use it as a nourishment spiritual, as that it is too, but as a mean also to renew a "covenant" with God by virtue of that "Sacrifice," as the Psalmist speaketh (Ps. l. 5). So our Saviour Christ in the institution telleth us (Luke xxii. 20), and the Apostle (Heb. xiii. 10). And the old writers use no less the word sacrifice than sacrament, altar than table, offer than eat; but both indifferently, to show there is both.

And again, too, that to a many with us it is indeed so fractio panis, as it is that only, and nothing beside; whereas the "bread which we break is the partaking of Christ's" true body (1 Cor. x. 16), and not of a sign, figure, or remembrance of it. For the Church hath ever believed a true fruition of the true body of Christ in that Sacrament. Bp. Andrewes.

The title of priest, although it did (as most certainly it doth not) properly and primarily signify a Jewish sacrificer (or slaughterer of beasts) doth yet nowise deserve that reproach, which is by some inconsiderately (not to say profanely), upon that mistaken ground commonly cast upon it; since the Holy Scripture itself, we see, doth here (Ps. cxxxii. 16) even in that sense (most obnoxious to exception) ascribe it to the Christian pastors. And so likewise doth the Prophet Isaiah, And I will also take of them for Priests and for Levites, saith the Lord (Isa. lxvi. 21), speaking (as the context plainly declares) of the Gentiles, which should be converted and aggregated to God's Church. And the prophet Jeremiah, Neither shall the Priests the Levites want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to do sacrifice continually (Jer. xxxiii. 18). Which prophecy also evidently concerns the same time and state of things, of which the Prophet Malachi thus foretels: For from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, my name shall be great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense shall be offered to my name, and a pure offering (Mal. i. 11). It were desirable, therefore, that men would better consider, before they entertain such groundless offences, or pass so uncharitable censures upon either words, or persons, or things. Dr. Barrow (Sermons i. p. 257).

Question. What think you of the names Sacrifice, Altar, and Priest?

Answer. The ancient Churches used them all, without exception from any Christian that ever I heard of. As the bread is justly called Christ's body, as signifying it, so the action described was of old called a sacrifice, as representing and commemorating it. And it is no more improper than calling our bodies, and our alms, and our prayers, sacrifices. And the naming of the table an altar, as related to this representative sacrifice, is no more improper than the other.

"We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat" (Heb. xiii. 10) seems plainly to mean the sacramental communion; and the Revelation (vi. 9; viii. 3. 5; xvi. 7, &c.) uses that word. Richard Baxter (in Christian Institutes, i. p. 304).

Christians have an Altar whereof they partake . . . Christ performed His Sacrifice, in the active and transient sense, once for all, upon the Cross. He distributes it daily, in the passive and abiding sense of it, to all His true Servants, to every faithful Communicant. His Table here below is a secondary Altar in two views; first, on the score of our own Sacrifices of Prayers, Praises, Souls, and Bodies, which we offer up from thence; secondly, as it is the Seat of the consecrated Elements, that is, of the Body and Blood of Christ, that is, of the grand Sacrifice symbolically represented and exhibited, and spiritually there received,—received by and with the Signs bearing the Name of the Things. Dr. Waterland (Distinctions of Sacrifice, p. 69, ed. 1740).

— οἱ τῇ σκηνῇ λατρεύοντες] those who serve the Tabernacle, the Levitical Priests; those who remain within the Tabernacle, and do not go out of the camp to Jesus, Who is the true sacrifice. See v. 12.

He uses the word σκηνή, Tabernacle, and studiously avoids, for obvious reasons, the word Temple. It is remarkable that neither the word ἱερὸν nor ναὸς occur once in this Epistle. The word σκηνὴ occurs nine times.

10—16.] The sense of these verses, which will be best considered collectively, is as follows: We Christians are charged by the Jews with having no Altar. But this is not true. Far from it. We have an Altar in a far higher and more glorious sense than they have. We have an Altar, of which they have no right to eat who remain within the confines of the Levitical Tabernacle, and do not go out of the camp to Jesus, the true Sacrifice; that is, who continue as Jews within the narrow precincts of the Levitical Law, and do not go forth as Christians to the larger liberty of the Gospel.

This great truth (says the Apostle) was prefigured even by the Levitical Law itself. For the bodies of the sacrifices, whose blood was brought into the Holy Place, were not to be eaten within the Tabernacle, but were to be utterly consumed with fire outside the camp. See Lev. vi. 30; ix. 11; xvi. 27. Or, if τὰ ἅγια means here the Holiest of all (as ix. 8. 12. 24, 25; x. 19), the same was equally true. See Lev. xvi. 27, 28.

These Levitical Sacrifices for sin (περὶ ἁμαρτίας), or sin-offerings, were figures of the One True Sacrifice offered by Christ, Who, as our Priest, offered Himself as our Victim, slain for the sins of the whole world without the Camp, being crucified on Calvary without the city walls (see Matt. xxvii. 32); and Who, also, as our Priest, entered once for all into the true Holy of Holies with His own Blood. See above, ix. 8. 12. 25.

The Altar on which the sacrifice, typified by all other sacrifices, was offered, is the Cross of Christ on Calvary. There He offered Himself once for all; and thence He carried His own Blood within the Veil into the Heavenly Holy of Holies, and there He is ever pleading for us, as our High Priest, the all-prevailing efficacy of that sacrifice offered once for all.

They, therefore, who linger within the courts of the Levitical Law, and do not go forth to Calvary, they have no part in the true Altar, and in the true sacrifice.

But let us take up our Cross (v. 8), and follow Christ. Let us go forth from the Tabernacle, and from the Camp to Calvary. Let us go forth from the Altar of Aaron to that of Christ. Let us go forth from the earthly and perishable City, and ascend by faith to the heavenly and eternal (v. 14). Let us go forth from the region of Levitical shadows to the substantial blessings of the Gospel. Theodoret.

But what is our Altar? and what are its sacrifices?

The Apostle answers this question in vv. 15, 16.

We Christians do not partake thereat of carnal meats and drinks, like those who serve the Tabernacle, and who, resting upon those shadowy ordinances, were not profited by them (v. 9). But yet we have an Alar at which we feed (v. 10), the Altar at

We do not there offer the produce merely of our corn and wine, but we offer the fruit of our lips (Hos. xiv. 2, as paraphrased for Greek readers by the LXX), praising His holy Name. We there offer alms to God through Christ. For with such sacrifices God is well pleased. Cp. Rom. xii. 1, where St. Paul says, I beseech you to present your bodies a living sacrifice, well pleasing to God. On κοινωνία, see Gal. vi. 6. 2 Cor. viii. 4. Phil. iv. 15.

Compare also St. Peter's language: To Whom, coming as a living Stone, ye also as lively stones are being built up a spiritual house, a holy Priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. 1 Pet. ii. 5.

On this subject of spiritual sacrifices, see Mede on the Christian Sacrifice; Waterland's Charge on Distinction of Sacrifice, § 10; and the authorities in Suicer, v. θυσία.

On this passage it may be observed—

(1) That if the Apostle had supposed that Christ's Body and Blood is offered as a sacrifice on the Christian Altar on earth, he would not surely have omitted to say so, in describing the Christian Altar and the Christian sacrifice.

(2) That he does speak of a right to eat at this Altar; not to eat carnally (v. 9), but in the heart, and for growth in grace (v. 9).

(3) That he has fully described elsewhere what that eating at the Christian Altar is. 1 Cor. x. 16; xi. 24.

(4) That he has also said, that therein we declare, announce (καταγγέλλομεν) the Lord's Death as an act already done; an expression inconsistent with the notion that we ourselves do that act, either by repetition or by continuation. (1 Cor. xi. 26.) Cp. above on Heb. x. 12.

St. Paul exhorts us to offer our bodies a living sacrifice, holy and well pleasing to God, which is our rational worship. (Rom. xii. 1.) And, again, let us offer the sacrifice of praise, that is, the fruit of our lips. These offerings, indeed, are not according to the Levitical Law, the hand-writing of which has been taken away by our Lord (Col. ii. 14), but they are according to the Spirit; for we must worship God in spirit and in truth. (John iv. 23.) Wherefore, the Offering of the Eucharist is not carnal, but spiritual, and therefore pure. For we offer to God the Bread and the Cup of Blessing, giving Thanks to Him for that He commanded the earth to bring forth these fruits for our nourishment. And then, when we have made this offering, we invoke the Holy Spirit, in order that He would exhibit (ἀποφήνῃ) this sacrifice and this bread to be the body of Christ, and the cup to be the blood of Christ, in order that they who have partaken of these symbols (τῶν ἀντιτύπων, cp. above, ix. 24) may receive remission of sins, and everlasting life. They, therefore, who bring these offerings in commemoration of the Lord, do not consent to the dogmas of the Jews, but, worshipping spiritually, shall be called the children of wisdom. S. Irenæus (fr. ii. ed. Pfaffii, Lug. Bat. 1743, p. 26). See above, x. 12.

17. Πείθεσθε τοῖς ἡγουμένοις] Obey your spiritual guides, and submit yourselves. A precept which seems to show, that the Author of this Epistle had not undertaken the task of writing it without the approval of their Pastors. He who gives this direction to others, would certainly have complied with it himself. Perhaps he wrote the Epistle at their desire. Cp. v. 24.

The Writer of this Epistle appears to be very studious of showing his affection and deference to the Clergy of the Church at Jerusalem. See also below, v. 24.

This was what might be specially expected from St. Paul, for reasons which will be specified in the note on that verse. Besides, since he was the Apostle of the Gentiles, it might, perhaps, be objected by some of his adversaries (overlooking his claims to address the Hebrews, see Introduction, p. 360), that in writing to the Church at Jerusalem he was intruding into a province that did not belong to him. He might, therefore, be reasonably very desirous to obviate this objection, and to make all men understand that he was on terms of entire friendship with the Clergy of Jerusalem, and that, in writing to the Hebrew Christians there, he acted with their cognizance and concurrence.

On the succession of Bishops at Jerusalem after James, the brother of our Lord, see Euseb. iv. 5. He says, that from James to the siege by Hadrian there were fifteen in number, οὓς πάντας Ἑβραίους φασὶν ὄντας . . . συνιστάναι γὰρ αὐτοῖς τότε τὴν πᾶσαν Ἐκκλησίαν ἐξ Ἑβραίων πιστῶν,—a passage which illustrates the title of this Epistle.

On the duty prescribed in this text, see Dr. Barrow's admirable Sermons, iii. p. 107—169, entitled "Of Obedience to our Spiritual Guides and Governors."

18. πειθόμεθα] So the best MSS.—Elz. πεποίθαμεν.

— καλὴν συνείδησιν ἔχομεν] we have a good conscience. This apologetic declaration was a very suitable one for St. Paul to make, when addressing himself, as here, to Hebrews, and may be compared with his language in Acts xxiii. 1; xxiv. 16. After his apprehension by Jews at Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 28), and his consequent imprisonment at Cæsarea and at Rome, he might well speak thus in self-defence. But such words as these would not have sounded well in the mouth of one who had not been accused, and who was not well known as an accused person to those whom he addressed. Therefore, here is another evidence in favour of the opinion which ascribes this Epistle to St. Paul.

19. ἵνα τάχιον ἀποκατασταθῶ ὑμῖν] that I may be restored to you more speedily. Another characteristic trait of St. Paul. The author of the Epistle expresses his desire of being restored to Jerusalem. He had, therefore, been formerly in that city; and (as the word here used appears to intimate) had been taken away from it, and taken away from it under such circumstances as made him desire to be restored to it. This was the case with St. Paul. He had been taken away from Jerusalem to Rome as a prisoner and a malefactor. How natural, therefore, was it that he should desire to be restored to it, in order that his innocence might be publicly manifested to the Jews and Christians there! Cp. v. 23.

If this reasoning is correct, then we are led by it to determine the date of the Epistle. He is now at liberty, for he speaks of coming to Jerusalem. He had been released from the imprisonment which began at Jerusalem, was continued for two years at Cæsarea, and for two years more at Rome. Then he was acquitted and released; and he might well wish then to be restored as innocent to Jerusalem. Therefore the date of the Epistle cannot be earlier than A.D. 63, and was probably A.D. 64 or 65. See above, Introduction, p. 366.

20. Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης] This prayer seems to be suggested by what precedes.

He had desired them to pray to God, that he himself might be restored to them. He had been sent a prisoner to Rome, but God could restore him. He could restore the Apostle, the Christian Pastor, to Jerusalem. Such a restoration of St. Paul to Jerusalem, after so long an imprisonment caused by the Jews, would be like a resurrection from the dead. But God could effect it. He had brought again from the dead the great Shepherd, through the blood-shedding of the Everlasting Covenant (Matt. xxvi. 28), not like the blood of the temporary Levitical Covenant, with which the Jewish High Priest went in often into the earthly Oracle, but through the blood of the Covenant which will last for ever. He had led Him, through the blood shed once for all, with which the True High Priest, the Great Shepherd, Who laid down His Life for the sheep (John x. 11), has entered once for all into the true Holy of Holies in the heavenly Jerusalem. Whether, therefore, He think fit to restore me to you or not, He can protect you, though I am absent from you.

On this text, see Bp. Andrewes' Serm. iii. 80.

ὑμᾶς ἐν παντὶ ἔργῳ ἀγαθῷ, εἰς τὸ ποιῆσαι τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ, ποιῶν ἐν ὑμῖν τὸ εὐάρεστον ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ᾧ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. ἀμήν.

21. τὸ εὐάρεστον] that which is well pleasing to God. A Pauline precept. See Rom. xii. 2. Eph. v. 10.

22. Παρακαλῶ—ἀνέχεσθε τ. λ. τ. π.] I beseech you, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation. The Author craves forbearance and indulgence for himself. How is this, when he was enabled to write in such a sublime strain of heavenly eloquence as pervades this Epistle? Should such a writer apologize for himself? Yes; if the writer is St. Paul, he may well do so. For he had been a persecutor of the saints at Jerusalem, and he was regarded as a renegade by the Jews; and he had been arrested as a malefactor at Jerusalem, and had been sent a prisoner to Rome. Besides, he was the Apostle of the Gentiles; and it might be alleged by some that in writing to the Hebrews he was usurping what did not belong to him but to others. (Cp. v. 17.)

— διὰ βραχέων] in few words; "paucis pro copiâ rerum et argumenti dignitate" (Bengel).

— τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἡμῶν Τιμόθεον] our brother Timothy. This sentence also seems to point to St. Paul as the Author of the Epistle. (Cp. Bp. Pearson, Minor Works, ii. 359.) Timothy was St. Paul's fellow-labourer from the time of his second missionary journey (Acts xvi. 1) even to his death; and St. Paul calls Timothy his brother in various places of the Epistles (1 Thess. iii. 2. 2 Cor. i. 1. Col. i. 1. Philem. 1). Ἡμῶν is omitted by Elz., but is found in A, C, D*, M, and the Versions generally, and is received by Lach., Bleek, De Wette, Lünemann, Delitz. The Hebrew Christians would be well affected to Timothy because he was circumcised. Theophyl.

— ἀπολελυμένον] been set at liberty. This is evidently the true sense of the word—and not 'sent away,' as it has been rendered by some. The passive voice does indeed sometimes signify to be sent away, to depart, but only when this sense is made perfecly clear by the context (see Acts iv. 23; xv. 30); but when it is placed absolutely, as here, it signifies to be released. See Acts xxvi. 32.

— ἐὰν τάχιον ἔρχηται] if he comes more quickly than may possibly be the case. On this elliptical use of the comparative τάχιον, see on Acts xxv. 10. 2 Tim. i. 18.

Timothy was probably with St. Paul when he was arrested at Jerusalem (cp. Acts xx. 4), and it was natural that both of them should desire to revisit Jerusalem together again.

It is probable also that Timothy had now been sent by St. Paul to Philippi, according to the expressed intention of the Apostle in his Epistle to that Church (Phil. ii. 23), and had then been put in prison, and had been afterwards released, but had not yet returned to St. Paul.

These incidents also are of service in enabling us to ascertain the date of the Epistle. See above, Introduction, p. 366.

— ὄψομαι ὑμᾶς] I will see you. If, therefore, the writer of this Epistle is St. Paul, it is clear that the Apostle had now been released from his two years' confinement at Rome. See note on v. 25.

24. Ἀσπάσασθε πάντας τοὺς ἡγουμένους ὑμῶν] Salute all your spiritual Guides. A remarkable message. The author claims acquaintance with all the Pastors at Jerusalem, and sends his salutations to them all.

This incident also is in harmony with the Pauline authorship. On the last previous occasion, when St. Paul had visited Jerusalem, the Bishop of Jerusalem, St. James, had convened a Synod of his Presbyters to meet him, and it is expressly recorded that all the Presbyters were then present, and that he saluted them (Acts xxi. 18); and he complied with the advice which they then tendered him. This compliance, it is observable, led to his arrest, and to his imprisonment at Cæsarea and Rome. He might, therefore, well send his greetings to them all, as being known to them all, and as desiring them to be assured of his perfect love towards them all. Cp. v. 17. There was something peculiarly appropriate and graceful in such an assurance from him.

— Ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας] They who are from Italy salute you. It may be inferred as probable from these words—

(1) That this Epistle was not written at Rome. If it had been, the writer would have mentioned Rome, and not Italy.

(2) That, if it was written by St. Paul, as is most likely, it was written by him after he had been released from his confinement there (see v. 23), and had quitted Rome.

(3) That it was not written from Italy. He could hardly take upon himself to convey to the Hebrews the greetings of those of so extensive a country as Italy generally, nor would he have described the Christians of Italy as those from Italy, but as the saints or brethren of Italy.

(4) That some friends had accompanied him from Rome, and from Italy, who were known to the Hebrews, and whose greetings, therefore, he sends to them, and whom he describes here as those from Italy.

(5) That, inasmuch as he had designed to pass by Rome to Spain (see on Rom. xv. 24. 28), this Epistle may have been written on his journey to or from Spain, or in it.

Compare (for the use of ἀπὸ) Acts x. 23. 38; xvii. 13; xxi. 27. Gal. ii. 6. Winer, p. 554.

25. ἡ χάρις μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν] grace be with you all. Another proof to the same effect. This benediction is the characteristic token of St. Paul's Epistles, and was not used by any other writer in St. Paul's lifetime.

It is observable also, that almost all the Epistles which were written by St. Paul at the period of his life (to which this Epistle is to be ascribed, namely, his later years) have this Benediction in a brief form, as here. See above on 1 Thess. v. 28.

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

EPISTLES TO TIMOTHY AND TO TITUS.

On the dates and design of St. Paul's Two Epistles to Timothy, and of the Epistle to Titus; and on the chronology and order of the events between the end of the Acts of the Apostles and the Death of St. Paul [1].

St. Luke closes the Acts of the Apostles with the following words: "He (St. Paul) abode two whole years in his own hired house (at Rome), and received all who came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all boldness, no man forbidding him."

This specification of a term of two years appears to intimate, that St. Paul did not remain at Rome after that time, but was enabled to quit it for some other place.

This inference is confirmed by internal evidence.

The period of two years would have expired in the spring of A.D. 63 [2].

At that time no persecution had as yet arisen at Rome against the Christians, on the part of the Imperial Government.

But on the 19th of July of the following year [3], the great fire broke out at Rome, which raged for six days and seven nights, and burst out afresh, after a short interval, and almost consumed ten of the fourteen regiones of the Capital [4].

The Emperor Nero, who was generally suspected to be the author of that conflagration, endeavoured to divert the popular obloquy from himself, by imputing the fire to the Christians. This was the occasion of the first persecution of the Christians by the Roman Government [5].

If St. Paul had remained at Rome fifteen months after the expiration of the two years specified at the close of the Acts, he would probably not have been released, but have perished in that persecution.

That he was liberated at the end of those two years, is, as has been observed, suggested by the specification of that time by St. Luke, and is also confirmed by the Apostle's own writings, and by external testimony.

[1] A synoptical view of the events specified in these observations may be seen in the "Chronological Table" prefixed to this volume.

A disposition has shown itself in recent times to follow in the footsteps of Gibbon (chap. xvi.), and to dispute the statement of Tacitus, Suetonius, and of all Christian Antiquity, that the Christians were specially obnoxious to the Heathen, and as such were made the victims of the Neronian Persecution. It has been alleged by some, that the true objects of the heathen hatred and rage, and the real sufferers in that Persecution, were the Jews, and that History has confounded the Christians with them. But if this had been the case, the Jews would have had some Martyrs to show. Josephus was then at Rome, and he would have been glad to have been able to relate, that the subsequent rebellion of his countrymen against Rome had been provoked by her persecutions.

One of the many services rendered to Church History by the late Professor Blunt is that which he has performed in his Lectures on the First Three Centuries, where may be seen, in chap. viii., a satisfactory solution of the problem which perplexed Gibbon and his followers.

In the Epistle to the Romans, written from Corinth before his arrival at Rome, he had expressed an intention to pass through Rome, and to go further westward to Spain [1].

In the Epistle to Philemon, written during his sojourn at Rome in this period of two years, he expresses a confident expectation of liberation. He desires him to "prepare for him a lodging," for he trusts that through his prayers he shall "be given unto him [2]."

Writing also to the Philippians, he deliberately considers the future issue of his trial, and compares the respective probability of the two alternatives, whether of life or death, and declares his full persuasion that he will be acquitted [3]. Accordingly he adds, that he hopes shortly to come to them [4].

To the Hebrews also he announces that their brother Timothy has been set at liberty; with whom, if he comes shortly, he will visit them [5].

The circumstances also of St. Paul's sojourn at Rome during the two years mentioned by St. Luke, were so different in many respects from those of his imprisonment there, when he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, which bears internal marks of being written just before his death [6], that a person who compares them carefully can hardly suppose that they belong to the same time.

For example. In the Epistles written in that two years' sojourn, he anticipates, as has been observed, a speedy release [7]. But in the Second to Timothy he exults in the foresight of approaching Martyrdom [8].

In the former period Timothy was with him [9]; but in the latter, Timothy is desired to come to him [10]. In the former period, Demas was with him as a fellow-labourer [11]; but in the latter, Demas has deserted him [12]. In the former period, Mark was with him [13]; but in the latter, Timothy is desired to bring Mark with him [14].

Before the former period, when St. Paul landed at Miletus, he had Trophimus with him, and took him to Jerusalem [15]. But before the writing of the Second Epistle to Timothy, St Paul had left Trophimus at Miletus sick [16].

Indeed, the whole character of the one period was different from the other. In the former period his friends came freely to him, and many were encouraged by his bonds to preach the Gospel [17]. But when he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy he was in close confinement, and Luke alone was with him [18]; and St. Paul mentions, to the special praise of Onesiphorus, that when he came to Rome he sought him out very diligently, and found him [19].

In a word,—the former interval of two years had been characterized by consideration and kindness on the part of the Roman authorities, for the person and character of the Apostle. But in the latter period, St. Paul is treated with that severity which might have been expected by the leading champions of the Gospel from the agents of Nero, after the excitement of the popular passions of the heathen multitude at Rome had been exasperated against the Christians by the Emperor [20].

"Quamvis ea quæ jam diximus sufficere videantur, adhuc tamen apertiùs et extra omnem controversiam ex Epistolâ Secundâ ad Timotheum probatur Apostolum Paulum bis Romam venisse; et in eâ urbe haud diu ante mortem suam secunda vincula et severiora passum esse.

"Nam Apostolus eam Epistolam scripsit, ut ex ipsâ patet, Romæ (i. 17), et quidem in vinculis quorum ipse mentionem facit (i. 8; ii. 9).

"Scripsit autem eam ad Timotheum tunc absentem desiderans eum videre (i. 4).

"Hæc autem vincula multum à prioribus differebant. Nam in prioribus vinculis prædicavit in conducto suo cum omni fiduciâ sine prohibitione. Notissima tunc fuit Pauli domus, in quâ per biennium habitavit et recepit omnes ingredientes ad eum. (Act. xxviii. 30, 31.) In secundis vinculis, alia statim rerum facies fuit. Tunc enim Onesiphorus (inquit), cùm Romam venisset solicitè me quæsivit et invenit. (2 Tim. i. 17.) An opus erat, ut Onesiphorus σπουδαιότερον, et cum tanto studio ac solicitudine quæreret Paulum, et ex tam sedulâ inquisitione inveniret, si Apostolus aut in eâdem domo, aut cum eâdem libertate, et non in arctâ et abditâ custodiâ prædicâsset?

"De prioribus vinculis ad Philippenses scribit ea manifesta fuisse in prætorio et in cæteris omnibus; ut plures è fratribus in Domino confidenter in vinculis meis abundantiùs auderent sine timore verbum Dei loqui. (Phil. i. 13.) In posterioribus autem, omnes eum comites et συνεργοὶ præter unum dereliquerant, et in alias regiones transierant. (2 Tim. iv. 10.)

"Magnum certe discrimen inter biennalem Pauli custodiam Lucæ memoratam, et hanc quam Apostolus in hâc secundâ ad Timotheum Epistolâ describit. Neque hujus disparitatis ulla ratio excogitari posse videtur, quàm quòd prior ante incendium, quod prædiis Tigellini Æmilianis proruperit, fuerit, posterior postea . . . ." (Tacit. Ann. xv. 40.)

"Ex his, et ex iis quæ antè diximus, constat, S. Paulum,

Accordingly we find a clear testimony, dating from St. Paul's age, that the Apostle, who in his first confinement was at Rome for the first time, and had never reached any point beyond it, did not terminate his career there at that time, but went to some regions westward of Rome.

S. Clement, the Apostle's contemporary, affirms that St. Paul went, in his missionary journeys, to the extreme limit of the West [1].

S. Clement was then writing at Rome itself, in an age when Gaul, and Spain, and Britain, had been opened out by the Roman arms, and had been made subject to Rome. And he could not have said that St. Paul had reached the limit of the West, if he had never gone beyond Rome. But this would have been the case, if St. Paul had suffered martyrdom in the imprisonment described by St. Luke at the close of the Acts of the Apostles, and had not been liberated from it.

S. Clement therefore must be understood to affirm in this passage, that St. Paul was not put to death at this time at Rome, but was released, and was enabled to go to the limit of the West, as far as it was then known to the Romans. Thus, as S. Clement expresses it, he became "a herald of the Gospel to the Eastern and Western world."

This testimony harmonizes with St. Paul's previously declared intention of visiting Spain [2].

The ancient author of what is commonly called the Muratorian Canon [3], written (it seems) in the West about the middle of the second century, appears to take for granted that the Apostle went into Spain [4].

It is also affirmed by Eusebius, that the Apostle was released after the two years' sojourn at Rome, with which the History of the Acts of the Apostles ends; and that, after he had preached the Gospel for some time subsequent to that release, he came to Rome a second time, and then suffered martyrdom [5].

Eusebius adds, that when St. Paul was in this second imprisonment at Rome, he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy.

The testimony of S. Jerome, who resided for some time at Rome, as Secretary to its Bishop, Damasus, and who had favourable opportunities of knowing the local traditions concerning St. Paul, says that the Apostle was released by Nero after the two years' sojourn mentioned by St. Luke; and that he preached the Gospel afterwards in regions of the West, and was afterwards imprisoned a second time at Rome, and then wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy, in immediate foresight of his martyrdom [6].

S. Jerome also affirms, that after his first imprisonment he preached the Gospel in Spain [7].

The same thing is stated by Theodoret, who says that St. Paul was liberated from his first imprisonment at Rome, and that he communicated the benefits of the Gospel to Spain, and other nations, and "to the islands lying apart in the high sea [8]."

On reviewing the above evidence, we may conclude that St. Paul was liberated from his confinement at Rome after the two years' sojourn mentioned by St. Luke at the close of the Acts of the Apostles, in the spring of A.D. 63.

The following results may also be stated as probable.

Having been released, he went to some country west of Italy, perhaps Spain.

He probably afterwards fulfilled his intention of going to Jerusalem, perhaps with Timothy [9]; and left Titus at Crete in his way thither [10].

prioribus vinculis solutum Româ exiisse; multas provincias peragrâsse; Corinthi, Mileti, Troade fuisse; Nicopoli hyemâsse; in Asiam et Macedoniam profectum esse; et in insulâ Cretâ prædicâsse; et denique Romam reversum esse; (ubi denique martyrium passus est.)"

[4] He says, "Acta omnia Apostolorum sub uno libro scripta sunt. Lucas optimè Theophilo comprehendit, quia sub præsentiâ ejus singula gerebantur: sicut et semotâ passione Petri evidenter declarat, sed et profectione Pauli ab Urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis."

Some slight variations, suggested by critical conjecture, have been admitted here. See the original, with collations, in Mr. Westcott's valuable work on the Canon of the N. T. p. 557—561. The writer's meaning seems to be, that the excellence of St. Luke's history may be inferred from the circumstance of his restricting himself to the narration of those events of which he was personally cognizant; and from his omission of other incidents in which he was not engaged. Compare note above on Rom. xv. 24—28.

He also executed his design of visiting Colossæ in Phrygia [1].

He also performed his promise of going to Philippi in Macedonia [2].

About this time, when setting forth for Macedonia, he commanded Timothy "to abide at Ephesus as chief Pastor of that Church [3]," and not long after he wrote his First Epistle to Timothy.

This last assertion requires some confirmation. The following considerations may serve that purpose:

In that Epistle St. Paul says that he exhorted Timothy "to abide at Ephesus when he himself was setting forth (πορευόμενος) to Macedonia [4]."

This journey of St. Paul to Macedonia was subsequent to the period of history embraced in the Acts; and was therefore after his two years' sojourn at Rome.

This appears as follows:

Only three journeys of St. Paul into Macedonia are contained in the History of the Acts of the Apostles. In none of these three did he desire Timothy "to abide at Ephesus."

In his first journey to Macedonia he took Timothy with him [5].

Before he undertook the second journey into Macedonia he had sent Timothy into that country [6], and he rejoined Timothy in Macedonia [7].

In his third journey into Macedonia he took Timothy with him; and with him he sailed beyond Ephesus, in his way to Jerusalem [8].

Therefore in none of those journeys did he desire Timothy to abide at Ephesus when he himself was setting forth into Macedonia.

It has indeed been alleged by some learned persons [9], that Timothy was placed at Ephesus by St. Paul at the time of some visit of his to Macedonia not mentioned in the Acts, but within the compass of its History.

But this is not probable in itself; nor has any sufficient proof been adduced in behalf of this assertion.

It is not likely in itself. Because, as long as the Apostle was in full vigour of body, and in the active discharge of his duties, he would in all probability reserve the chief superintendence of so important a Church as that of Ephesus to himself, and would not commit it to so young a man as Timothy.

Such a delegation of Apostolic authority to another, was only appropriate in a later period of St. Paul's career, when he had no expectation of being able to exercise such functions in his own person; and when, in anticipation of approaching dissolution, he would be desirous to commit them to another.

Besides, it is evident that when St. Paul passed by Ephesus in his way to Jerusalem, whence he was sent in bonds to Cæsarea and thence to Rome, where the History of the Acts leaves him, he had not settled Timothy as Chief Pastor at Ephesus.

This is clear from his last interview with the Presbyters of Ephesus at that time [10].

He then takes leave of them in solemn and affecting terms. Assuredly, if Timothy had then been already appointed by him to be their Bishop, some notice of that relation between them and him could hardly have failed to be taken at such a time.

Timothy himself was present at that interview [11]. But there is no charge given to him in that capacity, and no exhortation to the Presbyters of Ephesus to revere the successor of the Apostle. And Timothy was not then left behind at Ephesus [12] at that critical time when the Apostle was quitting it for ever; and when, if Timothy had been its Bishop, he would surely have remained there to defend the flock of Christ against the grievous wolves, who, as St. Paul warns them, would enter in after his departure [13].

Still further; St. Paul, when he afterward came to Rome, and was in the prison there, wrote his Epistle to the Ephesians, and Timothy was with St. Paul at that time[1]. But Tychicus is sent to the Ephesians with the Epistle, and not Timothy[2]. Timothy is not associated with St. Paul in writing his Epistle to the Ephesians, as he is to the Colossians and Philippians, although he was known to them[3]. And in all the notices concerning him at that period, there is no indication whatever that Timothy ever performed any Episcopal act at Ephesus, or had as yet been advanced to so high and arduous an office as that of the chief pastorship of that Church.

Besides, if Timothy had been appointed to so important a post as the Episcopal See of Ephesus before St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, it is not at all probable that St. Paul would have retained him with him at Rome during that time, and have employed him in an embassy into Greece[4].

More evidence might be adduced, to show that the appointment of Timothy to the Episcopate of Ephesus, and consequently the First Epistle of St. Paul to Timothy, are posterior to St. Paul's release from his two years' confinement at Rome[5].

The only argument on the other side that seems to deserve consideration, is derived from St. Paul's words to the Presbyters of Ephesus at Miletus, on that affecting occasion to which a reference has been made.

In that solemn farewell, he says that they will "see his face no more[6]."

This is tantamount to an assertion that he should never revisit Ephesus.

But in his Epistle to Timothy the Apostle expresses a hope that he should be able to come to him shortly[7].

Hence it has been inferred by some that the First Epistle to Timothy could not have been written after the interview with the Ephesian Presbyters at Miletus.

What is to be said here?

Some have solved the supposed difficulty by answering confidently that the Apostle was mistaken in his anticipation; and that he did visit Ephesus after that farewell.

But the fact is, there is no evidence to show that he ever revisited Ephesus after that interview; or that he ever intended to do so.

It is worthy of remark, that in several Epistles written afterwards from Rome, he expresses an intention of revisiting those to whom he writes. Thus he mentions a design of seeing Philemon at Colossæ, and promises a visit to the Church at Philippi; and in the Epistle to the Hebrews[8] he mentions a design of revisiting them.

But no such intention is expressed in his Epistle to the Church of Ephesus.

Indeed it has been too hastily assumed by some that St. Paul intimates such a design in his Epistle to Timothy.

What he does say, is, that he hopes to see Timothy himself. But he does not say that he intends to see Ephesus[9].

This intention of seeing Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus, was probably fulfilled by him in a similar manner to that in which he had executed a like purpose with regard to the Presbyters of the same city.

When he was sailing by the coast of Asia, in his way to Jerusalem, he had sent for the Ephesian Presbyters to the neighbouring city of Miletus, and he gave them an Apostolic Charge and Benediction there, and bade them solemnly farewell[10].

[5] This matter is clearly and fully argued by Bp. Pearson, Minor Works, ii. p. 382.

"Nos diù postea scriptam fuisse primam ad Timotheum Epistolam asserimus (i. e. after St. Paul's sojourn at Rome), et tam maturè scribi potuisse pernegamus.

"Verba quidem S. Pauli sunt 1 Tim. i. 3, Sicut rogavi te permanere Ephesi cùm irem in Macedoniam.

"Ego verò ex iisdem verbis demonstro, neque illo tempore, neque quovis alio in Actibus denotato, Paulum rogâsse Timotheum ut Ephesi permaneret, aut ad illum scripsisse hanc Epistolam, in quâ hæc verba continentur."

Bp. Pearson then proceeds to demonstrate that proposition, and thus concludes:

"Quamobrem pro certo haberi debet, nullâ ex his tribus profectionibus Paulum rogâsse Timotheum ut Ephesi permaneret; ac pariter certum est circa illa tempora non fuisse scriptam primam ad Timotheum Epistolam.

"Unde clarè sequitur necessariò statuendum esse, Paulum quartò in Macedoniam profectum esse, antequàm Epistolam scripsit ad Timotheum.

"Illa autem quarta profectio institui non potuit nisi post biennalem ejus Romæ custodiam."

[10] Acts xx. 16—36.

If he did this in the case of a large body of persons, the Presbyters of Ephesus, he might well do it in that of a single individual, his own son in the faith, Timothy [1].

Besides, after the Persecution of the Christians had broken out in the Roman Empire, St. Paul would not willingly incur such peril as must have awaited him in a city like Ephesus, where he had preached three years, and was well known, and where he was specially obnoxious to many [2].

St. Paul was ever ready to suffer gladly for Christ, but he would not willingly expose any one to the sin of being a Persecutor. He would, therefore, be disposed to shun Ephesus.

For a similar reason he would not, under existing circumstances, be eager to revisit Rome.

Thus then we are brought back to the conclusions already stated as probable, viz.

After his release from his first detention at Rome, in the Spring of A.D. 63, and after a missionary journey to some countries to the west of Italy, he went with Timothy to Jerusalem, as he had designed to do [3].

In his way from the west to Jerusalem, he would probably sail by Crete, and perhaps he left Titus there at that time, as Chief Pastor of that island [4].

From Jerusalem he went, according to his intention, into Phrygia, to Colossæ [5]; and thence proceeded along the southern bank of the Mæander to the neighbourhood of Ephesus, perhaps to Miletus, and there besought Timothy to abide at Ephesus, when he himself set off to Macedonia [6] to pay his promised visit to Philippi [7].

From Philippi in Macedonia he perhaps passed over into Epirus, and wintered at Nicopolis, near Actium [8].

The First Epistle to Timothy, and the Epistle to Titus, were written about this time. It seems probable that the First Epistle to Timothy was written before that to Titus; and that Titus would have a copy of that Epistle, in order that he might thence supply those directions [9] which were not contained in the Epistle to himself.

Why, it may be asked, did St. Paul write an Epistle to Titus, as well as to Timothy, on Church-Regimen? Would not the Epistles to Timothy have served for Titus also?

The fact here specified deserves attention. Probably there were differences of character in St. Paul's two spiritual sons which required some difference of treatment. But the principal inference, and it is an important one, which is to be derived from this fact, seems to be this—that by writing to the two Chief Pastors of two places, so different in population and habits, as the polished capital of Asia, Ephesus, and the almost savage island of Crete, and by prescribing the same form of Church-Regimen to both—the Holy Spirit has taught the world by St. Paul, that this form of Church Government—which is no other than that of Diocesan Episcopacy—is designed by the great Head of the Church for all countries and ages of the world.

The design with which these Epistles were written—their subject-matter—their very phraseology—all bespeak a date of composition distinct from, and later than, that of any other Epistles of St. Paul.

The Apostle's declining years, the death of so many of his Apostolic Brethren, the breaking out of the Persecution of the Christians under Nero in A.D. 64, the foresight of his own martyrdom not far distant, the anticipation also perhaps of the death of the Apostle of the Circumcision, St. Peter, for which that Apostle was looking, as our Lord Jesus Christ had showed him [10], the foreboding of evil days at hand for the Church [11]—these and other considerations would impress themselves on the Apostle's mind with great force and solemnity, after his release from his two years' detention at Rome, and would inspire him with earnest solicitude, and with a vehement desire, to provide for the future spiritual welfare of the Churches, which would soon be bereft of his personal presence and fatherly care.

He would, therefore, now bequeath to the Church an Apostolic Directory for her future guidance in Spiritual Regimen and Polity[1].

This he did by constituting the Churches of Ephesus and of Crete, and by setting Timothy and Titus over them respectively as Chief Pastors of those Churches, which were thus presented to the eye of Christendom as specimens and models of Apostolic Churches; and by addressing to the Chief Pastors of those Churches these Epistles, which were designed to be to them, and to all Bishops and Pastors, like a sacred Manual and a heavenly Oracle for their guidance, how they "ought to behave themselves in the House of God, which is the Church of the Living God, the Pillar and the Ground of the Truth[2]."

It may also be remarked, that the form of religious error, against which St. Paul provides an antidote in these Epistles, is of a peculiar character, such as belonged to the last age of the Jewish Polity, and to the decay of the Jewish Ritual at Jerusalem.

It is not the rigid Pharisaism, and strict legal self-righteousness, which had been condemned by St. Paul in the Epistles to the Galatians and to the Romans. But it was a speculative Gnosticism, a theorizing profession of Faith, a spurious Religion of Words, vaunting, in boastful hypocrisy, its own spiritual illumination, but hollow, barren, heartless, profitless, and dead; not 'maintaining good works,' but rather disparaging them; explaining away the doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body[3] by an allegorical process of Interpretation, afterwards fraught with so much moral mischief to the world; and deluding its votaries with a specious show and empty shadow of godliness; and puffing them up with presumptuous notions of superior holiness, and tempting them to cauterize their consciences with a hot iron[4]; and inveigling them to make compromises between God and mammon, and enticing them with earthly allurements to make Religion a Trade, and to wear away their days in hypocritical unfruitfulness, and to live as liars to themselves, and indulging them in antinomian licentiousness, and in worldly lusts, and carnal concupiscence, and sensual voluptuousness.

It was, in fact, that hypocritical form of Religion which had incurred the stern censure of the Bishop of Jerusalem, St. James, foreboding the coming woes of Jerusalem[5]; and which is also denounced in the Catholic Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude[6]; and which afterwards developed itself in the full amplitude of its hideous deformity in the organized systems of the Gnostics, and particularly in the mystical allegories of Valentinus, and the moral oppositions of Marcion[7], subverting the foundations of Faith and Practice, and bringing disgrace on the Christian name by its moral profligacy and dissolute enormities[8].

This is the form of Judaizing Gnosticism that is presented to the eye by the Apostle St. Paul in these Epistles to Timothy and Titus, and evoked from him those solemn denunciations which characterize these Epistles concerning the moral guilt of Heresy, and on the necessity of shunning all profitless and barren speculations, and of teaching wholesome and sound Doctrine, fruitful in Good Works[9].

The peculiar phraseology of these Epistles also deserves notice.

It has indeed been arbitrarily represented in recent times as an argument against their genuineness. But it may rather be adduced in confirmation of the statement, that they belong to a distinct period of their own (and this a late one) in the Apostle's career.

[2] 1 Tim. iii. 15.

The following words, from a writer of the third century, well describe the Apostle's design in writing the Pastoral Epistles: *οὐ μόνον ὡς σοφὸς ἀρχιτέκτων θεμέλιον κατεβάλλετο, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀρχιτεκτονικὰ οἱονεὶ βιβλία ἔγραψεν, πῶς δεῖ τὸν ἀρχιτέκτονα οἰκοδομεῖν οἰκίαν, ὁποῖον δεῖ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον εἶναι, πρεσβύτερόν τε, καὶ διακόνους, καὶ τὸ ὑπόλοιπον τῆς ἐκκλησίας πλήρωμα· ταῦτα γὰρ πάντα οἱονεὶ νόμοι ἀρχιτεκτονικοὶ ἦσαν. [7] On which account these three Epistles of St. Paul, or portions of them, were rejected by Marcion,—a proof of their existence at that time. See Tertullian, adv. Marcion. v. 21. Hieron. Prol. ad Titum.

But Tatian and the Encratites (says Jerome), and other earlier heretics (says Irenæus, iii. 12. 12) who are puffed up by a false pride of knowledge, own them as Scripture, but wrest them from their true sense by misinterpretation. The act of the one heresiarch Marcion in rejecting them, is an evidence of what the others of the same stamp would have done if they had been as venturous as he was. And thus the rejection of these Epistles by one, and their reception by others, is a strong evidence of their Genuineness and Authority; and may be appealed to in confirmation of the general testimony of the Ancient Universal Church in behalf of these Epistles, and in opposition to the allegations of some critics (such as Eichhorn, Schleiermacher, De Wette, Baur, and Schwegler) who have impugned them in recent times.

[8] For a clear view of its distinguishing features in Faith and Practice, see Blunt on the Early Church, chap. ix.

[9] See notes on 1 Tim. i. 10. Titus i. 16; iii. 8.

Some of the most remarkable features of this phraseology are

1. πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, used to introduce a memorable saying, a formula peculiar to these Epistles [1], and very appropriate to a time when the Apostle would leave certain memorable sentences as "faithful sayings," to be like "nails fastened by the Masters of Assemblies, which are given by one Shepherd [2]"—even by Christ Himself, the Chief Shepherd.

2. ὑγιαίνουσα διδασκαλία, λόγοι ὑγιαίνοντες, λόγος ὑγιὴς, ὑγιαίνειν τῇ πίστει [3]—words equally proper to be sounded in the ears at a time when the Church was suffering from such spiritual diseases as the Apostle describes under such names of a canker, fables, profitless questions, idle talk [4].

3. The same observation may be applied to the perpetual inculcation of the terms sound, sober, holiness, and such like [5].

They are like protests against that empty profession of religion, which was like a foul and deadly gangrene preying on the vitals of the Church.

At, or soon after, the time when the Epistle to Titus was written, St. Paul was designing to winter at Nicopolis, in Epirus [6]. He sent for Titus to come to him there, as soon as Artemas or Tychicus should have arrived in Crete to supply his place [7]; and, perhaps, sent him thence on a mission to Dalmatia [8].

After wintering at Nicopolis the Apostle seems to have visited Corinth, where Erastus remained in charge [9], and thence he came to Miletus, where he left Trophimus sick [10].

Perhaps it was at Miletus that he had another interview with his son in the faith, the beloved Timothy; and there he was separated from him, under some circumstances of peculiar distress, which after a loving and reverent association with his spiritual Father, St. Paul, during about fifteen years, and a fellowship of labour and of bonds for the sake of Christ, betokened the approach of the time of separation and spiritual orphanship, and brought from the eyes of Timothy a flood of tears [11], and made the sea-shore at Miletus to be a witness of a scene similar to that pathetic parting between St. Paul and the Presbyters of Ephesus, at the same place about ten years before.

Some reasons have been stated in the notes on the second Epistle to Timothy for the conjecture [12], which is there offered to the consideration of the reader, as to what the circumstances of this parting from Timothy were [13].

St. Paul, it is probable, was then apprehended in the neighbourhood of Ephesus; and was carried as a prisoner by sea along the coast of Asia toward Rome.

In his voyage thither he touched at Troas, and deposited some of his property in safe custody with Carpus there [14].

Thence he probably proceeded under a military guard to Neapolis and Philippi, and so by the Egnatian way toward Rome: and thence wrote his second Epistle to Timothy a little before his death [15].

He had associated the name of Timothy with his own in writing the two first Epistles that he addressed to any Christian Church, those to the Thessalonians. And now about thirteen years after the date of those two Epistles, he writes this, his last Epistle, to him.

Thus his sufferings for the Gospel were made more fully known; and finally he bore testimony to Christ at the tribunal of Cæsar, and laid down his life for the Gospel in the Capital of the World.

His Martyrdom was by the same manner of death [16] as that of the forerunner of Christ,

2. Τιμοθέῳ] On the History of Timothy, see Acts xiv. 6; xvi. 1. He was of Lystra in Lycaonia; his mother, Eunice, a Jewess, and afterwards a Christian. (2 Tim. i. 5.) Having been associated by St. Paul with himself at Lystra, he accompanied the Apostle in his missionary journey in Asia, and in his first visit to Macedonia; and being left by him temporarily in charge there, rejoined him with Silas at Corinth (Acts xvii. 14; xviii. 5), and is associated by St. Paul with Silas in his Epistles to the Thessalonians (1 Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1), written from Corinth.

He was afterwards with St. Paul at Ephesus (1 Cor. iv. 17; xvi. 10); and having been despatched by him with Erastus to Macedonia, rejoined him there (Acts xix. 22. 2 Cor. i. 1), and accompanied him to Corinth (Rom. xvi. 21); and when he had quitted it for Macedonia, was one of those who went with him along the coast of Asia, touching at Miletus, where the Apostle addressed the Ephesian presbyters (Acts xx. 17—36) in his way to Jerusalem, with the collection of alms for the poor Christians there.

He was afterwards with St. Paul in his first imprisonment at Rome; and is associated with him in his Epistles to the Colossians, Philemon, and Philippians, written from Rome.

He was probably despatched by the Apostle to Philippi a little before St. Paul's release from his imprisonment (see Phil. ii. 18—20), and was afterwards put in prison and liberated; and after his release St. Paul expressed his hope to visit Jerusalem with him. (Heb. xiii. 23.)

Having made this trial of his faithfulness during a term of thirteen years, and having afforded him the benefit of near personal intercourse with himself, and of the experience of his own apostolical administration, St. Paul, now in his old age (Philem. 9), and not expecting ever to revisit Ephesus (Acts xx. 25. 38), settled him as Bishop in the great city of Ephesus, and writes to him the present Epistle, in order to instruct him further in his Episcopal duties. At the same time he expresses a hope to see him again shortly (1 Tim. iii. 14, 15); and it is probable that this hope was realized. (2 Tim. i. 4.)

When St. Paul, after a few years' liberty, was again in prison at Rome, and foreknew that his martyrdom was near (2 Tim. iv. 6), he addressed to him the Second Epistle (2 Tim. iv. 21), in which he desires him to endeavour to come to him quickly. (2 Tim. iv. 9.) He requests him to bring the cloak which he had left at Troas (2 Tim. iv. 13), by which place he would probably pass in his way from Asia to Rome. He informs him that he has sent Tychicus to Ephesus, probably to take Timothy's place in his absence. Perhaps, therefore, Timothy was occupied in visiting the Churches of Asia when St. Paul wrote the second Epistle. Timothy has always been regarded by the Church as the first Bishop of Ephesus. See Euseb. iii. 4, and the Acts of the Great Council of Chalcedon (Concilia General. iv. p. 699, Labbé).

It has been said, indeed, by some in recent times, that this assertion is inconsistent with the general tradition of St. John's residence and death in that City. But it may be remembered that St. John himself addresses in the Apocalypse a Spiritual Pastor of the Church of Ephesus, whom he designates as its Angel, i. e. as its Chief Pastor. (Rev. ii. 1.)

The residence, therefore, of Timothy at Ephesus, would not have been incompatible with that of St. John. The local tradition at Ephesus, and that of the Martyrologies, is, that he suffered death by stoning in that City. Bolland, Acta Sanct. 24 Ian.: the Greeks keep his festival on 22nd Jan. See the authorities in Tillemont, Mémoires, ii. p. 69.

3. Καθὼς παρεκάλεσα] As I besought thee then, so I beseech thee now. Winer, § 63, p. 503.

St. Paul uses a word of gentle exhortation, not of command, for he was writing to one who was not only his own son in the faith, but was also a Bishop of the Church. Theophyl. See ii. 1. Cp. v. 1.

In reading this and the second Epistle to Timothy, it is to be borne in mind, that these two Epistles were designed to be not only a Directory to Timothy himself, for the regulation of his own practice, and to furnish him with a store of arguments against Judaizing and other opponents, but also to be a public, authoritative Commission, which Timothy might show to others as his credentials, delivered to him, as Bishop of Ephesus, by Christ, the Head of the Church, acting by the instrumentality of the Apostle, guided by the Holy Ghost; and sending his Epistles to Timothy, not to be reserved in his own private custody, but to be read publicly in the Church (as they ever have been) as an integral portion of Holy Scripture.

If, then, there were any at Ephesus, who, on account of Timothy's youth, or other causes, might be disposed to disparage his Episcopal authority, he could appeal to these Epistles, dictated by the Holy Spirit, as his own official warrant; and show from them that it was not of his own choice that he abode at Ephesus, in order to reprove the false doctrine of some false teachers, especially the Judaizers, but that he had been there placed by St. Paul. Cp. v. 18, and Introduction to this Epistle.

— προσμεῖναι ἐν Ἐφέσῳ] to abide still at Ephesus.

St. Paul had already written his Epistle to the Ephesians, and he now desired Timothy to remain in charge at Ephesus to watch over the Church there, and to inculcate what he had taught. Cp. Theophyl.

St. Paul does not say to Timothy that he left him at Ephesus, ἵνα παραγγείλῃς τισὶ μὴ ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν, 4 μηδὲ προσέχειν μύθοις καὶ γενεαλογίαις ἀπεράντοις, αἵτινες ζητήσεις παρέχουσι μᾶλλον ἢ οἰκονομίαν Θεοῦ τὴν ἐν πίστει.

as he says to Titus that he left him in Crete. (Tit. i. 5.) There is no evidence that St. Paul ever revisited Ephesus after his first imprisonment at Rome. Perhaps on some occasion, when sailing by Asia toward Macedonia, he desired Timothy to abide at Ephesus. See on iii. 15, and Introduction to this Epistle, p. 419—21.

— πορευόμενος εἰς Μακεδονίαν] when I was on my journey to Macedonia. As to the time of this journey, see the Introduction to this Epistle, p. 419. Cp. Phil. ii. 24, where, writing at Rome, he expresses a hope to visit Philippi in Macedonia.

4. γενεαλογίαις ἀπεράντοις] interminable genealogies,—

(1) Understood by some of the Fathers to refer to the emanations of Æons, in the speculations of Gnosticism. So Iren. i. 1. Cp. Iren. Frag. i. p. 3, ed. Pfaff.; and Tertullian, de Præscr. 33, and de Carne Christi, 24; and so Blunt on the Early Fathers, p. 640. Cp. below on vi. 20.

(2) Others regard these Genealogies as of Jewish origin, not the Genealogies of the Mosaic Law (see Augustine, refuting this allegation, c. Adversarium Legis, ii. 1), but the genealogies of the Jews, priding themselves on their hereditary descent from Abraham, and boasting themselves to be God's favoured race, to the exclusion of the Heathen world. (John viii. 33. 39. 44.)

Or (3) the Genealogies of the rabbinical schools, such as may be found in the Talmud. So Chrys., Aug., who exemplifies them by a specimen: "Deum primo homini dicunt duas creâsse mulieres, ex quibus texunt genealogias verè (sicut ait Apostolus), infinitas, parientes infructuosissimas quæstiones."

This opinion is confirmed by what St. Paul says to Titus, i. 14, μὴ προσέχοντες Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις: and iii. 9, γενεαλογίας καὶ ἔριδας καὶ μάχας νομικάς.

These Genealogies might well be called interminable, as contrasted with the Genealogies of Holy Scripture, which serve the purpose of proving the descent of the Messiah, and particularly as compared with the two Genealogies of the Gospels, which have their πέρας, or terminus, in Christ. (Matt. i. 1—18. Luke iii. 23—38.)

— οἰκονομίαν] dispensation. The meaning is, These fables and interminable Genealogies, with which these heterodox Pastors feed their flocks, supply no wholesome diet to the soul, only controversial and thorny questions, which have no spiritual nourishment in them, and are no part of the divine dieting of God's dispensation in Christ, supplied from the storehouse of His love.

The word οἰκονομία, as here used, and expressing God's care in governing, guiding, ordering, and feeding His Household, especially by the ministry of Christ, the Incarnate Word, Whom He has appointed to be Head of the Church, the House of the Living God (1 Tim. iii. 15. Heb. x. 21), is explained by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Church and City where Timothy now was, Ephesus (Eph. i. 10; iii. 2), the best Commentary on this Epistle to its Bishop. See note there.

This οἰκονομία Θεοῦ is here affirmed to be in faith, namely, to have its proper element in the sphere of faith, in opposition to the teaching of these seducing Judaizers at Ephesus, who placed God's Œconomy or Dispensation in the lower element of human works according to the Law, by which they supplanted the scheme of the Gospel, and sought to establish their own righteousness, and to obtain salvation as a debt due to their own deserts.

The reading οἰκοδομίαν (Elz.), edification, is found in D, and οἰκοδομὴν in D*, but neither of these readings has any claim to be put in comparison with οἰκονομίαν, which is in A, F, G, I, K.

5. Τὸ δὲ τέλος τῆς παραγγελίας ἐστὶν ἀγάπη] But the end of the precept is Love. Those Genealogies of which the Apostle had been speaking, have no end. But the precept,—that is, the true, sound, wholesome system and body of Christian doctrine, which ought to be delivered by thee and by all Christian Pastors, and which is opposed by those ἑτεροδιδάσκαλοι,—has its end and consummation in Love.

Cp. Rom. xiii. 10, πλήρωμα νόμου ἡ ἀγάπη, and Gal. v. 13. Col. iii. 14. Eph. iv. 16; and Augustine, Serm. 350 and Serm. 358, and in Ps. xxxi.

— ἐκ καθαρᾶς καρδίας καὶ συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς καὶ πίστεως ἀνυποκρίτου] The Love which the Apostle describes as the τέλος of the precept, springs from a clean Heart, one unsullied by carnal lusts and sordid cares; and from a good Conscience, regulated by God's Will, and not tampered with, but carefully obeyed; and from faith unfeigned,—not a specious, hollow, hypocritical, inoperative, barren faith, such as is condemned by St. James (ii. 17, 18),—but a living, healthful, energetic, fruitful Faith. See Gal. v. 6.

The Love which the wife of Potiphar professed for Joseph was not out of a clean heart, but of impure lust. Cp. Augustine, de Doctr. Christ. i. 5. A pure heart is that which loves nothing but that which ought to be loved. The love which Conspirators, and Pirates, and Robbers profess for one another is not from a good conscience. (Augustine, Serm. 90.) The love which Demas professed for St. Paul was not from a faith unfeigned; but his faith was a mere empty profession, like that of those who are sown "on the rock, which, when they hear, receive the word with joy, but have no root in themselves, and which for a while believe, but in time of trial fall away" (Luke viii. 13).

Faith is mentioned last, as the root of all, from which every other virtue springs and grows. Hence Ignatius (ad Eph. 14), referring probably to this passage, says, Ἀρχὴ μὲν πίστις, τέλος δὲ ἀγάπη.

6. ὧν τινὲς ἀστοχήσαντες] The word ἀστοχεῖν is used of archers who shoot their arrows without skill. (Cp. vi. 21. 2 Tim. ii. 18.) Teachers of others ought to aim aright, and to direct their arrows well, in order to hit the mark; but these have shot at random, and having missed love, and good conscience, and faith, have swerved aside to vain jangling. Chrys., Theophyl.

The Apostle thus shows that the main source of Unbelief and Heresy is in an evil life; and therefore he speaks of the evil heart of unbelief. Heb. iii. 12. Cp. John vii. 17.

8. Οἴδαμεν δέ] But we know. A reply to the Judaizers at Ephesus, who charged the Apostle with disparaging the Mosaic Law. He shows that they themselves were chargeable with the sin which they imputed to him.

— καλὸς ὁ νόμος, ἐάν τις αὐτῷ νομίμως χρῆται] See Rom. viii. 12.

We who preach "Christ, the end of the Law, to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4), we use the Law lawfully, and as the Law itself commands us to do, although we are accused by some of disparaging the Law; whereas they who treat it as an end, and not as the means to the end, Christ, treat it unlawfully, and, as far as in them lies, contravene and frustrate the Law. See Chrys. and Augustine (de Spiritu et Literâ, 16), who says, "Justus bonâ lege legitimè utitur, et tamen justo lex non posita est; non enim ex eâ justificatus est, sed ex lege fidei, quâ credidit nullo modo posse suæ infirmitati, ad implenda ea quæ lex factorum juberet, nisi divinâ gratiâ sublevari."

9. δικαίῳ νόμος οὐ κεῖται] law is not enacted for a righteous man. "Justus non est sub lege, quia in lege Domini est voluntas ejus (his delight), qui enim in lege est, secundùm legem agitur; ille ergo liber est, hic servus" (Augustine in Ps. i. A Lapide).

Cp. S. Irenæus (iv. 16. 3) on the reason why the Decalogue was not given to the Patriarchs: "Quare Patribus non disposuit Deus testamentum? Quia lex non est posita justis, justi autem Patres virtutem Decalogi conscriptam habentes in cordibus . . . habebant in semetipsis justitiam Legis."

This may be predicated, not only of the Law of Moses, but of Law generally. Laws are not enacted for the sake of rewarding good men, but in order to coerce the evil. And this seems to be a preferable sense here, not only because Νόμος is without the Article, but because the Law of Moses, as far as it was a special code, promised rewards to good men. See Eph. vi. 2. Lev. xviii. 5. Ezek. xx. 11. 13. 21. Cp. Gal. v. 23, and

It is however true that St. Paul (as Wetstein has observed), in his enumeration of the sins which follow here, seems to have had his eye on the order of the Decalogue. Thus ἀσεβεῖς καὶ ἁμαρτωλοί, ἀνόσιοι καὶ βέβηλοι are they who violate the commandments of the First Table; and they who are next specified, break the injunctions of the Second Table.

— πατραλῴαις] strikers of fathers; ἀλοιᾶν, ψιλῶς τὸ τύπτειν (Ammonius). The word was applied to any outrage against parents. See Pollux, iii. 13.

10. ἀνδραποδισταῖς] kidnappers of men, in order to make them slaves. Cp. Rev. xviii. 13.

Men-stealing is forbidden under pain of death. Exod. xxi. 16. Cp. Deut. xxiv. 7, where it is applied to the stealing of an Israelite. Ἀνδραποδιστής ἐστιν ὁ τὸν ἐλεύθερον καταδουλωσάμενος (Pollux, iii. 78). He was sometimes called σωματέμπορος, in Latin, 'plagiarius.'

A person who stole a slave from his master was also called ἀνδραποδιστὴς in Greek and Roman Law. (Etymol. Cp. the Lex Fabia; Wetstein.)

— τῇ ὑγιαινούσῃ διδασκαλίᾳ] the wholesome doctrine. It is observable that the word ὑγιαίνω (to be in health) occurs eight times in the pastoral Epistles, and always in reference to doctrine. A striking proof of the importance of sound teaching.

11. ὃ ἐπιστεύθην] See Rom. iii. 2, ἐπιστεύθησαν τὰ λόγια. 1 Cor. ix. 17. Gal. ii. 7. 1 Thess. ii. 4. Tit. i. 3.

12. Καὶ χάριν ἔχω κ.τ.λ.] Another reply to the Judaizing false teachers mentioned above, v. 4—7.

They charge me with—

(1) Either being a renegade now, or

(2) With having been a blasphemer formerly.

He is thus led to speak of his own Conversion and Apostleship, and shows how it is exemplary to them.

— πιστόν με ἡγήσατο θέμενος εἰς διακονίαν] He judged me faithful, in that He put me into the ministry. See Theophyl.

It has been asked, How could Christ have judged St. Paul faithful, when he was a persecutor? and how could He have therefore put him into the Ministry?

This question is treated at length by A Lapide here, who argues, that πιστὸς does not mean faithful as a Christian, but only trusty, as a heathen, or unregenerate person might be.

But how could any one, who was only πιστὸς in this sense, and so lately a blasphemer, be therefore judged to be meet to be advanced to the Apostleship?

Some of the Schoolmen (as Aquinas here) suppose that πιστὸς is said by anticipation of what Paul would become, and what God foreknew; and that God chose him "ex prævisis meritis;" but this opinion tends to Pelagianism and Arminianism.

But the supposed difficulty arises from an incorrect notion as to the time at which St. Paul was "put into the Ministry."

He was not ordained an Apostle till many years after his Conversion. See above on Acts xiii. 2.

St. Paul went through a term of probation of several years after his Conversion. And when he had approved himself to be πιστὸς, through the grace which God had given him, and which he had cherished, and by which he had profited, then he was "put into the Ministry,"—then, but not till then, was he ordained to the Apostleship.

13. τὸν πρότερον] A, D*, F, G have τὸ πρότερον, and so Lachm., Tisch., Ellicott, Alf. But the article τὸν gives force to the substantives, and increases the emphasis of his self-accusation.

It is a characteristic of St. Paul's manner in his latest Epistles to look back on God's first mercies, and to teach others to do so. A practical lesson on the true nature of Christian Thankfulness. See on 2 Tim. i. 5; iii. 11.

— βλάσφημον καὶ διώκτην καὶ ὑβριστήν] An accumulation of guilt. Not only a blasphemer of God, but a persecutor of His Son; with acts of insult, outrage, and violence. Theophyl.

St. Paul confesseth himself to have been a persecutor, &c., although he followed the guidance of his own Conscience (Acts xxvi. 9), and to have stood in need of mercy for the remission of those wicked acts, though he did them ignorantly, and out of zeal for the Law. Cp. John xvi. 2. Bp. Sanderson, ii. p. 122.

— Ἀλλὰ ἠλεήθην] But nevertheless I obtained mercy, because I did it not knowing what I did, being yet in unbelief.

This sentence is best explained by our Blessed Lord's prayer on the Cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do" (Luke xxiii. 34). Not as if they were not guilty of a heinous sin; for, if they were not guilty, they would not have needed forgiveness. But Jesus Christ, in His great mercy, pleaded for them a circumstance, which made their sin to be less sinful than might have been the case. Their sin was not against knowledge and conscience: it was not a wilful and presumptuous sin, but one of ignorance. They did not know that He Whom they crucified was the Son of God. Not that their ignorance excused them, for they might have known Him as such, and their only hope was in God's mercy; yet it did not, as it were, close the door to mercy, as Wilfulness and Presumption would have done.

So (as Bp. Sanderson says, iii. 233) though Saul was a persecutor, a blasphemer, and injurious, yet he obtained mercy, because he did it ignorantly. His ignorance was not enough to justify him; he stood in need of God's mercy, or he would have perished in his sins. But yet who can tell, whether he ever would have found mercy, if he had done the same things, and not in ignorance? Ignorance, then, though it do not deserve pardon, yet it often findeth it, because it is not joined with open contempt of Him that is able to pardon. But he that sinneth against knowledge doth not only provoke the Justice of God, but dam up His Mercy by his contempt, and doth his part to shut himself out for ever from all possibility of pardon. See also Bp. Sanderson, ii. 50, where he says that St. Paul here "leaves it questionable whether there be hope of mercy for such as blaspheme maliciously and against knowledge."

St. Paul's words here are, therefore, a solemn warning to all persons, such as open Infidels or profane Scoffers, who imagine that they have nothing to fear, provided they are sincere, and act according to their conscience; for there "is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death" (Prov. xiv. 12).

The extenuating circumstance of ignorance was probably mentioned by the Apostle as a warning to the Jews, and to apostatizing Christians, Judaizers, and others of later days, who might be disposed to pervert his wonderful Conversion into an occasion for presumption on God's mercy.

St. Paul says, that he obtained mercy because he did it ἀγνοῶν. But this, be it observed, was at the commencement of the Gospel. At that time the evidences of Christianity were not fully displayed, as they were afterwards, and as they are now.

St. Paul could not long have remained ἀγνοῶν after the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost had been poured out upon the Church, and after the working of so many miracles by the Apostles and others at Jerusalem, and after so many wonderful signs had attended the reception of the Gospel wherever it was preached.

Hence, therefore, we may derive a confirmation of the opinion, that St. Paul's Conversion followed soon after the Crucifixion, and Ascension, and Day of Pentecost.

— ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ] when I was yet in a state of unbelief, i. e. before I had been received into the Church by a profession of faith in Christ.

He guards against the abuse of the divine mercy shown in his particular case, into a plea for recklessness and apostasy in the case of those who have been baptized; such as was the case of Simon Magus, of whom it is said that he ἐπίστευσε, i. e. made public profession of faith in Christ, and was baptized, and then committed the sin to which he has given his name. (Acts viii. 13—18, where see note.) And such was the case also with those Hebrew Christians to whom St. Paul had referred in his Epistle to the Hebrews, vi. 1—8.

The word πιστεύω, to embrace the faith in Christ, as used there and below, v. 16, explains ἀπιστία. Cp. Heb. vi. 4—6, and Rom. xi. 23, where the spiritual state in which the Jews are, is called ἀπιστία. Cp. Tertullian, de Pudic. 18.

14. Ὑπερεπλεόνασε] was exceedingly abundant. The metaphor is derived from a stream. (See Bp. Sanderson on v. 13.) I by my sins obstructed the course of God's grace, but the Stream of His Mercy brimmed over, and overflowed the mounds and dams of my sinfulness, by the surpassing exuberance, copiousness, and power of its spiritual inundation.

— μετὰ πίστεως καὶ ἀγάπης] with faith and love. The natural concomitants of the fertilising current of divine Grace, duly received and cherished in the Soul.

The river Nile fertilizes Egypt by its 'pinguis arena,' Hermus and Pactolus bring their golden ore; the stream of divine Grace brought with it to me Faith and Love.

It is to be remembered, however, that St. Paul has taken care to inform us, that, at his Conversion, he was "not disobedient to the heavenly Vision." See on Acts xxvi. 19. And our Lord had pointed to him at Damascus as a suppliant for grace, "Behold he prayeth," Acts ix. 11.

15. Πιστὸς ὁ λόγος] Faithful is the saying. A formula used by St. Paul in these Epistles to Timothy and Titus, in order to introduce some weighty and memorable truth. (1 Tim. iii. 1; iv. 9. 2 Tim. ii. 11. Tit. iii. 8.) It is to him what Christ's preamble was to the Saviour Himself, but which no one else ever ventured to use, Ἀμὴν, Ἀμὴν, λέγω ὑμῖν, uttered about twenty-five times by Him in the last Gospel, and in that alone. And this Apostolic preamble is found in these last Epistles, and in them only.

— ὧν πρῶτός εἰμι ἐγώ] chief of whom am I. The pronoun is reserved for emphasis to the last place of the sentence.

The word πρῶτος, first, is not to be understood first in time, but in guilt. Cp. Augustine, Serm. 175 and 176, on this text, and in Ps. lxx., and his recently discovered Sermon (299, Vol. v. p. 1785), "Non quia prior peccavit, sed quia plus peccavit; nemo enim graviùs Ecclesiam est persecutus."

It is to be remembered that the person who utters these words is St. Paul, and that he is speaking of himself.

Being illumined by the Holy Ghost, he had a clear perception of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, especially of the sin of which he himself had been guilty, of blasphemy, persecution, and outrage against the Ever-Blessed Son of God. St. Paul thought of himself formerly breathing rage and slaughter against the Saints (Acts ix. 1), and making havock of the Church (viii. 3) even in strange cities (Acts xxvi. 11), and stirring up the Chief Priests to shed the blood of the faithful (Acts ix. 2), and requesting letters from them, authorizing him to persecute the worshippers of that Adorable Redeemer, Who in His tender love had come into the world to save sinners, and was risen from the dead, and had ascended into Heaven, and was seated in glory at God's right hand.

In this respect his own sin was greater than that of those who crucified Him, and who had not seen the evidence of His mighty working in His Resurrection, Ascension, and sending of the Holy Ghost.

He is speaking of what was in the range of his own knowledge; and it was no exaggeration to say, that, as far as he knew, no one was a greater sinner than himself.

He had his eye fixed on his own sin, and on that only, he would not judge others; and being endued by the Holy Ghost not only with a clear sense of the heinousness of sin, but with the grace of humility and repentance, he speaks from the depth of his own self-abasement, and remorse, and shame, looking up to Him Whom he had pierced. (Zech. xii. 10.) "Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners—chief of whom am I." Compare the prayer of the Publican, Ὁ Θεὸς ἱλάσθητί μοι τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ (Luke xviii. 13), "God be merciful to me the sinner."

16. ἵνα ἐν ἐμοὶ πρώτῳ] in order that in me, being the chief of sinners, He might show forth all His long-suffering.

As in a house where there are many sick, and one most sick of all, a Physician selects him for the exercise of his medical art, and restores him to perfect health, and thus gives hope of recovery to all, so did Christ, the good Physician, come to me, says the Apostle. He cleansed even me from sin, and poured out even on me all the riches of His grace and love, so that none might despair, but all may have hope in Him. Cp. Theodoret.

St. Paul acknowledges with thankfulness and joy that he has obtained the mercy of God, because he was first, that is, chief, of sinners; and yet, says he, I obtained mercy in order that all may say, If Paul was healed, why should I despair? Wherever the Physician comes, He asks for some sick man who may be deemed incurable, and He heals him. He does not look for reward, but He publicly commends His art to the World's esteem and acceptance. But do not therefore love sin. Love not the couch of sin. Arise, thou paralytic, from thy bed. Hear the voice of Paul himself, Surge qui dormis et exsurge à mortuis, et illuminabit te Christus (Eph. v. 14). Cp. Augustine (Serm. 175).

Elz. has here τὴν πᾶσαν. But A, F, G have τὴν ἅπασαν, which is received by Lach., Tisch., Ellicott, Alf. Ἅπας is rarely used by St. Paul, only once, certainly (Eph. vi. 13). But its very rarity makes it more emphatic here, and makes it less likely that it was substituted by copyists for πᾶσαν.

The phrase τὴν ἅπασαν μακροθυμίαν, 'totam longanimitatem,' may be compared with Acts xx. 18, τὸν πάντα χρόνον, and Gal. v. 14, ὁ πᾶς νόμος.

On the difference between ἅπας and πᾶς, see on Acts ii. 1.

Christ chose me (says the Apostle), in order to show forth in me, as the chief of sinners, all His long-suffering, not that He might encourage any one to sin, but for encouragement to all who should profess their faith in Him to life everlasting. I, being the chief of sinners, needed not only a portion of His long-suffering, but all of it.

Observe the humility of the Apostle. God, being desirous (he says) to assure all that He is ready to forgive all sin, chose me the most sinful of all men; and since I obtained mercy, no one need doubt that all are capable of obtaining it. Let no one despair of salvation, since I am saved. Chrysostom.

— πρὸς ὑποτύπωσιν] for a pattern. St. Paul does not mean that he himself in the abstract is a pattern for all who should believe; but he says that God has set forth in him all His own long-suffering, for a pattern to all who should embrace the Gospel. (See on v. 3.) They are not to look at him as their model, but they are to contemplate God's mercy in him as a pattern proposed for their encouragement, πρὸς προτροπὴν καὶ παράκλησιν (Chrys.), and as an assurance to them, that, if out of such untractable materials, as Saul the persecutor, the divine Artificer could mould Paul the Apostle, God's grace can also model them into vessels of honour fit for the Master's use (2 Tim. ii. 21), if they are also like Saul in being not disobedient to the heavenly call, and in praying for pardon and grace. See above on v. 14.

The word ὑποτύπωσις occurs below, 2 Tim. i. 13. See also the examples of it in Wetstein, p. 320.

It is shown by Wetstein's examples of the use of the word ὑποτύπωσις, that it not only signifies a model to be copied, but an adumbration or delineation, a primary draught or sketch, to be afterwards filled in; a cartoon, or sub-tracery (ὑπὸ), to be afterwards painted over. In this view, the mercy of God shown in the case of St. Paul might very properly be called an ὑποτύπωσις, a primary sketch and delineation, to be afterwards filled up, and coloured over with the rich hues of the Divine Mercy shed forth over all the world.

— τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν] Of those who should be converted from unbelief like mine (ἀπιστία, v. 13), and embrace the Gospel, and so inherit everlasting life. An encouragement and exhortation to all, especially to the Jewish teachers, of whom he has been speaking. See on v. 3.

17. τῶν αἰώνων] of the ages, the countless ages of Eternity.

— μόνῳ] Elz. adds σοφῷ, not in A, D*, F, G, and cancelled by Griesb., Sch., Lün., Tf., Ell., Alf.

18. κατὰ τὰς προαγούσας ἐπὶ σὲ προφητείας] according to the prophecies on thee, concerning thee (Syriac), going before, and leading the way to thine Ordination. 'Secundùm præcedentes in te prophetias' (Vulg.).

Whether these prophecies, which guided St. Paul in his ordination of Timothy (2 Tim. i. 6), were directly from the Holy Ghost, with regard to Timothy (as is the opinion of Chrys., Theodoret, Theophyl., Œcumen.), or by the medium of Prophets, cannot be accurately determined.

It is probable, that before St. Timothy's ordination to the Episcopate of Ephesus, the Holy Spirit spake to the Prophets, and the Prophets declared to the Church the Holy Spirit's will, designating him to the Episcopate, as was done in St. Paul's own ordination to the Apostleship at Antioch. (Acts xiii. 2.)

This fact serves to account for the appointment of so young a man, as Timothy was (1 Tim. iv. 12), to so great a charge in so large a city as Ephesus; and St. Paul mentions the fact as justifying the appointment; for the sake of others, especially the Christians at Ephesus, who would read this Epistle, and thence learn to treat their Bishop with due respect. See above, v. 3.

— ἐν αὐταῖς] In and by these prophecies as thy spiritual weapons, in the strength of which thou mayest go forth and war the good warfare. Cp. Winer, § 48, p. 346.

19. ἣν τινὲς ἀπωσάμενοι] Heresy, therefore, and False Doctrine, is ascribed by St. Paul to lack of due regulation of the Conscience by God's will and word, and to sins wilfully committed against Conscience. See v. 6.

The root of impiety is an evil life. Theodoret. "Fons hæreseos mala conscientia." A Lapide.

20. Ὑμέναιος] Hymenæus, who said that the Resurrection was past. (2 Tim. ii. 17.)

— Ἀλέξανδρος] Alexander. Cp. 2 Tim. iv. 14. The name of an Alexander is mentioned as a leader of the Jewish party at Ephesus. Acts xix. 33, where see note.

As to the inferences from names thus mentioned, it may surely be affirmed with Origen that "nihil otiosum in Sacrâ Scripturâ;" and it may be reasonably inferred that the writers of Holy Scripture, being inspired by the Holy Ghost, were not without divine guidance in the mention of names; and that one of the ends they are designed to answer, is to show the harmony and truth of the different portions of Holy Scripture by means of slight and almost unnoticeable coincidences, which, though of little importance singly, yet when taken together, afford a strong testimony to Christianity.

The mention of an Alexander in the Acts, where he is introduced without any apparent reason (as far as the narrative of that book is concerned), may have been suggested prospectively by the Holy Spirit, in order to illustrate the mention to be made of him afterwards (supposing him to be the same person) by the Apostle St. Paul, and to account for, and justify, the severe sentence of excommunication pronounced upon him by the Apostle.

— οὓς παρέδωκα τῷ Σατανᾷ] whom I delivered to Satan: not whom I have delivered, but whom (as thou knowest) I delivered—by a solemn act of religious discipline at a particular time.

I here state to thee the reason of this act, in order that thou mayest communicate that reason to others on my authority; especially to the Church at Ephesus.

The reason was not, in order to gratify any private resentment on my own part; let no one harbour so uncharitable an imagination; but in order that they whom I delivered to Satan may be taught by wholesome discipline not to continue to blaspheme, and so may escape the terrible consequences of that deadly sin, which I, who "was formerly a blasphemer," well know.

This discipline, therefore, of Excommunication, is "medicinalis vindicta, terribilis lenitas, charitatis severitas." Augustine (ad Literas Petilian. iii. 4). See above on 1 Cor. v. 5, where the meaning of the phrase 'to deliver to Satan,' is considered.

These persons, of whom the Apostle speaks, being separated by Excommunication from the communion of the Church, and bereft of divine grace, were grievously tormented by their Ghostly Enemy with diseases and sundry afflictions. It might, therefore, be hoped that they would thus be brought to a better mind, when they felt the consequences of their blasphemy. . . . From this mention of Excommunication the Apostle naturally begins to deliver his directions to Timothy on Church-Regimen. See Theodoret.

As the Pillar of Cloud overshadowed the Tabernacle in the wilderness, and protected it from the heat; and they who were without the precincts of its shadow were scorched by the beams of the sun; so they who are put out of the Communion of the Church in their march through the wilderness of this world, are exposed to the fiery darts of the Enemy, in order that they may be disciplined thereby. Cp. Chrys., Theoph.

CH. II. 1. Παρακαλῶ οὖν] I exhort therefore. 'Obsecro igitur,' Vulg. The οὖν, therefore, introduces an inference from the general exhortation in v. 18 of the foregoing chapter. A Lapide.

— πρῶτον πάντων] In this Apostolic charge to the Bishop and Church at Ephesus, and to all Bishops and Churches of all place and time, the Holy Spirit, speaking by St. Paul, declares that the first duty of the Public Assemblies of the Faithful is Prayer, as He had said by Isaiah (lvi. 7), "My House shall be called an House of Prayer for all people." Cp. Matt. xxi. 13. Mark xi. 17. Luke xix. 46.

— δεήσεις, προσευχὰς, ἐντεύξεις] δέησις expresses our needs (ἐνδείας); προσευχὴ shows that we look to God as our only helper; ἔντευξις is an urgent personal address (interpellatio) to Him as such.

As to δέησις, the etymology and true sense of the word is marked by Demosthenes and Æschines, δέομαι ὑμῶν δικαίαν δέησιν, μετρίαν δέησιν. See Wetstein. I your suppliant in need present to you a humble petition.

Προσευχὴ denotes a reverent turning to God, and a devout meditation on and adoration of His Divine Majesty. Origen, de Orat. 44. It can only be applied to God. We cannot address προσευχὴ to a creature. Προσευχὴ is therefore more significant of the power of Him Whom we invoke, than δέησις is; and δέομαι is used by St. Paul himself in addresses to men. (Acts xxvi. 3. Gal. iv. 12.)

Ἔντευξις is personal, earnest, solicitation, made with a view of moving the Person, who is the object of it, to some action, in defence of, or commiseration and pardon of, the person who makes it, or for whom it is made. See Acts xxv. 2. Rom. viii. 27. 34; xi. 2. Heb. vii. 25. 1 Macc. x. 61. 2 Macc. iv. 8. Ἐντυγχάνω is said of appeals to man, as well as to God.

— ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀνθρώπων] in behalf of all men. The Christian Priest, in the execution of his priestly office, ought to regard himself as the father of all, and to pray for all, because Christ came to save all, and not to limit his prayers, as the Jews do, to his own people. Chrys., Theodoret.

2. ὑπὲρ βασιλέων] for kings. This Apostolic direction is not only a charge to the Bishop and Church at Ephesus, but it is also designed as a reply to the allegations of the Jews, who charged the Apostle with disloyalty to the Roman Authority, and thus stirred up the Heathens against the Gospel. See Acts xvii. 5. 7.

This Epistle, being publicly circulated and read in primitive times, served this excellent purpose; as is evident from Tertullian's Apology, where he rebuts the charge of civil disaffection, with which the Christians were charged, by reference to this passage of St. Paul. See Apolog. 31, where, it is observable, he calls these words of this Epistle, 'Dei voces,' the 'words of God.'

This exhortation is also an evidence of the courage and divine commission of St. Paul. See on Titus iii. 1.

"Pray for kings," even for a Nero, even for a Decius, even for a Diocletian—persecutors of the Church: how much more for a Constantine! — σεμνότητι] gravity, seen in external deportment, so as to overcome the prejudices of others, and to conciliate and win the Heathen to the faith, by the quiet gravity of your deportment, even inspiring them with respect and reverence for you and for your religion. This Text has ever been rightly regarded as a divine statement of the end and purpose for which Civil government exists; and, consequently, of the duties of those who are invested with civil power by God.

As Bp. Bilson says, "On Christian Subjection," p. 339,—

Praiers must be made for kings, and all that are in authority (1 Tim. ii. 2), in order that they may discharge their duties according to God's ordinance, which is, that their subjects, by their help and means, may lead an honest, godly, and quiet life; godliness and honesty being the chiefest ends of our praiers, and effects of their powers. And (p. 343),—

If their dutie stretch so far, their authority must stretch as far. Their charge ceaseth where their power endeth. God never requireth princes to do what He permitteth them not to do. If, then, godliness and honestie be the chiefest part of their charge, therefore they are likewise the chiefest end of their power.

Ibid. (pp. 179. 183.) If you deny that this is the prince's charge, to see the law of God fully executed, His Son rightly served, His Spouse safely nursed, His House timely filled, you must countervail that which Moses prescribed, David required, Esay prophesied, Paul witnessed, and Christ commanded, with some better and sounder authority than theirs is.

A gross error it is, to think that regal power ought to serve for the good of the body and not of the soul, for men's temporal peace, and not for their eternal safety. Hooker, VIII. iii. 2. Cp. V. lxxvi. 4; VIII. vi. 11. See Bp. Andrewes, below, p. 325.

Utinam considerare principes vellent, aliud esse sacerdotem agere, ex umbone Scripturas interpretari, Sacramenta administrare, in nomine Christi ligare et solvere; aliud auctoritate suâ prospicere, ut quæ sunt sacerdotis agat sacerdos. Has partes in Ecclesiâ Dei pii principes sibi semper vindicarunt. Nova, infanda, execranda theologia est, quæ docet curam subditorum pertinere ad principem tantùm quatenus homines sunt, non quatenus Christiani. Casaubon (Dedicat. Exerc. Baron.).

We confess with S. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, v. 24), that the chiefest happiness for which we have some Kings in so great admiration above the rest, is not because of their long reign, but the reason wherefore we most extol their felicity is, if so be they have virtuously reigned; if the exercise of their power hath been service and attendance upon the Majesty of the Most High; if they have feared Him as their own subjects have feared them; and thus heavenly and earthly happiness are wreathed into one Crown, as to the worthiest of Christian Princes it hath by the Providence of Almighty God hitherto befallen. Hooker (V. lxxvi. 8).

It doth certainly belong unto Kings, yea, it doth specially belong unto them, to have care of religion, yea, to know it aright, yea, to profess it zealously, yea, to promote it to the uttermost of their power. This is their glory before all nations which mean well; and this will bring unto them a far more excellent weight of glory in the day of the Lord Jesus. The English Translators of the Holy Bible, in their Preface to the Authorized Version, A.D. 1611.

This being the duty and happiness of "Kings and all in authority," it is consequently the bounden duty, and ought to be a chief happiness of loyal subjects and good citizens to promote the exercise of that power by all good means.

3, 4. τοῦτο γὰρ καλὸν κ.τ.λ.] for this is good and acceptable in the eyes of God our Saviour, Whose will it is that all men should be saved. Imitated by S. Clement of Rom. c. 7: βλέπωμεν τί καλὸν καὶ τί τερπνὸν καὶ προσδεκτὸν ἐνώπιον τοῦ ποιήσαντος ἡμᾶς· ἀτενίσωμεν εἰς τὸ αἷμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὅτι διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν σωτηρίαν ἐκχυθὲν παντὶ τῷ κόσμῳ μετανοίας χάριν ὑπήνεγκεν—remarkable words, from a contemporary of the Holy Apostles, and clearly asserting, as the Apostle does here, the Universality of the Redemption effected by the Blood of Christ. Cp. Justin Martyr (De Resurrectione, p. 532, Otto), who quotes these words of St. Paul, "Do they represent God as envious?" But He is good; καὶ θέλει πάντας σώζεσθαι. Imitate God. It is His will that all men should be saved (σωθῆναι), therefore let it be thine also; therefore pray for all. Chrysostom. See the note above on Rom. viii. 30.

The words πάντας ἀνθρώπους, 'all men,' have special force and pertinency against the Judaizers, who would limit God's mercies to those who received the Levitical Law.

4. ἐπίγνωσιν ἀληθείας] a clear knowledge of the Truth—a knowledge much insisted on in these Pastoral Epistles, where this expression is repeated four times (see Titus i. 1. 2 Tim. ii. 25; iii. 7), and contrasted with the knowledge, γνῶσις, falsely so called, of the Antinomian Libertines, who professed godliness, but denied its power. (1 Tim. vi. 20. 2 Tim. iii. 5. Titus i. 16.)

5. εἷς καὶ μεσίτης] 'One Mediator;' a doctrine very necessary to be inculcated by Timothy in the Churches of Asia, where the false teachers disseminated many erroneous notions on this subject, particularly that

(1) God was to be approached by the Mediatorship of Angels; see on Col. ii. 18: and that

(2) Christ being man is inferior in dignity to Angels. Hence in his Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, St. Paul had been careful to dwell on the doctrines,—

(1) Of Christ's Divinity and superiority to the Angels.

(2) Of His Incarnation.

(3) Of His Proper and exclusive Mediatorship, consequent on the union of the two Natures of God and Man in His One Person, and on His Headship of the Universal Church.

(4) On the error and sin of raising up other Mediators, to the disparagement of His Divine Dignity, and proper Humanity, and Mediatorial Office. See on Eph. i. 10. Col. i. 15; ii. 18.

— ἄνθρωπος X. 'I.] a man, Christ Jesus. A man; not an Angel; Christ Jesus; Who became our Mediator, by becoming Man in time, being God from eternity. "In the beginning was the Word" (John i. 1). The World was not, when the Word was. The Word made the World. When He made us men, He was not as yet made Man. That was a great grace; the grace of our Creation, by the Word; but we have received a greater grace than this, that of our Second Creation by the Word made Flesh. This second and greater grace is extolled by the Apostle when he says, "There is One Mediator of God and men." He does not add simply, "Christ Jesus," lest you might imagine that he was speaking of 'the Word;' but he says, 'a Man.' For what is a Mediator? One by whom we are joined and reconciled to God. We were separated from Him by sin; and so were dead. Christ was not Man when man was made; but He became Man, that man might live. Augustine (Serm. 26). See also Augustine in Gal. iii. 15—18, and in Ps. ciii., where he says, "Inter duos Mediator; ergo Christus Mediator inter hominem et Deum; non quia Deus, sed quia homo; nam quia Deus, æqualis Patri, non autem Mediator; ut autem sit Mediator, descendat ab æqualitate Patris, faciat quod ait Apostolus, 'semetipsum exanivit, formam servi accipiens, in similitudine hominum factus, et habitu inventus est ut homo.'" (Phil. ii. 7.)

A Mediator is between two, and ought to have communion with both. Chrys., Theophyl.

Therefore He is united to the Father as God, and to us all as Man. Theodoret.

6. ὁ δοὺς ἑαυτὸν ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων] Who gave Himself a ransom for all. He declares that Christ suffered death for all. Theodoret.

What does he mean by ransom? Mankind was guilty, and liable to the punishment of death, and He gave Himself in their stead (ἀντί). Theoph.

The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many (Matt. xx. 28). A ransom is a price given to redeem such as are in any way in captivity. All sinners were obliged to undergo such punishments as are proportionate to their sins, and were by that obligation captivated and in bonds, and Christ did give his life a ransom for them, and that a proper ransom, if that his life were of any price, and given as such. For a ransom is properly nothing else but ἐτέθην ἐγὼ κήρυξ καὶ ἀπόστολος, ἀλήθειαν λέγω, οὐ ψεύδομαι, διδάσκαλος ἐθνῶν ἐν πίστει καὶ ἀληθείᾳ.

8 [g] Βούλομαι οὖν προσεύχεσθαι τοὺς ἄνδρας ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ, ἐπαίροντας ὁσίους χεῖρας χωρὶς ὀργῆς καὶ διαλογισμοῦ· 9 [h] ὡσαύτως καὶ γυναῖκας ἐν καταστολῇ some thing of price given by way of redemption, to buy or purchase that which is detained, or given for the releasing of that which is enthralled. But it is most evident, that the life of Christ was laid down as a price; neither is it more certain that He died, than that He bought us: Ye are bought with a price, saith the Apostle (1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23), and it is the Lord who bought us (2 Pet. ii. 1), and the price which He paid was His blood; for we are not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ (1 Pet. i. 18, 19). And as that blood was precious, so was it a full and perfect satisfaction. For as the gravity of the offence of the sin is augmented according to the dignity of the person offended and injured by it, so the value, price, and dignity of that which is given by way of compensation, is raised according to the dignity of the person making the satisfaction. God is of infinite Majesty, against whom we have sinned, and Christ is of the same Divinity, Who gave His life a ransom for sinners: for God hath purchased his Church with His own blood (Acts xx. 28). Although therefore God be said to remit our sins by which we were captivated, yet He is never said to remit the price, without which we had never been redeemed; neither can He be said to have remitted it, because He did require it and receive it.

But Christ taking upon Him the nature of Man, and offering Himself a sacrifice for sin, giveth that unto God for, and instead of, the eternal death of man, which is more valuable and acceptable unto God than that death could be, and so maketh a sufficient compensation and full satisfaction for the sins of man: which God accepting becometh reconciled unto us, and, for the punishment which Christ endured, taketh off our obligation to eternal punishment. Thus man who violated, by sinning, the law of God, and by that violation offended God, and was thereby obliged to undergo the punishment due unto the sin, and to be inflicted by the wrath of God, is, by the price of the most precious blood of Christ, given and accepted in full compensation and satisfaction for the punishment which was due, restored unto the favour of God, Who being thus satisfied, and upon such satisfaction reconciled, is faithful and just to take off all obligation unto punishment from the sinner; and in this act of God consisteth *the forgiveness of sins. — τὸ μαρτύριον καιροῖς ἰδίοις] the Testimony in His own season, that is, 'Christ gave Himself a ransom for all in the fulness of time'—when the long-expected season had arrived, and Christ came and fulfilled the Law, by offering Himself on the Cross for the sins of the world. (Eph. i. 10. Gal. iv. 4. Heb. ix. 10.)

This sentence does not seem to have been fully understood, in consequence of a non-apprehension of that to which the Apostle refers.

St. Paul is vindicating himself and his Ministry from the charges of the false teachers, especially the Judaizers (see i. 5—10), alleging that he disparaged the Levitical Law.

He shows, here and above, that the Gospel which he preaches is the fulfilling of the Law, and that they who did not receive it, and who opposed his preaching, did not understand the Law.

He now uses a word, Μαρτύριον, very familiar to Jewish ears, especially to the readers of the Pentateuch, in the LXX, where it is found about thirty times, and signifies the עדות (edhuth), "Testimony," i. e. of the Holy of Holies. See Exod. xvi. 34; xxv. 16. 21, 22; xxvi. 33, 34. Lev. xvi. 13. Num. vii. 89. The Tables of the Law were "The Testimony." The Tabernacle was called "the Tabernacle of the Testimony," the Ark was "the Ark of the Testimony." See Acts vii. 44. Rev. xv. 5.

This word, "the Testimony," added to these holy things, signified that they were Witnesses between God and the People, and bore Testimony to some future Blessing, of which they were shadows and types, and which testified of Christ, especially in His Mediatorial Office, fulfilling the Law, and reconciling God and Man, by a perfect Obedience, active, and passive, both in Life and Death. See 1 Cor. x. 1. Col. ii. 17; and cp. Mather on the Types, p. 406—412.

The word Μαρτύριον would suggest to Timothy, by birth a Hellenistic Jew, and to Asiatic Jews and Jewish Christians, a view of the solemn scenery of the Holy of Holies, its Ark, its Mercy-seat, its Tables of the Covenant, its Aaronic Rod, the badge of the Levitical Priesthood.

The Apostle, therefore, here intimates that the Redemption made by the Blood of Christ was the True Testimony, which was reserved for its full revelation in its own appointed season, καιροῖς ἰδίοις. Cp. Eph. i. 10, εἰς οἰκονομίαν τοῦ πληρώματος τῶν καιρῶν.

The Doctrine of the Atonement made by the blood of Christ, the only Mediator between God and Man, the true High Priest, Who is gone into the Holy of Holies with his Own Blood (see Heb. ix. 11. 23, 24), having perfectly fulfilled both the Tables of the Commandments, and who is the Faithful and True Μάρτυς, or Witness (Rev. i. 5; iii. 14); this doctrine is not (as the Judaizers allege) any new doctrine, preached by me in contravention of the Law, or in disparagement of it, but it is the very heart and kernel of the Law; it was enshrined within the Veil, in the inmost recesses of the Sacred Oracle, where God's Presence rested, the Holy of Holies; it was acted typically, year by year, by the High Priest, entering into that Oracle on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 2), and is now declared by us, the Apostles, in its own appointed season to the World.

This truth was signified by the rending of the Veil of the Temple at the Crucifixion, which showed that the office of the typical "Testimony" was then finished. (Matt. xxvii. 51.)

The above Interpretation of the present text is confirmed by other passages in St. Paul's Epistles, where he teaches that the ministrations of "the Tabernacle of the Testimony," especially of the Holy of Holies and of "the Ark of the Testimony," were figurative witnesses of Christ.

Thus he represents the Veil, through which the High Priest passed into the Holy of Holies, as a type of Christ's Flesh (Heb. x. 20); and in Rom. iii. 25 (a passage which illustrates the present text) he says, that we are justified freely through the ἀπολύτρωσις, or redemption, that is, by Christ Jesus, Whom God set forth as an ἱλαστήριον, or Propitiation, through faith in His Blood; and He says, that this plan of Justification was testified (μαρτυρουμένη) by the Law and the Prophets (iii. 21).

7. εἰς ὃ] to which Evangelical Testimony I was appointed a Preacher and an Apostle. The Jewish Priests were appointed by God as Ministers of the Levitical Testimony, which was figurative and typical, manuductory and preparatory, to Christ; but I am appointed a Minister of the True Testimony, Christ Himself, fulfilling the Law by His perfect Obedience, and by the sacrifice of Himself.

— λέγῳ] Elz. adds ἐν Χριστῷ, which is not supported by the best authorities.

8. ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ] in every place,—not only in the Temple at Jerusalem, but now, when the Veil has been taken away, and the "true Testimony" has been revealed, in His own due season, in the sacrifice of Christ,—in all places, according to His Own Prophecy. See John iv. 21—23; and as the Prophets themselves witnessed, Mal. i. 11. Cp. Chrys., Theodoret.

— ἐπαίροντας ὁσίους χεῖρας] lifting up holy hands. So St. Paul's contemporary, S. Clement, writes to the Corinthians (c. 29), προσέλθωμεν αὐτῷ ἐν ὁσιότητι ψυχῆς ἁγνὰς καὶ ἀμιάντους χεῖρας αἴροντες πρὸς αὐτόν.

Here is a holy work enjoined to all men,—the work of Prayer. This is a function of that Priesthood which appertains to all, and which all ought to discharge. Cp. 1 Pet. ii. 5, and above on Heb. xiii. 15.

— χωρὶς ὀργῆς] Matt. v. 23.

— διαλογισμοῦ] doubting. James i. 6.

9. ὡσαύτως καὶ γυναῖκας] in like manner women also. Elz. has τὰς before γυναῖκας, but the preponderance of authority is against it. The sense is, As I have directed men to lift up holy hands in prayer in every place, putting aside wrath and doubting (which are internal affections of the mind, and putting on the inward ornaments of faith and love), so, in like manner, I command women to attire themselves in decent apparel, with modesty and self-control.

These directions for Women have special reference to their deportment in the public assemblies of the Church, as appears from vv. 11, 12; and are to be compared with the similar precepts in the first Epistle to the Corinthians. (1 Cor. xi. 3—10; xiv. 34—36.) Doubtless, the women of Ephesus needed such precepts no less than those of Corinth.

In the words ὡσαύτως καὶ γυναῖκας, in like manner women also, there is, further, a declaration of the blessed truth, that, in Christ Jesus, Women as well as Men are admitted to be fellow-members, fellow-worshippers, fellow-heirs of salvation. There is no separate "Court of the Women" in the Christian Church, as there was in the Jewish Temple. In Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female, but ye are all one in Him. (Gal. iii. 28.)

But let not woman presume on her newly-acquired privileges in the Gospel. Rather let her show her thankfulness for them by reverence and modesty, especially in the public assemblies of the Church of Christ.

It is not easy to represent the several words here used by equivalent ones in English. Καταστολὴ is 'vestitus compositus et demissus,' the staid and sober attire of modesty, as distinguished from the loose and flowing robes, the flimsy, fluttering costume which betrays the opposite character.

This word καταστολὴ is found only once in the New Testament, and once only in LXX, Isa. lxi. 3, where it describes the robe of the redeemed. The uncompounded form στολὴ, long robe, is found in Mark xii. 38, and is applied to the dress of Angels (Mark xvi. 5), and to the long white robe of Christ's Righteousness in which the Saints are invested. (Rev. vi. 11; vii. 9. 13.) The preposition κατὰ (in κατα-στολὴ) gives the sense of settled adjustment (compositio) of dress, and also of matronly demission of a long robe reaching down to the feet. See Horat. Sat. i. 1. 71 and 99, "Ad talos stola demissa." Cp. 1 Cor. xi. 4, κατὰ κεφαλῆς ἔχων, and Theophyl. here, who says that the Apostle uses the word καταστολὴ to show that women should be covered by their attire, and not immodestly exposed.

Αἰδὼς, never used by LXX, and only twice in N. T.—here and Heb. xii. 28, signifies that inner grace of reverence (ἐντροπὴ) 'verecundia,' especially self-reverence, which shrinks and recoils from any thing unseemly and impure.

Σωφροσύνη is that soundness of mind which regulates and controls all inordinate desires, and exercises a dignified restraint on the actions and deportment, and is defined in 1 Macc. iv. 31 as ἐπικράτεια τῶν ἐπιθυμιῶν. Αἰδὼς is to the heart and spirit what σωφροσύνη is to the mind, or intellectual faculty; hence Thucyd. (i. 84), αἰδὼς σωφροσύνης πλεῖστον μετέχει: and the Author of 1 Macc. iv. 31 says that the reasoning faculty (λογισμὸς) restrains all appetites which interfere with σωφροσύνη: and Xenophon (Mem. ii.) speaks of the eyes being κεκοσμημένα αἰδοῖ, τὸ δὲ σχῆμα σωφροσύνῃ. Cp. Dean Trench, Synonyms N. T. § xx. p. 81, and Wetstein here.

— ἐν πλέγμασιν, ἢ χρυσῷ, ἢ μαργαρίταις] Cp. 1 Pet. iii. 3; and Augustine, Serm. 161; and S. Jerome (Epit. Marcellæ): "Solent splendere gemmis, aurum portare cervicibus et auribus perforatis rubri maris pretiosissima grana suspendere." See Wetstein.

12. διδάσκειν οὐκ ἐπιτρέπω] See 1 Cor. xiv. 34.

13. Ἀδὰμ γὰρ πρῶτος] For Adam was first formed, and then Eve. St. Paul, as usual, goes back to first principles. As in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, in his discourse on female attire in Church Assemblies, and in his correction of the abuses which prevailed at Corinth in this respect, he had reverted to the history of the Creation itself, and to the consequent relation of Man to Woman; and in that Discourse had proceeded to argue the question on the ground of the Second Creation in the Birth of the Second Adam; so he pursues the same method here. Cp. note on 1 Cor. xi. 4—12.

14. Ἀδὰμ οὐκ ἠπατήθη] Adam was not deceived by the Serpent, as Eve was (2 Cor. xi. 3), nor did he pluck the fruit from the tree, as she did; but she first ate it, and gave it to him, and he received it from her hand. (Gen. iii. 6.) Theodoret.

St. Paul, however, says, that "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all, even over them who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression" (Rom. v. 12—14); but it is not without reason that the Apostle says that Adam was not deceived; for Eve received as true that which the Serpent said; but Adam would not be separated from partnership with his wife, even in sin, therefore he was not less guilty than she was; indeed, he sinned knowingly and willingly. Therefore St. Paul does not say that Adam did not sin,—but he says that Adam was not deceived, and so both were not "credendo decepti, sed ambo peccando sunt capti, et diaboli laqueis implicati." Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xiv. 11). See also Aug. in Ps. lxxxiii.

— ἐξαπατηθεῖσα] So A, D*, F, G, Lach., Tisch., Alf., Ellicott. Elz. has ἀπατηθεῖσα.

— ἐν παραβάσει γέγονε] became, and still is, in the transgression; facta est, et nunc manet, in prævaricatione.

15. Σωθήσεται δὲ διὰ τῆς τεκνογονίας] Though woman was deceived by the Serpent, and plucked the fruit of the forbidden tree, and gave it to her husband, and so became involved, and is still involved, in transgression, yet she shall be saved by means of the child-bearing, if they (i. e. women generally) abide in faith and love.

By the words 'the child-bearing' (observe the definite article "the"), we are to understand the child-bearing of Christ by the Blessed Virgin; for she, by giving birth to the Saviour, was the means of salvation to women.

It was objected by some, indeed by Theophylact himself, to this interpretation, that it was inconsistent with what follows,—where the Apostle says, if they remain in faith; words which the objectors to the interpretation supposed, erroneously, to mean, if the children remain in faith.

But it is now generally allowed by the best Expositors, that the word they refers to women. From the generic singular γυνὴ (woman), the plural γυναῖκες (women) is to be supplied, as a nominative, before μείνωσιν. See Winer, § 58, p. 458, who says that the whole sex, womankind, is contained in γυνή. Cp. p. 555; cp. Vorst. (de Hebrais. N. T. p. 367); and see a similar usage in this Epistle, v. 3, μανθανέτωσαν, which confirms this interpretation.

The ancient interpretation, therefore, mentioned by Theophylact, which seems to have suffered unjustly from the above objection, deserves to be reconsidered;

In the Ancient Catena (recently published by Dr. Cramer, p. 22) we find this early interpretation thus clearly stated: "The whole female sex, and even the whole race of mankind, is saved through Christ, born of a Woman, according to the flesh, if they (i. e. women) abide in faith and love, and in sanctification with modesty; πιστεύσασαι γὰρ εἰς τὸν Χριστὸν, καὶ ἔργων προνοησάμεναι ἀγαθῶν σωθήσονται."

This newly-recovered testimony is confirmatory of that interpretation which appears to rest on strong and satisfactory grounds. For it is to be observed,

That St. Paul in this passage is speaking of the duties of Women, especially with regard to apparel and deportment in religious assemblies. He had already treated that subject in his First Epistle to the Corinthians (1 Cor. xi. 8—12), and there, as we have seen, he argues the matter, with a reference

(1) To the Creation, and

(2) To the Incarnation.

Here, in this passage, he has referred, in v. 13, to the First Creation of Man in the First Adam. What would be more likely, than that he therefore should now proceed here also to speak of the Second Creation of Man in the Second Adam,—namely, the Incarnation of Christ?

He had spoken of the Fall of Man, and had stated that this was due to the subtlety of the Serpent, deceiving the Woman, and working the woe of all mankind by the instrumentality of the Woman. Therefore, it was very natural, that the blessed Apostle should next proceed to vindicate and assert God's power and love, and to show that God triumphs over Satan even by those means which Satan himself uses against God and man; and to minister some comfort to Woman in her sorrow and her shame, by referring to the primeval prophecy delivered at the Fall (to which he has just been referring), and preannouncing that the seed of the Woman would bruise the Serpent's head (Gen. iii. 15); and by suggesting the consideration that Almighty God had used the same instrumentality, that of Woman, for overcoming Satan, which Satan had used for overcoming Man; and that in His infinite love, God had saved mankind, and would save even Woman herself, by the same agency as that by which the Tempter had worked her woe.

Thus (as the Apostle has just said), though Woman had been deceived by Satan, and had plucked the fruit of the forbidden tree, and had eaten it herself, and had also given it to her husband, and he ate it; and so Woman had brought sin and woe on her husband, herself, and her children; and though she had received as her punishment and curse for her sin, the sentence from God that she should bring forth children in pain and sorrow (Gen. iii. 16), yet by God's mercy, Woman, who had been chosen by Satan as his instrument for bringing ruin on man, had been chosen also by God as His instrument for vanquishing Satan and restoring Man. "Behold, a Virgin shall conceive and bear a Son, and call His name Emmanuel. To us a child is born, to us a Son is given, and His name shall be called the Mighty God, the Prince of Peace." (Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6.)

Here was comfort indeed; that Womankind should be saved even by that very thing which had been pronounced to be the means of her chastisement,—namely, by child-bearing,—that she should be saved through 'the child-bearing;' that is, through the blessed child-bearing of the promised Seed of the Woman, the Second Adam, Christ Jesus, conceived by the Holy Ghost, and the Saviour of Mankind,—the Child of the Virgin-Mother, and the Father of the New Race; if they do not yield to the allurements of the Serpent, their Ghostly Enemy, but abide stedfast in faith and love, with sanctification and modesty.

In support also of the above interpretation, we may cite the words of Irenæus (iv. 40): "Almighty God had compassion on mankind, and threw back the enmity on the Enemy, and abolished the enmity which existed between Man and Himself. As Scripture says, 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman,' &c. (Gen. iii. 15.) Our Lord absorbed this enmity into Himself by being made Man of the Seed of the Woman, and so bruised the Serpent's head." And Irenæus adds (v. 21): "The Enemy would not have been completely routed, unless He Who routed him had been born of a Woman. For the Serpent overcame Man at the beginning by means of Woman."

To which may be added the following, from a more recent Expositor:

"The Woman, that is, Eve (v. 14), being deceived, was in the transgression: that is, was first guilty of eating the forbidden fruit, but rescued from the punishment by the promised Seed,—that is, by her child-bearing,—by the Messias, which was to be born of a woman, and so to redeem that nature which He assumed; but this not absolutely, but on condition of faith, and charity, and holiness, and sobriety, and continuing in all these; and this advantage belonging not only to the first Woman, Eve, but to all her posterity, in respect of whom it is that the number is changed from the Singular to the Plural, she, as the representative of all women, had the promise made to her (Gen. iii. 15); but the condition must be performed by all others as well as her, or else the benefit will not redound to them. And this is the most literal importance of the διὰ also, being saved by this, as by a means of all women's and men's redemption and salvation." Dr. Hammond. See also Mr. Ellicott's note here.

Thus, in fine, where sin and sorrow abounded, grace and joy much more abound; thus Woman is restored in Christ to her blessed position as the helpmate of man, and she who in the hands of Satan had been made the means of Death to all, is made, by God's overruling Love, to be the means of endless Life to all in Christ.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE to the THIRD and following Chapters of this Epistle.

I. THE Apostle now proceeds to give direction to Timothy concerning the Government of the Church at Ephesus; a Church planted by St. Paul himself in the capital of Asia, where he had preached for three years,—and where, according to the usage which St. Paul had followed from the beginning, ordaining Presbyters in every Church (Acts xiv. 23), many πρεσβύτεροι had already been ordained to be ἐπίσκοποι or overseers of the flock of Christ, which He purchased with His own blood. (Acts xx. 17. 28.)

He first states to Timothy the qualifications requisite for those who are to be appointed by him to the office of ἐπίσκοποι (vv. 2—7).

Secondly, he specifies the criteria which are to guide him in the choice and ordination of Διάκονοι (vv. 8—13).

St. Paul tells him, that he sends him these directions in writing, in order that he may know how to demean himself in "the House of God, which is the Church of the Living God."

He next proceeds to deliver some instructions as to his own teaching and superintendence of the teaching of others (iv. 6. 11); and assures him that, notwithstanding his youth (v. 12; cp. 2 Tim. ii. 22), if he follows these directions, and stirs up the spiritual grace which was conveyed to him by the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery, and of those of the Apostle himself (v. 14; cp. 2 Tim. i. 6), and gives attendance to reading, to exhortation, and to doctrine, he will be a pattern to others, and will save himself and those who hear him (iv. 12—16).

He then offers some counsels as to the order which he is to pursue with regard to the Widows of the Church. He describes the qualifications of those who are to be admitted into the class of Widows maintained by the alms of the faithful; and specifies those who are to be rejected (v. 9—16). He instructs him in the measures he is to adopt in assigning stipends to Πρεσβύτεροι (v. 17), and in hearing accusations against them (v. 19), and commands him to pronounce public censures, in the presence of all, on those who are guilty of sin (v. 20); and sums up all with a solemn charge to Timothy to execute his office without partiality (v. 21, and see vi. 14. 20).

Here, then, we see Timothy invested with solemn spiritual functions in the Church of God in the city of Ephesus, the capital of Asia. We behold him entrusted with authority to govern the Church, to regulate her affairs; to exhort and rebuke others, Laity and Clergy, and particularly to exercise a discretionary authority in the appointment of two distinct orders of Clergy, called respectively Ἐπίσκοποι and Διάκονοι (iii. 2—13).

Here, therefore, we have the following system of Church Regimen and Polity presented to us by the Holy Spirit, speaking by the Apostle St. Paul, for the government of the Church at Ephesus, in three grades and orders, as follows:

1st. Timothy, exercising authority over all;
2ndly. Ἐπίσκοποι, and 3rdly. Διάκονοι.

II. If we now proceed to St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy, we hear the Apostle exhorting him to stir up the spiritual gift which was in him by the laying on of the Apostle's hands (2 Tim. i. 6); and to confide to faithful men, who should be able to teach others, those things which he had received from the Apostle (2 Tim. ii. 2); and to preach the Word, and to reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine, and to do the work of an Evangelist, and to fulfil his ministry. (2 Tim. iv. 5.)

III. If, also, we examine the Epistle to Titus, whom St. Paul placed at Crete as he had placed Timothy at Ephesus, we find the same system of Church Regimen and Polity established there.

He reminds Titus that he had left him in Crete, that he might set in order the things which the Apostle himself had not been able to arrange; and that he should ordain Presbyters in every city, as the Apostle had directed him (Tit. i. 5); and then he gives him instructions as to the qualifications of these persons who were to be appointed as Ἐπίσκοποι, or overseers, of others. (Tit. i. 7.)

He tells him, that the mouths of false teachers, whom he describes, must be stopped (v. 11), and that it is his duty to rebuke them sharply (v. 13).

He gives him directions for the regulation of the conduct of old and young; and charges him to rebuke with all authority (ii. 15), and teaches how to deal with heretics (iii. 10).

IV. If we now take another step in advance, and proceed to the Book of Revelation, written by the last surviving Apostle, the beloved Disciple, St. John, we see there a view of the spiritual regimen of that Church over which Timothy was set by St. Paul, that of Ephesus.

In the Book of Revelation, Christ Himself appears, and speaks to a Person who is called the Angel of the Church of Ephesus. (Rev. ii. 1—6.)

Christ, the Divine Head of the Church, recognizes that Person as the Representative of that Church, and addresses him as such. He regards him as responsible for it, and remonstrates with him, as having authority to try those who call themselves Apostles and are not: and he calls on him to repent, and to do his first works; and if he fails to do so, He threatens him with a removal of his candlestick. (Rev. ii. 1—5.)

V. If we extend our view to the other six Churches of Asia, as displayed in the Book of Revelation, we see each of them severally, like Ephesus, having a Person set over them called an Angel (i. 20); and we find that in each case Christ addresses that Person as the Representative of each Church respectively, and as accountable for its spiritual state. And it may be observed, as a striking proof of this personal responsibility of the Angel for the spiritual condition of his own Church, that in no instance does the epithet, good or bad, assigned to the Church by Christ in the Apocalypse, agree in gender with Church, but it is made to agree in all cases with Angel. (See iv. 15. 17.)

VI. On the whole then, we see the following characteristics of the Regimen of the Apostolic Churches exhibited in Holy Scripture.

1st. A single person, such as Timothy at Ephesus, and Titus a Acts 20. 28. Phil. 1. 1. b Tit. 1. 6. ch. 5. 9.

III. [1] [a] Πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, εἴ τις ἐπισκοπῆς ὀρέγεται, καλοῦ ἔργου ἐπιθυμεῖ. [2] [b] Δεῖ οὖν τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεπίληπτον εἶναι, μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρα, νηφάλιον, in Crete, in St. Paul's age, appointed by the Apostle himself to govern the Churches founded at those places.

---

The concurrent testimony of all Christian Antiquity is expressed by Eusebius (iii. 4), when he says, "Timothy was the first who received the Bishopric of Ephesus, and Titus was the first who was appointed Bishop of Crete."

In like manner we see the Angel of Ephesus, and the Angels severally of each of the other six Asiatic Churches in St. John's age, holding the first place in the Church, with principal authority over all its members.

We see, 2ndly, Πρεσβύτεροι called also Ἐπίσκοποι, as being Overseers of their respective flocks.

3rdly, Διάκονοι, Deacons.

VII. It would be profitless to engage in verbal discussion concerning the name given to the office of the Person, who, as Timothy or Titus did, occupied the highest place in each of these Churches, having been put there by Apostolic Authority, and who is addressed as the Representative of that Church by Christ Himself in the Apocalypse. The thing itself is plainly apparent in Holy Scripture, and as such is to be revered as the Ordinance of God.

VIII. The consentient voice and concurrent practice of the Church of Christ, from the times of the Apostles for many centuries in succession, illustrates and confirms this result; and shows that Church Government by single Persons, each holding chief authority in his own particular Church, and having two distinct orders of Ministers under him, called Presbyters and Deacons, is that form of Ecclesiastical Regimen which is most agreeable to the Word of God.

On this subject the reader may consult the Preface to the Ordinal of the Church of England, in which it is said, that "it is evident unto all men diligently reading the Holy Scriptures and ancient Authors, that from the Apostle's time there ever have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons;" and Hooker, V. lxxvii. 9; VII. v. 2—8, and VII. vi. Saravia, de Minist. Ign., Part i. cap. xi., and Part ii. cap. xiii.; and Minor Works, ed. Churton, Vol. i. p. 271–286, and Vol. ii. p. 369—385; where he says that "St. Paul, in his last Apostolic journey, after his first imprisonment at Rome, and shortly before his second imprisonment and martyrdom, set certain persons, severally, over the Presbyteries which he had established; and that he invested those persons with that authority and power which was afterwards claimed and exercised by the several Bishops who succeeded in the room of these several persons. Thus Timothy was set over the Presbyters of Ephesus, with authority to govern that Church and rule the Presbyters, and rebuke them, if need were, and ordain whom he might find needful and worthy to be ordained. Timothy had received spiritual grace by the laying on of St. Paul's hands, and was qualified thereby to perform this office of Ordination. The same remarks apply to Titus in Crete. Similarly, St. John, in the Apocalypse, writes to the seven Angels of the seven Churches in Asia. He addresses each Angel separately, and considers him accountable for all, whether good or bad, that exists in his own Church respectively. We assert, that these Angels of the Churches were individual persons, and special Rulers of their own several Churches. Each of these had been ruling his Church for some years before the date of the Apocalypse. And each of these is called a Star—the Star of his own Church. (Rev. i. 16—20.) The Angels, or Rulers of the Churches of Asia, were single Persons, and were not bodies of men; they were asteres, not asterismi" (Bp. Pearson). They were Apostolic Stars, and not Presbyteral Constellations.

CH. III. 1. ἐπισκοπῆς] oversight. The word is chosen on account of its generality. St. Paul does not say τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, and he uses the word ἐπισκοπή,—a general term, in a spiritual sense, to describe,

(1) The office of superintending a flock; and so applied, as here, to a Presbyter, or Pastor of a Church. Cp. Acts xx. 28. Phil. i. 1. Tit. i. 7. 1 Pet. v. 2.

(2) The office of superintending Pastors themselves, and characterizes the work of an Apostle. Acts i. 20, where see note.

Hence (3) though doubtless in the present passage St. Paul in writing to Timothy, the Chief Pastor of the Church of Ephesus, and in pointing out to him the qualifications which he himself is to require in those persons who are to be ordained by him to the ἐπισκοπή, or oversight of a flock,—and of whom, when ordained, he, Timothy, is himself to have the ἐπισκοπή, or oversight,—is speaking of Overseers of a flock, yet St. Paul's language applies with no less force, but rather with greater cogency, to those who are raised from the ἐπισκοπή of a flock to the Apostolic Office (ἐπισκοπή, Acts i. 20) which Timothy himself held, viz. the ἐπισκοπή of Pastors as well as of their Flocks.

(4) It is, therefore, with no impropriety (as has been sometimes alleged) that the Church of England, in her Office for the Consecration of Bishops, adopts these words as containing suitable admonitions to those who are to be promoted from the ἐπισκοπή of a flock to the chief ἐπισκοπή in the Church.

Theodoret well says,—Although the Apostle applies these directions particularly here to the case of Presbyters, yet they who are Bishops should be the first to observe them, inasmuch as they have a higher place, and therefore greater responsibilities.

Hence we see, that as early as in the third century these words were applied to describe the duties of Bishops; as in the following language of Archelaus (Bishop of Mesopotamia, A.D. 278, in Routh, R. S. iv. p. 185): "Appellati sumus ex Salvatoris desiderio Christiani, sicut universus orbis terrarum testimonium perhibet, atque Apostoli edocent; sed et optimus Architectus ejus, fundamentum nostrum, id est Ecclesiæ, Paulus, posuit, et legem tradidit, ordinatis Ministris, Presbyteris et Episcopis in eâ; describens per loca singula, quomodo et qualiter oporteat Ministros Dei, quales et qualiter fieri Presbyteros, qualesque esse debeant qui Episcopatum desiderant; quæ omnia benè nobis et rectè disposita usque in hodiernum statum suum custodiunt, et permanet apud nos hujus regulæ disciplina." Where Dr. Routh says,—

"Locus notandus de Hierarchiæ Ecclesiasticæ ordine ab Apostolis instituto. Episcopatum, Presbyteros et Ministros tantùm nominat Archelaus, quod Ministrorum, hoc est Diaconorum, nomine omnes infra Presbyteratum ordines antiquissimi Patres comprehendere consueverint, ita Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 6. Stromatum, p. 667. Tertullianus, de Baptismo, cap. 17. Origenes, Homil. 2, in Hierem. et in Matthæi cap. 19, p. 363."

See also next note, and on v. 2.

— καλοῦ ἔργου ἐπιθυμεῖ] he desires a good work. The Apostle here explains what ἐπισκοπή is, viz. that it is a "nomen operis non honoris; ut intelligat non se esse Episcopum, qui præesse dilexerit, non prodesse." And the word itself denotes that "he who is set over others, diligently watches over those over whom he is set." Augustine (de Civ. Dei, vii. 19).

2. τὸν ἐπίσκοπον] the overseer. This word (ἐπίσκοπος) is here applied to those who were to be ordained to watch over a flock. And in this sense it is used Acts xx. 28. Phil. i. 1. Tit. i. 7.

These persons were also called Presbyteri by reason of their age and dignity, and Episcopi on account of this office and work of oversight. Therefore St. Peter says, Πρεσβυτέρους παρακαλῶ ὁ συμπρεσβύτερος, ποιμάνατε τὸ ποιμνίον, ἐπισκοποῦντες μὴ ἀναγκάστως. 1 Pet. v. 2.

See also Theodoret here, who says, that they who, after the death of the Apostles, succeeded the Apostles, and had the chief oversight of Pastors and Churches, did not arrogate to themselves the name of Apostles, although they succeeded to their place, but reverently reserved the name of Apostles for those who had been really Apostles of Christ; and they adopted for themselves the name of Ἐπίσκοποι, and that name was generally assigned to them as their distinctive title in the next age to that of the Apostles.

The sum of the whole matter (says Dr. Bentley) is as follows:—

The word Ἐπίσκοπος, whose general idea is overseer, was a word in use long before Christianity; a word of universal relation to œconomical, civil, military, naval, judicial, and religious matters. This word was assumed to denote the governing and presiding persons of the Church. The Presbyters, therefore, while the Apostles lived, were Ἐπίσκοποι, overseers. But the Apostles, in foresight of their approaching martyrdom, selected and appointed their successors in the several cities and communities, as St. Paul did Timothy at Ephesus, and Titus at Crete.

What name were these successors (of the Apostles) to be called by? Not Ἀπόστολοι, Apostles; their modesty, as it seems, made them refuse it: they would keep that name proper and sacred to the first extraordinary messengers of Christ, though they really succeeded them in their office, in due part and measure, as the ordinary governors of the Churches. It was agreed, therefore, over all Christendom at once, in the very next generation after the Apostles, to assign and appropriate to them the word Ἐπίσκοποι, or Bishop. From that time to this, that appellation, which before included a Presbyter, has been restrained to a superior order. Dr. Bentley on Freethinking, p. 136.

Compare the note above on Phil. i. 1.

It clearly appeareth by Holy Scripture that Churches Apostolic did know but three degrees in the power of Ecclesiastical Order; at the first, Apostles, Presbyters, and Deacons; afterwards, instead of Apostles, Bishops. Hooker, V. lxxvii.

— μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρα] the husband of one wife. (Cp. Tit. i. 6.) These words are best explained by those below in v. 9, ἑνὸς ἀνδρὸς γυνὴ, the wife of one husband.

(1) It is clear that those words (ἑνὸς ἀνδρὸς γυνὴ) do not signify the wife of not more than one husband at a time, for they are spoken of a χήρα, or widow, who has no husband at all; but they mean a woman who has not been married more than once.

(2) Since, as we there see, it was required by St. Paul, in the case of women who were candidates for inscription as Widows in the roll of the Church, that they should not have been married more than once, it need not be matter for surprise, that, in the case of men who were to be promoted to an Ἐπισκοπὴ in the Church, they who had not contracted two marriages in succession were to be preferred.

(3) This passage was understood in this sense by Origen (Hom. 17 in Luc.), who says, "Neque Episcopus, nec Presbyter, nec Diaconus, nec vidua possunt esse digami." And in his book, c. Celsum (iii. p. 141), Origen says, that St. Paul μονόγαμον μᾶλλον διγάμου αἱρεῖται. And Tertullian (ad Uxorem, c. 7), "Præscriptio Apostoli digamos non sinit præsidere." And so the Fourth Council of Carthage, c. 69, and Epiphan. Hær. 48, and de Fide, p. 465, and Canon. Apostol. xvi., and S. Jerome in Jovinian 1, "Digamus in clerum eligi non potest," and Ambrose, de Offic. i. 50. Cp. Suicer, v. δίγαμος. Bingham, iv. 5, and Wetstein here.

But (4) the Church did not consider the words of the Apostle to contain a precept of perpetual and universal obligation. Indeed, in disciplinarian matters of this kind, the Church possesses a discretionary power, which she exercises with careful regard to time and place.

See the remarks of Hooker and Bp. Sanderson quoted above in the note on Acts xv. 20, concerning the Apostolic Decree prescribing abstinence from Blood.

Hence (5) we find it asserted in the recently discovered Treatise of S. Hippolytus, Bishop of Portus, near Rome (Philosophumena, p. 290), that in the time of Callistus, Bishop of Rome, at the beginning of the third century, persons who had married twice, and even three times, began to be admitted to the Diaconate, Priesthood, and Episcopate: Ἐπὶ τούτου ἤρξαντο ἐπίσκοποι, καὶ πρεσβύτεροι, καὶ διάκονοι δίγαμοι καὶ τρίγαμοι καθίστασθαι εἰς κλήρους. And similar passages may be seen, quoted from Tertullian, in the Editor's volume, "Hippolytus and the Church of Rome," p. 265.

(6) It must also be borne in mind, that there is a great difference between the rules to be observed with regard to the ordination of persons to the priestly office, and the rules to be observed with regard to the same persons when they have been ordained. No one is obliged to enter the priestly office; but no one is able to divest himself of it when he has entered it. Ordination imprints a seal that is indelible.

Besides, one of the purposes for which Holy Matrimony was ordained by God is, that it should be "a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication" (1 Cor. vii. 2. 9). It was instituted to be a cure for the passions of that fallen nature with which men are born into the world. And they who forbid Marriage, take away that remedy which is provided by God.

While, therefore, it was deemed requisite to prescribe, that no one who had been twice married should be admitted into the Holy Order of Priesthood, it would by no means follow, that any one who had been admitted to the Priesthood should be debarred from contracting a second Marriage.

St. Paul has not dealt with the case of those Ἐπίσκοποι who lose their wives by death after their ordination to the office of Ἐπισκοπή. But it may be inferred from his words in iv. 3 what his judgment would have been concerning those who prohibit another marriage in such a case, and who even prohibit Marriage altogether to Christian Priests.

(7) There were doubtless special reasons for the restriction here imposed on Timothy's choice of persons to be admitted by him to the Priesthood.

The cares of a double family might disqualify a person for learning the duties of the sacred profession; and under the urgent necessities of those days (1 Cor. vii. 26), it was very desirable that the spiritual soldier should be as free as possible from earthly ties.

Besides, the Gentile Christians would be predisposed to expect such immunities in Christian Priests;

The Priests of the Heathen were married but once. "Inter Gentiles, etiam Flamen unius uxoris vir ad sacerdotium admittitur, Flaminissa quoque unius viri uxor eligitur; ad tauri Ægyptii sacra semel maritus assumitur." Jerome (ad Ageruchiam). Should Christians be less strict in their rules on this point than the Heathen?

(8) On the whole, St. Paul's words may be regarded as an Apostolic precept to Timothy, necessary for those times (cp. Tit. i. 6), and as a prudential counsel for all times; but not as having the force of a command of universal obligation. And, accordingly, as the testimony of many of the Fathers show (see particularly Theodoret here, and others cited by Bingham and Suicer), though they have been made the groundwork of disciplinarian canons of particular Churches, they have never been enforced by any Decree of a General Council of the Universal Church of Christ.

3. πάροινον] Cp. Titus i. 7. 'Vinolentum, et violentum.' Παροινία, ἡ ἐκ τοῦ οἴνου ὕβρις (Hesych.).

— μὴ πλήκτην] no striker. Cp. Tit. i. 7. 'Non percussorem' (Vulg.). Τύπτης=πλήκτης (Hesych.). "Non manu promptus ad cædendum, et pugnax." Tertullian (de Monogam. c. 12).

Hence the Emperor Justinian (Novell. 123) says, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ οἰκείαις χερσὶν ἔξεστιν ἐπισκόπῳ τινὰ πλήττειν. Cp. Coray (on Titus), Atakta ii. p. 300.

This word gives an instructive view of the impulsive vehemence of the Oriental character, by which St. Paul himself was a sufferer at the hands of the Asiatic Jews (Acts xxi. 27. 32), and of the difficulties with which Christianity had to contend in curbing its impetuosity. Elz. adds μὴ αἰσχροκερδῆ.

— ἐπιεικῆ] equitable. Tempering the rigour of strict Justice, correcting its inaccuracies, and supplying its defects, with the gentleness and fairness of Equity. Ἐπιείκειά ἐστιν ἡ δικαίων ἐλάττωσις (Phavorin.). Cp. Aristot. (Ethic. v. 10).

It is not from εἴκω, cedo, but from εἰκὸς (ἔοικα), "quod decet," ἐπιεικὲς = πρέπον. (Suid.)

4. τέκνα ἔχοντα] On the married state of Presbyters, see Polycarp (ad Phil. 12), and Dr. Jacobson's note, p. 526.

6. τυφωθεὶς] puffed up like smoke, not burning with the bright pure flame of truth, love, and zeal; but elated, and swollen like a dark cloud of smoke, with vain glory and empty pride. See on vi. 4, and note on 2 Tim. iii. 4.

— κρῖμα—τοῦ Διαβόλου] The condemnation incurred by the devil for pride. (Maldonat.) Cp. Isa. xiv. 12, and Hooker, I. iv. 3, on the sin and punishment of the fallen Angels, as distinguished from the "elect Angels," v. 21.

k 2 Tim. 2. 20. Eph. 2. 21.

This reference to the case of the fallen Angels, and in v. 21 to the "elect Angels," has a peculiar propriety in an Epistle to one who, like Timothy himself, filled an office which is called by Christ that of an "Angel of the Church" (Rev. ii. 1).

7. ὀνειδισμὸν—καὶ παγίδα τοῦ Διαβόλου] In the former clause St. Paul had directed Timothy not to ordain a novice, lest he should be lifted up by arrogance, and fall into the punishment incurred by the Devil for pride.

He now instructs him that the person chosen ought to have a good report even from the heathen, lest he should sink into contempt, and, in a spirit of recklessness, as one who has no character to lose, should outrage men's opinions, and corrupt their manners, and fall into the snare laid for him by the Devil, namely, that of shameless infamy, by which the Devil entraps men (cp. 2 Tim. ii. 26), and makes them desperate.

8. σεμνούς] worshipful.

— μὴ αἰσχροκερδεῖς] not covetous of filthy lucre. An appropriate charge with regard to the office of the Deacons as almoners of the Church. See Acts vi. 1, 2.

11. Γυναῖκας] women appointed to be Deaconesses, whether they be wives of Deacons or not. So Chrys., Theodoret, Theophyl., Œcum.

The insertion of this sentence, in the middle of his discourse concerning Deacons, shows (as Theoph. observes) that the Apostle is not speaking of Women generally: and the absence of the Article from γυναῖκας indicates that he is not referring only to the wives of Deacons, but is speaking of Deaconesses generally, whether married (see on v. 12) or unmarried.

Such an office, as is here described, was held by Phœbe, a διάκονος of the Church of Cenchreæ; and therefore probably mentioned first in the list of names in Rom. xvi. 1, where see note. Perhaps Priscilla, the wife of Aquila, was also one of this class. See note on Acts xviii. 18.

On account of the official character of these Women, holding, in some respects, a place in the Church co-ordinate to that of Deacons, St. Paul prescribes that their qualifications should correspond with those which he has already laid down for Deacons. Hence the word ὡσαύτως, in like manner, i. e. as I have directed in the case of the Deacons, so I now direct for the Deaconesses. He applies to these Deaconesses the epithets σεμνὰς—πιστὰς ἐν πᾶσι, with which we may compare those applied to the Deacons in v. 8.

He had not made any such official addition of Women in connexion with the ἐπίσκοποι mentioned above (vv. 1—7), because the functions of the Episcopi were of a purely spiritual and sacred kind. But the Deacons have a lay element blended with the ecclesiastical in their office (see note on Acts vi. 2);—an important principle, which needs to be observed in the present times.

12. μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρες] See v. 2.

There was also special need for such a charge in the case of Deacons, having the charge and distribution of the alms of the faithful, and who might be liable to suspicion, and to temptation, if they had large families dependent upon them.

13. οἱ γάρ] The γὰρ introduces the reason why he lays so much stress on the duties of Deacons.

— βαθμὸν—καλόν] a good degree.

He had said before (v. 10), let them first be proved, and then let them be advanced to the Diaconate.

He now tells Timothy that they who have served in the office of Deacon well, purchase to themselves a good degree; they have a claim for promotion at thy hand. So. Chrys., Theophyl. The word βαθμὸς hence became the vox solennis for a degree or order in the Church, whose practice and nomenclature, in this and many other respects, is the best Exponent of the Apostle's meaning.

Thus the General Council of Chalcedon (can. 39) says, Ἐπίσκοπον εἰς Πρεσβυτέρου βαθμὸν φέρειν ἱεροσυλία ἐστίν. See also the numerous examples in Suicer, v. βαθμός.

St. Paul does not call it a higher step, but a good one; for it is not the desire of advancement in honour, but in means of usefulness, that he propounds. So v. 1, καλοῦ ἔργου ἐπιθυμεῖ.

If it be said, as it has been, that the reference to ecclesiastical promotion would be at variance with the tenour of an Apostle's sentiments and language, the same objection might be taken more forcibly to the mention of double pay to the Presbyters in v. 17. But the fact is, St. Paul's language to Timothy, in both cases, is designed to instruct him what course he himself, as a Bishop, is to adopt in recognition of the just claims of meritorious Deacons and Presbyters; and is not intended to inform Presbyters and Deacons what they ought to desire.

Indeed, having stated their claims on their earthly spiritual Superior for his guidance, he directs their thoughts heavenward, and lifts up their eyes and minds to the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls (1 Pet. ii. 25), and bids them think of the heavenly crown which they will receive, when the Chief Shepherd shall appear. (1 Pet. v. 4.)

14. τάχιον] sooner than might be inferred from these written instructions. Cp. Acts xxv. 10, and 2 Tim. i. 18, as to this use of the comparative; and as to the sentiment, see 2 John 12. 3 John 13, 14.

It has been alleged, that this expression of a hope to visit Timothy is inconsistent with St. Paul's declaration to the Ephesian Presbyters at Miletus, that they "all, among whom he had gone preaching the Gospel, should see his face no more" (Acts xx. 25. 38).

But it may be observed, that St. Paul does not say here that he expected to come to Ephesus. Indeed, it is more probable, that having now in his old age (Philem. 9) appointed Timothy to the Apostolic office of Chief Pastor at Ephesus, he would rather abstain from personal interference there, lest he should seem to overshadow him to whom the highest position in that Church had now been confided by himself.

There is no evidence that St. Paul ever was at Ephesus after that visit to Miletus.

On a former occasion (mentioned in Acts xx. 15. 17) when going to Jerusalem, he determined to sail by Ephesus, and yet touched at Miletus on the coast, and sent for the Presbyters of Ephesus to come to have an interview with him at Miletus; so, perhaps, when touching at Miletus on subsequent occasions, he may have sent for the Chief Pastor of Ephesus, Timothy, and have seen him there. Cp. note above on Acts xx. 25, and on 2 Tim. i. 15—18; iv. 20, and the Introduction to these Epistles to Timothy, p. 420.

15, 16. ἵνα εἰδῇς κ.τ.λ.] in order that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the Living God, the pillar and ground of truth (and confessedly the Mystery of Godliness is great), Who was manifested in the flesh, justified in His spirit, showed Himself to Angels, was believed on in the world, and was received up in Glory.

I. As to the reading of these two verses, Eliz. has Θεὸς before ἐφανερώθη, and this reading is found in D, I, K, and in most of the Cursive MSS.

But this reading, Θεὸς, i. e. ΘΣ (God), seems to be derived from ΟΣ (Who), which is found in A* (see Ellicott, p. 100), and in C* (see Tischendorf, Prol. Cod. Ephr. p. 39), and in F, G (see Tregelles, "Printed Text," p. 165, note), and in some Cursive MSS.

All the earlier Versions (before the seventh century), viz. the old Latin, Vulgate, Peschito, Harclean, Syriac, Memphitic, στῦλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας, [16] [1](καὶ ὁμολογουμένως μέγα ἐστὶ τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας μυστήριον), ὃς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκὶ, ἐδικαιώθη ἐν πνεύματι, ὤφθη ἀγγέλοις, ἐκηρύχθη ἐν ἔθνεσιν, ἐπιστεύθη ἐν κόσμῳ, ἀνελήφθη ἐν δόξῃ.

1 John 1. 14. Matt. 3. 16. 1 Pet. 3. 18. Mark 16. 5. Eph. 3. 5, 6.

Thebaic, Gothic, Armenian, Æthiopic, represent here a relative pronoun, viz. ὃς, qui, or ὅ, quod.

This united testimony that Θεὸς did not belong to the passage in the days when those Versions were made is very strong; and when it is remembered that no Version of similar antiquity can be brought forward to counterbalance these witnesses from every part of Christendom, the preponderance of testimony is overwhelming. (Tregelles, p. 228.) S. Jerome (in Isa. liii. 11) quotes the passage thus: "QUI apparuit in carne." Theodorus Mopsuest., Cyril Alex., and Epiphanius have also ὃς (see Wetstein); and Augustine (Serm. 204) reads quod agreeing with 'sacramentum,' but he interprets the passage as if it were qui; and so the Latin Fathers generally, following the old Latin and Vulg., which have Quod.

D* has also the neuter pronoun ϘO. It is said by Liberatus, the Deacon, in his Breviarium, cap. xix. (cp. Hincmar. Opusc. lv. c. 17), that Macedonius, the Bishop of Constantinople, was banished (A.D. 506) by the Emperor Anastasius for altering OΣ here in Manuscripts into ΘΣ: "Tanquam Nestorianus ergo culpatus expellitur per Severum Monachum."

See Dr. Bentley on Freethinking, p. 117, ed. 1743, or Vol. iii. p. 366, ed. Dyce; and compare Bp. Pearson's note on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 240, who has anticipated Bentley's remarks, though Bentley does not seem to have been aware of it.

Whatever may have been the extent of this alteration, this incident may serve to remind us that the change of OΣ into ΘΣ = Θεὸς is a very easy one; whereas, if the earliest MSS. had ΘΕΟΣ here (and the word is usually presented so in full in the earliest MSS.), it is difficult to explain how the reading OΣ found its way into the most ancient MSS., e. g. A, C, F, G; particularly since the construction of ὅς is not nearly so easy a one as that of Θεὸς would have been; and therefore Θεὸς was not so likely to have been exchanged for ὅς, as ὅς for Θεός.

For a similar reason the testimony of Jerome, reading QUI after the neuter word Sacramentum, is of more weight than that of the other Latin Fathers reading Quod.

II. On the whole, then, it may be concluded, that—

(1) The evidence for a relative pronoun is far stronger than for the noun-substantive Θεός.

(2) The evidence for the masculine pronoun ὅς is far stronger than for the neuter ὅ.

(3) The Masculine OΣ has accordingly been preferred by Griesb., Lach., Tisch., Alf., Huther, Ellicott, and by Tregelles in his summary of the evidence on this subject.

III. As to the general construction and meaning of the Apostle's language here, it seems most probable that the words καὶ ὁμολογουμένως μέγα ἐστὶ τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας μυστήριον are to be regarded as a parenthesis, which is altogether in the manner of St. Paul. When some great argument presses itself on his mind, he declares its dignity by some expressions which break forth from him abruptly and vehemently into a parenthetical proposition, as here. See, for instance, Rom. ii. 13.

Next, the relative pronoun ὅς, Who, is to be referred to the antecedent Θεοῦ, which is repeated twice in v. 15, so as to be impressed strongly on the reader's mind, and to prepare him for the relative ὅς commencing the sublime declaration which sums up the whole, and proclaims the Church to be no other than the House of God, the living God, Who was manifested in the flesh, justified in His Spirit, seen of Angels, preached to the Gentiles, received up in glory; and, consequently, that HE, who was thus manifested in the flesh, preached, and glorified, is no other than GOD, the LIVING GOD, the Everlasting JEHOVAH.

The adoption, therefore, of the reading ὅς for Θεὸς, while it improves the rhythm of the sentence, makes no change in the sense. The doctrine is the same as, and is something more than, that which is declared in the English Authorized Version, "God is the Mystery of Godliness. God was manifest (or, rather, was manifested) in the Flesh." And this Text, as now read, remains, and ever will remain, an impregnable bulwark of the Catholic Verity of the Godhead and Manhood of Christ.

IV. As to the meaning of particular words in these two verses:—

(1) Ἐκκλησία Θεοῦ ζῶντος, the Church of the Living God. Therefore it is not the Church of Man, but is grounded on the Rock, namely, on Christ, confessed to be (1) the Living God, and also (2) to be God Incarnate: "God manifested in the flesh." See above on Matt. xvi. 18. 1 Cor. iii. 10, 11.

(2) στῦλος καὶ ἑδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας. The Church is the Pillar of Truth, because, like the Pillar of Cloud and Fire (always called στῦλος by LXX), it is visible far and wide, day and night, and is a guide to the wayfarers in the wilderness of the world on their march to Heaven.

It is ἑδραίωμα, the basis, the pedestal (not the Rock on which the Truth rests, which is Christ, see Theodoret here, but) a firmamentum, settled, seated (ἑδρασθὲν) on the Rock. And therefore the Gospel, in which the Doctrine of Christ is contained, is called the στῦλος καὶ στήριγμα of the Church. (Irenæus. iii. 11.)

The Church is the pillar and base of the Truth,—

1st. In supporting, maintaining, guarding, and visibly displaying to the World, the True Canon of Holy Scripture, particularly by the public reading of it.

2ndly. In maintaining, guarding, and promulging the True Exposition of Holy Scripture, especially in her public symbols of Faith, called Creeds.

3rdly. In guarding and dispensing the Holy Sacraments pure and undefiled, for the new birth and continual renovation of the soul.

The Church of the Living God is the House of God, in contradistinction to the Jewish Temple, in which the Law, and Aaron's Rod, and the Pot of Manna were formerly enshrined in the Holy of Holies, which were only for a particular people, and were types and figures of future good things, now revealed in the Church, which contains the Word and Sacraments, and dispenses them freely to all.

(3) τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας μυστήριον, the Mystery of Godliness. See on Eph. iii. 9, 10. Col. i. 26, 27; ii. 2, where the word μυστήριον is employed in like manner to describe the great Mystery kept secret even from Angels, but now revealed to them and to the Heathen, as well as the Jews, by the Ministry of the Church of Christ, namely, the Incarnation of God the Son.

The doctrine of the Incarnation is here affirmed to be a Mystery. It is not, therefore, to be scanned and analyzed by man's Reason, but to be reverently received, on the testimony of God's Holy Word, by Faith. A warning against the speculations of those who venture to intrude with inquisitive and profane familiarity into "the secret things of the Lord our God;" and an encouragement to the humility, patience, faith, and hope of those who now, in this lower world, "see through a glass darkly," and are thus reminded of the imperfection of their present condition, and of all earthly things, and look forward to the fruition of that future felicity which will have no end, when they will "see face to face, and know even as they are known" (1 Cor. xiii. 12).

Cp. Bp. Sanderson's Sermon on this text, i. p. 224—247.

It is also a Mystery of Godliness. Other Mysteries, such as those of Paganism, were accompanied with impure rites and orgies; and there is even in Christendom what the Apostle describes as the "Mystery of Iniquity." (See on 2 Thess. ii. 7.) But the Mystery of the Incarnation is a Mystery of Godliness. Though the manner of it cannot now be apprehended by human Reason, yet the doctrine is clearly revealed in Scripture (Eph. i. 7—10. Col. i. 26), and is to be firmly embraced by Faith. And this doctrine of the Incarnation of the Son of God is the very root of godliness. It is the groundwork of all virtuous practice. It affords the strongest motive to love of God, and to personal Holiness. In it Christ says, Be ye holy, for I, Who have taken your nature and joined it to the Nature of the Holy One, am Holy. (Cp. Eph. i. 2—6. Tit. ii. 11—13.) It is the strongest argument for Humility (see Phil. ii. 6), and for Universal Charity. See above, Introduction to the Epistle to the Ephesians, p. 275—277, and note on Eph. v. 5.

(4) ὃς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκὶ, Who was manifested in the flesh. Cp. Matt. i. 23. John i. 14. Tit. i. 3, and note. 1 John i. 2, ἡ ζωὴ ἐφανερώθη. So Barnabas, Ep. 6, Ἐν σαρκὶ μέλλοντος φανεροῦσθαι καὶ πάσχειν, προεφανερούτο τὸ πάθος: and xii., υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν σαρκὶ φανερωθείς. Ignat. Eph. 19, Θεοῦ ἀνθρωπίνως φανερουμένου. Hippolyt. (c. Noet. 17), Θεὸς ἐν σώματι ἐφανερώθη.

(5) ἐδικαιώθη ἐν πνεύματι, was justified in His spirit.

The Son of God, Who is God of God, the Living God, took our Nature, and thus assumed not only human flesh (σάρκα), in which He was manifested, but He took also a human soul, which, in its higher faculties, by which it is distinguished from its mere animal life (ψυχὴ), is called πνεῦμα, or spirit, in Holy Scripture. (See above on 1 Thess. v. 23, and cp. 1 Pet. iii. 18.) And in this, His human spirit, He was justified, i. e. declared to be, what no other man ever was, perfectly just; and so, being truly man, as well as God, and being justified in that which He had from our nature (cp. Theodoret), namely, a human πνεῦμα, He became "our Righteousness." (Jer. xxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16.) See on 1 Cor. i. 30.

(6) ὤφθη ἀγγέλοις, He showed Himself to Angels. On the meaning of ὤφθη, see above, 1 Cor. xv. 5, 6, 7, 8, and John xvi. 16, 17. 19. 22. The Angels could not see the essential glory of His Divinity, which was Invisible (see 1 Pet. i. 12, and Col. i. 15), but they beheld Him when He became Incarnate. Theodoret, and so Chrys.

And then the Mystery of His Love to Men was revealed to Angels by the Ministry of His Church. Cp. note above on Eph. iii. 10.

CH. IV. 1. Τὸ δὲ Πνεῦμα κ.τ.λ.] But the Spirit speaketh expressly. The connexion is as follows. But, notwithstanding the clearness of the witness of the Church to the truth (see above, iii. 15, 16), the Holy Ghost expressly saith that in the latter times some will fall away from the faith, and deny the great Mystery of Godliness, which has just been described.

The form of this denial will be considered in the notes below on κωλυόντων γαμεῖν, v. 2, and ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων, v. 3.

The word ἀποστασία does not signify open profession of unbelief, but declension from the Truth—Heresy. See on 2 Thess. ii. 3.

The Prophecy of St. Paul reveals the future rise and prevalence of such Heresies as those of the Marcionites, Encratites, and Manichæans. Chrys., Theoph.

And so Bp. Pearson in his Concio on this and the following verses. Minor Works, ii. 41—45.

But the Prophecy has doubtless a still wider scope, and extends to all forms of spiritual deceit and delusion which contravene the Mystery of Godliness. And so this Apostolic Prophecy is to be combined with that other prediction, delivered by St. Paul, describing the 'Mystery of Iniquity.' See above on 2 Thess. ii. 3—12.

This passage (vv. 1—5) is quoted with some very slight variations by S. Hippolytus in his recently discovered Philosophumena, p. 276—as "the words of the blessed Apostle St. Paul"—a fresh testimony from the beginning of the third century to the genuineness of this Epistle. He applies this prophecy to the Encratites.

— διδασκαλίαι δαιμονίων] doctrines suggested by Devils; doctrines engendered by the operation of Evil Spirits. Theodoret. "Omnis enim Hæreticorum doctrina Dæmonum arte composita est." Primasius. Cp. Bp. Pearson, l. c.

Similarly, in writing to the Churches of Asia, St. John speaks of assemblies of false teachers as Synagogues of Satan, συναγωγὰς τοῦ Σατανᾶ (Rev. ii. 9; iii. 9), as opposed to the Church of Christ. See also Rev. xvi. 13.

Justin M. refers to, and explains those words (Dial. c. Tryph. 7), τὰ τῆς πλάνης πνεύματα καὶ δαιμόνια δοξολογοῦσι ψευδοπροφῆται, and of some Heretics he says that they do not teach the doctrines of Christ, but τὰ ἀπὸ τῶν τῆς πλάνης πνευμάτων.

2. ἐν ὑποκρίσει ψ. κ. τ. l. σ.] with the hypocrisy of liars who are seared as to their consciences with hot iron. The sense of this passage has been obscured by placing a comma between ψευδολόγων and κεκαυτηριασμένων. The construction is the same as in S. Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians (i. 6), ἀπεχόμενοι τῶν ψευδαδέλφων, καὶ τῶν ἐν ὑποκρίσει φερόντων τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου, οἵτινες ἀποπλανῶσι κενοὺς ἀνθρώπους—a passage where he has St. Paul's words in his mind, as in many other places of the same Epistle.

St. Paul is speaking of a particular kind of Hypocrisy—towards a man's own self, and toward God—the Hypocrisy of liars who have wilfully cauterized their own consciences, and are, therefore, given over by God's judicial retribution to a reprobate mind.

This was precisely the Hypocrisy of which we hear so much in the Gospels, as the sin of the Pharisees (Luke xii. 1. Matt. xxiii. 13); who were not only guilty of deceiving others by an outward show of religion, but were also guilty of insincerity towards God, and toward their own consciences. This last is, indeed, included in that general Hypocrisy, which, in the Gospels, is represented as their character. They were not men who did not believe in their religion; on the contrary, they were zealous for it: but their religion was hypocritical; it allowed them in immoral practices; they indulged in pride and uncharitableness under the cloak of zeal for God. See Matt. xv. 7—14; xxiii. 13. 16. 19. 24. 26, where hypocrite and blind are used interchangeably, as applicable to them. They tampered with their own Consciences, and allowed themselves in sin, known to be such; and therefore God, in His anger, blinded their eyes, and their hearts were hardened, and their consciences were made callous, and they loved darkness and lies more than light and truth, and rejected Him Who was the Light, and is the Truth.

Hence we read in Scripture of the "deceitfulness of sin," viz. its deceiving those who are guilty of it, and who in their blindness act as men who have deceived themselves, and would fain deceive God. (Acts v. 3; xxviii. 27. Gal. vi. 7. James i. 22. 26.)

This prophecy of St. Paul may, therefore, be compared in this respect with the awful words in that other prophecy already mentioned (2 Thess. ii. 11. 12), which is the best exposition of this passage, and where it is said, that because they would not receive the love of the truth, but would have pleasure in unrighteousness, therefore God would send them an inner-working (ἐνέργειαν) of delusion, so that they should believe the lie, which they would utter. See note on that passage. Theirs would indeed be the hypocrisy of liars cauterized in their own consciences.

When any one is deluded through sin wilfully committed against Reason and Conscience, which, by habits of sin thus committed, becomes branded by a hot iron, this is Hypocrisy towards himself; and he who is guilty of it, acts as if he could deceive God, and this is Hypocrisy toward God; and this is the form of Hypocrisy here described by St. Paul. See Bp. Butler on 1 Pet. ii. 16, who has supplied some of the sentences of this note, and above on Matt. xxiii. 13.

It is unhappily too notorious, that a large portion of the Western Church has fulfilled this Prophecy, by its own practice in giving sanction to mendacious Legends, and to "lying wonders;" and that it has even made, and is making, a traffic of fabulous Miracles, and has thus fallen away from the profession of a sound faith in the 'Mystery of Godliness,' which abhors what is false, especially in religion, and has initiated itself and others in the 'Mystery of Iniquity,' which receives not "the love of the truth," and is given over to "strong delusions," and to believe a lie.

Speaking of these pious frauds, or rather impious impostures, authorized and propagated by the Papacy, a learned and pious Bishop of our own Church has said that "wise men have thought that the authors of these romances in religion were no better than the tools and instruments of Satan (cp. St. Paul's words, 'doctrines of devils,' v. 1), used by him to expose the Christian religion, and so to introduce Atheism." Bp. Bull (Serm. iv.).

A striking recent proof of the truth of this assertion may be seen in the facts described in "Notes at Paris," 1854, p. 144—152.

3. κωλυόντων γαμεῖν] forbidding to marry. This was done by Marcion and Apelles, "ejus secutor" (Tertullian, Præs. Hær. 33), and before Marcion, by Saturnilus, the Scholar of Menander, "qui nubere et generare, à Satanâ dicebant esse." See Iren. i. 22. Theodoret, Hær. Fab. i. 3; and so Tatian. Iren. i. 28. Cp. Clemens Alex., Strom. iii. p. 462, who applies to them this prophecy, and cp. Bp. Pearson, l. c. p. 52.

This clause is introduced here in connexion with what precedes (iii. 15, 16), because the Heresy of "forbidding to marry," strikes at the root of the doctrine of "the great Mystery of Godliness," inasmuch as, by the Incarnation, the Son of God has married our Nature, and has espoused to himself a Church, and so has sanctified Marriage, as St. Paul had fully declared to the Church, of which Timothy was Chief Pastor, that of Ephesus. See on Eph. v. 23—32, and cp. Introduction to that Epistle, p. 275—277.

The fact, that a Christian Church, in defiance of the language of the Holy Spirit, declaring here by St. Paul, that they who "forbid to marry" are doing the work of seducing Spirits, and are warring against the 'Mystery of Godliness;' and in defiance also of his words in this same Epistle, describing those who are to be ordained to the Holy Orders of Presbyters and Deacons as "Husbands of one wife," and as having their "children in subjection" (iii. 2—4)—has ventured to shut the door of Holy Orders against all who are married, and to forbid Marriage to those who have been admitted to Holy Orders, is a mournful proof that men may still imitate the Jews, who fulfilled their own Scriptures by condemning Christ (Acts xiii. 27), and τίας τοῖς πιστοῖς καὶ ἐπεγνωκόσι τὴν ἀλήθειαν· 4 [d] ὅτι πᾶν κτίσμα Θεοῦ καλὸν, καὶ οὐδὲν ἀπόβλητον, μετὰ εὐχαριστίας λαμβανόμενον· 5 ἁγιάζεται γὰρ διὰ λόγου Θεοῦ καὶ ἐντεύξεως.

that when they love a lie they may be so much blinded by the Father of Lies as to accomplish the most awful predictions of the Scriptures of Truth, which describe those who accomplished them as identifying themselves with men who give heed to Lying Spirits, and have their consciences seared by a hot iron.

— ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων] to abstain from meats. The word 'commanding' to be supplied from κωλυόντων. Theophyl. Cp. Winer, § 62, 2, p. 588. A prophecy preparing the world for the Heresy of the Manichæans, who forbad the use of meats, as created by the Evil One (Cyril Hieros. Catech. 63); and of the Severians (Epiphan. Hær. 45); and before them all, of the Ebionites (Epiphan. Hær. 30).

Observe the beauty of the connexion of this declaration with what had preceded—a connexion which is in some degree marred by the breaking off of the argument by the abrupt termination of the Third Chapter.

The Heresy of commanding to abstain from meats, is here condemned, because, like that of forbidding to marry, it had a direct tendency to subvert the 'great Mystery of Godliness' contained in

(1) the doctrine of the Incarnation, and

(2) the doctrine consequent on the Incarnation—that of Universal Redemption.

(1) Consider it first with regard to the Incarnation. If, as these false teachers affirmed, adopting the dualistic theory (against which God Himself had delivered a solemn protest by Isaiah, xlv. 7), the Flesh was created by the Evil Principle; and if, therefore, it was necessary to abstain from meats, as polluted and unclean, then it would follow, that God could not have taken human flesh, and united it for ever to the Godhead.

(2) Consider it also with regard to the kindred doctrine of Universal Redemption.

Christ, by His Incarnation, becoming the Second Adam, recovered for us the free use of all the creatures of God, and recovered for them their original benediction which they had received from God.

See Bp. Sanderson's Sermon on this text (Vol. iii. p. 144—211), and the remarks above in the notes in the present volume on 1 Cor. iii. 22, and 1 Cor. vi. 12, which may serve for a comment on this and the following verse; and see below, on v. 5.

All that the Apostle here says will thus be seen to grow out by a natural sequence from what he has before declared concerning 'the great Mystery of Godliness,' "God manifested in the flesh."

4. οὐδὲν ἀπόβλητον] nothing is to be rejected. "Meminimus gratiam nos debere Domino Creatori. Nullum fructum operum Ejus repudiamus. Planè temperamus, ne ultrà modum aut perperàm utamur." Tertullian (Apol. 42).

A warning against those who take, or would impose, Vows of total abstinence from any of God's creatures. Such vows are an insult to God the Creator, God the Redeemer, and God the Sanctifier. See notes above on 1 Cor. iii. 22; vi. 12; viii. 13. Rom. xiv. 21; and cp. Theodoret here.

5. ἁγιάζεται διὰ λόγου Θεοῦ] it is sanctified by the Word of God. It is sanctified in various ways,—

(1) by the Word of God in Creation, when He blessed the creatures, and sanctified them to the use of man, and when He blessed man, and gave him dominion over them. (Gen. i. 22. 28. Cp. Gen. ix. 3. Ps. viii. 6.)

(2) by the Word of God in Redemption, when He abolished the difference between clean and unclean meats; and said, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common (Acts x. 15), words which were true in a literal sense as to meats, as well as in a figurative sense as to men. See Rom. xiv. 17—20. And thus the effect of the original Benediction (λόγος Θεοῦ, His εὐλογία) pronounced at the Creation of Adam, was restored to Mankind in Christ. See 1 Cor. iii. 22. And this Divine Benediction it is, this λόγος Θεοῦ, which gives us the free and joyful use of them, and makes them nutritive and comfortable to us, for man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. (Deut. viii. 3. Matt. iv. 4.) It is not the creature itself which nourishes us, but it is God's benediction on the creature which makes it serviceable to the use of all, and sanctifies it to the use of the faithful.

St. Paul uses the present tense, ἁγιάζεται, because the original Benediction of God on the Creatures, and on Man as their Lord, takes effect toties quoties, and is applied effectually in every Christian meal by means of ἔντευξις, or Invocation. See next note.

(3) In a still more recondite sense, a sense which may have been present to the mind of the Holy Ghost, inspiring the Apostle, a sense which has a special connexion with the Doctrine of the Incarnation, of which He is here treating, and a sense also which would have a peculiar propriety in this Epistle to the Bishop of Ephesus, which was afterwards to be the residence of St. John, and the place where he wrote his Gospel, Every creature is sanctified by the Word of God, even by the Incarnate WORD, Who, by His Incarnation, hallowed man, the recipient of the Creatures, and hallowed the creatures for man's use. See v. 4.

That a word, as well as a prophecy, may have a manifold and a germinant meaning in Holy Writ (such is its fulness and fruitfulness), is a truth which has been too much forgotten by modern Exegesis; and that the Name "The Word of God" is applied by St. John to Christ, and by no other writer of Holy Scripture, is a proposition which has been too readily accepted. See Heb. iv. 12, and Titus i. 3. And it is worthy of remark that the Holy Spirit, speaking by St. Paul in his Epistles to the Church of Ephesus, and to Timothy its Bishop, dwells specially on those Doctrines which concern the Divinity and Incarnation of Christ, and which the same Spirit asserted and maintained in all their fulness by the teaching of that Apostle who lived and died at Ephesus, namely, St. John. See above, p. 277, and on Acts xx. 32.

— ἐντεύξεως] prayer, invocation. See 1 Tim. ii. 1. Thus it appears that in every rightly framed "Grace before meat," there are three things contained, viz.

1st. A thankful reference to the original Benediction pronounced by God the Creator on the Creatures, and to the primeval grant of Dominion over them, made to Man as their Lord.

2ndly. A Thankful reference to the reiteration of that Benediction, and to the restoration of that Dominion, by God the Redeemer.

3rdly. Prayer to God, that He would send His Blessing on the creatures provided by Him for Man; and that He would sanctify them to the use of those who partake of them, and would sanctify those who partake of them, to His Service.

6. διάκονος] An appropriate word in this discourse concerning the Tables of Christians, which were attended by the ministry of those whose office was instituted for the very purpose of διακονεῖν τραπέζαις. (Acts vi. 2.)

— ἐντρεφόμενος] inwardly nourished with the words of faith—another appropriate word, intimating that the bodily nourishment derivable from the creature is of no avail without that inner sustenance of faith in the Creator and Redeemer, which is the diet of the soul.

7. βεβήλους καὶ γραώδεις μύθους] profane and old wives' fables. Such were the legends of Judaism (Chrys., Theodoret, Theoph.), of which abundant examples may be seen in the Cabala of the Talmud (cp. Hottinger, Thesaur. Philol. p. 434—449), and by which the worship and religious offices of the Jews were corrupted, and especially by the introduction of the worship of Angels as Mediators (see on Col. ii. 18), undermining the foundations of that εὐσέβεια, which consists mainly in the adoration of the One God, and of the One Mediator between God and Man. See ii. 5.

This Warning also has a natural connexion with what precedes, and has a prophetic application to later times, especially to the practice of that portion of Christendom, which withholds the use of the Holy Scriptures, in the vernacular tongue, from the people, and instead of satisfying their hungry souls with the Bread of Life, feeds them with the unwholesome husks of legendary fables.

— παραιτοῦ] (1) properly 'deprecate,' 'ask off.' See Acts xxv. 11. Heb. xii. 19.

(2) as here, decline, shun, refuse, reject, renounce. Cp. 2 Tim. ii. 23. Tit. iii. 10. Heb. xii. 25.

— Γύμναζε δὲ σεαυτὸν π. εὐ.] but exercise thyself unto Godliness. He had spoken of spiritual food, derived from the words of faith (v. 6); he now speaks of the need of spiritual exercise (such as Prayer and Fasting) for the preservation of spiritual health.

The word by which he describes these exercises, γυμνάζω, shows that the spiritual exercises are to be regular, and that they require effort, and suppose spiritual mortification and wrestling. The Apostle compares the Christian Life to training in a ghostly Gymnasium. Cp. 1 Cor. ix. 24, where he compares its religious exercises to those of an athlete; and says (v. 27), ὑπωπιάζω μοῦ τὸ σῶμα, I beat under my own body (μοῦ emphatic), not the body of another, as this world's athletes do; I contund myself, my own flesh, as my enemy.

8. σωματικὴ γυμνασία] gymnastic exercise of the body is profitable for little—for little time and for little benefit.

This expression is to be explained by reference to the use of gymnastic exercises for the training of the young to a vigorous habit of body, and also to the training of the Wrestlers and Runners for prizes, in the Games of Heathen Antiquity, and also to the regular gymnastic exercises which were a part of the habitual regimen of the daily life of the higher class of the Romans. See Bentley on Horat. Sat. i. 6. 126, "fugio campum lusumque trigonem;" and Martial's description of the Roman Day, "sufficit in nonam nitidis octava Palæstris" (Epig. iv. 8. 5). The Romans had their hour (the eighth hour) for bodily gymnastics; so ought the Christian to have his appointed hours for spiritual exercises.

What the Apostle means, therefore, is, that the Children of light should learn a lesson from the children of this world, who exercise themselves in physical gymnastics for the acquisition of the precarious health of this life, and for the attainment of ephemeral prizes on earth; and should take similar care to exercise themselves in the spiritual discipline of Prayer and Self-mortification, with a view not only to the promises of this life's joys, which wait upon Piety, but much more to spiritual and eternal health and Victory.

The great Apostle of the Gentiles, the unwearied Athlete of the Gospel, the Xystarches of the Christian Palæstra, sends these directions to Timothy, as the spiritual Gymnasiarch of Ephesus, in order that he may train himself and his people to receive the imperishable crown of glory from the hands of the Divine Agonothetes at the Great Day.

10. κοπιῶμεν] we labour—in our Christian gymnastics.

— σωτὴρ πάντων] See ii. 4. God is the Saviour of all men in will, and He is the Saviour of all who believe, not only in will, but in effect. See above, Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans, p. 194, and on Rom. viii. 33.

12. Μηδεὶς σοῦ τ. ν. καταφρονείτω] Cp. the words in 1 Cor. xvi. 11, written from Ephesus, concerning Timothy.

— σοῦ τῆς νεότητος] Cp. the position of the pronoun in Col. iv. 18. Elz. adds ἐν πνεύματι after ἐν ἀγάπῃ.

13. Ἕως ἔρχομαι] The present tense indicative seems to denote that the Apostle is on the point of setting out to come to Timothy. See iii. 14. Cp. Luke xix. 13, ἕως ἔρχομαι, and John xxi. 22.

— πρόσεχε τῇ ἀναγνώσει] give attendance to reading, not only to the public reading of the Holy Scriptures, of the Law, and the Prophets (Acts xiii. 15. 2 Cor. iii. 14), and of portions of the New Testament (see 1 Thess. v. 27), but also to private study (cp. Chrys., Theodoret), as appointed means of stirring up spiritual grace. See below on 2 Tim. iv. 13.

14. διὰ προφητείας] The gift of the Holy Spirit was bestowed on Timothy by means of the Prophecy by which the Spirit spake, and which pointed him out for Ordination, and with the laying on of the hands of the Presbyters, who had been already constituted by St. Paul in the principal cities of Asia (Acts xiv. 23; xx. 17), and who joined with the Apostle in ordaining him. (2 Tim. i. 6; cp. 1 Tim. i. 18.)

It is not improbable that they by whose ministry the Holy Spirit delivered the prophecy were themselves Presbyters, who took part in the Ordination of Timothy. Cp. Acts xiii. 2.

We have evidence here of the means used by the Holy Ghost for the Ordination of Timothy, who was a Chief Pastor of the Church.

It has been said by some ancient Expositors (Chrys., Theophyl.) that the Πρεσβυτέριον here mentioned was composed of Bishops, "because Presbyters would not have ordained a Bishop."

But it may be observed—

(1) That it is not certain that St. Paul is referring to the Ordination of Timothy to the Episcopate. He may be speaking of his Ordination to the Priesthood at Lystra. Cp. Ellicott.

(2) Next, even if he is speaking of Timothy's Ordination to the Episcopate, then it is to be observed, that in Timothy's Ordination, as in St. Paul's own Ordination, the Holy Ghost Himself spoke by the Prophecy here mentioned, and that He pointed Timothy out for Ordination; and therefore it was the Holy Ghost Himself, Who, by the ministry of Prophecy, of the Presbytery, and of the Apostle St. Paul, ordained Timothy.

We are tied to the use of the means which the Holy Ghost has sanctioned. But the Holy Ghost is not restrained to the use of any means, but has sovereign Power to act, either by means or without means, according to His own Divine Will. And He proves His own Sovereign Authority by certain extraordinary Exceptions, and thereby gives Divine sanction to the Rules instituted by Him, and obliges us to conform to them.

Therefore the operations of the Holy Spirit in this Ordination, where He vouchsafed a supernatural intervention, cannot afford any precedent for contravening, disparaging, or dispensing with the use of those regular ordinary means which have received the sanction of the Holy Ghost Himself, whose Divine Presence and perpetual indwelling has been assured to the Church by Christ Himself (John xiv. 16), and Who speaks and acts in the consent and by the practice of the Universal Church of Christ from primitive times in the ordination and consecration of her Chief Pastors.

Cp. the remarks above on the extraordinary case of Cornelius receiving the Holy Ghost before he was admitted to the Sacrament of Baptism. (Acts x. 47.)

Ch. V. 1. Πρεσβυτέρῳ] An elder. Not 'a presbyter' here, but any one advanced in years. (Theoph.) The use of this word in this sense, in this Epistle, where so much is said of Ecclesiastical persons, may serve to remind the reader that the term Presbyter, applied in it to a minister of the Church (as in this chapter, v. 17), is one which teaches the duty of reverence to him on the part of his flock; whereas the term Episcopus describes his duties of spiritual superintendence, and pastoral vigilance, toward those who are committed to his care.

3. Χήρας τίμα] Honour widows, if they are widows indeed, such as are described (in v. 5) as left solitary in the world, without any children or grandchildren, and can devote themselves entirely to the service of God, without neglecting (under pretence of piety) any duty to those of their own kindred. Honour such widows as these, for they are widows indeed.

Honour them by admitting them into the honourable class of Widows, enrolled by the Church, and making profession of Widowhood, and of devotion to the service of Christ.

Honour them, if need be, by providing a competent maintenance (τιμὴν, see v. 17) for them (Chrys., Theodoret, and Jerome on Matt. xv. 4), if they have no relatives, who ought to support them, and if they are above a certain age (v. 9).

Timothy was Bishop of Ephesus, the Metropolis of Asia; and the Widows here spoken of by St. Paul, were poor aged women (see Jerome, ad Jovinian. i. Vol. ii. p. 263), such as, in those times, on account of the services they were accustomed to perform to the Saints, were maintained out of the contributions of the Church and the common stock . . . that so there might be no cause at Ephesus of such complaint as had been made by the Grecians at Jerusalem, that their widows were neglected in the daily ministration. (Acts vi. 1; and compare Acts ix. 39. 41, concerning the Widows at Joppa.) See Bp. Sanderson, i. p. 58, and ii. p. 186.

On the condition and duties of the χῆραι, or Widows of the Church, see Ignat. Smyrn. 6. Polycarp, 6. Const. Apost. viii. 25. Cornelius (Bishop of Rome, A.D. 250), in Euseb. vi. 43, mentions, as existing in the Church of Rome, χήρας σὺν θλιβομένοις (see v. 10) more than 1500 in number. Cp. Bingham, VII. iv. 7; and on their election also to the office of Deaconesses, ibid. II. xxii., and Suicer in v. Διακόνισσα; and Blunt, Church History, p. 29. On this verse, see also Jerome, Epist. iv. p. 729, ad Matrem et Filiam.

4. ἔκγονα] grandchildren, τέκνα τέκνων (Hesych.); used by LXX in that sense, Deut. xxix. 10. Isa. xlviii. 19, and by other Writers cited by Wetstein.

— μανθανέτωσαν] i. e. let such Widows learn. Some Expositors understand St. Paul to mean, "let the children and grandchildren learn."

But the former interpretation seems to be far preferable,

(1) Because the Apostle is here speaking of the duties of Widows, and not of their Children or Grandchildren.

(2) Because, also, he says below, v. 16, "If any Christian have widows, let him maintain them." And he therefore does not inculcate that duty here; if he had done so, he would not have repeated the precept there.

(3) He applies the word μανθάνω to Widows below, v. 13, and so here. Cp. the use of μανθάνω, ii. 11; v. 13, and 2 Tim. iii. 7.

(4) The plural verb μανθανέτωσαν is used, because the proposition is a general one; and the plural nominative χῆραι, 'Widows,' is to be inferred from the collective words τις χήρα. And so Winer, § 67, p. 556, and Huther; and see the similar structure above in ii. 15.

The words of the Apostle may therefore be paraphrased thus:—

If a Widow have children or grandchildren, let such Widows learn first to show piety towards their own household. Almighty God will accept such piety from them as piety towards His own House, the Church (iii. 15). And let them learn thus to requite their own Progenitors. Observe, the word used here is not Parents, but Progenitors, a word carrying their thoughts and affections far back to former Ages. Do not let them suppose that they have no duty to their own Parents and Grandparents, and even to their distant Progenitors, because those Ancestors are dead. The Fifth Commandment cannot be cancelled by death; it is one of perpetual obligation. They owe a duty of gratitude to the departed, and they ought to show it by affection to their posterity. This is acceptable to the Heavenly Parent of all. God will requite such service as done to Himself, and will reward it accordingly.

This interpretation is confirmed by Theodoret, Chrys., and Primasius. And Augustine, referring to this passage, says, that such a Widow was his own mother, Monica, who was the wife of one husband, and requited her parents by governing her own house with piety. Confess. ix. 9. A Lapide.

There is a peculiar propriety also in the precept Honour widows, as compared with the fifth commandment, Honour thy father and thy mother (Eph. vi. 2). Honour those widows who are widows indeed. Be to them a son; and let Widows who have children or grandchildren honour their own Parents and Progenitors by cherishing their Posterity.

It is to be regretted, that so natural and so easy an Exposition of the Apostle's words, one which opens so clear, beautiful, and extensive a view of the Christian duty of reverential love and gratitude to the Departed, and shows that in the Church of Christ all successive Generations, being incorporated in the Incarnate Word, Who is Everliving, partake of His Immortality, and are bound together, each to each, by sacred bands of dutiful affection and natural piety, should be censured by some Expositors as forced and extravagant! . . All true love of the Present, and of the Future, is grounded on gratitude and reverence for the Past.

After ἐστι Elz. has καλὸν καὶ, which is not supported by the best authorities here. Cp. above, ii. 3.

5. μεμονωμένη] having been made desolate; i. e. not only without husband, but who has no children or grandchildren.

Such a widow is a widow indeed; her eye is fixed, and her hand leans, upon God, and upon Him alone.

This assertion confirms the Exposition just given of v. 4. Those other widows, who have children and grandchildren, ought to please God by taking care of them. That is their first duty; let them learn that duty first of all, says the Apostle. And such Widows ought to be supported by their own relatives (v. 16), and not by the Church.

— προσμένει ταῖς δεήσεσι] she continually attends on the prayers and on the supplications, particularly the public prayers of the Church. (See ii. 1.) She has an intercessory office. Cp. the striking words of S. Polycarp, 4, concerning the Widows, where he speaks of them as interceding continually for all men, and being like a holy Altar at which sacrifices of prayer and praise are offered to God: χήρας . . . ἐντυγχανούσας ἀδιαλείπτως περὶ πάντων, γινωσκούσας ὅτι εἰσὶ θυσιαστήριον Θεοῦ.

Such Widows may, in the eyes of men, seem to be desolate, but it is not so; they trust in God, and in Him alone, and therefore they are not alone. But other Women too often trust mainly on some earthly stay; and therefore those Widows, though they may seem desolate, are in fact stronger than other Women; for they have a stronger stay.

The Church herself, the Spouse of Christ, while She is in this Vale of tears, is a Widow; She appears to be left alone in this world; She trusts in God, and in Him alone. She is a Widow indeed, and therefore She is strong indeed. See Augustine in Ps. cxxxi.

6. Ἡ σπαταλῶσα] She that liveth in pleasure. St. Paul is here considering the case of wealthier widows; σπαταλᾷ = τρυφᾷ, Hesych. James v. 5, ἐτρυφήσατε καὶ ἐσπαταλήσατε.

The word σπαταλᾶν properly signifies a careless and lavish waste of time and money squandered in self-indulgence. Cp. Aristoph. Neb. 56, ὃ γύναι λίαν σπαθᾷς.

— ζῶσα τέθνηκε] being alive she is dead. "Quod de viduâ deliciosâ dixit Apostolus, etiam de animâ, si Deum suum amiserit, dici potest, vivens mortua est." Augustine (1 Joann. 47). Cp. Rev. iii. 1.

These wealthier widows, of whom the Apostle here speaks, are condemned for lavishing their money and their time on themselves in luxury and dissipation, instead of providing for others. See the next verse.

8. Εἰ δέ τις—τῶν οἰκείων] If any one, and here particularly, if a Widow wastes her means and her time idly and luxuriously,

9 Χήρα καταλεγέσθω μὴ ἔλαττον ἐτῶν ἑξήκοντα γεγονυῖα, ἑνὸς ἀνδρὸς γυνὴ, and does not take care of her own children or grandchildren (see above, v. 4), she has denied the faith, and is worse than a heathen. (1 Cor. xiv. 22.) Cp. the use of πιστὸς = a Christian, v. 16.

Doubtless, this is a general proposition applicable to all, and is to be understood as such. But here, as the context shows, it is specially applied to Widows. So Theodoret. Cp. v. 4, where the Apostle propounds a general proposition, growing out, in a similar manner, of a particular case.

9.] The Apostle now proceeds to speak of those who may be admitted by Timothy, as Bishop of Ephesus, into the Church's Roll (κατάλογος) of Widows, and may be allowed to make profession of Widowhood, and of devotion to the service of God. Cp. Hooker, V. lxviii. 11.

— γεγονυῖα] To be construed with μὴ ἔλαττον ἐ. ἑ., 'non minus sexaginta annos nata.'

— ἑνὸς ἀνδρὸς γυνή] the Wife of one husband. Even the Heathen showed respect for Univiræ. Horat. Od. iii. 14. 5, "Unico gaudens mulier marito Prodeat." Servius (ad Virg. Æn. 111), "Flaminicam nonnisi unum maritum habere licet." Tertullian says (ad Uxor. i. 7), "Sacerdotium viduitatis celebratum est apud Nationes. Disciplina Ecclesiæ, et præscriptio Apostoli Viduam adlegi in Ordinationem (al. ordinem) nisi univiram non concedit." And Tertullian says (de Veland. Virg. 9), "Ad quam sedem, præter annos sexaginta, non tantum univiræ, id est nuptæ aliquando, eliguntur, sed et matres, et educatrices filiorum." See above on iii. 2.

10. εἰ ἐτεκνοτρόφησεν] if she nursed children, i. e. her own. See 1 Thess. ii. 7.

11. παραιτοῦ] decline, refuse (see iv. 7); do not admit them on the roll of the Widows of the Church, referred to in v. 9. Primasius.

— ὅταν γὰρ καταστρηνιάσωσι τοῦ Χριστοῦ] for when they (younger Widows) have waxed wanton against Christ, to Whom the Widows of the Church are supposed to make profession of entire devotion when admitted on the Roll of the Widows. See v. 5, and Tertullian as quoted on v. 9.

The word στρηνιᾶν, to run riot, is explained by ἀτακτεῖν (Suidas), and by ὑβρίζειν διὰ τὸν πλοῦτον (Hesych.), and is connected with the Lat. strenuus, Engl. strain, and indicates that full habit of body, which is shown by wantonness and excess, as it were, like the lusty restiveness of animals, who strain against the rein, and wax fat, and kick. (Deut. xxxii. 15.) Cp. Rev. xviii. 7. 9, ἐδόξασε καὶ ἐστρηνίασε, πορνεύσαντες καὶ στρηνιάσαντες.

So these younger Widows, when nourished by the alms of the Church, will use the strength which they thence derive against Him Who gives it; they will become impatient of restraint, and will not bear the yoke of Christ; and are not therefore to be invited, or allowed, to make profession of Widowhood, nor to be admitted into the roll of the Widows of the Church, lest they fall into a snare, and incur condemnation by contracting a second marriage, and by renouncing their pledges to Him. Theodoret.

12. ἔχουσαι κρῖμα, κ.τ.λ.] having condemnation. These words are explained by Tertullian (de Monog. 13) by reference to the profession of undivided devotion to Christ, which Widows of the Church made on their admission to the roll of Widowhood, and which they cancel by the subsequent act of their will (θέλημα) resolving on a second marriage. "Juvenculæ viduæ (says Tertullian) in viduitate deprehensæ, et aliquamdiù affectatæ, nubere volunt, habentes judicium quòd primam fidem resciderunt: illam videlicet à quâ in viduitate inventæ, et professæ eam, non perseverant. Propter quod vult eas nubere, ne primam fidem susceptæ viduitatis posteà rescindant." And so Theodoret and Chrys., who says that Widows indeed are, as it were, "betrothed to Christ." And Augustine (de bono Viduitatis, 11), "Irritam fecerunt fidem, quâ priùs voverant quod perseverantiâ implere noluerunt;" and de sanctâ Virginitate, 34, "In eo, quod primò voverant, non steterunt;" and in Ps. 75, "Voverunt et non reddiderunt."

The words ἔχουσαι κρῖμα, ὅτι are interpreted by most of the Fathers, Greek and Latin, 'having condemnation because.' And so κρῖμα is used Matt. xxiii. 13, Mark xii. 40, Luke xx. 47, and in this Epistle, iii. 6. And so Calvin, Beza, Erasmus, Luther, and the Authorized Version.

The pledge which they made to Christ is called πρώτη πίστις, their first pledge, in regard to the subsequent promise which they make by marriage to another husband.

Some learned Romanist Expositors here (e. g. Cornelius a Lapide) lay great stress on these words of St. Paul, as the groundwork of an argument that the Apostle would have approved, and by implication recommends, Vows of Celibacy. On this it may be observed—

(1) That it is true the Apostle supposes the Widows of the Church, who are here described, to make a profession of Widowhood on their admission to their Ecclesiastical state as Widows.

(2) He also says, that they who marry after that profession are guilty of breaking their plighted troth to Christ.

(3) But it is also to be remarked, that St. Paul expressly commands Timothy not to admit any one into the class of Widows before sixty years of age (v. 9).

(4) And he states, as the reason of this prohibition, that younger widows, if they are admitted, may wax wanton against Christ, and desire to marry, and incur condemnation by violating their pledge of Widowhood.

(5) It is therefore evident, that St. Paul would not have permitted persons of tender years to take a vow of celibacy; and he would not have allowed Timothy to impose such vows. He would have censured those persons as guilty of a heinous sin, who abuse their spiritual influence and pastoral authority in order to entangle young, inexperienced, and enthusiastic women in such vows, and allure them into a Cloister, under plea of espousing them to Christ; and so expose them to the peril of the condemnation, which they incur if they afterwards desire to marry, and break their engagement to Him.

(6) It has been alleged by some, that St. Paul's argument here concerns only younger Widows, who, having experienced the joys and comforts of a married life, are to be dealt with in a different way on that account; and that his cautions and prohibitions are not to be extended to the case of other younger women who have never been married, and are ready to devote themselves to the service of Christ and His Church, and to take a vow of celibacy.

(7) But to this it may be said, that in verse 14 he says νεωτέρας, younger women, and not τὰς νεωτέρας, the younger widows. See note there.

(8) Next, the Apostle had already considered the case of such younger women, who were desirous of devoting themselves to the service of Christ and of His Church, and who were recognized by the Church as such, and who were, in fact, the Deaconesses already mentioned by St. Paul, and concerning whom he had given precepts in chapter iii. 11 (where see note) in connexion with the office of Deacons.

(9) He does not say that these Deaconesses are to be required, invited, or permitted to take a vow of celibacy.

He says nothing on this head; but he enables others to infer his mind in this respect, as to the Deaconesses, from what he says as to the Deacons.

The Deacons are described as husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well (v. 12). St. Paul would not receive to the Diaconate those who have been married more than once. He does not, indeed, require marriage, but he does not impose celibacy.

This is his rule for young men who are to be ordained to the Diaconate.

We may thence gather, what his judgment was with regard to young women who are candidates for the office of Deaconess in the Church. He would not allow them to make a vow of celibacy, and he would not permit any to impose such a vow upon them.

Some reasons have been stated above for believing that Priscilla, the wife of Aquila, was a Deaconess of the Church. See on Acts xviii. 18.

One of the functions of Deaconesses would probably be to be assistants to the Presbyters in the Baptism of Women; and married women or Widows would be most eligible for this function of the Deaconess; while unmarried women would be preferable for other duties of the same office of Deaconess.

On the whole, on reviewing what the Apostle has said on the subject of Widows and Deaconesses, δὲ καὶ ἀργαὶ μανθάνουσι περιερχόμεναι τὰς οἰκίας, οὐ μόνον δὲ ἀργαὶ, ἀλλὰ καὶ φλύαροι καὶ περίεργοι, λαλοῦσαι τὰ μὴ δέοντα.

(1) We are led to admire the divine wisdom and foresight by which he was enabled to thread his way through its intricacies, and to provide cautions against the evils which afterwards arose in the Church in connexion with it; and to prescribe rules for her guidance in this important and difficult matter in succeeding generations. He has here supplied her with a solution of the difficulties which afterwards presented themselves.

(2) We may also be permitted to cherish a hope, that these Apostolic counsels may hereafter bear more abundant fruit than is now the case;

The offices of the Deaconess and of the Widow are here commended by the Holy Spirit to the reverent regard and affectionate use of the Church.

It is much to be regretted, that these offices have fallen almost into desuetude, by reason of the human corruptions by which the divine counsels of the Apostle have been marred, especially from the imposition of vows of celibacy. The abuses by which these offices have been blemished, have entailed on the Church a forfeiture of the benefits derivable from the offices themselves.

(3) But it is the part of true Reformation, to separate the abuses of things, from the things themselves that are abused. And it would be a blessed work of Christian Charity, to restore the offices of Widow and Deaconess in the Church to their primitive simplicity; and so to engage the affections and sympathies, and to exercise the quiet piety and devout zeal of Christian women, old and young, in the service of Christ, in a regular and orderly manner, under the guidance of lawful Authority, and with its commission and benediction, according to the Apostolic model prescribed by the Holy Ghost.

13. Ἅμα δὲ καὶ ἀργαὶ μανθάνουσι] Moreover also being idle they are learners, running about from house to house. Here is an example of an oxymoron,—a common figure of speech with St. Paul. See on Rom. xii. 11.

These Widows profess to be learners in the school of Christ, which is a school of diligence and fruitfulness, and yet they are ἀργαὶ, idle and unprofitable, whereas the true Widow learns by labour, and is fruitful in good works. They profess to be learning their calling as Widows of the Church, in His service; but their life is a contradiction to their profession.

The emphasis is on the word μανθάνουσι,—they are learners and yet idle, and nothing but learners, and never taught. Idleness is their learning. Their scholarship is folly. Their industry is thriftless bustle and silly talk.

Many learned Interpreters render these words, "they learn to be idle;" and the construction is defended by Winer, § 45, p. 311, from Plato, Euthyd. 276, οἱ ἁμαθεῖς ἅρα σοφοὶ μανθάνουσι.

But it can hardly be said that they could learn to be idle; they were idle, and showed their idleness by what they did and said.

The word μανθάνω is often put absolutely in the New Testament. Thus Matt. xi. 29, μάθετε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ. 2 Tim. iii. 14, ἔμαθες, and is used in a similar sense in this Epistle, ii. 11, γυνὴ ἐν ἡσυχίᾳ μανθανέτω, 'let a woman be a learner in quietness and by quietness;' the very opposite of what is predicated of these widows who are idle, and yet always running about from house to house, doing nothing, and prating much (φλύαροι); not working (ἀργαὶ, ἀεργοὶ), and yet περὶ-εργοι, meddlers, busybodies. Cp. 2 Thess. iii. 11, μηδὲν ἐργαζομένους ἀλλὰ περιεργαζόμενοι.

The Christian Widow, says the Apostle, ought to be a learner of piety (μανθανέτω εὐσεβεῖν, v. 4); but these are silly women, ever learning (πάντοτε μανθάνουσαι), but never coming to the knowledge of the truth. 2 Tim. iii. 7.

— φλύαροι] 3 John 10, λόγοις πονηροῖς φλυαρῶν ἡμᾶς. The word is explained by λῆρῶν and μωρολογῶν in Hesych.

14. νεωτέρας] younger women generally, and younger widows particularly.

This is a general proposition arising from the particular case under consideration (as in v. 7), and is connected with what precedes by οὖν.

This proposition is to be compared with what St. Paul says, 1 Cor. vii. 8, 9. 26. 29, θέλω δὲ πάντας ἀνθρώπους εἶναι ὡς καὶ ἐμαυτόν . . . . λέγω δὲ τοῖς ἀγάμοις καὶ ταῖς χήραις, καλὸν αὐτοῖς ἐστὶν ἐὰν μείνωσιν ὡς κἀγώ.

But How, it may be asked, is that expression of the Apostle's will (θέλημα), that all were, like himself, unmarried, and his declaration there that it is good for them so to remain, consistent with what he says here, βούλομαι νεωτέρας γαμεῖν, I desire that younger women should marry?

The answer to this question seems to be,—

(1) In the former case, the Apostle uses the word θέλω, in the latter he says βούλομαι.

(2) These two words have different significations. The words θέλω, θέλημα, express his own personal inner will; that which his own Reason, enlightened by Grace, led him to choose as best in the abstract for the attainment of the end of man's existence, union with God, as the greatest good.

(3) But βούλομαι represents that which he desires relatively, taking into consideration all the external circumstances of the case; and what, after a careful survey of those circumstances, he deems to be most expedient, rebus sic stantibus, and considering mankind as they are in themselves, and the temptations from Satan, the world, and the flesh, by which they are beset; and what therefore he gives as his counsel, βούλευμα, and his βούλημα, or desire.

(4) His abstract θέλημα is for celibacy; but his relative βούλημα, in the case of younger women, is for Marriage.

(5) This conclusion is confirmed by what he says at the beginning of the chapter just referred to, 1 Cor. vii. 1: "It is good (καλὸν abstractedly) for a man not to touch a woman; but relatively, on account of the fornications which abound (διὰ τὰς πορνείας), let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband."

(6) Thus, while the Apostle maintains the dignity of the single state, with a view, where it is possible, to entire devotion of body and soul to the service of God (1 Cor. vii. 32. 34), he also, like a wise guide, carefully surveys the dangers of the road, and considers the infirmities of the traveller, and gives his directions accordingly.

This is well expressed by an ancient Bishop and Father of the Church, who had a high appreciation of the dignity of celibacy, as his writings show; but yet applies the word νεωτέρας to virgins as well as widows, and says: "His verbis intelligamus eas quas nubere voluit meliùs potuisse continere quàm nubere; sed melius nubere quàm retrò post Satanam ire, id est ab illo excellenti virginitatis vel viduitatis proposito in posteriora respiciendo cadere et interire." Augustine (de bono Viduitatis, c. 11). See also next note.

This precept may at first perhaps cause surprise.

But this word τεκνογονεῖν, as well as γαμεῖν, οἰκοδεσποτεῖν, are to be taken in connexion with their context; and are to be understood as containing a solemn warning against the deadly sins to which the illicit unions of which he speaks give occasions. Those unions were not γάμοι, Marriages, but Adulteries; and they had not their fruit in the birth and life of children, but were often attended with deliberate acts of abortion or infanticide. "Nam, quæ de adulterio concipiunt mulieres frequenter occidunt." Primasius.

The dark picture drawn by S. Hippolytus in his recently discovered work (as may be seen in "S. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome," p. 269), affords a striking illustration of the wisdom and truth of this Apostolic precept. This might well be called "a following of Satan," v. 15. A similar remark may be applied to οἰκοδεσποτεῖν.

15. ὀπίσω τοῦ Σατανᾶ] The younger widows followed after Satan by breaking their plighted troth to Christ; and other younger women did so by falling into temptations, against which a remedy and a safeguard has been provided by God in Holy Matrimony. See preceding note.

17. Οἱ καλῶς—πρεσβύτεροι] He now passes on to treat of the Discipline to be exercised towards Presbyters, and this subject is continued to the end of the chapter.

— διπλῆς τιμῆς] double pay. See Joseph Mede's Discourse, xix. p. 70—73; and Barrow's Consecration Sermon, xii. p. 177, ed. 1683. Blunt, on the Church History of the First Three Centuries, chap. ii. p. 28, and note above on Matt. xv. 4; and Occasional Sermons by the Editor, No. xxxviii.

18. Βοῦν ἀλοῶντα] the ox while treading out the corn. See 1 Cor. ix. 9.

— Ἄξιος ὁ ἐργάτης] Luke x. 7. It has been alleged here (e. g. by Wieseler, Chronol. p. 303, note), that St. Paul never applies the word Scripture to the New Testament, and that these words cannot be a quotation from St. Luke's Gospel.

This is a bold assertion.

St. Peter combines all St. Paul's Epistles with the Scriptures of the Old Testament; and says, "that unlearned and unstable men wrest them as they do the rest of the Scriptures," τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς (2 Pet. iii. 16), and therefore St. Peter regarded St. Paul's Epistles as an integral part of Scripture.

If St. Peter in his Epistle called St. Paul's Epistles Scripture, may not St. Paul in those Epistles have called some of the Four Gospels Scripture?

Especially, may not St. Paul have done so in his last Epistles?

Now it is almost certain that the present Epistle was one of St. Paul's last Epistles; and it is most probable, that St. Luke's Gospel had been published and circulated several years before the present Epistle was written (see on 2 Cor. viii. 18); and it is also certain, that St. Luke's Gospel was received and read as Holy Scripture as soon as it was written, and delivered to the Church. It is certain also, that St. Luke's Gospel contains the words here quoted by St. Paul, and introduced by him, together with a quotation from the Old Testament (Deut. xxv. 4), with the preamble by which St. Paul is accustomed to introduce quotations from Scripture, λέγει ἡ Γραφή. (Rom. iv. 3; ix. 17; x. 11; xi. 2. Gal. iv. 30.)

May we not therefore be permitted to believe, that St. Paul is here quoting from St. Luke's Gospel? and that by combining a quotation from that Gospel with a quotation from the Book of Deuteronomy, the Apostle purposely designed to teach the important truth, that the Gospels are inspired by God no less than the Books of Moses are; and that the Gospels are to be received as Scripture by all, as the Books of Moses were received by the ancient people of God, and by the Apostles and Evangelists, and by the Son of God Himself.

20. Τοὺς ἁμαρτάνοντας] Those Presbyters who sin and continue in sin, and are known to continue in sin; rebuke them before all.

This seems to be the meaning of the words. For,

(1) He does not say ἁμαρτόντας, but ἁμαρτάνοντας: and this present participle with the article prefixed expresses the character and habit. So ὁ πειράζων, ὁ βαπτίζων, οἱ στρατευόμενοι, ὁ κλέπτων, and other examples. See Winer, § 18, p. 99, and § 45, p. 316.

(2) He is speaking specially of Presbyters, whose sins, particularly in doctrine, are public and notorious. And this exposition is confirmed by the application of the word ἁμαρτίαι to them here, and in v. 24, and Tit. iii. 11, where he says of a heretical teacher, that he ἁμαρτάνει ὢν αὐτοκατάκριτος.

St. Paul, by the use of the word ἁμαρτάνω thus applied to unsound teaching, declares the moral guilt of false doctrine. Cp. Mark xvi. 16.

In his charge to the Ephesian Presbyters at Miletus, he had already delivered a solemn warning against the perverse doctrines which would manifest themselves among them after his own departure. (Acts xx. 29.) Cp. the words of Christ to the Angel of the Church of Ephesus. (Rev. ii. 4, 5.)

(3) Hence S. Augustine (Serm. 82), in considering the question propounded by some, how this precept concerning rebuke is to be reconciled with our Lord's command, Matt. xviii. 15—18, says,—"If our brother sins against us privately, he is to be rebuked privately; but if a man sins publicly, he is to be rebuked publicly;" "corripienda sunt secretiùs, quæ peccantur secretiùs; corripienda sunt coram omnibus, quæ peccantur coram omnibus;" and this is the case of unsound teaching. Cp. 2 Tim. iv. 2—4, where St. Paul uses the word ἔλεγξον with special reference to false teachers; and see note on v. 22.

21. Διαμαρτύρομαι] I solemnly protest and adjure thee. This charge concerns what precedes (v. 17—20), and also what follows to the end of the chapter, and marks the Apostle's deep sense of the solemn importance of the functions of the Episcopal Office, especially in the Ordinations to the Priesthood, and in the conduct of a Bishop to his Presbyters.

— ἐκλεκτῶν ἀγγέλων] the elect Angels. Those who have "kept their first estate." (Primas.) See above, 1 Tim. iii. 6, 7; and Bp. Bull's Sermon on the Office of Angels, i. p. 321.

This reference to the elect Angels has a special beauty and propriety in this solemn Apostolic Charge to the Bishop of Ephesus. Timothy was the Angel of that Church. (See Rev. i. 20; ii. 1.) If then Timothy desires to be a companion and fellow-worshipper for ever with the elect Angels in the Church glorified in heaven, let him do the work of a faithful Angel in his office in the Church militant upon earth.

Here also, in the use of this word Angel, may perhaps be another instance in which St. Paul's language in his Epistles to the Bishop of Ephesus seems to have a prelusive and prophetic connexion with that of the last Apostle and Evangelist who lived and died at Ephesus, and wrote his Gospel there, and ruled the Churches of Asia from his see in that city. See above on iv. 5.

— κατὰ πρόσκλισιν] by partiality; properly, by a bias towards. So Clemens R. (c. 21) speaks of ἀγάπη μὴ κατὰ πρόσκλισιν.

22. Χεῖρας τ. μ. ἐπιτίθει] lay hands suddenly on no one. In ordination. (Theodoret, Chrys., Primas.) And so Bp. Pearson (Minor Works, ii. p. 385): "Accepit Timotheus ab Apostolo auctoritatem exercendi censuras in totâ Ecclesiâ Ephesinâ. Peccantes coram omnibus argue; eademque auctoritas speciatim ad Presbyteros in officio continendos extendebatur, quæ eò nobis evidentior proponitur, quòd cum certâ limitatione proponitur; Adversus Presbyterum accusationem noli recipere nisi sub duobus vel tribus testibus (v. 19). Idem etiam de potestate sacros ordines conferendi observandum est, quæ ideò magis fit conspicua, quia cum cautione proponitur, Manus citò nemini imposueris, neque communicaveris alienis peccatis." And so the Church of England in her First Collect for the Ember Weeks.

— ἁμαρτίαις ἀλλοτρίαις] with other men's sins. See v. 29. If you admit them to Holy Orders, knowing them to be unfit, or if you neglect to rebuke them, you are a partaker of their sins.

Hence Christ imputes to the Angels of the Church of Ephesus, and of the other Churches of Asia, the unsoundness of doctrine, and other sins, which prevailed there. (Rev. ii. 4, 5. 14. 20.)

"Unumquemque Angelum uniuscujusque Ecclesiæ separatim alloquitur, et unicuique sua bona aut mala opera imputat." Bp. Pearson, ii. p. 387.

— Σεαυτὸν ἁγνὸν τήρει] keep thyself pure, in order that thou mayest be a pattern to others, especially to thy Presbyters (iv. 12), and mayest be able to exercise spiritual discipline over them, and others, with courage and a good conscience, and without being liable to the charge of committing the sins, which thou art bound to punish in others. And yet do not suppose, that this precept of purity is intended to oblige thee to a rigid and ascetic regimen, which may injure thy health, and incapacitate thee for the active discharge of thy episcopal duties. Therefore with this precept of purity the Apostle couples the following;—

— μηκέτι ὑδροπότει] be no longer an ὑδροπότης, a water-drinker: showing that hitherto Timothy had been such. Thus St. Paul bears testimony, and (as this Epistle was read in the Church), a public testimony, to the temperance of the Bishop of Ephesus. Cp. iii. 8.

Observe the prudent caution of the Apostle's language. He does not say μηκέτι ὕδωρ πῖνε, but μηκέτι ὑδροπότει: nor does he say οἶνον πῖνε, but οἴνῳ ὀλίγῳ χρῶ: nor does he say διὰ τὴν γαστέρα, but διὰ τὸν στόμαχόν σου. Cp. Libanius (Epist. 1378 apud Wetstein): πέπτωκε ἡμῖν ὁ στόμαχος ταῖς συνεχέσιν ὑδροποσίαις, τόνου δὲ στερηθεὶς τὰ σιτία διὰ τὴν ἀσθένειαν διαλύει. Plin. H. N. xxiii. 22, "Vino modico stomachus recreatur."

— τὰς πυκνάς σου ἀσθενείας] thy frequent infirmities, or sicknesses.

S. Gregory (Moral. in Evang. p. 1449. Hom. iv. in Matth.) suggests the inquiry, why St. Paul, who had restored Eutychus to life (Acts xx. 9), and had healed the sickness of the father of Publius, and others, at Malta (Acts xxviii. 8), did not preserve the health of his beloved son Timothy, who was his companion and coadjutor in preaching, and was placed by him as Bishop at Ephesus.

He observes that those miracles were done in the presence of unbelievers, and that miracles are a sign, not to those who believe, but to those who believe not (1 Cor. xiv. 22). "Ille foris per miraculum sanandus erat, qui interius vivus non erat, ut per hoc, quod exterior potestas ostenderet, hunc ad vitam interior virtus animaret. Ægrotanti autem fideli socio exhibenda foris signa non fuerunt, qui salubriter intus vivebat."

Bodily health was to be given miraculously to those who were sick in soul, in order that by the cure of the body, the soul might be saved also; but they who were sound in soul needed not a bodily cure; in their case, the sickness of the body might even promote the health of the soul.

Timothy was to be an example to others of Christian virtue, by patience in suffering, as well as by energy in action; and his zeal in the discharge of active duties would be more exemplary to others, and more fruitful in future glory to himself, because he was subject to frequent bodily infirmities.

Almighty God, in order to show His love and power in the body, healed men by means of St. Paul's handkerchiefs and aprons (Acts xix. 12). But also to show His love and power in the inner workings of divine grace in the soul, He left Paul's dear son in the faith to suffer bodily pain, and enabled him by His grace to win eternal glory by suffering.

He thus teaches all how they may be enabled to suffer; and that none should be staggered and perplexed when they see good men afflicted with severe physical sufferings.

For another reason of the mention of these infirmities by St. Paul, see note above on Phil. ii. 26.

24, 25. Τινῶν ἀνθρώπων—δύνανται] These two verses are connected with what precedes (v. 20. 22) concerning Timothy's Episcopal duties, particularly toward Presbyters.

Observe the indication of this connexion in the repetition of the word ἁμαρτία. See on v. 20. The Apostle had been speaking of Ordination, and of the guilt of partaking in other men's sins by too much facility in laying on of hands. Hence Timothy might be supposed to inquire of St. Paul, How am I to judge of other men's sins? And what, if I am not cognizant of them?

St. Paul, therefore, propounds a general proposition in reply, which is to be applied by Timothy to the special circumstances before him. Cp. v. 8. 14, where general principles are laid down for application in particular cases.

The sins of some men are manifest, going before them to the act of judging on your part (εἰς κρίσιν): so that you may readily discern what sort of men they are; and you may not admit to Ordination such persons as are thus self-condemned (αὐτοκατάκριτοι, Titus iii. 11).

Other men's sins are also evinced after trial. They will show themselves by trial. The office will show the man.

The conjunction καὶ indicates that Timothy will be able to discern them also. The former you must reject; the latter you must rebuke. Do not make yourself an accomplice in either, by carelessness in admitting the one to the Priesthood, or by connivance at the sins of the others who have been admitted by you to it.

So for the most part, Chrys., Theodoret, Severian (in Catenâ), and Œcumenius, and Theophylact expound the passage.

25. Ὡσαύτως] In like manner you may easily determine, in some cases, whether a man may be admitted by you to the Priesthood. His sound doctrine and good deeds will be manifest; they will speak for him before admission. And if his sound doctrine and good deeds are not manifest then, yet they will soon be proved by trial, after his admission to the office. If he is a faithful and zealous Priest, his doctrine and works cannot be hid.

Thus you may readily discern between the evil and the good, and exercise Discipline accordingly.

The reading of this passage is somewhat various in the MSS., but the varieties are of little importance, and do not affect the sense. Elz. has τὰ καλὰ ἔργα, and ἐστὶ and δύναται, but A, D, F, G have τὰ ἔργα τὰ καλὰ, and D, F, G have εἰσὶ, and A, D have δύνανται.

Ch. VI. 1. ἵνα μὴ τὸ ὄνομα τ. Θ.—βλασφημῆται] See Rom. ii. 24, and Clemens R. c. 47. St. Paul here combats and condemns that false teaching which, under colour of preaching the doctrines of Universal Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity in Christ, enlisted the passions of Slaves against Masters, and Subjects against their Rulers, and thus exposed the Name of God and the doctrine of the Gospel, to reproach and blasphemy from the Heathen, as if it were a Religion of Anarchy and Sedition, and ministered to man's evil appetites and love of lucre (v. 5), under the name of Piety and Godliness. We may compare what he says to Titus concerning those false teachers "subverting whole families by their doctrines for the sake of filthy lucre" (Titus i. 10, and see there ii. 10). On the historical results of the working of this false teaching in ancient and modern times, see Bp. Sanderson's Sermon, Vol. iii. p. 273, on 1 Pet. ii. 16, "As free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God."

These anarchical doctrines were a natural product of a diseased Judaism. The Jews, supposing themselves to be the favoured people of God, resented all secular rule as an usurpation on the prerogatives of Jehovah. See on Matt. xxii. 16—21. Luke xx. 22—25. Their Rabbis taught that it was a sinful thing to own any mortal master, and to be bond-servants to heathens. See Lightfoot on 1 Cor. vii. 23.

They might, therefore, in hatred to Christianity, maliciously pervert the doctrines of the Gospel to purposes congenial to their own notions; or they might, even unwittingly, so misunderstand and misinterpret them, as to render them hateful to Society, and subversive of civil government and of domestic peace. See below on Titus i. 10, 11.

The great Apostle had, therefore, a difficult task to perform, in vindicating and maintaining, on the one side, the great doctrine of Christian Liberty against some of the Judaizers; and in asserting and upholding the duty of Christian subjection, on the other hand, against those of the same class who abused the sacred name of Liberty into a plea for Licentiousness.

How beautifully does the divine wisdom, charity, and courage, with which the holy Apostle was endued, shine forth in the execution of this difficult work, in his Epistles!

In the Epistle to the Galatians he had pleaded the cause of Christian Liberty (see Gal. v. 1—13, and Note at the end of the Second Chapter). In his Epistle to the Corinthians he had defined the limits of its use (see on 1 Cor. vi. 12). In his later Epistles, he has guarded against its perversion. See his precepts to Slaves here, and Eph. vi. 5, and Col. iii. 22, and the Epistle to Philemon.

Masters) who take part in the mutual good offices (between Master and Slave), are believing, and beloved, that is, are brethren in Christ.

The word ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι is used here in its most proper sense. Persons who take hold of a weight (e. g. a piece of timber at its two extremities) with a view of helping one another in carrying it, are said respectively ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι. Thus Thucyd. ii. 61, τοῦ κοινοῦ τῆς σωτηρίας ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι, and Diodorus S. xviii. 9, ἀντιλαβέσθαι τῆς ἐλευθερίας.

The relative duty of Master and Slave is of this kind. It is to be borne by both parties. Each of the two takes hold of it at his own end, and, like the fruitful cluster of the grapes of Eshcol (Num. xiii. 23), it is to be carried on the shoulders of both. And, like that cluster, this burden is also a benefit (εὐεργεσία). St. Paul will not flatter Masters at the expense of their Slaves, nor Slaves at the expense of their Masters. Each is to be an εὐεργέτης, or benefactor, to the other. The Master owes food and wages to the Slave; the Slave owes faithful service to the Master.

The force and wisdom of this Apostolic teaching will be more evident and impressive, when it is borne in mind that these words of St. Paul, addressed to the Bishop of Ephesus, would be listened to by Masters and Slaves, gathered together in the Church, and hearing this Epistle publicly read in the religious congregations at Ephesus and other great cities of the world.

3. Εἴ τις ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖ] If any man, under colour of Christian Liberty, teaches otherwise, and exempts Slaves from obedience to their Masters, St. Paul, in holy indignation, inveighs against such a man, as one that is proud and knoweth nothing, but doteth about questions and strife of words. Bp. Sanderson, iii. 168, on 1 Tim. iv. 4, and cp. iii. pp. 275. 290.

3—5.] Compare the fragment of S. Irenæus (ed. Pfaffii, p. 1), ἔστι μὲν οὖν ἡ γνῶσις ἡ ἀληθινὴ ἡ κατὰ Χριστὸν σύνεσις, ἣν ὁ Παῦλος καλεῖ τὴν σοφίαν Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ τὴν ἀποκεκρυμμένην (1 Cor. ii. 7) ἣν ὁ ψυχικὸς ἄνθρωπος οὐ δέχεται (1 Cor. ii. 14), ὁ λόγος τοῦ σταυροῦ (1 Cor. i. 18) οὗ ἐάνπερ τις γεύσηται (Heb. vi. 4) οὐ μὴ παρελεύσεται ταῖς παραδιατριβαῖς καὶ λογομαχίαις τῶν τετυφωμένων καὶ φυσιουμένων.

5. διαπαρατριβαὶ κ.τ.λ.] continued janglings of men depraved in their mind; and, consequently, by an act of divine retribution, bereft of the truth. See on iv. 2.

The preposition διὰ in διαπαρατριβαὶ gives to the word the sense of obstinate continuance in strife. See Winer, § 16, p. 92. Elz. has παραδιατριβαὶ, but the reading in the text is authorized by A, D, F, G, I, and is received by Gb., Scholz., Lach., Tisch., Huther, Ellicott, Alford.

— νομιζόντων πορισμὸν εἶναι τὴν εὐσέβειαν] supposing that Godliness is a traffic for gain.

The false Teachers ingratiated themselves with Slaves, and other dependents, by flattering them, that because all men are equal and brethren in Christ, therefore they need not be subject to their Masters; or that, if they were subject, they had a claim to greater temporal advantages than they enjoyed; and thus they excited Slaves to disobedience, and made the profession of the Gospel to be a matter of secular traffic and worldly lucre.

St. Paul commands Masters to give to their Slaves what is just and equal (Col. iv. 1), but he also teaches Slaves this lesson: "if a man have food and raiment, let him be therewith content" (v. 8).

These passages seem to have been in the mind of Clement of Rome when he wrote (frag. iii.), μὴ ταρασσέτω τὴν καρδίαν ὑμῶν, ὅτι βλέπομεν τοὺς ἀδίκους πλουτοῦντας, καὶ στενοχωρουμένους τοὺς τοῦ Θεοῦ δούλους. Οὐδεὶς γὰρ δικαίων ταχὺν καρπὸν ἔλαβεν, ἀλλ' ἐκδέχεται αὐτόν· εἰ γὰρ τὸν μισθὸν τῶν δικαίων ὁ Θεὸς εὐθέως ἀπεδίδου, ἐμπορίαν ἂν ἠσκοῦμεν, καὶ οὐκ εὐσέβειαν, οὐ διὰ τὸ εὐσεβὲς ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸ κερδαλέον διώκοντες.

Compare the Epistle of the Bishops against Paul of Samosata in Euseb. vii. 30, ἡγούμενος πορισμὸν εἶναι τὴν θεοσέβειαν.

Elz. has ἀφίστασο τῶν τοιούτων after εὐσέβειαν, against the preponderance of the best authorities.

6. πορισμὸς μέγας κ.τ.λ.] Est quæstus magnus pietas. Quæstus est acquisitio lucri. Audite pauperes. Communem habetis divitibus mundum; commune cœlum. Sufficientiam quærite, plus nolite. Cætera gravant, non sublevant, onerant, non honorant. Augustine (Serm. 85).

Aug. and Vulg. render αὐτάρκεια by sufficientia, i. e. competency, and this is its sense in 2 Cor. ix. 8, but here it means that frame of mind which St. Paul describes as his own, Phil. iv. 11, ἔμαθον, ἐν οἷς εἰμὶ, αὐτάρκης εἶναι. See here v. 8, ἀρκεσθησόμεθα.

7. οὐδὲν γὰρ εἰσηνέγκαμεν] On this text see Augustine, Serm. 14 and Serm. 177.

— δῆλον] Omitted by A, F, G, and 17, and by Lach., Alf., but the preponderance of authority is in its favour, and it is received by Tisch.

The word δῆλον here seems to signify a manifest token. The fact, which we all know, that we brought no earthly wealth with us into this world, is a manifest token that we shall not be able to carry any thing out of it. Cp. Job i. 20. Ps. xlix. 17. Eccl. iv. 14.

St. Paul speaks of the ἀδηλότης of wealth, v. 11. It is uncertain, and yet by its very uncertainty it may certify us that we may not put our trust in it; for it soon leaves us, or we must soon leave it. We must have, therefore, some other stay—the treasure of heaven.

8. ἀρκεσθησόμεθα] Τοῖς ἐφοδίοις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀρκεσθησόμεθα. Clem. R. 2.

10. ῥίζα γὰρ πάντων τῶν κακῶν ἐ. ἡ φιλαργυρία] for the love of money is the root of all evil. Some learned Expositors and Critics would render ῥίζα a root, and not the root; and would qualify the assertion of the Apostle into a declaration that the love of money is a root from which all evil may come. But this dilution of the phrase does not seem requisite or admissible. St. Paul does not assert that evil may not arise from some other cause besides love of money. But he has before his eyes certain evils, which professed to spring from εὐσέβεια or godliness. He affirms, on the contrary, that the root of them all is sordid love of lucre. And as all writers are accustomed to do, he generalizes the proposition, and says that the love of money is the root of all evil—leaving it to the reader to apply the proposition specially to the evil before him.

Thus S. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, and Martyr, imitating this passage (ad Phil. 4), says, Ἀρχὴ πάντων τῶν χαλεπῶν φιλαργυρία· εἰδότες οὖν ὅτι οὐδὲν εἰσηνέγκαμεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ ἐξενεγκεῖν τι ἔχομεν . . . διὰ ὁδοποιήσωμεν ἑαυτοὺς πρῶτον πορεύεσθαι ἐν τῇ ἐντολῇ τοῦ Κυρίου. And even Heathen writers say, "Aviditas materia omnium malorum" (Ammian. Marcellin. xxxi. 4): ἡ φιλοχρηματία μήτηρ κακότητος ἁπάσης (Phocyl. 38. 41, ap. Athen. vii. p. 280). Wetstein. Cp. Juvenal, Sat. xiv. 173, "Inde ferè scelerum causse," &c Cp. Bp. Sanderson, i. 116; ii. p. 343.

Tertullian, quoting this passage (de Patient. 7), ascribes it to the Holy Spirit of God. "Cupiditatem omnium malorum radicem Spiritus Domini per Apostolum pronuntiavit."

— ἧς τινὲς ὀρεγόμενοι κ.τ.λ.] which certain persons reaching after and grasping at, strayed away from the right road of faith, and pierced themselves in different parts with many pangs.

As to the word περιπείρω, see examples in Wetstein, p. 350. It does not signify to pierce through, but to wound in different places, by the application (περί) of the person or thing to the object which inflicts the wound, as here; or by the impact of the instrument for wounding on the person or thing that is wounded. See the examples in Wetstein, p. 350, particularly Gregory Nyssen (contra Usurarios), τοῖς ἀγκίστροις τῶν τόκων ἑαυτοὺς περιπείροντας, and (contra Fornicarios) ὁ πόρνος αὐτὸς ἑαυτῷ τὸ τῆς ἀτιμίας περιπείρει βέλος.

But whence is the metaphor derived?

(1) It may have been taken from a traveller journeying along a road, and tempted by fruit which he sees, to quit the path, and make his way through brambles and briars, and to clutch at it; by which action he wounds himself. So the man who covets an evil covetousness (Hab. ii. 9) pierces himself with thorns, which are compared by our Lord to the riches, and cares, and pleasures of this life (Luke viii. 14). Cp. Chrysostom and Theophyl. here.

(2) It has indeed been said by some, that there is an incorrectness of expression here, inasmuch as love of money implies a desire, and no one can be said to reach after a desire.

(3) But to this it may be said, that φιλαργυρία does not so much mean a desire of money to be gotten (πλεονεξία), as a love of money already gained. It is rather avarice than covetousness. See Trench, Synonyms N. T. § xxiv.

The φιλαργυρία for which the Pharisees, who were most in esteem among the Apostle's fellow-countrymen, were proverbial (Luke xvi. 14), did not disqualify them for exercising a commanding influence, and for being, in the popular mind, patterns of sanctity, and objects of general admiration.

These sectaries, building on the temporal promises of the Ancient Law, made it an article of faith, that riches are a proof of divine approbation. Wealth was another name for Piety. Love of wealth was a Love of God's favour. Thus they sanctified Avarice.

They were φιλάργυροι, and were known to be φιλάργυροι, and were admired as such. Even their φιλαργυρία was an object of popular imitation. Covetousness was consecrated into a virtue, and appeared to be desirable as such.

In accordance with these statements, we find in the LXX Version of the Old Testament, that φιλαργυρία is represented as something which is an object of pursuit to men. Thus Jerem. viii. 10, πάντες φιλαργυρίαν ἀποδιώκουσι. And even πλεονεξία is described as something to which the heart may be inclined,—κλῖνον τὴν καρδίαν μου εἰς τὰ μαρτύριά σου, καὶ μὴ εἰς πλεονεξίαν.

And (4), perhaps the Genitive ἧς may be connected with ῥίζα, in the following manner.

Covetousness (says the Apostle) is the Root of all evil. It is represented by him as a Root. It is a Root which seems to many to promise much worldly pleasure, profit, and delight; a Root which attracts the eye, and is therefore an object of desire. It is a Root which men see growing by the wayside of life, which they quit the path to gather, and grasp at it, and in clutching it wound themselves.

It may therefore be asked,—Is there any such Root in nature which may have suggested this picture to the Apostle?

The traveller in Italy, Sicily, Greece, and Asia, will readily answer that there is. It is that of the prickly pear, which is in itself both Root and Fruit. It attracts by its appearance and by its sweetness; it appears to be a Root productive of gratification to the appetite, but when clutched by the hand of one eager to pluck it, he finds that it is fenced with prickles, and it wounds him with many thorns. It is thus described by Pliny, xxi. 17: "Est homini dulcis, mirumque è folio ejus radicem fieri, ac sic eam nasci." See also Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. i. 12; iv. 5. It is called by Linnæus "ficus Indica ramis radicantibus." Billerbeck, Flora Classica, p. 116. 248.

Covetousness is such a Root as this; it seems to bear the fruits of worldly joy and profit, but when it is grasped by one who leaves the path of faith in order to gather it, it pierces him with many sorrows; it is a Root of thorns and briars both to body and soul.

11. Σὺ δὲ, ὦ ἄνθρωπε τοῦ Θεοῦ—φεῦγε· δίωκε] He follows up the metaphor; fly from the allurements of covetousness, and keep the path of Faith (v. 10), and follow after Righteousness. Hunger after that, and thou shalt be filled. (Matt. v. 6.) Thou man of God, flee these things. Man of God! Thou hast been received into His family by His grace. Miserable indeed would it be, if the love of money kept thee down to earth, who criest to Him, Our Father which art in heaven! All earthly wealth is vile in comparison with Him. Thou art going on a journey to Him Who is thy Father, and Who dwells at thy Home. Use thy wealth as an inn, not as a mansion. Refresh thyself, and pass on. Love not the world, but love Him Who made it. Thou canst take nothing out of the world, but He can take thee to Himself. Thou, O man of God, therefore flee these things. Flee them as a foe. Pursue after Righteousness as a friend. This will make thee rich indeed. See Augustine, Serm. 177.

— πραϋπάθειαν] meekness of heart. So A, F, G, Scholz., Lach., Tisch., Huther, Ellicott, Alf.—Elz. πραΰτητα. The word is used by Ignatius, Trall. 8.

12. ἐπιλαβοῦ] lay hold of that fruit which grows in the path of Faith, which will not wound thy hand, but will feed thee with eternal joys,—the fruit of the Tree of Life. (Rev. xxii. 2.)

— τὴν καλὴν ὁμολογίαν] that good confession which thou madest before many witnesses at thy Baptism (Chrys., Theophyl.), when thou madest a public renunciation of the pomps of the world and the lusts of the flesh. Cp. 1 Pet. iii. 21. Heb. vi. 1. Tertullian (Coron. Mil. 3): "Aquam adituri contestamur nos renuntiare Diabolo, et pompæ, et angelis ejus." Cyprian (Ep. 81): "Sæculo renuntiavimus cùm baptizati sumus;" and Ep. 7. See also Hooker (V. lxiii). Bingham (xi. chap. vii.), where he applies this passage to the Renunciation at Baptism. Blunt (Early Church, p. 37).

13. τοῦ μαρτυρήσαντος—τὴν καλὴν ὁμολογίαν] Christ witnessed that good confession not by words only (John xviii. 36, 37; Matt. xxvii. 11), but by deeds, when He showed Himself to be the Saviour of the world, and died for it on the cross. As Theodoret says: "St. Paul calls the Salvation of the world the Good Confession of Christ, for He endured His Passion for it."

Christ when crucified by the power of Heathen Rome, Christ when dying on the cross, at the great city of Jerusalem, at the time of its great Festival the Passover, when two millions of people were present, witnessed that Good Confession, which has inspired, and will ever continue to inspire, the hearts of all Martyrs and Confessors with faith and courage, and peace and joy, even to the Day of His Second Advent to judge the world. He, the faithful Witness (Rev. i. 5; iii. 14), the glorious Protomartyr, the High Priest of our Profession (Heb. iii. 1), made that Good Confession, which gives power to all other Good Confessions, when He was baptized in the Baptism of His own Blood, which imparts divine efficacy to all other Baptisms administered in His Name.

The phrase μαρτυρεῖν ὁμολογίαν is similar to μαρτυρεῖν μαρτυρίαν, 1 John v. 10. Rev. i. 2.

14. τὴν ἐντολήν] The Commandment, of Faith and Duty, to which thou madest a vow of obedience at thy Baptism.

15. ὁ Βασιλεὺς—κυριευόντων] It is carefully to be observed, that in Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 16, this title is expressly ascribed to Christ: a proof of His consubstantiality and co-equality with the Father; and that Christ is the μόνος Δυνάστης,—the only Potentate, the everlasting Jehovah,—Who alone hath immortality.

17. ἐν τῷ νῦν αἰῶνι] rich in this present life. For Lazarus may become Dives, and Dives may become Lazarus in that life which is to come.

— τῷ Θεῷ] A, F, G omit τῷ ζῶντι, not received by Lach., Tisch., Huther, Ellicott, Alford; but ζῶντι is found in D, E, I, K, and in Origen, Chrys., Theodoret, and many Latin Fathers, Vulg. and Syriac, and it gives force to the sentence, "Let them not trust in what is fleeting, but in Him Who is Eternal."

17—19.] On this text see Bp. Andrewes' Sermons, Vol. v. p. 3.

19. ἀποθησαυρίζοντας—θεμέλιον καλόν] treasuring up a good foundation; a bold metaphor, but happily bespeaking by its very boldness that the act here described cannot be done on earth, but may be done in heaven. Here on earth men may lay up treasure, but that treasure has no foundation. He who builds any thing upon it builds on the sand. But they who are rich toward God, and lay up treasure in heaven, treasure up for themselves a good foundation for the future; and they will dwell hereafter in a house which God builds for them on that foundation which He permits them, when on earth, to lay up in heaven; if they build in faith on the merits and mercy of Christ. Cp. Augustine, Serm. 177.

Elz. has αἰωνίου for ὄντως, which is supported by the best authorities, and clearly intimates that this present life does not really deserve to be called Life (ζωή), but that there is a Life which is Life indeed.

20. τὴν παραθήκην] Cp. 2 Tim. i. 14, that precious deposit of sound Faith,—the Faith once for all delivered to the saints (Jude 3), which the great Householder has committed to thy trust. Guard that, hold it fast. See Rev. iii. 3.

A warning against those who either take from it or add to it. See on Acts xx. 27, where St. Paul declares to the Presbyters of Ephesus that he had declared to them "the whole counsel of God."

This is the choice jewel whereof the Lord Jesus Christ has made His Church the depository. Every man in the Church ought earnestly to contend for its maintenance. "O Timothee, depositum custodi." St. Paul more than once calleth upon Timothy to keep that which was committed to his trust. (1 Tim. vi. 20. 2 Tim. i. 14.) He meaneth it in respect of the Christian Faith, which he was bound to keep entire as it was delivered to him, at his peril, and as he would answer it at another Day. Bp. Sanderson (iii. 279). Cp. Tertullian, Præscr. Hær. 25.

— βεβήλους κενοφωνίας] iv. 7. 2 Tim. ii. 16.

— ἀντιθέσεις τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως] oppositions of the γνῶσις, or knowledge, falsely so called; that of the Judaizing teachers of Talmudical fables, and the so called mystic senses of the Cabala. See on i. 3, and Col. ii. 18, 19; and Tit. i. 14; iii. 9; and Buxtorf, in v. קבלה.

S. Irenæus (ii. 14) applies these words also to the heretical teaching of the Gnostics; and so Chrys., Theodoret, and Theophyl. (who reckons the Nicolaitans among the Gnostics); and Œcum.; and so Hammond, and other later Expositors. And since the Gnostic speculations were in some respect an upgrowth from a corrupt Judaism, this application may be admitted, especially since it must be remembered, that St. Paul was enabled by the Holy Ghost to discern future evils, and to pronounce warnings against them. (See on Col. ii. 19.) At the same time, it will be borne in mind that the schools of the Gnostics, properly so called, belong to an age subsequent to this Epistle.

This precept has also a wider application. "The nature of such Controversies (says Lord Bacon), where the matter in dispute is great, but is driven to an over great subtlety and obscurity, is excellently expressed by St. Paul in the warning and precept that he giveth concerning the same: 'Devita profanas vocum novitates, et oppositiones falsi nominis scientiæ.'—'Men create oppositions which are not, and put them into new terms, so fixed, as, whereas the meaning ought to govern the term, the term in effect governeth the meaning.'" Lord Bacon (Essay iii. on Unity in Religion).

Πρὸς Τίτον] So A, D, E, F, G, K. Concerning the date and design of this Epistle, see above, Introduction, p. 421—3; and concerning the personal history of Titus, see below on v. 4.

Ch. I. 1. δοῦλος Θεοῦ] a servant of God. On all other occasions St. Paul calls himself δοῦλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ,—an evidence, as Ellicott observes, of the genuineness of this Epistle.

Perhaps he adopts this title, servant of God, in this Epistle, where he inveighs so strongly against the Judaizers (i. 10; ii. 9), who, on the plea of being servants of God, subverted the foundations of obedience to men, and so exposed the name of God to blasphemy (see on 1 Tim. vi. 1), and in order that he might declare more fully the principle of the Gospel, that service to lawful superiors is service to God.

— ἀπόστολος] See on 1 Tim. i. 1.

— κατὰ πίστιν] with a view to the faith of the elect of God,—that is (as Theodoret and Theophyl. explain it), in order that by my Apostleship the elect of God may believe and know the truth, which is according to godliness. Cp. Rom. i. 5; and on this use of κατὰ see Winer, § 49. 62, p. 356. 499; and note above on Acts xxvii. 12.

— ἐκλεκτῶν Θεοῦ] the elect of God. See on Rom. viii. 33.

2. πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων] before all time, and therefore anterior to the Levitical Law. An answer to Jewish objectors, who alleged that the Gospel was a new doctrine.

He calls these times aiwnious, because there was no such thing as Time before them. See Augustine's disquisition on the word αἰώνιος, "Ad Orosium contra Priscillianistas et Origenistas," Vol. viii. 941.

3. ἐφανέρωσε] See 1 Tim. iii. 16, and the next note but one.

— καιροῖς ἰδίοις] See on Eph. i. 10. 1 Tim. ii. 6.

— τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ] His Word,—namely, His co-eternal Son. Jerome, and (it seems) Theodoret and Œcumen.; so also Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xii. 16), "Ipsum Ejus Verbum co-æternum."

It is indeed alleged by most modern Expositors, that neither here nor in any other passage of Holy Scripture, is the Second Person of the Ever Blessed Trinity called ὁ Λόγος, the Word, or Λόγος Θεοῦ, the Word of God, except in the writings of St. John.

But this assertion seems to have been made too hastily. It is certain, that the phrase, the Word of God, in this sense, was not invented by St. John, but was applied to the Messiah, in the Chaldee Paraphrases of the Old Testament, long before any of the Gospels were written. See the authorities quoted above on John i. 1.

Indeed, 'the Word of God' was a title already prepared and consecrated by the ancient Church of God for Evangelical use.

It is therefore evident, that the title 'Word of God' might be, and very probably would be, used by St. Paul, who was very conversant with the Rabbinical writers; and that it might be, and probably would be, claimed by him for Christ,—especially in his controversies with Jewish Teachers. See above on Heb. iv. 12.

We should therefore expect to find it occurring in such Epistles of St. Paul as those to the Ephesians, Timothy, and Titus, and to the Hebrews, in which the Apostle is arguing against Judaizers, who disparaged the divine dignity of Christ, and in which he dwells specially on the great Mystery of the Incarnation of the Everlasting Word of God.

It has been said, indeed, that St. John in his Gospel calls Christ "the Word," but does not call Him the "Word of God."

This is true; but in the Apocalypse St. John expressly declares that "His Name is called the Word of God" (Rev. xix. 13); and he never calls Him there the Word, as he does in his Gospel (John i. 14); and in his first Epistle he calls Him the Word of Life (1 John i. 1).

These circumstantial variations in St. John's own usage, grounded on essential unity of doctrine, afford sufficient evidence that there might also be some slight differences in expression between him and other Writers of Holy Scripture in this respect, and yet unity of substance.

It certainly is a novel assumption, one at variance with the faith and teaching of ancient Christendom, but one which has been very confidently propounded in modern times, that the title "Word of God" is never ascribed to Christ by any Writer of Holy Scripture except St. John.

If this theory is erroneous, it is a very pernicious one. It has an evident tendency to subserve the purposes of those who take low views of the character and office of the Writers of Holy Scripture.

All parts of Scripture, from Genesis to Revelation, are dictated by One Spirit. They form one Book. The persons, by whose instrumentality they were penned, lived in different ages and countries, but He Who wrote by them is One, and ever the Same.

The disposition, too prevalent in modern times, to regard the Writers of Holy Scripture as independent, isolated individuals, and to represent them as speaking severally a different phraseology, and as teaching different doctrines, or similar doctrines with dissimilar phases, cannot fail to lead the popular mind to regard the Doctrine of Holy Scripture as not objectively the same, but as subjectively modified by the peculiar temperaments and personal idiosyncracies of men.

It tends also to degrade the Writers themselves from their high station, "as holy men of God moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. i. 21), to individuals actuated by their own private imaginations; and to reduce them from their proper dignity of Prophets, Evangelists, and Apostles, to the lower level of ordinary men.

If these theories of modern Exegesis are applied to the critical exposition of the Text of the written Word, and even to the philological treatment of the Titles of the Incarnate Word, it is evident that Christ Himself may be deprived (as far as human power can rob Him) of some of His divine prerogatives, and that Christendom may be despoiled of some of the most precious treasures of its sacred inheritance.

Let it therefore be referred to the learned reader's consideration, whether it be true that Christ is never called "the Word" by any Writers of Scripture but St. John.

Let him examine the following texts:—

(1) Luke i. 2, see note, "Eye-witnesses and Ministers of the Word." Does not "the Word" here bespeak a Person? and what Person but Christ?

(2) Acts xx. 32, St. Paul's farewell benediction to the Elders of Ephesus, "I commit you to God, and to the Word of His Grace, Who (viz. His Word) is able to build you up, and give you an inheritance among all that are sanctified."

A mere abstract thing cannot build up, and give an eternal inheritance, but a Person can build us up; and there is One Person Who can do this, and can give us an everlasting inheritance in heaven, and that Person is Christ, the Incarnate Word.

This Benediction is the more remarkable as addressed to the Presbyters of Ephesus, a Church which St. Paul had founded, and to which he had preached for three years, and to which he wrote fully in his Epistle, as already instructed in the great doctrine of the Incarnation of the Eternal Word (Eph. i. 3—14. 23; iii. 19), and which was committed to the care of Timothy, and was afterwards governed by St. John. And that Church would see something very appropriate and convincing in the fact that the same title was given to Christ by the two Apostles, St. Paul and St. John. See above on 1 Tim. iv. 5.

(3) Heb. iv. 12, a very remarkable passage. See note there.

(4) 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5. Every Creature of God is good, for it is sanctified by the Word; a declaration from St. Paul to the Bishop of the same Church Ephesus, Timothy, and to the Ephesian Church itself, that the creatures of God are now sanctified to the free use of the faithful, and that they are sanctified by the Incarnation of the Word of God. See note there.

(5) Tit. i. 3, the present passage, Ἐφανέρωσε δὲ καιροῖς ἰδίοις τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ, i. e. "He manifested, in His own appointed season, His Word."

What is made manifest (φανεροῦται) must be pre-existing, in order to be manifested. And if by "Word" here we merely understand with modern interpreters the Gospel, we have, it would seem, a feeble tautology,—He manifested forth a manifestation.

And this tautology seems to become still more insipid, when we connect it with what follows, viz. ἐν κηρύγματι, in the Gospel preached. See note on 1 Cor. i. 21.

But if with S. Jerome, Augustine, and other earlier Expositors, we understand by Λόγος a Person pre-existent from eternity, the Co-eternal Word of God, we gain a full and forcible declaration in entire harmony with the context, and very appropriate as an introduction to this Epistle, where the Apostle is contending against the erroneous doctrines of the Rabbinical Teachers, who were familiar with the phrase 'Word of God' as applied to the Messiah (see on John i. 1), and who required to be taught that this title was due to Jesus Christ, and to Him alone.

In confirmation of this Exposition we may remark, that the word ἐφανέρωσε, here used, 'He manifested,' is specially applied, and, as it were, consecrated, by the Writers of Holy Scripture, to describe the Manifestation of the Godhead in the Incarnation of Christ.

Thus St. Paul says of the Eternal Son, that He was manifested in the flesh, ὃς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκί (1 Tim. iii. 16). Thus also St. John, speaking of the Incarnation, says, ἡ ζωὴ ἐφανερώθη, 'the Life was made manifest' (1 John i. 2. Cp. 1 John iii. 5). Thus also St. Peter, speaking of the same Divine Person, says, ἀμνοῦ ἀμώμου Χριστοῦ προεγνωσμένου μὲν καταβολῆς κόσμου φανερωθέντος δὲ ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν χρόνων δι' ὑμᾶς (1 Pet. i. 20). So also S. Ignatius (ad Magnes. in 8), ἐφανέρωσεν ἑαυτὸν διὰ Χριστοῦ, υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ ὅς ἐστι Λόγος αὐτοῦ ἀΐδιος. See note on 1 Tim. iii. 16.

(6) James i. 18, ἀπεκύησεν ἡμᾶς λόγῳ ἀληθείας, 'He begat us by the Word of Truth;' a passage which may be compared with 1 John i. 1, τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς, said of Christ, and with 1 Pet. i. 23, where St. Peter is speaking of our Regeneration, "We were born anew (he says) not from corruptible seed, but through the Word of the Living God."

In both these passages the work of Regeneration is ascribed to the Word of God.

It is certain, that our Baptismal New-Birth is a consequence of the Incarnation of the Eternal Λόγος, without which, as far as we know, it would never have been effected, and of our engrafting into the mystical Body of Christ. And it is so described by St. John (i. 11—14), and by St. Paul (Col. ii. 9—12).

Further; the remarkable word πλήρωμα, signifying the absolute fulness of the Godhead in Christ, the Co-eternal Word, and the communication of that fulness to mankind by the Incarnation of the Word, is employed alike by St. Paul (Col. i. 19; ii. 9. Eph. iv. 13), and by St. John (i. 16). Why not the word Λόγος also?

In the language of the Apostle of the Gentiles, especially in his Epistle to the Ephesians, and in his Epistle to the Bishop of Ephesus, we may recognize that teaching concerning the Incarnation which prepared the way for the last Evangelist, St. John, writing at Ephesus, and enabled him to break forth, without any fear of not being understood, in that divine preamble to his Gospel, "In the beginning was the Word."

4. Τίτῳ] On the history of Titus, a Gentile by extraction, and associated with St. Paul at Antioch, the Metropolis of Gentile Christianity, as his companion to the Council of Jerusalem (see Gal. ii. 1—3), and afterwards employed by him in missions to Greece, especially Corinth, see 2 Cor. ii. 12; vii. 6. 13, 14; xii. 18; and in the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem, see 2 Cor. viii. 16. 23; xii. 18. He appears to have been placed in Crete by St. Paul soon after his liberation from his first Roman imprisonment, and to have been with St. Paul in his second imprisonment at Rome, and to have been sent by him to Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10), which he had probably visited with St. Paul when the Apostle went to Illyricum. Acts xx. 2. Rom. xv. 19. 2 Cor. ii. 13.

On the non-occurrence of his name in the Acts of the Apostles, see on 2 Cor. viii. 18.

On his subsequent history, see the encomiastic oration of one of his successors, Andreas Cretensis, p. 155 (in Amphilochii Opera, ed. Paris, 1640), εἰς πανεύφημον τοῦ Χριστοῦ Ἀπόστολον (on St. Titus' Day, Aug. 24, among the Greeks; Jan. 4, among the Latins), in which he calls him, p. 166, τὸ θεόκτιστον τῆς Κρητῶν Ἐκκλησίας προπύργιον. Cp. Tillemont, Mémoires, p. 64, and notes.

5. ἀπέλιπον] So A, C, D, F, G, Lach., Tisch., Ellicott, Alf. —Elz. κατέλιπον.

— ἐν Κρήτῃ—ὡς ἐγὼ σοὶ διεταξάμην] Cp. the similar words of St. Paul to the Bishop of Ephesus, 1 Tim. i. 3. He takes care that it shall be known, that Timothy and Titus had not appointed themselves to their respective Sees, but had received an Apostolic Commission from him.

On the Episcopal office of Titus in Crete, see Euseb. iii. 4, and Chrys. here, and note above, v. 4. The local tradition in Crete is, that his residence was at Gortys, and that he died in that Island at the age of ninety-four. (Tillemont, ii. p. 64.) The Cathedral Church of the Island is dedicated to him.

— ἵνα τὰ λείποντα ἐπιδιορθώσῃ] that thou mightest set in order in addition the things that are wanting. A proof of the Apostolic authority committed to Titus. He, as Bishop of Crete, had been appointed by St. Paul to succeed in the discharge of the ordinary functions of his office in the place of the Apostle Paul, and to supply what was left incomplete by him. "Reliquit Titum Cretæ Paulus, ut rudimenta nascentis Ecclesiæ confirmaret; 'ut ea quæ deerant corrigeret.' Omne autem quod corrigitur imperfectum est. Et, in Græco, præpositionis adjectio, quâ scribitur ἐπι-διορθώσῃς, non id ipsum sonat quod διορθώσῃς corrigeres, sed super-corrigeres; ut quæ à me correcta sunt, nedum ad plenam veri lineam retracta, à te corrigantur et normam æqualitatis accipiant." Jerome.

This could not have been said to a Presbyter. And one of the things which Titus is commanded to perform, in his successive and supplementary character, is to ordain and to govern Presbyters. (v. 5; ii. 15.)

It may therefore be said, in the words of a learned English Prelate, "Titus and Timothy were charged by Paul to 'require and command' the pastors and preachers to refrain from false doctrine, and 'to stop their mouths' or 'reject' them that did otherwise; 'to ordain elders' according to the necessity of the places, and 'receive accusations against them;' and 'sharply' and 'openly to rebuke' them if they sinned, and that 'with all authority.' (1 Tim. i. 3. Tit. i. 11; iii. 10; i. 5. 13. 1 Tim. v. 19, 20. Tit. ii. 15.) These things the Apostle earnestly requireth, and, before Christ and His elect angels, chargeth Timothy and Titus to do. It is, then, evident they might so do: for how vain and frivolous were all those protestations made by St. Paul, if Timothy and Titus had only voices amongst the rest, and nothing to do but as the rest!" *Bp. — μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἀνήρ] See on 1 Tim. iii. 2.

7. Δεῖ γὰρ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον—εἶναι] For he who has the oversight of others ought to be, &c. St. Paul is giving directions to Titus, the Chief Pastor of Crete, concerning the qualifications of those who are to be ordained Presbyters in every city by him. The persons who, on account of their age and dignity, are called Presbyters, are here called Episcopi, in relation to the flock, of which they had the oversight. See Theodoret here, and the Preliminary Note above on 1 Tim. iii.

These Presbyters of Crete are called Episcopi; but there was one person set over them by St. Paul as their Overseer, namely, Titus. He is not called Presbyter or Episcopus by St. Paul; he is commanded by the Apostle to ordain and rule Presbyters, and to set them as spiritual Overseers over their pastoral charges in the several cities of Crete.

It would be of no use to dispute about the name by which Titus himself, and such as Titus, who were entrusted by the Apostles with the ordination and government of Presbyters, were called. The fact is certain, that Titus and Timothy were placed by St. Paul at Crete and Ephesus, and were invested with chief spiritual authority over Presbyters, Deacons, and People; and that in this respect they stood in the place of the Apostle St. Paul himself in their respective spheres. (See v. 5.) And ever since that time, those persons, who have been and now are thus lawfully placed as Chief Pastors in their several Dioceses, are the proper successors of the Apostles. And it certainly ought not to be made a matter of complaint against them, but the contrary, that they have not arrogated to themselves the name of Apostles, but are content with a humbler title, that of Episcopi, which is indeed very expressive of their duties, inasmuch as they have the oversight of Christ's flock, both Clergy and Laity, but was originally applied by the Apostles to the second order of Ministers in the Church.

The universal consent of the Church, in and from Apostolic times, in the acknowledgment of Episcopal Government, and the universal establishment of that Government in all parts of the world, are facts which cannot be gainsaid; and they afford the best practical exposition of the language of St. Paul on the subject of Church Government, in this Epistle, and in the Epistle to Timothy.

The argument in this respect has been stated, with his usual clearness and vigour, by Dr. Barrow, as follows: "The primitive general use of Christians most effectually doth back the Scripture, and interpret it in favour of this distinction of Episcopal Government. For how otherwise is it imaginable, that all the Churches founded by the Apostles in several most distant and disjoined places (at Jerusalem, at Antioch, at Alexandria, at Ephesus, at Corinth, at Rome) should presently conspire in acknowledgment and use of it? How could it without apparent confederacy be formed? Could it be admitted without considerable opposition, if it were not in the foundation of those Churches laid by the Apostles? How is it likely that in those times of grievous persecution falling chiefly upon the Bishops (when to be eminent among Christians yielded slender reward, and exposed to extreme hazard; when to seek pre-eminence was in effect to court danger and trouble, torture and ruin), an ambition of irregularly advancing themselves above their brethren should so generally prevail among the ablest and best Christians? How could those famous Martyrs for the Christian truth be some of them so unconscionable as to affect, others so irresolute as to yield to, such injurious encroachments? and how could all the holy Fathers (persons of so renowned, so approved wisdom and integrity) be so blind as not to discern such a corruption, or so bad as to abet it? How, indeed, could all God's Church be so weak as to consent in judgment, so base as to comply in practice with it? In fine, how can we conceive, that all the best monuments of antiquity down from the beginning (the Acts, the Epistles, the Histories, the Commentaries, the writings of all sorts coming from the blessed Martyrs and most holy Confessors of our faith), should conspire to abuse us? the which do speak nothing but Bishops; long Catalogues and rows of Bishops succeeding in this and that city; Bishops contesting for the faith against Pagan Idolaters, and Heretical corrupters of Christian doctrine; Bishops here teaching, and planting our religion by their labours, there suffering, and watering it with their blood?" Barrow (Works, London, 1686. Folio. Serm. xxiv. Vol. iii. p. 273). See also Bp. Pearson (Minor Works, i. pp. 271—286).

It may be concluded, therefore, from Holy Scripture, and from the universal practice of the Church of Christ, from its foundation for more than fifteen hundred years without interruption, that Church-Government by Bishops is of divine institution. "Exitus variâsse debuerat error. 12. ἴδιος αὐτῶν προφήτης] a prophet of their own, counted as such by themselves,—Epimenides, a priest and poet (vates) of Crete. See Augustine, contra Adversarium Legis, ii. 13.

On the use of the word Prophetes in this sense, see Varro, L. L. vi. 3. 10. Epimenides, who visited Athens about A.D. 596, is described by Plutarch (Solon, p. 84) as θεοφιλὴς καὶ σοφὸς περὶ τὰ θεῖα, τὴν ἐνθουσιαστικὴν καὶ τελετικὴν σοφίαν. Wetstein.

— Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται] The Cretans are always liars. This verse is from the χρησμοὶ of Epimenides. (Jerome.) The first half of it was adopted by Callimachus (Hymn. Jov. 4), alleging as a proof of their mendacity that they claimed to have in their island the grave of Jupiter, the king of gods! Chrys.

This popular boast of the Cretans, mentioned by St. Paul's countryman Callimachus, is a striking proof of the tendency of Heathenism and Idolatry to propagate falsehood, and to do the work of the Father of Lies. No wonder, that the Apostle here speaks as he does of the false and treacherous character of the inhabitants of Crete, which had become proverbial. See the authorities in Wetstein, p. 370; and Koray's Atakta, ii. p. 304.

On St. Paul's citations from Heathen Poets, even from an Heathen Altar, see Chrys. here, and notes on Acts xvii. 23. 28, and 1 Cor. xv. 33.

The Apostle St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, declares to the Jews their guilt, and consequent need of Repentance and of a Redeemer,—not on his own authority, but by quotations from their own Prophets (Rom. iii. 10—15), against whose testimony they could make no exception. So he here adduces against the Cretans the witness of one whom they regarded with reverence as a Prophet of their own, and who also was held in universal estimation by the Gentile World, Epimenides,—a proof of his prudence and wisdom in administering rebuke.

Not less observable is the evidence thence derivable of St. Paul's confidence in his own divine mission, and in that of Titus, set as Bishop by him over the people of Crete.

What impostor would have dared to use such strong language as this concerning that Nation, to whom he sent a spiritual Envoy, in order that he might reside among them and govern them? If St. Paul had been a mere secular Teacher, he would have perhaps quoted some smooth saying to flatter the national vanity of the Cretans; and he would not have cited this verse of Epimenides. But he was armed with divine power, and God gave similar gifts to Titus by his means. God had not given him the spirit of fear, but of power and of love, and of a sound mind.

The design of this severe censure is stated in v. 13. The moral disease of the Cretans is discovered and probed to the quick, "in order that they may be sound in the faith," and be rescued from the errors of those false teachers who would destroy them, by smooth speeches, in body and soul (vv. 13, 14; ii. 1).

Observe also the result. This Epistle, in which this severe censure is contained, has ever been received and read in the Churches of Christendom as a part of Holy Scripture. It was doubtless read in the Churches of Crete itself; and Titus, to whom it is addressed, is at this day honoured there as the Apostle of Crete. (Cp. on v. 4.)

These results would never have been produced, if the Cretans had not been convinced of the inspiration of St. Paul, and of the Apostolic Mission of St. Titus.

On this important topic compare note on Gal. iii. I, ὦ ἀνόητοι Γαλάται.

Yet this wise speech, so fruitful in profitable teaching, is now denounced by some critics as "eine harte und ungerechte Bestätigung!" De Wette, p. 10.

— κακὰ θηρία] evil beasts, on account of their savage disposition. Joseph. A. xvii. 5. 5. Cp. the proverb, Κρῆτες, Καπρὰ δοκες, Κίλικες, τρία κάπρα κάκιστα. On the words θηρίον and bestia applied to persons, see Wetstein.

— γαστέρες ἀργαί] sluggish bellies: that is, given up to sloth and gluttony. "Vivite lurcones, comedones, vivite ventres." Lucilius.

A barren soil for a Christian Bishop to cultivate! The Apostle does not conceal its untractable character from him whom he has appointed to break it up, and to bring it, by Christian tillage, into spiritual fertility. Another proof of his godly sincerity and courage.

14. Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις] See on 1 Tim. i. 4; iv. 7; and Ignatius (ad Magnes. 8), μὴ πλανᾶσθε μυθεύμασιν τοῖς παλαιοῖς, ἀνωφελέσιν οὖσιν· εἰ γὰρ κατὰ Ἰουδαϊσμὸν ζῶμεν, ὁμολογοῦμεν χάριν μὴ εἰληφέναι.

— ἐντολαῖς] human ordinances concerning abstinence from certain meats as unclean, and other ceremonial matters. See Eph. ii. 15, and Col. ii. 21—23.

15. Πάντα (Elz. μὲν) καθαρὰ τοῖς καθαροῖς κ.τ.λ.] To the clean all things are clean; viz. all creatures, because created good by a good God, and because blessed by Him, and sanctified by Christ, and because restored to man for his free use by Him. But to those persons who are not sanctified by spiritual indwelling in the mystical body of Christ, and by faith in the Incarnation of Him Who is the Eternal Word, but are defiled by evil lusts which war against the soul, all things are unclean.

See above on 1 Tim. iv. 4; and Augustine contra Faustum Manichæum, xxxi. 4; and Bp. Sanderson, quoted above, on 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23.

— ὁ νοῦς καὶ ἡ συνείδησις] their Mind and their Conscience. The word νοῦς, Mind (mens, μένος), has a very comprehensive sense in the New Testament, and signifies not only the Understanding and Reason, but also the Will and the Affections. See Rom. i. 28. Eph. iv. 17. 1 Tim. vi. 5; and the note in Mr. Ellicott's excellent edition of this Epistle.

The νοῦς, Mind, is clearly distinguished from the Conscience; e. g. in that it takes cognizance of external objects, and considers and reasons concerning the attributes and will of God, as revealed in Nature and Revelation; and according as it is rightly regulated or no, and is in a healthful or diseased condition, determines and governs the practice, and forms the habits of man. But the Conscience (as the word is used in the New Testament), ἡ συνείδησις, the Conscience, or moral sense, given to man by God, is His voice in the human heart, and does not necessarily suppose any active energy of the intellectual faculty, but pronounces, as it were, by a spiritual instinct or moral inspiration on the character of human actions, and often speaks most clearly, articulately, and powerfully, as in children and women, where the νοῦς, or reasoning faculty, may not be deliberately exercised. See Rom. ii. 15.

At the same time it is a necessary part of our moral discipline, to bring all the faculties of the νοῦς, or Mind, to bear upon the Conscience, and to inform and regulate it by the will of God. See above on Acts xxiii. 1.

The false teachers here mentioned are censured, not only as depraving their understanding and will, but as having desecrated and polluted, if we may so speak, that divine oracle, and moral Shechinah, which God Himself had enshrined in their heart, their Conscience. See on 1 Tim. iv. 2.

16. ὁμολογοῦσιν] they acknowledge, they own, that they know God; that they are not ignorant of the truth; and yet they practically deny it by their lives. As the Apostle says (Rom. i. 18), "they hold the truth in unrighteousness," and thus they sin wilfully against their own conscience.

The sense seems to have been misunderstood by some, on account of the ambiguity of the meaning of the word 'profess' in the English Version,—a word which is now more commonly employed in the sense of 'pretend.'

— βδελυκτοὶ—καὶ ἀπειθεῖς] On the tendency of the denial of the doctrine of the Incarnation to produce immoral practice, see on Col. ii. 22, 23.

— ἀδόκιμοι] reprobate. See Rom. i. 28. 2 Tim. iii. 8. Contrast with this sentence iii. 1, πρὸς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἑτοίμοι.

CH. II. 1. Σὺ δέ] However great may be the moral disease of the population of Crete, and however corrupt the teaching of these Judaizers (i. 10—16), do not thou be silent, but speak those things which beseem the wholesome doctrine. See on 1 Tim. i. 10; iv. 3.

2. πρεσβύτας] old men. See 1 Tim. v. 1. Philem. 9.

3. Πρεσβύτιδας] 1 Tim. v. 2.

— ἐν καταστήματι] in deportment. "Composito gressu, habitu, incessu," &c. "Incessus, motus, vultus, sermo, silentium, quandam decoris sacri præferant dignitatem." Jerome. Cp. Simplicius in Wetstein, p. 372, κατάστημα αὐτοῦ σεμνὸν, σταθερὸν, i. e. 'compositum.' S. Ignatius (ad Trall. 3) says of the Bishop of Tralles that his "very κατάστημα (deportment, carriage) was a sermon (μαθήτεια), and his very meekness was power"—like that of a late most reverend Primate of the Church of England in our own age.

— ἱεροπρεπεῖς] θεοπρεπεῖς (Hesych.), worshipful, 'augustæ'—'beseeming holiness'—a word applied by Plato, Xenophon, Josephus, and others, to characterize what is in accordance with the reverential solemnity and holy dignity of the public offices of religious worship. See Wetstein. Cp. 1 Tim. ii. 10. Eph. v. 3.

4. ἵνα σωφρονίζωσι] That they may be to them like their Σωφρονισταί, who were set over the youth of Athens to regulate and order their behaviour. (Etym. M.) The inculcation of the word σώφρων in this Epistle (i. 8; ii. 2. 5) intimates the character of those with whom Titus had to deal. A, F, G, H have σωφρονίζουσι here, in the Indicative mood, and so Lach., Tisch., Alf. But C, D, E, I, K have the conjunctive σωφρονίζωσι, and so Huther, De Wette, Bloomf., Ellicott. See above, note on Gal. iv. 17. 1 Cor. i. 31.

5. οἰκουρούς] keepers at home. And something more; viz. keepers of home. See Hesych. in v. οἰκουρία· ἡ κατ' οἶκον φυλακή.

The dignity and freedom given by Christianity (Gal. iii. 28) to the women of Greece, might easily be abused into an occasion of licence, and bring a reproach on the Gospel. Hence the greater importance of this precept—"that the word of God might not be evil spoken of."

7. τύπον] 1 Thess. i. 7. 2 Thess. iii. 9. 1 Tim. iv. 12. "Doctor aliorum debet esse instar conchæ, quæ priùs ipsa impletur, quàm in alios redundet." S. Bernard (Serm. 18, in Cantica. A Lapide).

— ἀφθορίαν] uncorruptness. So the major part of the best authorities. Elz. ἀδιαφθορίαν. Cp. Eph. vi. 24. Mill and Bloomf. add ἀφθαρσίαν after σεμνότητα, with D, G (perhaps), and I, K. Elz. has ὑμῶν for ἡμῶν.

9, 10. Δούλους] See i. 1, and 1 Tim. vi. 1.

11. Ἐπεφάνη] 'illuxit' (Jerome), or 'apparuit,' as a bright and glorious Light, suddenly gleaming on the world, which sat in darkness and the shadow of death.

— πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις] to all men; to Gentiles as well as Jews, to women as well as men, to slaves as well as to freemen.

13. τὴν μακαρίαν ἐλπίδα] the blessed Hope, laid up as a treasure in heaven, and one day to be fully enjoyed. See Col. i. 5.

— ἐπιφάνειαν τῆς δόξης] the manifestation of the Glory of Christ; coming to judgment with Power and Great Glory, and sitting on the Throne of His Glory. See Matt. xix. 28; xxiv. 30; xxv. 31. 2 Thess. i. 9; ii. 8.

— τοῦ μεγάλου Θεοῦ καὶ Σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ] of our Great God and Saviour Jesus Christ. So Theodoret, who says, "St. Paul here calls Christ the Great God; and thus rebukes the heretical blasphemy," which denies His Godhead. And Chrysostom here asks, "What can those persons say, who allege that the Son is inferior to the Father?" And Theophylact, "Let such men listen to the Apostle, who declares that the Son is God and Mighty;" and in his note on Phil. ii. 6, "Hear," he says, "Paul affirming that the Son is the Great God," and he then quotes this verse. So likewise S. Jerome, who says, "Our Saviour Jesus Christ is here called the Mighty God." And again, "Christus Jesus, Magnus Deus atque Salvator noster, redemit nos sanguine suo, ut sibi Christianum populum peculiarem faceret." So also Primasius here, "He calls Christ the Great God, concerning Whom the Angel said to Mary, He shall be Great." (Luke i. 32.)

Indeed there is a continuous chain of authorities, reaching from the Apostolic age to the present, showing that this text has been generally applied to God the Son by the best writers.

S. Ignatius (ad Ephes. i.) appears to have had it in his mind, and certainly expresses its sense, when he says, ἐν θελήματι Πατρὸς καὶ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν.

It was so understood by Clem. Alexand. (Cohort. ad Gentes, p. 7), where he says, that the manifestation here spoken of is the manifestation of the Divine Logos, God and Man.

It was so understood by S. Hippolytus, the disciple of S. Irenæus, and the Author of the Little Labyrinth in Euseb. v. 28, who says, ὁ γὰρ εὐσπλαγχνος Θεὸς καὶ Κύριος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς οὐκ ἐβουλεύετο. See Routh, Rel. Sacr. ii. p. 26. 151. So Athanasius, ad Adelphium i. p. 915, and in his Treatise on the Essence of the Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit, sect. 27, μέγας Θεὸς ἐκλήθη ὁ υἱός. And Cyril Hieros. (Catech. xv.) applies this manifestation also to Christ, coming to judgment. Other quotations to the same import from Epiphanius (adv. Hæres. p. 887), S. Basil (in Ps. i. and c. Eunom. iv. p. 294), and S. Gregory Nyssen (c. Eunom. x. p. 265), and from S. Chrysostom passim, may be seen in the late Dr. Wordsworth's Six Letters to Granville Sharp, pp. 66—84.

See also Dr. Routh, Reliq. Sacr. ii. 26, who observes that S. Cyprian, in the third century, often uses the title "Dominus et Deus noster Jesus Christus," and so other Bishops in the Third Council of Carthage, and the Synodic Epistle of the Council of Antioch (Euseb. vii. 30), and Didymus, the Master of S. Jerome (de Trin. iii. 2).

It is certain also, that the Apostle in other places ascribes to our Saviour the title of God. See Rom. ix. 5. Col. ii. 2. Heb. i. 8. Acts xx. 28. And it is probable that St. Paul had here in his mind the remarkable prophecy of Isaiah (ix. 6) where Christ is called "the Mighty God." Cp. below on Rev. xix. 17.

The word Ἐπιφάνεια, or Manifestation, here used, is employed by St. Paul in five other places in his Epistles, and in every one of them to describe the manifestation of Christ, and in four of them to designate the future Manifestation of His Coming to Judgment, as here. See 2 Thess. ii. 8. 1 Tim. vi. 14. 2 Tim. i. 10; iv. 1. 8.

On this text, see also the important remarks of Dr. Waterland, Moyer Lectures vi. Vol. ii. p. 129.

14. λαὸν περιούσιον] a peculiar people. So Clemens Rom. 58, ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ἐκλεξάμενος ἡμᾶς δι' αὐτοῦ (Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ) εἰς λαὸν περιούσιον. As S. Jerome observes here, this phrase is derived from the LXX, Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18. Exod. xix. 5; and is equivalent to the Hebrew סְגֻלָּה. Cp. Ps. cxxxv. 4. Eccles. ii. 8, where περιουσιασμὸς is used to signify a peculium, ἀπεριποίησις, 1 Pet. ii. 9. The words περιούσιος, περιποίησις mark something more than acquisition and possession: the preposition περὶ gives to these words an idea of speciality and superiority. Thus the Jews were a λαὸς περι-ούσιος, because they were chosen to be apart from, and above, all other people, in the distinctions of God's favour, a λαὸς ἐξαίρετος, as S. Jerome here explains the word. So those who are in Christ are a λαὸς περι-ούσιος, separate from, and superior to, those who do not receive and obey the Gospel.

— ζηλωτήν] σπουδαστήν, Hesych. Let us, therefore, not only do good works, but have zeal for the doing of them, rivalling one another, vying with one another, in doing them, and provoking one another to do them. Chrys. See below on iii. 8.

15. μετὰ πάσης ἐπιταγῆς] with all authority. A proof of the pre-eminence of Titus as Chief Pastor of Crete. See i. 5.

— μηδείς σου περιφρονείτω] Nolo te talem exhibeas, ut possis ab aliquo contemni. Nemo, te segniter agente, sic vivat, ut sese te putet esse meliorem; qualis enim ædificatio discipuli, si se intelligat magistro esse majorem? Jerome.

CH. III. 1. ἀρχαῖς καὶ ἐξουσίαις ὑποτάσσεσθαι] to submit themselves to rulers and authorities. Another proof of the Apostle's courage, truthfulness, and divine commission.

The Cretans were noted for their turbulence and unruliness, in which they were abetted and encouraged by the Jews and Judaizers of the islands (see on i. 10. 12), and they had now lost their independence, and were subject to a foreign rule, that of Rome, to which they were subjugated by Metellus Creticus, B.C. 67; and Crete was annexed to Cyrene as a Roman Province (Vell. Paterc. ii. 34. 38. Dio Cass. xxxvi. 2), under a Proprætor, with the title of Proconsul (Strabo, p. 840. Orelli, Inscr. 3658. Long, in Smith's Dict. p. 704).

Yet St. Paul charges Titus to inculcate loyalty to the authority of Rome, 1 Tim. ii. 1—3.

If the Apostle had been merely a secular teacher of human knowledge, or a champion of a human sect, and had not been endued with divine wisdom, he would not have ventured to inculcate these lessons of subordination to a foreign authority, now wielded by a Nero; but he would either have been silent on the subject, or, perhaps, have flattered the vanity and inflamed the passions of the Cretans, and have courted their favour, by following the example of those teachers, who excited them to throw off the yoke of Roman rule, and to recover their ancient Liberty.

A, C, D*, E*, F, G omit καὶ here: perhaps ἀρχαῖς may be a gloss.

— πρὸς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἑτοίμους] Quoted by Clement of Rome, 2.

2. ἐπιεικεῖς] equitable, fair, forbearing. See 1 Tim. iii. 3.

3. Ἦμεν γὰρ ποτὲ καὶ ἡμεῖς] for we also were formerly foolish. A modest reply from the Apostle to the censure of those who might condemn him as severe and uncharitable for speaking so sternly of the vices of the Cretans, and of the necessity of severe discipline in order to amend them. See i. 10—13; ii. 15.

Let not the Cretans imagine that we are thus arrogantly claiming any superiority to ourselves. We also once were what they now are; and our moral change is not due to ourselves, but to Divine Grace. Let them receive that, and then they will become what God's grace has made us to be. 1 Cor. xv. 10.

Thus the Apostle is led to speak of Regeneration, v. 4; and he opens out a glorious view, that of the New Birth of an entire Nation, and of the World.

4. ἡ χρηστότης] the kindness. See on Eph. ii. 7. These words are adopted by Justin Martyr, c. Tryphon. c. 47.

— ἐπεφάνη] beamed upon us. See ii. 11.

5. οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων τῶν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ] not by works (as a cause) wrought in righteousness, which (i. e. works) we did (antecedently to our adoption into Christ, and to which some men, i. e. the Judaizers, pretend, and on which they rely); but according to His own mercy He saved us.

He uses the article τῶν before δικαιοσύνῃ, because he is citing a phrase which others applied to themselves, but which he altogether repudiates in his own case.

When those false leaders were asked, What was their ground of hope of salvation, they would reply, τὰ ἔργα τὰ ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ ἃ ἐποιήσαμεν ἡμεῖς. But St. Paul would answer, Θεοῦ ἔλεος.

— ἔσωσεν ἡμᾶς] He saved us. As far as He is concerned, we are already saved; for He has done on His part all that was requisite for our salvation; and He has given us a good hope of salvation, if we persevere in the state of salvation in which He placed us at our Baptism. See above on Rom. viii. 24, 25. 30.

— διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας] by means of the laver of Regeneration. The merciful God delivered us from our former miseries by means of His only-begotten Son, having freely given us forgiveness of sins in the saving waters of Holy Baptism; and having created us again and formed us anew, and having vouchsafed us the gift of the Holy Ghost, and opened to us the path of Righteousness. Theodoret.

The same God Who created us originally has now created us anew. This is the grace and efficacy of Baptism. And as we consist of body and soul,—the one visible, the other invisible,—so Baptism consists of two things, viz. the Water and the Spirit, the one visible and received by our bodies, the other invisible and incorporeal, concurring with the former; the one typical, the other cleansing the inmost soul. Greg. Nazian. Orat. xl. p. 695.

On the doctrine of Regeneration in Baptism, see above on John iii. 5; and Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 61; Irenæus, iii. 17; v. 15; Tertullian, de Baptismo, 1. 20, and de Animâ, c. 20, "Nos in aquâ nascimur;" Theophyl. ad Autolyc. ii. 16, who imitates St. Paul's words, and says, that all men who resort to the Truth receive remission of sins "by water and the laver of Regeneration, and being born anew, and receiving a benediction from God." The following remarks on this text are from Dr. Waterland. A learned writer has well proved that the Greek and Latin Fathers not only used the word Regeneration for Baptism, but so appropriated it also to Baptism as to exclude any other conversion, or repentance, not considered with Baptism, from being signified by that name (Wall, Infant Baptism, Part i. xcv. pp. 22. 25. 28—30; Defence, pp. 12. 34. 41. 277. 318. 323. 327. 329. 333. 343; Append. pp. 4. 6. Comp. Archbishop Sharpe, Vol. iii. Græc. p. 1084. Bingham, xi. 1. 3, p. 462); so that, according to the ancients, Regeneration, or new birth, was either Baptism itself (including both sign and thing), or a change of man's spiritual state, considered as wrought by the Spirit in or through Baptism.

This new birth, this Regeneration, could be but once in a Christian's whole life, as Baptism could be but once; and as there could be no second Baptism, so there could be no second new-birth.

Regeneration, with respect to the regenerating agent, means the first admission; and with respect to the recipient, it means the first entrance into the Spiritual or Christian life. And there cannot be two first entrances or two admissions, any more than two spiritual lives, or two Baptisms.

The analogy which this new spiritual life bears to the natural, demonstrates the same thing. "Cùm ergo sint duæ nativitates—una est de terrâ, alia de cœlo; una est de carne, alia de spiritu; una est de mortalitate, alia de æternitate; una est de masculo et fœminâ, alia de Deo et Ecclesiâ. Sed ipsæ duæ singulæ sunt; nec illa potest repeti, nec illa. Jam natus sum de Adam, non me potest iterum generare Adam; jam natus sum de Christo, non me potest iterum generare Christus. Quomodo uterus non potest repeti, sic nec Baptismus." Augustin. in Johan. Tract. xi. p. 378, tom. iii. part 2, edit. Bened. Conf. Prosper. Sentent. 331, p. 246, apud Augustin. tom. x. in Append. Aquinas, Summ. part 3, qu. 66, art. 9, p. 150.

There are in all, three several lives belonging to every good Christian, and three Births, of course, thereto corresponding. Once he is born into the natural life, born of Adam; once he is born into the spiritual life, born of water and the Spirit; and once also into a life of glory, born of the Resurrection at the last day. Dr. Waterland (Regeneration stated and explained, Vol. vi. p. 346, on Titus iii. 5).

— καὶ ἀνακαινώσεως Πνεύματος ἁγίου] and by the Renovation of the Holy Spirit.

The παλιγγενεσία, or new Birth, just mentioned by the Apostle, takes place once in the laver of Baptism; but the subsequent work of ἀνακαίνωσις, i. e. renovation, or renewal, is habitually needed by us, and is performed daily by the Holy Spirit. As the Apostle says (2 Cor. iv. 16), "The inner man is being renewed (ἀνακαινοῦται, present tense) day by day."

Observe the word ἐξέχεεν, He poured forth from a spring; and observe the word λουτρὸν, a laver, into which what is poured forth flows.

These words, combined with the context here, and with our Lord's own declaration (in John iii. 5), on the necessity of being born again of Water (ἐξ ὕδατος) and of the Spirit, display the true doctrine of Regeneration;

All the spiritual Blessings of the New birth, and of the New life, are therein represented as flowing down to us from and out of the one fountain and well-spring of the Love of God the Father: and are all derived to us through God the Son, God and Man, Who is the sole Channel of all grace to men; and are applied to us personally by the agency of God the Holy Ghost. See note above on 2 Cor. xiii. 13.

All these Blessings come to us through the Incarnation of God the Son, Who took our nature and died for us, and washed us from our sins by His blood. And the Incarnation is, as it were, the point of contact, at which the channel of Filial Grace joins on to the Well-spring of Paternal Love, which opens out the way for the effusion of Grace to all the family of Man, whose nature God took in Christ. And the point of contact, at which the living Water of Grace, which flows from the Well-spring of Paternal Love through the Filial Channel of Grace, is poured forth into our souls, is in the laver of our New Birth in Baptism.

Thus, then, the Baptismal Font is the receptacle, into which the Grace flowing from the spring of God's love, and streaming down to us through Christ, God and Man, dying for us on the Cross, is poured forth as water conveyed by an aqueduct from a secret source in the distant hills, and gushing out into a pool; and is applied to the cleansing of our souls from original sin, and to the quickening of them in the spiritual Siloam of the laver of Regeneration.

Christ was born once by the operation of the Holy Ghost, and He lives for evermore.

He was born once in us by the operation of the Holy Ghost. And if we are truly His, He is daily renewed in us by the working of the same Spirit, and will dwell for ever in us.

Hence we see the wisdom of the Church in choosing the present passage of St. Paul for a proper Lesson on the Festival of Christ's Nativity, and in teaching us to pray, in her Collect for that Day, to God, Who has given His only-begotten Son to take our nature upon Him, that we, who have been born again and made God's Children by adoption and grace in Christ, may daily be renewed by the Holy Spirit, through the same Jesus Christ our Lord.

The reader will not have failed to observe the evidence afforded by this passage on the Doctrine of the distinct personality and several operations of the Three Persons of the Ever Blessed Trinity. Cp. 2 Cor. xiii. 13.

7. γενηθῶμεν] So A, C, D*, F, G, Lach., Tisch., Ellicott, Alf.—Elz. γενώμεθα.

8. Πιστὸς ὁ λόγος—διαβεβαιοῦσθαι] Faithful is the saying; a formula introducing a solemn asseveration. 1 Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; iv. 9. 2 Tim. ii. 11.

The saying thus prefaced is that which declares the practical character of the doctrine of Regeneration by Baptism.

This doctrine, therefore, of Baptismal Regeneration, is not (as it has been vainly misrepresented by some) a mere empty formality, a barren and unfruitful speculation, but it is the very root of virtuous practice.

The Apostle teaches, and commands Titus to teach, that they who have been engrafted into Christ by Baptism, must be careful to promote good works. They who have been born anew in Baptism have entered into a solemn covenant with God, by which they obliged themselves to a new and holy life; and therefore all who are baptized, are bound to keep their hearts with diligence. (Prov. iv. 23.) See Greg. Nazian. Orat. xl.

We who are baptized were baptized into Christ's death (says St. Paul, Rom. vi. 3); that is, into a conformity to it, as well as into a participation of its benefits, that we should be dead to sin; and as He was raised up from the dead, we should not continue in sin, but walk in newness of life. (Rom. vi. 2—5.)

We were baptized into His body. (1 Cor. xii. 13.) Our bodies were made members of Christ (1 Cor. vi. 15), and were united in Him to God, and became Temples of God the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 16); and we are therefore pledged thereby to be holy as He is holy (1 Pet. i. 15), to walk worthy of our holy vocation (Eph. i. 5, 6; iv. 1), and to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit in our lives. (Gal. v. 22.) See above on Eph. v. 5, and 1 Tim. iii. 16.

The teaching of St. Paul in this passage, and in many others of the Pastoral Epistles, where he dwells specially on the necessity of good works (1 Tim. ii. 10; v. 10; vi. 18. 2 Tim. ii. 21. Tit. i. 16; ii. 7. 14; iii. 14), is a protest and safeguard against that form of religion, and particularly of Judaism, which contented itself with a specious profession of Knowledge which it dignified with the name of Faith, but which was not productive of good fruits.

These passages are very important, as showing St. Paul's concurrence in the teaching of St. James, who wrote his General Epistle with a special view to this hypocritical form of nominal Religion.

See above the Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans, p. 200.

— καλῶν ἔργων προΐστασθαι] to promote good works: more than to do them; to be, as it were, "præfecti operum bonorum," to be foremost in them, and to lead others to them. The verb προΐστασθαι, with a genitive of persons, signifies to stand before them as their chief, ruler, protector, and patron, προστάτης. (1 Thess. v. 12. 1 Tim. iii. 4. 12.) And it is coupled with things, as here: προΐστασθαι τέχνης, Athen. p. 612; ἐργασίας, Plut. Pericl. p. 151 (Wetstein), where it means to drive on, and zealously to promote, aid, and urge on a work or trade, and not to allow the trade or work to stand still, but to drive on the workman. The overseer of the workmen who built a house or temple was called προστάτης ἔργων, ἐργοδιώκτης, "Præfectus operum," "Clerk of the works."

Such is a Christian's duty in this life, to be a προστάτης καλῶν ἔργων, or, as he calls it, ii. 14, to be a ζηλωτὴς καλῶν ἔργων. The meaning is well illustrated by the opposite declaration of Scripture concerning false teachers, who have an active tongue and lazy hand; who bind heavy burdens upon other men's shoulders, but will not come forward and reach out so much as one of their fingers to move them. (Matt. xxiii. 4.) Koray.

— οἱ πεπιστευκότες Θεῷ] They who have made public profession of faith in God; they who have been baptized and enkrafted into the company of the faithful, or visible Church. On this sense of πιστεύω, see Acts viii. 13; xiii. 48, where see note. Rom. xiii. 11. Elz. has τῷ before Θεῷ, and has τὰ before καλὰ, but it is not found in the best authorities.

9. γενεαλογίας] of the Judaizers. See 1 Tim. i. 4, and Koray here, p. 323.

— περιΐστασο] avoid, by going round about, purposely out of the way, to shun. 2 Tim. ii. 16, περιΐστασο = ἀνάφευγε (Hesych.), περιΐστασθαι = ἐκκλίνειν, φεύγειν (Suid.). Cp. Wetstein, p. 358, and Koray, Atakta, ii. p. 323.

10. Αἱρετικόν] one who makes αἱρέσεις or parties; a sectary, whether in doctrine or discipline. (See on 1 Cor. xi. 19.) The essence of Heresy lies in the exercise of the will or choice. "Hæresis (αἵρεσις) Græcè ab electione dicitur, quòd scilicet unusquisque id sibi eligat, quod ei melius esse videatur." Jerome.

It has pleased God, in the exercise of His own Sovereign Counsel and Will (Eph. i. 5), to make certain Revelations to man. He has consigned those Revelations to the Holy Scriptures, which are inspired by Him, and may be proved so to be, and which may also be shown to be a full and perfect exposition of His Will as to all supernatural Truth necessary for everlasting salvation. He has committed those Scriptures to the keeping of His Church, the Pillar and Ground of Truth (1 Tim. iii. 15), the Body of Christ, to which He has promised His presence and His Spirit to guide her into all truth. (John xiv. 16; xvi. 12. Matt. xxviii. 20.) Whosoever, then, after this act of God's sovereign Counsel and Will, does not set himself carefully to ascertain the Will of God, and dutifully to conform himself to it in matters of Doctrine and Discipline, but voluntarily chooses for himself some opinion, or adopts some practice in contravention of the Divine Will, as expressed in Holy Scripture, and as interpreted by the consent, and embodied in the practice, of the Universal Church; whosoever introduces some new Article of Faith not found in Scripture, and unknown to the primitive Catholic Church,—and much more, whosoever introduces some Article of Faith contradictory to Scripture and to the Sense of the primitive Universal Church,—that man is an αἱρετικὸς, a Heretic, and is to be avoided as such.

See Irenæus, i. 16, who says, "Quotquot absistunt ab Ecclesiâ, verè à semet ipsis sunt damnati, quos Paulus jubet devitare." And the clear statement of Tertullian (de Præscr. c. 7), "Paulus hæreses inter carnalia crimina numerat, scribens ad Galatas (Gal. v. 20), et Tito suggerit, hominem hæreticum post primam correptionem recusandum, quòd perversus sit ejusmodi, et delinquat ut à semet ipso damnatus. Sed et in omni penè Epistolâ de adulterinis doctrinis fugiendis inculcans, hæreses taxat, quarum opera sunt adulteræ doctrinæ, hæreses dictæ Græcâ voce ex interpretatione electionis, quâ quis sive ad instituendas sive ad suscipiendas eas utitur. Ideo et sibi damnatum dixit hæreticum, quia et in quo damnatur, sibi elegit. Nobis verò nihil ex nostro arbitrio indulgere licet, sed nec eligere quod aliquis de arbitrio suo induxerit. Apostolos Domini habemus auctores, qui nec ipsi quicquam ex suo arbitrio, quod inducerent, elegerunt, sed acceptam à Christo disciplinam fideliter nationibus adsignaverunt. Itaque etiam si angelus de cœlis aliter evangelizaret, anathema diceretur à nobis." (Gal. i. 8.)

— παραιτοῦ] See 1 Tim. iv. 7.

11. ἐξέστραπται] is perverted: properly, has been turned inside out, like a garment,—ἐκστρέψαι ἱμάτιον, τὸ ἀλλάξαι τὸ πρὸς τὸ ἔσω μέρος ἔξω. Schol. Aristoph. Nub. 88. Wetstein, p. 378.

A very expressive description of an αἱρετικός. Man's duty is to ascertain the will of God (see on v. 10); to clothe himself with it, to wear it, and exhibit it publicly in his life. But the αἱρετικὸς, or sectary, turns the garment inside out. He walks with the lining of his coat turned outside; he hides God's will, as if it were not fit to show, and perversely parades, and egotistically protrudes, his own will, in the eyes of men, as if it alone were beautiful and worth seeing. Thus he makes himself ridiculous in the sight of thoughtful men. St. Paul therefore calls him self-condemned: he stands forth in public view as convicted by his own self-love and self-adulation, and by his contempt of God's Will and Word. Cp. 1 Tim. v. 24.

— ἁμαρτάνει] sinneth. On the moral guilt of αἵρεσις see 1 Tim. v. 20.

12. Ὅταν πέμψω] When I shall have sent Artemas to thee, or Tychicus. Titus was not to quit his post in Crete, till the Apostle had sent some one, Artemas or Tychicus, to watch over the Church there.

It was very fitting (says S. Jerome) that the Apostle, who had preached the Gospel from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum (Rom. xv. 19), should not suffer the Cretans to be left desolate, both by his own absence and of that of Titus at once, but should send to them in his own stead and that of Titus, Artemas, or Tychicus, to comfort them by teaching and consolation.

In like manner, when St. Paul sent for Timothy to come to him at Rome, he took care to inform him, that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus to take charge of affairs there. 2 Tim. iv. 12.

It is probable, therefore, that Artemas was the person sent to Crete by St. Paul; and that Tychicus remained with the Apostle till he was sent to Ephesus; or, if Tychicus was the person sent, he afterwards returned to St. Paul.

— σπούδασον ἐλθεῖν πρός με εἰς Νικόπολιν] do thy diligence to come to me to Nicopolis; probably the Nicopolis in Epirus, built by Augustus after the battle at Actium, and thence deriving its name,—'the City of Victory.' Sueton. Aug. 18. Strabo, xii. 325. Howson, ii. p. 481. So Jerome, who says (in Prolog. ad Epistolam): "Scribit Apostolus de Nicopoli, quæ in Actiaco litore sita est, præscribitque Tito, ut, cùm è duobus Artemas seu Tychicus Cretam fuerit appulsus, ipse (Titus) Nocopolim veniat."

It is probable that St. Paul passed over from Macedonia into Epirus after his promised visit to Philippi. See Introduction, p. 42.

Nearly ten years before this Epistle was written, when St. Paul left Ephesus for Macedonia (A.D. 57, Acts xx. 1), he found Titus there (2 Cor. vii. 5, 6), and in all probability Titus then went with St. Paul on his missionary tour into Illyricum. (See on Acts xx. 1, 2. Rom. xv. 19.)

We find also, that after the date of this Epistle, and soon before St. Paul's death, Titus had gone, probably by St. Paul's command, into the neighbouring country of Dalmatia. (2 Tim. iv. 10.)

If this Epistle was written, as is most likely, a little before St. Paul's second Imprisonment and Martyrdom, then the intention of sending Titus into Dalmatia, as a person already acquainted with the Churches there planted by St. Paul, would harmonize very well with this command to come to the Apostle to Nicopolis, in Epirus, which would be on the route of Titus from Crete to Dalmatia.

A description of Nicopolis may be seen in the Editor's Work on Greece, p. 313—5, ed. 1858.

— τὸν νομικόν] the lawyer acquainted with the Levitical Law, and who will be of use to thee in dealing with the Judaizing teachers, and in refuting their errors. See v. 9. Do not therefore imagine that I disparage the Law; no, I revere the Law, which is from God; and therefore I would have thee to confute those who pervert the Law, by arguments from the Law,—as St. Paul himself has done in his Epistles to the Galatians and Romans.

The same observation applies to Apollos. (Acts xviii. 24—26.)

σπουδαίως πρόπεμψον, ἵνα μηδὲν αὐτοῖς λείπῃ. 14 Μανθανέτωσαν δὲ καὶ οἱ ἡμέτεροι καλῶν ἔργων προΐστασθαι εἰς τὰς ἀναγκαίας χρείας, ἵνα μὴ ὦσιν ἄκαρποι. 15 Ἀσπάζονταί σε οἱ μετ' ἐμοῦ πάντες· ἄσπασαι τοὺς φιλοῦντας ἡμᾶς ἐν πίστει. m Ἡ χάρις μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν.

See above on Rom. xvi. 14.

On the date and design of this Epistle, see above, Introduction, p. 423.

Ch. I. 1. κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν] in order to proclaim the promise of everlasting life in Christ. (Theodoret.) On this use of κατὰ see Tit. i. 1.

3. τῷ Θεῷ, ᾧ λατρεύω ἀπὸ προγόνων] to the God Whom I serve from my forefathers. The Apostle in his old age dutifully records his obligations, and reverently expresses his thankfulness, to his progenitors, and sets an example to others of similar gratitude (cp. 1 Tim. v. 4); and also defends himself against the imputation that he was an apostate from the faith of his forefathers. He shows his gratitude to them by preaching the promise (v. 1) made to Abraham in Christ.

— ἐν καθαρᾷ συνειδήσει] in a pure conscience. On the sense of these words see on Acts xxiii. 1, and compare Heb. xiii. 18. A defence of himself against those who alleged his example in persecuting the Church, as an argumentum ad hominem in their own behalf. He had acted in that respect with a view to no personal advantage, but in zeal for God's glory; and though he condemns himself as a blasphemer, and injurious for so doing (1 Tim. i. 13. 15), yet his case was very different from theirs, who had seared their consciences with a hot iron, and whose mind and conscience was depraved (1 Tim. iii. 9. Tit. i. 15), and who had the full evidence of the Gospel displayed before their eyes; which at that time he had not. See on 1 Tim. i. 13.

4. μεμνημένος σου τῶν δακρύων] remembering thy tears, shed on the occasion of St. Paul's departure from him. (Theodoret.) Compare the affecting description Acts xx. 37.

In his first Epistle to Timothy, St. Paul had signified his intention of coming to him. (1 Tim. iii. 14.) Probably that intention had been fulfilled, and the severance, of which he now speaks, was the close of that visit. Concerning the probable circumstances of that severance, see below on vv. 15—18.

— ἵνα χαρᾶς πληρωθῶ] in order that I may be filled with joy. To be construed with ἰδεῖν. Theoph.

5. ἐν τῇ μάμμῃ σου Λωΐδι] in thy grandmother Lois. Why does the Apostle go back so far in his affectionate recollections of Timothy? Probably for similar reasons to those which led him to speak of his own progenitors (v. 3). He would cheer Timothy with the reflection, that his own faith was not, as his adversaries alleged, a falling away from the faith of his grandmother, a holy woman under the Law, but was the same faith as hers. She had believed in Christ to come; he had been baptized in Christ come. There was one faith, and one Saviour for both.

A beautiful picture of dutiful reverence for the household piety of departed relatives is seen in this touching reference to Lois, on the part of the great Apostle, now full of years and honour, at the commencement of this farewell Epistle to the Bishop of Ephesus.

6. ἀναζωπυρεῖν] to stir up the flame. σφοδρότερον τὸ πῦρ ἐργάζεσθαι (Theoph.): ἀνεγεῖραι (Hesych.), the opposite of σβεννύναι, 1 Thess. v. 19. ζωπυρεῖν, κυρίως τοὺς ἀνθρακας φυσᾶν (Suid.). The word is found used intransitively. Clem. Rom. i. 27, ἀναζωπυρησάτω ἡ πίστις αὐτοῦ ἐν ὑμῖν. Cp. Ignat. ad Ephes. 1.

Almighty God in His wisdom permits His Truth to be assailed by Satan, as a rich occasion for those, whom He hath gifted for it, ἀναζωπυρεῖν, to awaken their zeal, to quicken up their industry, to muster up their abilities for the defence and rescue of that παραθήκη, that precious Truth whereof they are depositories, and wherewith He hath entrusted them. Bp. Sanderson (ii. p. 48).

The word ἀναζωπυρεῖν, as already observed, signifies to quicken a flame and keep it alive. The sacred flame of Divine Grace and Truth which comes down from heaven, and is kindled on the Altar of the Church, is committed to the vigilant custody of those who are ordained to be Bishops and Pastors of His Church. They are to take care that it is not bedimmed or sullied by Heresy. Their office is like that of Christian Vestals watching the heavenly fire, that sacred παραθήκη committed to their trust. Their duty is to quicken it (ἀναζωπυρεῖν), and to take care that it may not languish, and never be quenched. To them, in a Christian sense, may be addressed the solemn words of the Roman Law, "Custodiant ignem foci publici sempiternum." (Cicero, de Leg. ii. 8.) The failure of that flame, by the negligence of those who were appointed to watch it and keep it alive, was regarded by the Romans as foreboding the extinction of the Republic; and that negligence was visited by the severest penalties. Here also the emblem is instructive. Was it in the mind of St. Paul?

In his former Epistle he had expressed his design of coming to see Timothy. He was then at liberty. (1 Tim. iii. 14.) But now he is again in chains, and therefore desires him to come to him. (2 Tim. iv. 21.) Cp. Euseb. ii. 22, and the Introduction above, pp. 417. 423.

— συγκακοπάθησον] suffer afflictions with the Gospel. Some Expositors render this, 'be a sharer of suffering with me in the Gospel.' But the construction is more natural, and the image is much more striking, if the Gospel is regarded as a living sentient thing, and the words are rendered as above, Be thou a partner with the Gospel in its sufferings, and so thou shalt be a sharer of its glory. Cp. 1 Tim. vi. 1. Tit. ii. 5, where the Word of God is said to suffer blasphemy.

— κατὰ δύναμιν Θεοῦ] according to the power of God. Since God's power to support, save, and reward us who suffer for Him, is infinite, our willingness to suffer ought to be in proportion to (κατὰ) His power.

12. τὴν παραθήκην μου] that treasure which I have laid up in heaven, by spending, and being spent, for His sake. Matt. vi. 20. Mark x. 21. Luke xii. 33. This is my comfort and joy in all my sufferings for His sake, that whatever I spend, even it be my life itself, will be restored to me with abundant interest at the Great Day; for whosoever loseth his life for Christ's sake shall find it, and keep it unto life eternal. Matt. x. 39; xvi. 25. Luke ix. 24; xvii. 33. John xii. 25.

The sense is well expressed by A Lapide: "Depositum vocat thesaurum laborum et passionum pro Evangelio à se obitorum, quem Paulus patiens et moriens quasi apud Deum deposuit, ut in illo die magno illum recipiat, et coram toto mundo declaretur falsò fuisse traductus, incarceratus, verberibus et contumeliis affectus, tanquam impostor, publicèque proclametur verus fuisse veri Dei et Evangelii Apostolus et Doctor." See the appropriate Lesson appointed for St. Paul's Day, Book of Wisdom, chap. v.

13. Ὑποτύπωσιν ἔχε] Hold fast the pattern (1 Tim. i. 16),—the archetype and exemplar of sound words which thou art bound to copy out in thy preaching and in thy life, so that all may learn the truth from thy precept and practice.

14. παραθήκην] So the best authorities.—Elz. παρακαταθήκην. See above on v. 6, and Tertullian (Præscr. Hæret. cap. 25, 26), who hence well argues, that a definite 'depositum fidei,' from which nothing is to be detracted, and to which no addition can be made, was well known to exist in the Apostolic age. (See ii. 2.) The repetition of this word παραθήκη in v. 12, seems designed to remind Timothy that we can have no reasonable hope of our finding our own παραθήκη kept for us in God's hands, unless we keep His παραθήκη carefully in our hands.

— διὰ Πνεύματος ἁγίου] not by means of thine own strength, but seeking for, and relying on, the aid of the Holy Ghost to enable thee to guard it.

15. ἀπεστράφησάν με] they turned away from me at some particular time, when I needed, and expected, their help.

15—17. πάντες οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ κ.τ.λ.] all in Asia turned away from me. This cannot mean all in Asia who were at Rome. Such an interpretation is a very forced one. The words can only mean that 'all in Asia turned away' from him, not indeed all the Christians there; for Onesiphorus did not desert him, nor Timothy, nor Aquila and Priscilla (iv. 19); but all of that party to which Phygelus (so the best MSS.) and Hermogenes belonged, turned away from me.

He adds that Onesiphorus often refreshed him, and was not ashamed of his chain.

Nor was this all. Onesiphorus also afterward when he came to Rome, still more diligently sought for him, and found him out.

These words imply, that St. Paul had been exposed to some special peril when in Asia, and that thus the stedfastness of his friends there was then put to the test.

Then it was, that Phygelus and Hermogenes deserted him; then, probably, it was, that Alexander the Coppersmith, an ancient enemy (Acts xix. 33), in revenge for St. Paul's disciplinarian severity towards him (1 Tim. i. 20), did him much evil (2 Tim. iv. 14). Then it was, that Onesiphorus, who dwelt at Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 19), stood firmly by him, and was not ashamed of his chain (v. 16), i. e. of the chain by which he was bound in Asia. Nor was this all; but when, subsequently, Onesiphorus came from Asia to Rome, he carefully sought for, and found out, the Apostle, and ministered to him. Onesiphorus is thus put in striking contrast to that other party in Asia which betrayed St. Paul in his need.

If this interpretation of this passage is correct, we are led to the following inference, viz. that St. Paul was in Asia a short time before he wrote this his final Epistle; and that he was then made a victim of the malice of the Asiatic Jews, who had formerly united with Demetrius the Silversmith at Ephesus against him (Acts xix. 23. 33), and had put forth Alexander against him, but had been disappointed of executing their designs against him, at that time, by the interference of St. Paul's friends (Acts xix. 31), and had afterwards pursued him with their rancour even to Jerusalem, and had stirred the multitude against him there, and had arrested him in the Temple. (Acts xxi. 27—29.)

Such persons as these would have been greatly exasperated against him after his release from his first Roman imprisonment, which they doubtless had hoped would end in his death; and they would probably be cognizant of his severe language against the Judaizers, in his recent Epistles to the Philippians and to Titus, and in the first Epistle to Timothy.

These Asiatic Jews, his unrelenting and inveterate foes and persecutors, would gladly seize any opportunity for wreaking their vengeance upon him. Such an opportunity would have presented itself to them on the occasion of a visit of the Apostle to Asia; a short time before the date of this Epistle.

Then the persecution of the Christians had been set on foot by the Emperor Nero; and then, it is probable, the Jews resorted to their ancient stratagem of enlisting the passions and the power of the Heathen Magistrates (see on Acts xvii. 5, 6) against the Apostle; and then, perhaps, it was, that St. Paul was arrested a second time, and sent a second time a prisoner to Rome.

In confirmation of this statement, it will be remembered that at the Martyrdom of S. Polycarp in another great Asiatic city, Smyrna, the Jews were the leaders of the Heathen against that Apostolic Father and Bishop of the Church (Martyr. Polycarp. 12). In his execution, it is expressly recorded that the Jews were specially eager and forward, as their custom is, ὡς ἔθος αὐτοῖς (c. 13; see also c. 17 and c. 18).

Besides, it is evident from the Epistles of St. Peter, written about this time, that a fiery trial of Persecution was now raging against the Christians in Asia. See 1 Pet. i. 7; iii. 14; iv. 12. 16; v. 10.

Perhaps it was under such circumstances as these that the Apostle took leave of Timothy at that affecting farewell mentioned in v. 4. See above, the Introduction to these Epistles, p. 273; and below on iv. 13—19.

16. ἀνέψυξε] "refrigeravit, recreavit;" refreshed me, as a weary, thirsty, and hungry traveller, in a hot day. Wetstein.

17. γενόμενος ἐν Ῥώμῃ] they (Phygelus and Hermogenes) turned away from me when I was with them in Asia; but Onesiphorus, who had not been ashamed of my chain in Asia, when he afterwards came to Rome, sought me out in my prison there, and found me. May God reward him and his! Cp. Theodoret here.

— σπουδαιότερον] more diligently; his zeal was quickened by the difficulty of finding me.

A proof that the imprisonment in which this Epistle was written, was of a very different kind from the former confinement of the Apostle, described Acts xxviii. 30, 31. See Bishop Pearson, Minor Works, ii. 383, quoted above in the Introduction to these Epistles to Timothy, p. 417.

18. δώῃ αὐτῷ—ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ] It has been inferred from chap. iv. 19, where the household of Onesiphorus is saluted, that Onesiphorus was now dead; and that the present wish for him is therefore a prayer for the dead. But, not to dwell on the circumstance that it cannot justly be called a prayer, it is probable that St. Paul knew that Onesiphorus was not now at Ephesus. Indeed he seems to have been now at Rome (v. 17). And even if he were now at Ephesus he might be included in the salutation to his family.

— ὅσα ἐν Ἐφέσῳ διηκόνησε] Probably at the earlier period of St. Paul's three years' residence in Asia. (Acts xix. 1—20; xx. 31.)

— βέλτιον] better than I can express. See on Acts xxv. 10. Winer, p. 217.

CH. II. 1. Σὺ οὖν] Thou therefore—stimulated by the testimony of my sufferings, and by the example of Onesiphorus; and by a consideration of the power of God (i. 8—10).

2. διὰ πολλῶν μαρτύρων] through the intervention of many witnesses, whose presence was requisite, in order to attest what I delivered to thee publicly, as the deposit of faith; and what thou wast charged by me to deliver to others in succession after thee.

This precept appears to imply that the Doctrine of Christ was even then embodied in some "well-known form of sound words" (2 Tim. i. 13), constituting a public Symbol of Faith or Creed. See i. 14.

We have clear intimations of the existence of such symbols of Faith, in the writers of the Second Century (Iren. i. 10. Tertullian, de Virg. vel. c. 1; Præscr. Hæret. c. 13; c. Prax. 2. Origen, περὶ ἀρχῶν, præfat.), and also statements of their substance, which coincides very nearly with that of what is commonly called 'the Apostles' Creed.' Cp. Cyprian, Epist. ad Magnum 69. Greg. Thaumaturg. p. 1; and Hooker, iii. 1. 5.

This public delivery of a definite παραθήκη at Ordination, was accompanied in the Ancient Church by holding the Gospel over the head of the person to be ordained Bishop (see Concil. Carth. iv. can. 2. Bingham, ii. 11. 8), and is represented by the delivery of the Bible in our own Church.

This Apostolic committal of a deposit of faith to chosen faithful men, with a view to its successive delivery to others in succession, is thus described by St. Paul's contemporary, S. Clement of Rome, v. 44: οἱ Ἀπόστολοι . . . κατέστησαν τοὺς προειρημένους (i. e. the above-named Presbyters and Deacons), καὶ μεταξὺ ἐπινομὴν δεδώκασιν, ὅπως ἐὰν κοιμηθῶσιν (i. e. the said Presbyters and Deacons), διαδέξωνται ἕτεροι δεδοκιμασμένοι ἄνδρες τὴν λειτουργίαν αὐτῶν· τοὺς οὖν καταστάντας ὑπ' ἐκείνων, ἢ μεταξὺ ὑφ' ἑτέρων ἐλλογίμων ἀνδρῶν, συνευδοκησάσης τῆς ἐκκλησίας, οὐ δικαίως νομίζομεν ἀποβαλέσθαι τῆς λειτουργίας.

3. Συγκακοπάθησον] So A, C*, D*, E*, F, G, Lachm., Tisch., Huther, Ellicott, Alf.—Elz. σὺ οὖν κακοπάθησον.

5. ἐὰν μὴ νομίμως ἀθλήσῃ] unless he have striven lawfully. They who transgressed the laws of the Ancient Games were fined: the six statues of Jupiter at Olympia, called Ζᾶνες, were made from the fines levied on Athletes who had not contended lawfully. Pausanias, lib. v. 21.

6. Τὸν κοπιῶντα γεωργόν] It is meet that the labouring husbandman should first be a sharer in the fruits. The Apostle here alludes to that system of husbandry, according to which the γεωργὸς (métayer), or Tenant, who tilled the ground, was allowed to participate with the Landlord in the fruits of the soil, such as wine, oil, corn—and paid a portion to the Landlord as Rent (Matt. xxi. 34). See on Luke xvi. 5, and Heb. vi. 7.

Almighty God is the Great Landlord of all, and will take care that the good husbandman who industriously tills the soil of His field, the Church, shall first be a partaker with Him in the fruits of the harvest raised by his labour; and according to his κόπος so will his καρπὸς be. Cp. v. 15.

7.] Elz. has ἃ for ὅ, and δῴη for δώσει, which is the reading authorized by the preponderance of the best testimonies, A, C*, D, E, F, G.

St. Paul commands Timothy to understand what he (the Apostle) says: for, he adds, the Lord of all will enable him so to do, and to regard himself as a soldier fighting under his banner, an athlete wrestling in His arena, a husbandman tilling His field.

8. ἐγηγερμένον ἐκ νεκρῶν] risen from the dead. A warning against the heresies of those who denied the Resurrection of the body, and asserted that the Resurrection was only to be understood spiritually (ii. 18. Iren. ii. 31. Tertullian, de Res. 19. Prescr. Hæret. 33), or a mere succession of generations (Theodoret), and denied the Incarnation of Christ, and did not acknowledge His Royalty, and that He is the promised Messiah.

Simon Magus had already disseminated these doctrines, affirming that the human body of Christ was a mere phantom (φάντασμα). The Apostle, therefore, insists specially on the doctrines of the Incarnation of Christ, His Passion, His Resurrection from the dead, and His generation from the seed of David. Theodoret.

— ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυὶδ] from the seed of David. St. Paul appears to affirm expressly here that our Lord sprung by natural derivation from the seed of David, and that therefore his mother Mary was of that lineage. Cp. Rom. i. 3. Heb. vii. 14. Acts ii. 30.

The Genealogies of our Lord in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, are, doubtless, genealogies of Joseph. See above on Matt. i. 1. Luke iii. 23.

But there can be no difficulty in accepting a statement, in itself so probable, and resting on so high authority, that both Joseph and Mary were of the same lineage—the royal lineage of David. See on Matt. i. 1.

Some of the Talmudists assert, that Mary was the daughter of Eli (see Lightfoot on Luke iii. 23, Vol. ii. p. 400), and it has been supposed by some (Hofmann) that Jacob, the natural father of Joseph, died early, and that Eli, the father of Mary, and Jacob's kinsman, adopted Joseph; and that so Joseph's lineage is traced from Eli, who was the natural father of Mary; and that Joseph's genealogy in St. Luke is that of Mary also. See Delitzsch, Hebr. vii. 13, p. 290.

9. ὡς κακοῦργος] as a malefactor—and not as the world's benefactor by preaching Christ. The term κακοῦργος intimates also that his treatment now was more severe than in his former imprisonment (Acts xxvi. 30, 31), when he was not treated as such; but was allowed to enjoy many privileges and comforts (see Acts xxviii. 30, 31. Phil. i. 13; iv. 22), which were now denied to him.

13. γάρ] Not in Elz., but in A, C, D, E, F, G, I.

15. ὀρθοτομοῦντα] ploughing the furrows of spiritual tillage in a straight line (Theodoret), "non prævaricantem." Cp. Hesiod, O. and D. 433. Theocrit. x. 2, οὐ δὲ τὸν ὀγμὸν ἄγειν ὀρθὸν δύνᾳ, ὡς τὸ πρὶν ἄγες: v. 6, ὃς νῦν ἀρχόμενος τᾶς αὔλακος οὐκ ἀποτρώγεις. Cp. Euseb. iv. 3, ὀρθοτομία ἀποστολική.

Or the metaphor may be derived from cutting a road straight. Thucyd. ii. 100, ὁδοὺς εὐθείας ἔτεμε. See other examples in Wetstein.

Perhaps this latter may be the preferable sense, inasmuch as ὀρθοτομεῖν in a theological signification is often opposed to καινοτομεῖν, viz. to cut out a new path, by an heretical or schismatical deviation, instead of going forward in a right direction. See Hooker, V. lxxxi.

16. κενοφωνίας] hollow professions of piety with the lips, without any solid substance of good works wrought by the hand (see 1 Tim. vi. 20. James ii. 20, ὦ ἄνθρωπε κενέ): fitly, therefore, called profane.

— περιΐστασο] shun. See Titus iii. 9.

17. ὡς γάγγραινα] a cancer; which eats its way, and corrupts the sound part of the body. Theodoret. He could not have given a more frightful picture of the foulness of false doctrine than by comparing it to this deadly and loathsome disease.

— νομὴν ἕξει] pastionem habebit,—will eat more and more, until it devour the flesh of those on whom it fixes its fangs. Νομὴ is the proper medical term, expressing the gradual, corrosive action of that disease. Wetstein.

— Φίλητος] As to the accent, see on Acts xx. 4.

18. ἠστόχησαν] 1 Tim. i. 6; vi. 20.

— ἀνάστασιν ἤδη γεγονέναι] See on 1 Cor. xv. 12; and above, v. 8.

19. Ὁ μέντοι στερεὸς θ.] Notwithstanding this, the firm foundation of God stands, having this gravure upon it.

The solid foundation of God's spiritual house, the Church (1 Tim. iii. 15), has these two mottos inscribed upon it: "The Lord knoweth them that are His" (Numb. xvi. 5. Nah. i. 7. John x. 14. 27). He seeth, loveth, and will preserve them from all peril. Here is a comfortable assurance of His favour to us. And "Let all who name the name of the Lord (Κυρίου, so the best MSS.; Elz. Χριστοῦ) depart from iniquity" (Numb. xvi. 26. Isa. lii. 11). Let all who profess to know the Lord, and to worship Him, and who bear His Name, into which they have been baptized, eschew all things contrary to their profession, and follow such things as are agreeable to the same. Here is a salutary memento of our duty to Him.

Examples of a σφραγὶς, or gravure, on a foundation-stone, may be seen in Zech. iii. 9, and Rev. xxi. 14.

As to the first of these notes, the Apostle declares that the Lord, Who knoweth all things, knoweth those who are His; but we men do not know, either as to ourselves or others, whether we or they are His, and whether we or they shall persevere to the end. The fan is not in our hand to winnow the chaff from the wheat. The Lord only knoweth who are His by those secret characters of grace, and perseverance, which no eye of man is able to discern in another, nor perhaps in himself infallibly. We are, therefore, for the most part, to look at the Brotherhood, so far as it is discernible to us by the plain and legible characters of Baptism and outward profession. So that whosoever abideth in areâ Domini, and liveth in the communion of the visible Church, being baptized into Christ, and professing the Name of Christ, let him prove, as it falleth out, chaff, or light corn, or wheat, when the Lord shall come with His fan to purge His floor, yet in the mean time, so long as he lieth in the heap and upon the floor, we must own him for a Christian, and take him as one of the Brotherhood, and as such an one love him. For so is the duty, Love the Brotherhood. (1 Pet. ii. 17.) Bp. Sanderson (iii. p. 71).

As to the second note of our profession, here mentioned, "Let him that nameth the Name of the Lord depart from iniquity," it is to be observed, that in this mixed state of the visible Church, the Evil are mingled with the Good, and so they will continue to be till the great Day of Harvest. (Matt. xiii. 30—39.) And therefore what an Ancient Father says is true, "Ab iniquis recedere non potes quia mixta est palea tritico usque dum ventiletur. Necesse est ut, si proficis, inter iniquos vivas. Ab iniquis recedere non potes; ab iniquitate recede." Augustine (in Ps. xcii.).

Remark also, that no man may flatter himself with a secret persuasion that God has predetermined him to salvation, and that therefore whatever his course of life might be he cannot fall away. For the Apostle here says, "Let him that nameth the name of the Lord depart from iniquity."

To put any man in hope that what is not ordinarily revealed in the Gospel may yet be laid up for him in the cabinet of God's secret counsels, with this seal upon it, The Lord knoweth those that are His, as if they might be His still in God's acceptation which walk most contrarily to Him, this may prove a most dangerous snare of souls. And it is strange it should seek shelter in that text (2 Tim. ii. 19), which was most expressly assigned to the contrary, as is evident by the notation of the θεμέλιον in the beginning of the verse, which must assure us that there is no Salvation to be expected but according to the contents of that great indenture, once for all sealed in the blood of Christ; of which, as that indeed is one part, which is inscribed on one side of the seal, The Lord knoweth those that are His, i. e. He will never fail to own those that continue faithful to Him; so the other, on the other side, is most emphatical, Let every man that nameth the Name of Christ depart from iniquity, which, if he do not, he hath forfeited all the privileges of his Christianity. Dr. Hammond (in Sanderson's Works, v. p. 334).

By these words also, "Let him depart from iniquity," the Apostle delivers a prophetic protest against the Heresy which affirms that man has no free will of his own, and that human nature is only like inert and lifeless clay (see v. 21). He also condemns the false notion that man can fathom the inscrutable counsel of God, and can determine whether he himself will finally be saved or no; a notion which opens a wide door for Antinomian licentiousness, by encouraging presumption on one side, and producing desperation on the other.

The present paragraphs (vv. 19—21) are therefore of great importance for settling the controversies concerning Election, Reprobation, Free Will, Divine Grace, and Final Perseverance. See above on Rom. ix. 21—23.

20. Ἐν μεγάλῃ δὲ οἰκίᾳ] In the Visible Church of God upon earth. See 1 Tim. iii. 15. "In congregatione Christianâ." Aug. (Serm. 15.)

— ὀστράκινα] earthen. See 2 Cor. iv. 7.

21. Ἐὰν οὖν τις ἐκκαθάρῃ ἑαυτόν] Whosoever shall have cleansed himself. On ἐάν τις, and εἴ τις = quicunque, whosoever, see John iii. 3. 5; vi. 50, 51. 1 Cor. iii. 14, 15. 17, 18; viii. 3.

— ἀπὸ τούτων] from these; i. e. from the number and condition of the vessels to dishonour.

A very instructive expression, declaring that a man may at one time of his life be numbered among vessels to dishonour, and yet may become a vessel to honour by cleansing himself out from of their number and condition.

St. Paul does not mean that a man, considered as a vessel, is to cleanse himself from the society of other vessels. A Christian man may not go out of the great house which is the Visible Church of God; for, if he does this, he is guilty of schism (see on v. 19). But the evil will be mingled with the good as long as this world lasts. He cannot separate himself wholly from sinners, but he must cleanse himself from them as sinners; that is, he must not communicate with them in their sins. His duty is to labour and pray for grace to deliver himself by repentance and holiness of life from the number, and predicament, and future destiny of such vessels as are unclean, and remain unclean to the end. (Rev. xxii. 11.)

23. παραιτοῦ] 1 Tim. iv. 7.

25. ἀντιδιατιθεμένους] setting up themselves contentiously (διὰ) in opposition (ἀντί).

— μήποτε] if perchance at any time; 'si forte aliquando.' On the use of μήποτε in a dubitative and expectative sense, see Luke iii. 15, προσδοκῶντος τοῦ λαοῦ . . . καὶ διαλογιζομένων ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις μήποτε αὐτὸς εἴη ὁ Χριστός. Hence, by a natural consequence, μήποτε suggests an hypothesis, as here. This use of μήποτε may best be illustrated from the LXX, who often employ the conjunction μήποτε in this sense. See Gen. xxiv. 5. 39; xxvii. 12, μήποτε ψηλαφήσῃ με ὁ πατὴρ καὶ ἔσομαι αὐτῷ ὡς καταφρονῶν.

For examples of μήποτε in the New Testament, see Matt. iv. 6; v. 25; xxv. 9. Mark iv. 12. Heb. iii. 12; iv. 1.

26. ἀνανήψωσιν] return to sobriety, 'veluti ex crapulâ.' Cp. Pseud.-Ignat. ad Phil. 4, Παρακαλῶ ὑμᾶς ἐν Κυρίῳ ὅσοι ἂν μετανοήσαντες ἔλθωσιν ἐπὶ τὴν ἑνότητα τῆς ἐκκλησίας, προσδέχεσθε αὐτοὺς μετὰ πάσης πραότητος, ἵνα διὰ τῆς χρηστότητος, καὶ τῆς ἀνεξικακίας ἀνανήψαντες ἐκ τῆς τοῦ διαβόλου παγίδος ἄξιοι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ γενόμενοι σωτηρίας αἰωνίου τύχωσιν.

CH. III. 1. ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις] in the last days. The times of the Gospel dispensation extending to the end of the world. See v. 5, where he speaks of Timothy himself as living in these days. Cp. Acts ii. 17. 1 John ii. 18.

2. φίλαυτοι] lovers of themselves, not of God.

The Apostle places this word at the beginning of this long catalogue, because where the Love of God is not, and self-love is, there the evils here enumerated naturally arise. Having mentioned the root, he proceeds to speak of the branches. Theophyl. See Augustine, in Joann. Tract. 123, where, expounding this passage, he says, "Hæc enim vitia ex illâ radice quodammodo pullulant cùm sunt homines se ipsos amantes. Quod vitium maximè cavendum est eis qui pascunt oves Christi, ne sua quærant non quæ Jesu Christi." This φιλαυτία is 'caput mali,' as Aug. calls it (Serm. 330), and is, as he observes (in Joan. 123, cp. Serm. 96), the first link of a regular chain of succession of vices continued onward from its commencement in Love of self, as distinguished from the Love of God. This picture, therefore, of the workings of φιλαυτία, or Self-Love, may be set in opposition to that of Ἀγάπη, True Love, in 1 Cor. xiii. 4—8. It is well said by Augustine (de Civ. Dei init.), in his description of the two opposite Cities into which the world is divided, the City of God and the City of the Devil, that the City of God begins with, and is built upon, the love of God; but the City of the Devil begins with, and is built on, the love of self, and rises upwards through disdain of our neighbour into hatred of God.

This progress is thus traced by St. Paul. 1. The foundation of the Civitas Diaboli in φίλαυτοι. 2. There is an ascent from φιλάργυροι to βλάσφημοι, i. e. from love of money to blasphemy of God. 3. Another, from γονεῦσιν ἀπειθεῖς to ἀνόσιοι, i. e. from disobedience to Parents to irreverence and profaneness. 4. From ἄστοργοι through a long series of sins, till all is summed up in φιλήδονοι μᾶλλον ἢ φιλόθεοι, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; and this last word confirms the meaning assigned to θεοστυγεῖς above, Rom. i. 30.

It is a solemn consideration, that the Apostle here describes men in large numbers apostatizing from Christianity, and relapsing into the sins of the Heathen World. See above on Rom. i. 26, 27.

4. προπετεῖς] rushing headlong, precipitate. Προπίπτων πρὸ τοῦ λογισμοῦ (Hesych.). Cp. Acts xix. 36.

— τετυφωμένοι] See 1 Tim. iii. 6; vi. 4. This word is sometimes said to signify 'blinded by the fumes and mists of pride.'

φιλήδονοι μᾶλλον ἢ φιλόθεοι, 5 [b] ἔχοντες μόρφωσιν εὐσεβείας, τὴν δὲ δύναμιν αὐτῆς ἠρνημένοι· καὶ τούτους ἀποτρέπου. 6 [c] Ἐκ τούτων γάρ εἰσιν οἱ ἐνδύνοντες εἰς τὰς οἰκίας, καὶ αἰχμαλωτίζοντες γυναικάρια σεσωρευμένα ἁμαρτίαις, ἀγόμενα ἐπιθυμίαις ποικίλαις, 7 πάντοτε μανθάνοντα, καὶ μηδέποτε εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν ἀληθείας ἐλθεῖν δυνάμενα. 8 [d] Ὃν τρόπον δὲ Ἰαννῆς καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς ἀντέστησαν Μωϋσεῖ, οὕτω καὶ οὗτοι ἀνθίστανται τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, ἄνθρωποι κατεφθαρμένοι τὸν νοῦν, ἀδόκιμοι περὶ τὴν πίστιν. 9 Ἀλλ' οὐ προκόψουσιν ἐπὶ πλεῖον· ἡ γὰρ ἄνοια αὐτῶν ἔκδηλος ἔσται πᾶσιν, ὡς καὶ ἡ ἐκείνων ἐγένετο.

f Ps. 34. 19. Acts 13. 50. & 14. 2, 19, 22. 2 Cor. 1. 10.

But this does not seem to be the accurate interpretation of the word as used here.

The signification rather is, swelling and puffed up, like smoke issuing from a fire, and dilating himself with a vain-glorious and empty cloud of spiritual pride, which makes a great show, but is nothing but misty and murky vapour.

Hence the ancient Lexicographers interpret the word by ἐταρθεὶς, and τῦφος is ἔπαρσις, κενοδοξία, ὑπερηφάνεια.

The idea is excellently expressed by Augustine. "Fumus, à loco ignis erumpens, in alto extollitur et in globum magnum intumescit; sed quantò fuerit globus ille grandior, tantò fit vanior; ab illâ enim magnitudine non fundatâ et inflatâ it in auras, atque dilabitur, ut videas ei ipsam obfuisse magnitudinem. Quantò enim plus erectus est, quantò extensus, quantò diffusus undique in majorem ambitum tantò fit exilior et deficiens. Sic et isti inflatione tumoris sui euntes in ventos, extollentes se quasi justos et magnos ultra non proficient." Augustine (in Ps. xxxvi.).

— φιλήδονοι κ.τ.λ.] Φιλήδονον καὶ φιλόθεον τὸν αὐτὸν ἀδύνατον εἶναι. Demophil. (Pythag. p. 624). So Philo (de Agriculturâ, i. p. 313), speaking of the debasement of the soul by bodily self-indulgence, Μήποτε τὸν λαὸν ἅπαντα εἰς Αἴγυπτον τὴν τοῦ σώματος χάραν ἀποστρέψῃ καὶ φιλήδονον καὶ φιλοπαθῆ μᾶλλον ἢ φιλάρετον καὶ φιλόθεον ἐργάσηται. (Wetstein.)

5. μόρφωσιν] Not a form, μορφὴν, but an efformation, σχηματισμὸν (Lex. MS.), and dressing-up of godliness. See Philo (de Plant. 340), καὶ νῦν εἰσί τινες τῶν ἐπιμορφαζόντων εὐσέβειαν. (Wetstein.)

This hypocritical pretence, and artificial fiction of godliness, is that form of Judaistic Gnosticism which is specially condemned in these Pastoral Epistles. See Introductions above to the Epistle to the Romans, p. 203, and to the Epistles to Timothy and Titus.

6. αἰχμαλωτίζοντες γ.] So the major part of the best authorities. Elz. has αἰχμαλωτεύοντες τὰ γ.

— γυναικάρια] 'mulierculas.' The Evil Spirit, who tempted Adam by Eve (2 Cor. xi. 3. 1 Tim. ii. 13, 14), and endeavoured to beguile Job by means of his wife (Job ii. 9, 10), and the Israelites by the Midianitish women (Numb. xxv.), led women captive by his emissaries, the teachers of Heresy, and then associated those women with the Heresiarchs themselves in their evil work. This characteristic of Heresy, here pointed out by St. Paul, has uniformly marked its history in every age of the Church. "Simon Magus hæresin condidit adjutus auxilio Helenæ meretricis. Nicolaus Antiochenus omnium immunditiarum conditor choros duxit fœmineos. Marcion quoque Romam præmisit mulierem ad majorem lasciviam. Apelles Philumenam comitem habuit. Montanus Priscam et Maximillam primùm auro corrupit, deinde hæresi polluit. Arius ut orbem deciperet, sororem Principis antè decepit. Donatus Lucillæ opibus adjutus est." Jerome (Epist. ad Ctesiphontem). A Lapide.

It is observed by Hooker (Pref. iii. 13), that those persons who took the lead in the sixteenth century in subverting the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and in setting up that of Geneva, showed "eminent industry in making proselytes of that sex which they deemed apter to serve as instruments and helps in the cause."

7. ἐπίγνωσιν] perfect knowledge of the truth, as distinguished from the empty knowledge, the knowledge (γνῶσις), falsely so called (1 Tim. vi. 20), which made profession of knowing God, but in works denied Him (Tit. i. 16), and which made an outward show of godliness, but denied its power (v. 5). See on 1 Tim. i. 4.

8. Ἰαννῆς καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς] Jannes and Jambres. One or both are mentioned even by heathen writers (Pliny, H. N. xxxii., Apuleius, Apol. 2, and Numenius ap. Euseb. Præp. Evan. ix. 8), as skilled in magic; and by Jewish writers as Magicians of Pharaoh (Exod. i. 15; vii. 11), and also as sons of Balaam. See Buxtorf, Lex Talmud. col. 945, and Targum Jonathan in Exod. i. 15. Wetstein here. Winer, R. W. B. p. 535.

9. Ἀλλ' οὐ προκόψουσιν ἐπὶ πλεῖον] Notwithstanding they shall not be able to advance further, but shall be arrested and confounded by the power of Christ, as Jannes and Jambres were by Moses, after that they had been permitted to work some wonderful works, in order to show their antagonism, and also to prove eventually the greater power of God in defeating their machinations.

There is a remarkable harmony between this prophecy of St. Paul and that of St. John in the Apocalypse (Rev. xvi. 13), compared with the working of the Egyptian Magicians, as described by Moses (Exod. vii. 11. 22). See below on Rev. xvi. 13, and Augustine (Epist. 55), who says, "Animositas hæreticorum semper inquieta est, quos Magorum Pharaonis habere conatum declarat Apostolus, Sicut enim Jannes, etc. Quia enim per ipsam corruptionem mentis inquietissimè fuerunt, in signo tertio defecerunt (οὐ προέκοψαν ἐπὶ πλεῖον) fatentes sibi adversum esse Spiritum sanctum qui erat in Moyse. Nam deficientes dixerunt, Digitus Dei est hic!" (Exod. viii. 19.)

— ἄνοια] wicked folly; 'dementia' (Aug.).

10. παρηκολούθηκας] thou hast followed by the side, and art following, as a faithful companion, by personal knowledge, and also by sharing in my bonds and afflictions. Cp. Heb. xiii. 23. Phil. ii. 21, 22. See on Luke i. 3. The perfect tense seems preferable to the aorist adopted by some Editors from D, E, I, K.

This testimony to Timothy's stedfastness and faithfulness to the Apostle is made more forcible by its contrast with what is said of others who deserted the Apostle in his troubles (i. 15; iv. 10. 16).

This statement could very fitly be applied to Timothy, and (as far as appears) to no one else; for he, and he alone, had been almost in constant attendance on, or in communication with, St. Paul since the Apostle's second Missionary Journey in A.D. 51, to the date of the present Epistle.

— τῇ ἀγωγῇ] my course or tenour of life; my mode of leading my life, τρόπῳ, ἀναστροφῇ (Hesych.), τῇ τοῦ βιοῦ πολιτείᾳ (2 Macc. iv. 16).

— τῇ πίστει, τῇ μακροθυμίᾳ, τῇ ἀγάπῃ, τῇ ὑπομονῇ] Compare iv. 7, 8, where St. Paul speaks in similar terms of himself, as guided, strengthened, and supported by divine Grace.

This mode of viewing himself is in perfect harmony with his present position; and these expressions concerning his own life afford striking though silent evidence of the genuineness of this farewell Epistle.

He has now arrived at the end of his career, and is about to quit the world: he scarcely seems to belong to it; he looks back upon his past life, as it were, from without and from above. He therefore now uses words which might otherwise have been chargeable with ἀφροσύνη (2 Cor. xi. 1—17), and which he would hardly have employed before, or, at least, not without some qualification, as in 1 Cor. xv. 10.

11. ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ] in Antioch, of Pisidia (Acts xiii. 14. 44. 50), the first place in which St. Paul preached after his ordination to the Apostleship, from which he dates his sufferings here.

Another proof of truth. A forger would not have begun at this early stage in St. Paul's history, but would have commenced the recital of persecutions at a later period, viz. at St. Paul's sojourn at Philippi and Thessalonica, when, as is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, Timothy, of whom nothing had been said before, had been actually associated with the Apostle as a fellow-labourer in preaching of the Gospel. (Acts xvi. 1, 2.) Cp. Dr. Paley, H. P. p. 152, ed. Birks.

διὰ πίστεως τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. 16 [i] Πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος καὶ ὠφέλιμος

Besides, it may be remarked, a forger would not have used the word Antioch, thus placed by itself, to designate Antioch in Pisidia. In common language the name Antioch would only mean the great capital city generally known by that name, Antioch of Syria. But it was very natural for St. Paul, in writing to Timothy, to use the word Antioch in speaking of Antioch in Pisidia, as will be obvious to any one who will refer to Acts xiii. 14; xiv. 8. 21; xvi. 1, 2.

It is requisite to recal the reader's attention to such evidences as these; because unhappily the genuineness of these Epistles to Timothy and Titus has in the present age been controverted by some (e. g. Schleiermacher, De Wette, and Baur). Their allegations, however, which have been ably refuted by Dean Alford (Prolegomena, chap. vii.), have tended on the whole only to bring out more clearly the evident marks of their truth and Apostolic origin.

— ἐν Ἰκονίῳ, ἐν Λύστροις] in Iconium, in Lystra. Observe the order of these words here as compared with Acts xvi. 2. Here Iconium is placed before Lystra, because St. Paul came to Iconium before he came to Lystra (Acts xiv. 1—6). But there Lystra is placed before Iconium, because Timothy lived at Lystra. (See on Acts xvi. 1.) But Timothy was well known at Iconium. Hence it is probable that he had been cognizant of St. Paul's sufferings there before he was taken into his company at Lystra.

13. γόητες] μάγοι, περίεργοι (Hesych.), seducers, probably not only by sophistry, but also by sorcery, like Jannes and Jambres, and Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9). Such persons abounded at Ephesus, where Timothy now was. See on Acts xix. 12—19.

14. ἐπιστώθης] wert assured of. ἐπληροφορήθης. (Hesych.) πιστωθέντες ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ μετὰ πληροφορίας πνεύματος ἁγίου ἐξῆλθον. Clemens R. 42.

15. ὅτι] that, not because. The Apostle means to say, that when Timothy bears in mind that he has the privilege of knowing the Holy Scriptures, even from his infancy, he will feel a deep sense of gratitude to Almighty God, and of his own consequent responsibilities, and be stimulated thereby to remain stedfast in the profession, and teaching of the Truth, — ἀπὸ βρέφους—οἶδας] thou knowest from a child. βρέφος bespeaks an earlier age than παῖς. See Luke i. 41; ii. 12. 16; xviii. 15. Acts vii. 19. 1 Pet. ii. 2. βρέφος = νήπιον. Hesych.

The Jewish children, as soon as they were able to speak, were taught to commit to memory certain portions of the Law. See Rabbi Salomo, ad Deut. xi. 19, "As soon as a child is able to speak, his father ought to teach him the Law; otherwise he will seem to be burying him alive;" and other passages from the Rabbis (in Wetstein, p. 364; and cp. Deut. iv. 9; vi. 7. Ps. lxxviii. 4, 5, 6), who mention the age of five years as the time at which the Jewish children were to begin to read the Law.

— τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα] the Holy Scriptures, of the Old Testament.

The word γράμματα, writings, is limited here by the words prefixed (τὰ ἱερὰ), and specifies the writings which alone were regarded as the Holy Writings by Timothy and the Jews; viz. the Law, the Prophets, and the Chethubim or Hagiographa; and these collectively were called by them כְּתוּבֵי הַקֹּדֶשׁ, rendered here by St. Paul τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα (Hottinger, Thesaur. p. 98), and commonly known as τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα by the Hellenistic Jews. 1 Macc. xii. 9. 2 Macc. viii. 17. Joseph. Ant. procem. 3. Philo, v. Mosis ii. p. 179. 21.

— τὰ δυνάμενά σε σοφίσαι] which are the things that are able to make thee wise unto salvation; i. e. without the addition of the oral traditions of the Talmudists, or of other false teachers, against which the Apostle had delivered a warning, 1 Tim. iv. 1. See Titus i. 9.

Observe the article before δυνάμενα. A strong prophetic protest against the Romish dogma, that her unwritten Traditions are necessary to be added to Holy Scripture, in order to make us wise unto salvation. Concil. Trident. Sess. iv.

— διὰ πίστεως] through faith that is in Christ Jesus. Lest any one should pervert this text into a statement that the Scriptures which Timothy knew as a child (viz. those of the Old Testament) were the things that were sufficient to make him wise unto salvation, now that he had become a man, and now that the Gospel of Christ had been preached to the world and committed to writing, St. Paul adds two assertions,—

(1) that the Old Testament could make him wise unto salvation through faith in Christ, and not otherwise;

(2) that every Scripture, being inspired of God, is profitable, &c.

As to the first of these positions, see the note on v. 16.

As to the second, we may say with Hooker, that "when the Apostle affirmeth unto Timothy, that the Old was able to make him wise to salvation, it was not his meaning that the Old alone can do this unto us which live sithence the publication of the New. For he speaketh with pre-supposal of the doctrine of Christ, known also unto Timothy; and therefore, first, it is said (2 Tim. iii. 14), 'Continue thou in those things which thou hast learned and art persuaded, knowing of whom thou hast been taught them.' Again, those Scriptures he granteth were able to make him wise to salvation; but he addeth (2 Tim. iii. 15), 'through the faith which is in Christ.' Wherefore, without the doctrine of the New Testament, teaching that Christ hath wrought the redemption of the world, which redemption the Old did foreshow he should work, it is not the former alone which can on our behalf perform so much as the Apostle doth avouch, who presupposeth this, when he magnifieth that so highly. And as his words concerning the Books of Ancient Scripture do not take place but with pre-supposal of the Gospel of Christ embraced; so our own words also, when we extol the complete sufficiency of the whole entire body of Scripture, must in like sort be understood with this caution, that the benefit of Nature's light be not thought excluded as unnecessary, because the necessity of a divine light is magnified."

At the same time it is to be borne in mind, that in articles of supernatural truth, which transcend the powers of human Reason, and are the proper objects of Faith, and are necessary to be believed, the Holy Scriptures alone are the things which can make us wise unto salvation. "Propriùs Scripturæ finis est σοφίσαι εἰς σωτηρίαν, sapientes nos reddere ad salutem æternam per fidem quæ est in Christo Jesu. Est ergò Scriptura, quoad supernaturaliter credenda, sola et adæquata Fidei Regula." Bp. Sanderson, Prælect. iv. 15, and so Hooker, II. v. 4, "To urge any thing upon the Church as part of that celestially revealed Truth which God hath taught, and not to show it in Scripture, this did the Ancient Fathers evermore think unlawful, impious, execrable."

This truth has thus been expressed by S. Athanasius, referring to St. Paul's words (cont. Gentes, tom. i. p. 1, ed. Bened.), αὐτάρκεις μὲν γάρ εἰσιν αἱ ἁγίαι καὶ θεόπνευστοι γραφαὶ πρὸς τὴν τῆς ἀληθείας ἀπαγγελίαν: and (ex festali Epistolâ xxxix., tom. ii. p. 962) ταῦτα [βιβλία] πῆγαι τοῦ σωτηρίου, ὥστε τὸν διψῶντα ἐμφορεῖσθαι τῶν ἐν τούτοις λογίων· ἐν τούτοις μόνον τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας διδασκαλεῖον εὐαγγελίζεται· μηδεὶς τούτοις ἐπιβαλλέτω, μηδὲ τούτων ἀφαιρείσθω.

Cp. S. Aug. de Doct. Chr. ii. p. 9, "In iis, quæ apertè in Scripturâ posita sunt inveniuntur illa omnia quæ continent fidem moresque vivendi;" and S. Aug. c. Liter. Petil. iii. p. 6, "Si angelus de cœlo vobis annuntiaverit præterquam (παρ' ὃ Gal. i. 8) quod in Scripturis Legalibus et Evangelicis accepistis, Anathema sit;" and Origen, Hom. v. in Lev. t. ii. p. 212, "In hoc biduo puto duo Testamenta posse intelligi, in quibus licet omne verbum quod ad Deum pertinet requiri et discuti, atque ex ipsis omnem rerum scientiam capi. Si quid autem superfuerit, quod non Divina Scriptura decernat, nullam aliam tertiam Scripturam debere ad auctoritatem scientiæ suscipi;" and S. Hieron. in Aggeum, cap. i., "Quæ absque auctoritate et testimoniis Scripturarum quasi Traditione Apostolicâ sponte reperiunt atque confingunt, percutit gladius Dei." 16. Πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος καὶ ὠφέλιμος] Every Scripture, being inspired of God, is also profitable.

As to the interpretation of the several parts of this important assertion,—

(1) πᾶσα γραφὴ means 'every Scripture,' i. e. every portion of Scripture.

Πᾶς thus placed means 'every.' See Luke iii. 5, πᾶσα πρὸς διδασκαλίαν, πρὸς ἔλεγχον, πρὸς ἐπανόρθωσιν, πρὸς παιδείαν τὴν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ, 17 ἵνα ἄρτιος ᾖ ὁ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἄνθρωπος, πρὸς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἐξηρτισμένος.

φάραγξ. Acts xv. 21, πᾶν σάββατον. Rom. iii. 19, πᾶν στόμα: xiv. 11, πᾶσα γλῶσσα. Phil. ii. 10, πᾶν γόνυ. Cp. Winer, § 18, p. 101.

(2) Γραφὴ always in the New Testament signifies Holy Scripture, i. e. that which has been received by the Church of God, and read as a writing dictated by Almighty God, and distinguished as such from all other writings in the world.

This word Γραφὴ occurs about fifty times in the New Testament; but it is never applied in any one of these fifty passages to any other Writings than those of the Old and New Testament.

Thus it serves the double purpose of declaring,—

(1) that the Writings of the Old and New Testament stand by themselves, as distinguished from all other Writings of the World; and

(2) that the Books of the New Testament are of equal authority with, and from the same origin as those of the Old Testament, which had been received not only by the Jews, but by CHRIST Himself, as the unerring Word of God.

(3) This meaning of the word γραφὴ leads at once to the true interpretation of this passage, which has been sometimes made matter of question;

Since the word γραφὴ itself always signifies in the New Testament a divinely inspired writing, it would be an unmeaning tautology to assert that every Γραφὴ is divinely inspired.

The true rendering of the passage is this: Every portion of Scripture being inspired (i. e. because it is inspired), is also profitable.

(4) This interpretation has already been given by Origen (Hom. xx. in Joshuam. Philocal. c. 12), and so Vulg. and the Latin Fathers, "Omnis Scriptura divinitùs inspirata utilis est," &c., and the Syriac, and many of the best modern Expositors.

— θεόπνευστος] The Scripture itself is here described as animated by and filled with the breath of God. For the examples of the epithet θεόπνευστος, given to living persons, see Wetstein.

The examples cited by some Expositors, where the epithet θεόπνευστος is coupled with mere qualities or lifeless things, e. g. with σοφία or ὄνειρον, are not relevant here.

In those examples, the wisdom or the dream, to which the epithet is annexed, are said to be breathed by God into the person who receives them, but this cannot be predicated of the Scriptures. They are not breathed into us by God. But they themselves are filled with the breath of God. In fact, St. Paul predicates of Scripture what St. Peter predicates of the Writers of Scripture, whom he calls holy men moved by the Spirit of God. (2 Pet. i. 21.)

This is in perfect harmony with the true view which God has given us of the Holy Scriptures. St. Stephen calls them λόγια ζῶντα, living oracles (Acts vii. 38). And the Living Creatures (ζῶα) in Ezekiel (i. 15—21; x. 9—22) and St. John (Rev. iv. 6), full of eyes, winged, and filled with the Spirit, and ever moving, as the Spirit carries them, are heavenly representations of the divine Life and Power of the Everlasting Gospel.

This assertion of St. Paul that πᾶσα γραφὴ, i. e. every portion of Scripture being inspired of God, is also profitable, &c., is of inestimable value and importance.

(1) Consider the time and place in which this declaration is made, viz. about A.D. 67, at the close of this Epistle, the last Epistle written by St. Paul, and written a short time before his martyrdom, and in immediate prospect of it (iv. 6).

(2) At that time all his own Epistles had been written.

(3) Also, it is most probable, that the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke had then been written and published to the world. See above, Introduction to those Gospels, and on 2 Cor. viii. 18, and 1 Tim. v. 18.

(4) Also the Epistle of St. James, who died A.D. 62, and, probably, the first Epistle of St. Peter.

(5) All these are here included in the term Γραφὴ.

St. Paul's brother Apostle, St. Peter, in a passage written also at the close of his life, and at the end of his last Epistle (2 Pet. iii. 16), a passage which forms a happy counterpart to the present text, designates all St. Paul's Epistles as Γραφὰς, Scripture; and combines them with other Books known by that name, as belonging to the same class and of the same authority with them.

(6) This passage, therefore, of St. Paul, proclaims to the world the divine inspiration of every one of these writings—and of St. Paul's own Epistles among the number—which were then known and received as Γραφαὶ by the Church.

As to the few other Books of the New Testament which were written after this period (such as the Revelation and Gospel of St. John), they would never have been admitted into the number of Γραφαὶ by the Church, if she had not been convinced that they were of equal authority with those which had been received by her as γραφαὶ from the hands of Christ, and of St. Peter and St. Paul.

(7) Therefore this text of St. Paul will ever remain as a standing testimony from the divine Apostle, now about to shed his blood for Christ, to the Divine Inspiration of all the Books of the New Testament, as well as of the Old, and will serve as a holy safeguard against all the assaults made upon them by those who deny their divine origin or impugn their unerring veracity.

— καὶ ὠφέλιμος] is also profitable. There is no harshness or awkwardness in the conjunction καὶ here, as has sometimes been alleged. On the contrary, it serves to introduce a necessary caution and a salutary truth;

It propounds a caution against the writings of false teachers and fanatical enthusiasts, who claimed for themselves and their preaching divine inspiration. Such, for instance, was Simon Magus (Acts viii. 10) and other Gnostic γόητες (v. 13), who, on account of their sorceries, as well as their resistance to the truth, are compared to the Egyptian Magicians, Jannes and Jambres, and against whom the Apostle is specially contending in the Pastoral Epistles.

His often repeated denunciation of them and their doctrine in these Epistles is grounded on the fact, that their teaching is not ὠφέλιμος, or profitable, but is κενὴ, ἀνωφελὴς, μάταιος, εἰς οὐδὲν χρήσιμος, empty, vain, and unprofitable (see 1 Tim. vi. 20. 2 Tim. ii. 14. 16. Tit. iii. 9), and that it only makes a show of godliness, but denies the power. (2 Tim. iii. 5. Tit. i. 16.)

On the other hand, St. Paul lays special stress in these Epistles on the necessity of profitable teaching, wholesome doctrine, sound words (1 Tim. i. 10; vi. 3. 2 Tim. i. 13; iv. 3. Tit. i. 9. 13; ii. 1. 8), and of that γνῶσις, or knowledge, which is not ψευδώνυμος, falsely so called (1 Tim. vi. 20), but is in fact the Ἐπίγνωσις, or perfect knowledge of the Truth, an expression four times repeated in these Epistles (1 Tim. ii. 4. 2 Tim. ii. 25; iii. 7. Tit. i. 1), and of that Faith which is fruitful in good works. (1 Tim. vi. 18. 2 Tim. ii. 21; iii. 17. Tit. i. 16; ii. 7. 14; iii. 8. 14.)

Thus, then, his assertion here is twofold; it refutes a dangerous error, and affirms necessary truth. It declares that "every portion of Scripture, being inspired of God (and because it is inspired of God) is also profitable," &c., in order that the man of God may be throughly furnished unto all good works; whereas, on the other hand, whatever the pretensions of the false teachers might be to divine enthusiasm, the very fact that their doctrines were not profitable, but the contrary, and did not train men to good works, but allowed them in unholiness of life, was a practical proof that they were not inspired of God.

— ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ] Not ἐν ἀσεβείᾳ, as that of the false teachers. See ii. 16; iii. 5. 8. 13.

17. ἵνα ἄρτιος ᾖ] The Apostle, being about to be offered up (iv. 6), and now bidding farewell to his beloved son Timothy, who would soon be deprived of his personal presence and advice, refers him to the Holy Scriptures as a never-failing counsellor and guide, which would comfort him after his departure, and make amends for his absence. And if the diligent study of the Holy Scriptures is thus commended by St. Paul in this solemn manner to Timothy, who was himself endued with spiritual gifts of the Holy Ghost, how much more needful is that study to us! (Chrys., Theophyl., Œcumen.)

The force of this observation is strengthened by what has been already remarked, that St. Paul here speaks of Holy Scripture, not as an inanimate thing, but as θεόπνευστος, a living Being, filled with the Spirit of God. The Apostle himself was about to die, and Timothy was to be deprived of his personal presence, but the Word of the Lord endureth for ever (1 Pet. i. 25). The Apostle dies, but the Holy Spirit ever lives in his Epistles, and comforts Timothy and the Church after his departure, even to the end of time.

Well, therefore, might the Apostle, in this farewell Epistle to Timothy and to the Church, fix his and her eyes on the abiding presence of the Holy Ghost the Comforter, ever breathing and ever speaking in the Word of God.

Ch. IV. 1. Διαμαρτύρομαι] I conjure thee. (See 1 Tim. v. 21. 2 Tim. ii. 14.) Elz. adds οὖν ἐγὼ, not in the best authorities; also Elz. has τοῦ Κυρίου after καί.

— καὶ τὴν ἐπιφάνειαν] So A, C, D, F, G, and Griesb., Lach., Tisch., Huther, Ellicott, Alf.—Elz. κατά.

This restoration of καί is a happy one. It indicates that the Apostle has a clear view of Christ's Coming, and of His Kingdom; and, by a noble prosopopœia, appeals to them as Witnesses: I conjure thee in the sight of God, and the Future Judge of all, by His Coming, and by His Kingdom. This mode of speech had been suggested by the Hebrew Scriptures, especially in the LXX Version (Deut. iv. 26), where Moses calls Heaven and Earth to witness: Διαμαρτύρομαι ὑμῖν σήμερον τόν τε οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν. So Deut. iv. 26; xxx. 19; xxxi. 28, where this phrase introduces solemn appeals to the Elements as God's Witnesses of His dealings with His people, and as Remembrancers of their duties to Him.

2. κήρυξον] See Augustine, Serm. 46.

3. κατὰ τὰς ἰδίας ἐπιθυμίας — ἐπισωρεύσουσι] according to their own lusts will heap up to themselves teachers, having itching ears; i. e. because they, the hearers, have itching ears.

Instead of receiving those Teachers who are authorized by Christ to instruct them, and have a regular call and mission from Him to execute their sacred office, and to have spiritual oversight over them, they will stray away from their Pastors, and from their own proper Fold, and will raise up for themselves a confused heap of Teachers, as Jeroboam did, who made a promiscuous multitude of Priests, not of the sons of Levi, but whosoever would be consecrated by him. (1 Kings xii. 31; xiii. 33.)

The word ἐπισωρεύω, aggero (from ἐπὶ and σωρὸς, a mound), is sometimes employed to describe an action by which a person heaps up something injurious to himself, so as to overwhelm himself by that very thing which he has heaped up. So Chrys. (Ep. 92), ἑαυτοῖς ἐπισωρεύοντες κόλασιν, and ἑαυτοῖς ἐπισωρεύουσι τὸ πῦρ ἄσβεστον. See examples in Suicer in voce.

It also describes the work of an Enemy, raising up a mound against (ἐπὶ) a City in order to assault it. Cp. Isa. xxxvii. 33.

In the Song of Solomon, Symmachus has ἐπισωρεύσατέ μοι ἀγάπην, "raise Love as a mound with a banner against me," where the LXX have τάξατε.

Hence it appears, that the Apostle regards this promiscuous multitude of teachers as an offensive outwork thrown up by hostile hands to beleaguer the Church of God. His words may also intimate, that this outwork will prove injurious to those who raise it, as the Tower of Babel, the type of all works of Confusion, Pride, and Aggression against God and His Church, did to its builders; or, as in heathen mythology (in the pagan paraphrase of the Scriptural History of Babel), the Mountains heaped up by the Giants against the Powers of Heaven did to those who raised them.

— κνηθόμενοι τὴν ἀκοήν] having itching ears. It would seem that the Apostle now adopts another metaphor, and is comparing these persons, who have lost their healthful relish for sound doctrine, and who, in their prurient craving for something new, to stimulate and gratify their diseased appetite, accumulate to themselves a promiscuous heap of self-chosen Teachers,—to animals, especially unclean ones, who raise up for themselves a heap against which they scrape the diseased irritation of their skin, particularly their ears. The metaphor is found in Greek and Latin Authors, who describe sophistical Teachers, and others who sought to flatter and gratify their hearers by novelties, as κνήθοντας τὰ ὦτα, 'scalpentes auditorum aures.' See the passages quoted by Wetstein, p. 365.

4. μύθους] fables. See 1 Tim. i. 4; iv. 7. Tit. i. 14.

6. σπένδομαι] I am being poured out as a σπονδὴ, a libation or drink-offering to God. See Gen. xxxv. 14, ἔσπεισεν Ἰακὼβ ἐπ' αὐτῇ σπονδήν. Exod. xxix. 40. Numb. xxviii. 7. And compare St. Paul's words (Phil. ii. 17), εἰ καὶ σπένδομαι ἐπὶ τῇ θυσίᾳ καὶ λειτουργίᾳ τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν, where see note, and the Introduction to that Epistle, p. 333.

S. Ignatius, in his desire for martyrdom, imitates the language of St. Paul, πλέον μοι μὴ παράσχησθε τοῦ σπονδισθῆναι Θεῷ. Tertullian (contra Gnosticos, 13), referring to this passage, says, "Vides, quam martyrii definiat felicitatem, cui de gaudio mutuo acquirit solennitatem, ut proximus denique voti sui factus est, qualiter de prospectu ejus exultans scribit Timotheo, Ego enim jam liber."

This triumphant exultation of the Apostle at the prospect of death was doubtless designed, among other reasons, to show the Heathen that they had not conquered him, or injured the Gospel which he preached, by putting him to death. They might be inclined to imagine that his claims to miraculous powers, and to supernatural aid for himself and his Cause, were illusory, or he would have exerted them in his own behalf. He shows them that Death to him was Victory. He would also assure the Christians, who might be perplexed and staggered by his suffering, that their Apostle regarded death as a blessed release, and as the appointed passage to Everlasting Glory, and that it had no bitterness for him, but that he was enabled by God's grace to rejoice in it.

— ὁ καιρὸς τῆς ἐμῆς ἀναλύσεως ἐφέστηκε] the season of my departure is come. Ἀνάλυσις is departure (Luke xii. 36) from life. (Phil. i. 23.) The καιρὸς ἀναλύσεως is the season of loosing the cable from this earthly shore, on a voyage to the eternal harbour of heavenly peace. Hence Clemens R. 44, says of the faithful departed, τελείαν ἔσχον ἀνάλυσιν.

8. ἀπόκειταί μοι ὁ τῆς δικαιοσύνης στέφανος] there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness. St. Paul was now on the eve of Martyrdom. He did not speak in these terms of confident assurance before. See 1 Cor. ix. 17. Phil. iii. 11.

9. ταχέως] quickly. Before winter (v. 21), when the voyage would be dangerous. (Acts xxvii. 9.)

10. Δημᾶς] Demas, who had remained faithful to St. Paul in his first imprisonment at Rome (Philem. 24. Col. iv. 14), had now been alarmed by the greater severity, and more perilous prospects of the second, following on the savage Neronian persecution of the Christians, and had forsaken the Apostle.

— με ἐγκατέλιπεν] forsook me in (ἐν) the crisis of my suffering. The aorist tense intimates that the act was occasioned by some special danger which threatened the Apostle; and that Demas, terrified by it, deserted him in the hour of peril. A, C, D, E, F, G, L have the imperfect tense here, i. e. was forsaking me. This may, perhaps, be the true reading; but the confusions of ει and ι are so common in MSS. on account of the identity of sound in ancient pronunciation, that not much stress can be laid on this variation. The sense will not be affected by it. The same variation is found in v. 16, and even in v. 13, where A, C, F, G, I have ἀπέλειπον, which can hardly be the true reading.

— ἀγαπήσας τὸν νῦν αἰῶνα] having loved the present world. Cp. S. Polycarp (ad Phil. 9), who says, Obey the word of righteousness which ye beheld with your eyes in the blessed Ignatius, and Zosimus, and Rufus, and in Paul himself, and the other Apostles; being persuaded that they have not run in vain, and are now with the Lord in the place prepared for them; for they loved not this present world, οὐ γὰρ ἠγάπησαν τὸν νῦν αἰῶνα.

— Θεσσαλονίκην] Thessalonica, where St. Paul had many enemies, especially among the Jews. (Acts xvii. 5. 13.)

— Κρήσκης εἰς Γαλατίαν] Crescens to Galatia, to confirm the Church there. Observe the disinterested and paternal solicitude of the great Apostle, in his chains, for the distant Churches. He consented to be left alone by Titus, Crescens, and Tychicus (v. 12), in order that he might comfort them, and he would not send for Timothy from Ephesus without providing him a substitute (v. 12).

— Τίτος εἰς Δαλματίαν] Titus to Dalmatia, perhaps despatched thither by St. Paul on a missionary journey after his visit to Nicopolis in Epirus, where St. Paul probably passed a winter, perhaps the winter preceding the date of the present Epistle. (See Tit. iii. 13.)

11. Λουκᾶς ἐστι μόνος μετ' ἐμοῦ] Luke is alone with me. Alone of his usual fellow-travellers: for other friends were with him now. (See v. 21.) It would seem, therefore, unreasonable to conclude from this sentence, that St. Peter was not now at Rome.

On the testimony hence accruing to St. Luke's historical veracity, see Irenæus, iii. 14.

This mention of St. Luke, as still present with St. Paul at Rome at the close of his life, and probably remaining with him till his Martyrdom, suggests the inquiry—

Why did not St. Luke, the Historian of the Acts of the Apostles, the faithful friend and fellow-traveller of St. Paul, whose doings occupy so large a portion of that Book, continue his narrative even to that glorious consummation of the great Apostle's career? This question has been considered above in the Introduction to the Acts of the Apostles, pp. xii, xiii; and see on Acts xxviii. 30, 31.

— Μάρκον—διακονίαν] On the import of this commendation of Mark, as profitable for ministering to the Apostle, see above on Col. iv. 10. And on St. Mark's history see Introductory Note to St. Mark's Gospel, and below on 1 Pet. v. 13, where he is mentioned as present with that Apostle.

12. Τύχικον—εἰς Ἔφεσον] I send Tychicus (perhaps with this letter) to take thy place at Ephesus during the time in which thou wilt be absent from thy post there in order to come to me at Rome (v. 9. 21). Be therefore at ease on that account, and come quickly. Cp. above on Tit. iii. 12.

This public mention of Tychicus as sent by the Apostle to Ephesus, was doubtless designed to serve a double purpose,

(1) To protect Tychicus from the charge of having forsaken the Apostle at Rome as Demas had done. Cp. note above on Col. iv. 12, and here below, v. 20.

(2) To commend him to the reverent reception and regard of the Ephesian Church.

Tychicus, a native of Asia (Acts xx. 4), had already been employed and approved by St. Paul in the execution of important commissions to the Churches of Asia, particularly to Ephesus, and the neighbouring Church of Colossæ. (Eph. vi. 21. Col. iv. 7.)

13. φελόνην κ.τ.λ.] the cloak which I left at Troas with Carpus, bring with thee when thou comest, and the books, especially the parchments. The φελόνη, 'pænula,' is a cloak with long sleeves, especially for winter use, "such as travellers wore to defend themselves with from the cold or bad weather." (Bp. Bull.) Cp. v. 21; and Horat. 1 Ep. xi. 18. Juvenal, Sat. v. 79, Schol. in Pers. Sat. 68, "pallium cum fimbriis longis;" and for journeys, and in rain. Lamprid. in Alex. Sever. p. 366. Wetstein.

The other meaning assigned to the word, 'a chest for books,' has little to support it here.

On this text, especially in relation to the books and parchments, see Bp. Bull's Sermon x. on "human means useful to inspired persons." Vol. i. p. 240.

Besides, this mention of these minor details, the cloak, the books, and the parchments, here specified soon after those glowing aspirations for martyrdom, and those fervent anticipations of glory in the verses immediately preceding (v. 6—8), is very affecting, interesting, and instructive, as showing that those aspirations and anticipations were not a result of fanatical enthusiasm, but were the words of truth and soberness.

These minor matters give a beautiful relief of quiet serenity to the stirring scene of the great Apostle's Martyrdom.

— ὃν ἀπέλιπον ἐν Τρωάδι παρὰ Κάρπῳ—μεμβράνας] which I left at Troas with Carpus. St. Paul, a short time before this Epistle was written, had been at Miletus. (See v. 20.) It is probable that he was then apprehended, or already in custody, and was sent as a prisoner to Rome for trial, and, if convicted, for execution. See above on i. 15, and below, v. 14—16.

The case of the Apostle seems to have found afterwards a parallel in that of S. Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, in the Persecution under Trajan. Ignatius was arrested in the Province of Syria, at Antioch. (Mart. Ignat. § 2, p. 560, ed. Jacobson.) He was there tried before the Emperor Trajan, and thence sent to Rome. And when he was condemned to this deportation he exclaimed, "I thank Thee, O Lord, that Thou hast honoured me by Thy Love, in binding me in iron chains with Thy Apostle Paul." From Antioch he went along the coast of Asia by Ephesus, from which he had received a deputation in the person of its Bishop Onesimus (ad Eph. i.), to Smyrna, where he had an interview with the Bishop of Smyrna, Polycarp, the disciple of St. John; and thence he sailed along the coast of Asia to Troas. From Troas, Ignatius came to Neapolis, and so by Philippi through Macedonia to Epidamnus on foot, and thence by sea to Puteoli; and he desired to go from Puteoli by land in the footsteps of St. Paul. But he was carried by sea to Portus Romanus, near Ostia, and so came to Rome, where he was martyred (§ 6).

It seems probable, that the occasion and circumstances of St. Paul's last journey from Asia to Rome bore much resemblance to those of the voyage of S. Ignatius from Antioch to the same capital.

Indeed, there is a remarkable passage in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians, in which he compares himself in this respect to St. Paul, and seems to intimate that St. Paul as well as himself was a prisoner when he passed by Ephesus to Rome. "Ye (he says) are the πάροδος, or passage, of those who are being killed for God; ye are the fellow-votaries of Paul in the mysteries of the Gospel, the sanctified, the attested, the blessed Paul, under whose footstep may I be found when I attain to God!"

Ignatius received a deputation from the Ephesian Church by Onesimus, its Bishop; so, probably, did St. Paul by Timothy. Both sailed along the coast of Asia, and both touched at Troas.

If this was the case, then we may suppose that St. Paul, now in custody, deposited his cloak and books and parchments with Carpus, in order that they might be in safe keeping; and that now, in foresight of martyrdom, he asks Timothy, his faithful friend, to call for them at Troas, in his way from Ephesus to Rome, in order that St. Paul might have the disposal of them,—not only for his own use, but as bequests to his friends, perhaps to Timothy himself.

Hence the transition is very natural to the circumstances mentioned in the seven following verses, which refer (it would seem) to what had occurred to him in Asia, just before he was sent to Rome.

14—18.] Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil: of whom be thou ware also: for he greatly withstood our words. A, C, D* have ἀντέστη. F, G ἀνθέστη.—Elz. has ἀνθέστηκε, with D, E, I, K.

At my first defence, no one stood by me: but all men forsook me (as to the reading see v. 10),—may it not be laid to their charge! But the Lord stood by me, and strengthened me, that the Gospel might be fully preached, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered from the mouth of the Lion. He here speaks of the malignant treatment he had received from Alexander the coppersmith, who did him much evil, ἐνεδείξατο =

22 Ὁ Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματός σου. ἡ χάρις μεθ' ὑμῶν.

'fecit publicè.' Cp. Augustine, iii. 540. Probably this occurred in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, and therefore St. Paul here charges Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus, to beware of him. See on 2 Tim. i. 15.

This seems to have been on the critical occasion of his πρώτη ἀπολογία, the 'first defence' (specified in v. 16), when no man stood by him, and when many thirsted for his blood.

Some indeed have supposed, that he meant thereby his first defence at Rome, when sent thither from Cæsarea. (Acts xxviii. 16.) But as Chrys. observes (Prol. ad Philipp.; cp. Tillemont, i. 129), this is not probable. He is speaking of some more recent peril in Asia.

Then, perhaps, not figuratively, but actually, he was delivered from the mouth of the Lion; as seems to have been the case with him on a former occasion in Asia, at Ephesus (see on 1 Cor. xv. 32), and as S. Polycarp afterwards was, in the persecution of the Asiatic Christians at Smyrna. It is recorded of Polycarp, that the multitude of the Gentiles and Jews (who were foremost in the outrage against him) clamoured to the Asiarch Philip, ἵνα ἐπαφῇ τῷ Πολυκάρπῳ λέοντα, 'that he would let loose on Polycarp a Lion.' (Martyr. Polycarp. 12.) And the popular cry of the Heathen in times of persecution was "Christianos ad Leonem." Tertullian, Apol. 40.

The phrase the Lion's mouth is used in another place by St. Paul, and there it is not figurative, but literal. (Heb. xi. 33.) Perhaps the Apostle St. Paul had the comfort of being able to compare himself in this respect with the Prophet Daniel.

The Apostle was delivered from the Lion's mouth, and was sent on to Rome, in order to suffer there. And thus his testimony to Christ, first by his public defence in Asia, and subsequently by his public trial and glorious Martyrdom in the great Metropolis of the Heathen World, was made subservient to the consummation of the Gospel, and to the diffusion of a knowledge of the truth "to all Nations" of the World.

In v. 14, A, C, D*, E*, F, G have ἀποδώσει.—Elz. has ἀποδώῃ, and v. 17, ἀκούσῃ.

18. καὶ ῥύσεται—βασιλείαν—ἀμήν] Apparently an adaptation of the final sentences and the Doxology of the Lord's Prayer. See on Acts xxi. 14.

19. Ἄσπασαι Πρίσκαν—Ὀνησιφόρου οἶκον] Salute Prisca and Aquila and the household of Onesiphorus. His mind is still in Asia. See i. 16; and as to Priscilla and Aquila, see above on Rom. xvi. 3.

20. Ἔραστος—Τρόφιμον] Erastus remained at Corinth, but Trophimus I left at Miletus sick. Here are two other touching instances of the tender thoughtfulness of the great Apostle for his friends, and their good name, at the time of his own imminent peril, and severest sufferings, in imitation of the Great Exemplar. (John xviii. 8; xix. 26.)

After his mention of his perils, and of his desertion by Demas and others (iv. 10. 16; i. 15), it might perhaps have been inferred by some, that others who had been his chosen fellow-workers, and were now absent from him, had also forsaken him. Therefore he takes care to protect them against such an imputation. He mentions first the faithfulness of Luke, and next accounts for the absence of Titus and Tychicus (v. 10. 12), and he now explains the reason also of the absence of Erastus and Trophimus. Erastus, thy former companion in Greece (Acts xix. 22; cp. Rom. xvi. 23), abode at Corinth. He remained at his post in that great city where are many adversaries (Acts xviii. 6), and where he is exposed to many dangers as my friend. This word μένω here expresses courageous firmness and patient endurance under trial, as in other places. See iii. 14. Cp. προσμένω in 1 Tim. i. 3; v. 5. And the aorist probably intimates, that when St. Paul quitted Corinth on some recent visit to that city, he left Erastus in charge there; and that he tarried there, in obedience to the Apostle's injunction.

So likewise Trophimus. He was an Ephesian, and was specially obnoxious to the Ephesian Jews (Acts xxi. 29; cp. Acts xx. 4). They would have rejoiced to be able to allege that he had deserted St. Paul. After the Apostle's death, which was now near at hand, some calumnious persons would have alleged, that if Trophimus had not seen cause to separate himself from St. Paul, he would not have stayed behind at Miletus, but would have accompanied the Apostle to Rome. St. Paul, therefore, obviates such aspersions as these; and it was a happy thing for Trophimus, the Ephesian, that Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus, received these words from St. Paul's own hand, which enabled him to clear Trophimus from any such detractions, and to show that the stay of Trophimus at Miletus was necessitated by sickness, perhaps caused by sufferings and labours in the cause of the Gospel, and that he had not left St. Paul, but that St. Paul left him at Miletus.

21. Πούδης] Pudens. See the Essay of Archdeacon Williams, in which he endeavours to prove that the Pudens and Claudia here specified are the same persons as those mentioned in Martial (iv. 13; xi. 34), and that Claudia was daughter of Cogidunus, a British Chief, and that having come to Rome she was converted to Christianity, and was married to Pudens, and afterwards returned with her husband to Britain, where he held lands under her father Cogidunus. (See Williams's Discourses and Essays, p. 132—190. Lond. 1857, and also Dean Alford's Excursus iii. p. 104.) If this was so, this Epistle was written before their marriage; otherwise, the name of Linus would hardly have been inserted between them. Cp. Lightfoot, in Journal of Class. and Sacred Philol. Vol. iv. p. 73—76.

— Λίνος] Linus, of whom Irenæus thus speaks: After that the blessed Apostles (Peter and Paul) had founded the Church (at Rome), they committed the Bishopric of that city to Linus. This Linus is mentioned by St. Paul in his Epistles to Timothy. He was succeeded by Anacletus. And in the third place from the Apostles, Clement received the Episcopate of that city, a person who had beheld the blessed Apostles, and had enjoyed intercourse with them, and had their preaching still sounding in his ears. S. Irenæus (iii. 3. 3). See above, note on Phil. iv. 3.

PREFACE.

THE CATHOLIC or GENERAL EPISTLES,—probably so called because they are not inscribed to any particular Churches [1],—have an intimate connexion with the Epistles of St. Paul, and with each other.

The Epistles of St. Paul, as has been already observed [2], ought not to be regarded as separate compositions without mutual coherence, but as connected together, and as forming an harmonious system of Apostolic instruction in Christian Faith and Practice.

Accordingly, those Epistles will be studied with the greatest profit, when read in chronological order.

The Epistles of St. Paul receive also additional light from the Catholic Epistles, and reflect much light upon them.

The Epistles of St. Paul to the Galatians and Romans, for example, cannot be duly understood, unless they are viewed in connexion with the General Epistle of St. James; and on the other hand, the Epistle of St. James may perhaps be liable to misapprehension, unless set in juxtaposition with the Epistles of St. Paul to the Galatians and to the Romans.

But when those Epistles of the two holy Apostles are placed together, they will be found to be adjusted to each other, and to fit in to each other with nice accuracy and exact precision; and, when thus combined, they form a complete body of Apostolic doctrine on the great article of Justification; and they afford a sufficient safeguard against erroneous teaching from two opposite sides, by which that doctrine has been assailed. This will be more fully demonstrated in the Introduction to the Epistle of St. James [3].

In like manner, the two General Epistles of St. Peter have a near relation to the Epistles of St. Paul. They add strength and support to them, and are strengthened and supported by them.

St. Peter's First General Epistle bears a remarkable resemblance to St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians; and St. Peter's Second General Epistle occupies a similar place to that which is filled by St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians. In the doctrinal substance of his teaching, and in the practical application of the great principles of the Christian Faith to moral and social Duty, St. Peter, in his First Epistle to the Jewish Christians, exhibits his perfect agreement with the Apostle of the Gentiles in his exhortations to the great Gentile Church of Ephesus. In his Second General Epistle, St. Peter adds force and solemnity to the warnings of St. Paul to the Churches of Phrygia, concerning the immoral consequences arising from heretical denials or perversions of those Christian doctrines, which were propounded by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians, and by St. Peter himself in his First General Epistle.

Thus the two great Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, are seen standing side by side, teaching the same divine verities, and uttering the same cautions against corruptions of the Faith.

The proof of this statement will be submitted to the reader's consideration in the Introduction to the Second Epistle of St. Peter[1].

On one grave question St. Peter had, upon one occasion, differed from St. Paul. That difference arose in a discussion concerning the terms and conditions, upon which the Gentile converts were to be received into the Christian Church.

The circumstances of that controversy between the two Apostles have been narrated by St. Paul in one of his Epistles, the Epistle to the Galatians[2].

St. Peter addressed his First Epistle to the Asiatic Christians; and he particularizes the Galatians as among those to whom he writes[3].

It is remarkable, that in this Epistle St. Peter adopts the very words which are used by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians, concerning that same question which had formerly been an occasion of altercation between them[4].

It is also observable, that St. Peter, in his Second Epistle, written to the same parties as the first[5], and written also a little before his own death[6], and, consequently, a little before the death of his brother Apostle, St. Paul, who suffered martyrdom at Rome about the same time as St. Peter[7], declares his own affectionate regard for his "beloved brother Paul," and commends "all his Epistles" as "Scripture[8]."

Thus the Holy Spirit, speaking by the mouth of St. Peter a little before his decease, declares the divine Inspiration of St. Paul's Epistles; and by the gifts and graces of faith and love, peace and joy, patience and courage, poured into St. Peter's heart, He enabled him to unite with his brother Apostle, St. Paul, in preaching the same Faith, and in sealing that testimony with his blood.

The Catholic or General Epistles possess also a peculiar interest in their mutual relation to each other.

[8] See note below on 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.

The writer of the first of these Epistles is St. James, the Lord's brother, the first Bishop of Jerusalem, who died a Martyr to the faith in that city [1].

St. James, as we have seen, connects the Catholic Epistles with St. Paul's. St. Peter in his First Epistle often adopts the language of St. James [2].

The Holy Spirit, writing by St. Jude, the brother of St. James, frequently reiterates the language of St. Peter's Second Epistle [3]; and displays the fulfilment of the prophecies which had been delivered in that Epistle of St. Peter.

There is also good reason to believe, that the Second Epistle of St. John has an intimate relation, of a very interesting kind, to the First Epistle of St. Peter [4].

Thus those Epistles are connected together in a sacred network, and are woven together in a beautiful and almost seamless texture of substance and expression.

Each of these General Epistles performs also its appointed and appropriate work.

St. James confutes the errors of those who imagined that a speculative knowledge of religion, and theoretical profession of belief, is acceptable to God, irrespectively of practical piety; and he exhibits Christian Faith in its true character as the essential energizing principle of Christian Life.

St. Peter, in his First Epistle, follows St. James, and builds up, as it were, a systematic structure of moral duty on the solid foundation of Christian Faith. He applies the doctrines of the Gospel to the social and domestic relations of Rulers and Subjects, Husbands and Wives, Masters and Servants.

In his Second Epistle, St. Peter condemns the erroneous tenets of heretical Teachers, who denied the doctrines of Christ's Godhead and Incarnation, and of the Atonement made by Him on the Cross, and he exposes the immoral consequences of those tenets, and displays the licentious profligacy of those Teachers and their adherents.

St. Jude in his Epistle completes the work of St. Peter. He recalls the attention of the Church to St. Peter's prophetical warnings, and points out the fulfilment of St. Peter's Apostolic forebodings [5].

St. John also, in his Epistles, had a special function to discharge.

His brother Apostles, St. Peter and St. Jude, had denounced the proud presumption, the anarchical lawlessness, and the carnal sensuality of heretical Teachers. St. John deals with the heresies concerning the Manhood and Divinity of Christ [6], in their theological bearings on the whole body of Christian Doctrine. He shows that those heresies corrode and fret away, like a canker, the very vitals of Christian Theology, and destroy the very essence of Christian Faith, Hope, and Charity.

"Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father [7]." "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life [8]." "This is His commandment, that we should believe on the name of His Son Jesus Christ, and love one another[1]." "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent His Son to be a propitiation for our sins. Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another[2]." Here is the strongest motive to Christian holiness. "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God. Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is. And every one that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself, even as He is pure[3]."

The Catholic Epistles, thus contemplated, in relation to St. Paul's Epistles, and to each other, are recognized as mutually auxiliary and suppletory to each other; and minister salutary cautions to every age, against heretical error, sectarian divisions and antinomian licence; and constitute a divinely-organized system of instruction in Christian Doctrine and Practice; and approve themselves to be works of the same Divine Spirit, "dividing to every one severally as He will[4]."

Thus the Holy Apostles of Christ are seen standing together like beautiful statues, each in its own niche, on the front of some venerable Minster; and join together in the harmonious consent of one Faith, and in grateful ascriptions of glory to God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. "HOLY, HOLY, HOLY, Lord God of Sabaoth; Heaven and Earth are full of Thy Majesty. The glorious Company of the Apostles praise Thee."

The further elucidation of this subject in detail is reserved for the Introductions prefixed to the several Epistles.

The relation of the APOCALYPSE, or REVELATION of St. John, to the other parts of Holy Scripture, will be considered in the Introduction and Notes to that Book[5].

Recent events appear to be imparting a fresh interest of solemn importance to some portions of the Apocalypse. It may be not irrelevant to mention, that the Notes upon it in the present Volume were written before their occurrence.

The Editor now reverently commits the last portion of his labours on the New Testament to the gracious favour and blessing of the Divine Author of Holy Scripture, with a devout tribute of thankfulness to Him for His great mercy and goodness in enabling him to bring the work to a close, and with fervent and earnest supplication and prayer, that He would vouchsafe to accept it as an offering of praise, and that He would be pleased to make it subservient and ministerial to His own Glory, and to the salvation of souls, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

FROM THE BIRTH OF CHRIST TO THE END OF THE FIRST CENTURY.

Birth of JESUS CHRIST probably A.U.C. 749, four years before the common era. See on Matt. ii. 20.
Presentation in the Temple, forty days after the Nativity.
Visit of the Wise Men.
Flight into Egypt.
Herod's death, a little before the Passover, A.U.C. 750.
Settlement at Nazareth.
On the sequence of these events, see above on Matt. ii. 9.

A.D.

8. Jesus is catechized in the Temple (Luke ii. 42—49).
14. Death of the Emperor Augustus (19th August). Tiberius succeeds.
26. Jesus Christ begins His Ministry (Luke iii. 23; cp. notes on Matt. ii. 9. 20).
30. The Crucifixion of Christ at the Passover.
His Ascension, forty days after His Resurrection.
The Descent of the Holy Spirit at the Feast of Pentecost fifty days after the Passover.
31, 32. The Events described in Chapters iii.—vi. of the Acts of the Apostles.
33. St. Stephen's Martyrdom (Acts vii.). Saul was then a νεανίας (vii. 58).
St. Philip's Missionary Journey (Acts viii. 5—40).
St. Peter and St. John at Samaria. Simon Magus (Acts viii. 14—24).
34. Saul's Conversion (Acts ix. 1—22): cp. Euseb. H. E. ii. 1; and see note below on 1 Tim. i. 13.
Saul retires to Arabia (Gal. i. 17).
36. Pontius Pilate is recalled from his procuratorship in Judæa (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4. 2).
Damascus occupied by Aretas, who appoints an Ethnarch there.
37. "After many days" (ix. 23), Saul escapes from Damascus.
Goes up to Jerusalem; where he remains fifteen days, and sees Peter and James (Gal. i. 18, 19. Acts ix. 26, 27); and disputes with the Grecians; Saul is sent to Tarsus (ix. 30).
The Emperor Tiberius dies 16th March; Caligula succeeds.
38—41. "Rest of the Churches" (Acts ix. 31).
St. Peter's Missionary Journey (ix. 32—43). He tarries at Joppa many days (ix. 43).
Conversion and Baptism of Cornelius and other Gentiles at Cæsarea (Acts x. 1—48).
41. The Emperor Caligula dies 24th January, and is succeeded by Claudius.
St. Matthew's Gospel written probably about this time (cp. Introduction, p. xlix—lii, and note on Acts i. 4).
43. Euodius, first Bishop of Antioch (Euseb. Chron. ii. p. 269. Clinton, F. R. App. ii. p. 548).
The Disciples first called CHRISTIANS at Antioch (Acts xi. 26).
44. The Apostle St. James, the brother of John, is killed with the sword (Acts xii. 2), and St. Peter is imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, before Easter (xii. 4). Peter is delivered; and Herod is smitten by an Angel, and dies at Cæsarea (xii. 23).
St. Peter departs from Jerusalem "to another place" (xii. 17).

A.D.

44. Saul and Barnabas having been deputed by the Christians at Antioch (xi. 27—30) to bring supplies to the brethren in Judæa, on account of the anticipation of the famine foretold by Agabus, which "came to pass in the reign of Claudius Cæsar" (xi. 28), i. e. after January, A.D. 41, returned from Jerusalem to Antioch, with John Mark, who was connected with Peter (xii. 12), and with Barnabas. (See on xv. 39.)

45. The Ordination of Saul and Barnabas, at Antioch, to the Apostleship of the Gentiles. (See on xiii. 1.) Saul is henceforth called Paul. (See Acts. xiii. 9.) St. Paul's "Visions and Revelations of the Lord" seem to have been vouchsafed to him at this time. (See on 2 Cor. xii. 2, 3.)

Their first Missionary Journey to Cyprus (Paphos), and Pisidia, and Perga in Pamphylia (xiii. 4—13), whence Mark returns to Jerusalem. They visit Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra; return to Perga in Pamphylia, and thence come back to the place of their ordination, Antioch, where they remain a considerable time with the disciples (Acts xiv. 26—28).

49. A controversy arises at Antioch concerning the obligation of the Ceremonial Law (xv. 1, 2).

Paul and Barnabas, and some others, are deputed to go from Antioch to Jerusalem, "to the Apostles and Elders," concerning this matter (xv. 2, 3).

50, 51. Council of Jerusalem, at which Peter and James, Paul and Barnabas, are present (xv. 6—29).

Paul and Barnabas return to Antioch, where they remain some time (xv. 35, 36). Dispute of St. Paul and St. Peter at Antioch, concerning the Ceremonial Law. St. Peter is rebuked by St. Paul (Gal. ii. 11—13).

The altercation and separation of Paul and Barnabas (Acts xv. 39).

Paul takes Silas (xv. 40) on his second Missionary Journey, and afterwards Timothy also at Lystra (xvi. 1).

52—54. St. Paul passes through Phrygia and Galatia to Troas (xvi. 6. 8). Thence crosses over to Philippi (xvi. 12), Thessalonica (xvii. 1), Berœa (xvii. 10); thence to Athens (xvii. 15).

St. Luke's Gospel written probably about this time. See the Introduction to that Gospel, p. 168, and notes on 1 Thess. v. 2. 27, and 2 Cor. viii. 18; and cp. Clem. Alex. in Euseb. vi. 14.

St. Paul comes to Corinth, where he spends a year and six months (xviii. 1. 11).

Aquila and Priscilla come to Corinth.

St. Paul writes his two Epistles to the Thessalonians. See the Introduction to those Epistles, pp. 1, 2, and 25.

Epistle to the Galatians written probably about this time from Corinth. See the Introduction to that Epistle, pp. 36—41.

St. Paul sets sail from Cenchreæ in the spring for Ephesus, on his way to Jerusalem, for the feast, probably Pentecost (xviii. 18, 19).

The Emperor Claudius dies (13th October, A.D. 57), and Nero succeeds.

After a short visit at Jerusalem (xviii. 21),

St. Paul returns by way of Antioch, where he spends some time (xviii. 22), and Galatia and Phrygia, where he confirms all the disciples (xviii. 23), and by the upper regions of Asia Minor (xix. 1) to Ephesus; where he spends three years (xx. 31)—three months in the Synagogue, and two years in the school of Tyrannus (xix. 8—10).

57. First Epistle to the Corinthians. See Introduction to that Epistle, pp. 75—77.

St. Paul, after three years' stay at Ephesus, quits it for Macedonia (xx. 1).

Second Epistle to the Corinthians. See Introduction to that Epistle, p. 143.

Comes into Hellas, and spends three months there (xx. 3).

58. Epistle to the Romans, written at Corinth or Cenchreæ. See Introduction to it, p. 203.

St. Paul returns to Macedonia in the Spring, and arrives at Philippi for Easter (xx. 6).

Passes over to Troas (xx. 6). Touches at Miletus, where he bids farewell to the Presbyters of Ephesus, and gives them an Apostolic charge (xx. 17), and Tyre (xxi. 3), and lands at Cæsarea (xxi. 8). Comes to Jerusalem after several years (xxiv. 17), for the Feast of Pentecost (xx. 16; xxi. 17), and brings with him the alms (Acts xxiv.) which he had been collecting in Asia and Greece for the poor Saints at Jerusalem. (Rom. xv.

25, 26. I Cor. xvi. 1; see on 2 Cor. viii. 18; ix. 1—12.) He is accompanied by St. Luke now and till his arrival in Rome, A.D. 61; see also below on A.D. 67.

58. St. Paul is arrested by Jews at Jerusalem in the Temple (xxi. 28).

Is conveyed to Cæsarea (xxiii. 23—33).

58—60. Remains two years in detention at Cæsarea (xxiv. 27).

Epistle General of St. James. See below, p. 12.

St. Paul is sent by Festus, in the Autumn of A.D. 60, by sea toward Rome (xxvii. 1); is accompanied in his voyage by St. Luke and Aristarchus.

Winters at Malta (xxviii. 11).

61. Spring: St. Paul arrives, with St. Luke, at Rome.

62. Martyrdom of St. James the Bishop of Jerusalem, at the Passover. See below, p. 12, and Chronological Synopsis prefixed to the Acts, p. 25.

62, 63. St. Paul is at Rome, where he writes the Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians (see Introduction to Ephesians, p. 269), and to Philemon, in which he calls himself "Paul the aged" (Philem. 9. See above on A.D. 33), and that to the Philippians at the close of his imprisonment, A.D. 63.

Is detained at Rome for "two whole years," till the Spring of A.D. 63 (xxviii. 30); where the History of the "Acts of the Apostles" concludes: cp. Euseb. ii. 22.

64. St. Paul, after his liberation from his first imprisonment at Rome, goes probably to Spain, and perhaps even to Britain. See on Rom. xv. 24. 28, and the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, pp. 418—421.

Writes the Epistle to the Hebrews.

In the Summer of A.D. 64, the first Persecution of the Christians at Rome under the Emperor Nero begins. See Introduction to the Epistles to Timothy, p. 417, note.

St. Peter at Babylon, writes his First General Epistle; and soon afterwards travels westward towards Rome. See the Introduction to St. Peter's First Epistle, below, pp. 36—44, and p. 69. St. Mark and Silvanus or Silas are with him, when he writes his First Epistle. See on 1 Pet. v. 12, 13, and pp. 43, 44.

65—67. St. Paul returns from the West in his way to Jerusalem, probably with Timothy (Heb. xiii. 23). Perhaps leaves Titus at Crete in his way to Jerusalem; and after his visit to Jerusalem performs his promise of visiting Colossæ in Phrygia (Philem. 22).

On his way to Macedonia, to visit Philippi, according to his promise (Phil. ii. 24), he commands Timothy to "abide at Ephesus" as chief Pastor there (1 Tim. i. 3).

First Epistle to Timothy, Bishop of Ephesus. See the Introduction to that Epistle, p. 420.

Epistle to Titus, Bishop of Crete.

St. Paul passes a winter at Nicopolis in Epirus (Tit. iii. 12).

Probably visits Corinth, where Erastus was left in charge (2 Tim. iv. 20).

Comes to Asia, where he left Trophimus at Miletus (2 Tim. iv. 20).

Perhaps saw Timothy at Miletus. Cp. 2 Tim. i. 3.

St. Paul is arrested, probably near Miletus, and is sent a prisoner to Rome. See the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, and notes on 2 Tim. i. 4. 13; iv. 13—17.

Touches at Troas (2 Tim. iv. 13) in his way to Rome.

St. Paul, in close custody at Rome, writes the Second Epistle to Timothy. St. Luke is with him, and he sends for St. Mark (2 Tim. iv. 11).

St. Peter's Second General Epistle written about this time. See below, p. 69.

St. Mark's Gospel written probably about this time. See Introduction to that Gospel, p. 112.

The Emperor Nero dies on the 9th of June, in the thirty-first year of his age; is succeeded by Galba.

69. The Emperor Galba dies on the 15th January, and is succeeded by Otho.

The Emperor Otho dies on the 20th April, and is succeeded by Vitellius.

The Emperor Vitellius dies on the 24th December, and is succeeded by Vespasian.

70. Jerusalem taken by Titus, the son of Vespasian; the Temple burnt. Cp. notes on Luke xix. 43, 44; xxi. 20.

A.D.

71. Triumph of Vespasian and Titus for the conquest of Judæa.

79. The Emperor Vespasian dies on the 23rd June, and is succeeded by his son Titus.

81. The Emperor Titus dies on the 13th September, and is succeeded by his brother Domitian.

St. Jude's General Epistle, and St. John's Gospel and Epistles written probably about this time.

95. Second Roman Persecution of the Christians.

St. John writes the Apocalypse, or Revelation. See Introduction below, pp. 152—154.

96. The Emperor Domitian dies on the 18th September, and is succeeded by Nerva, who rescinds many of his predecessor's acts. See Introduction to St. John's Gospel, p. 267.

98. The Emperor Nerva dies at the end of January, and is succeeded by Trajan.

100. The Apostle and Evangelist St. John dies about this time.

INTRODUCTION

TO

THE EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. JAMES.

I. On the Design of the Epistle.

It is asserted by S. Augustine[1], that this Epistle is in some respects supplementary to the Epistles of St. Paul to the Galatians, and to the Romans.

This opinion appears to be well-grounded, and has been adopted by many later theologians[2].

St. Paul's design in those two Epistles had been to prove from the Hebrew Scriptures, that the hopes of Justification, which were built by many of the Jews on a presumption of their own obedience to the works of the Mosaic Law, and their own righteousness in the eye of God, were illusory and vain; and that the only meritorious cause of Justification is the Death of Christ; and that the proper organ on our side, by which the merits of that Death are to be laid hold on, and applied, is Faith; and that we are justified and accepted as righteous by God, on account of Christ's Death, through Faith in Him, apart from the works of the Law[3].

Thus St. Paul had confuted the notions of those, who sought "to establish their own righteousness[4];" and he had asserted the virtue of Faith in the merits of the sacrifice of Christ, as opposed to all human pretensions; and had shown the futility of all human claims, as contrasted with God's free grace in Christ[5].

But, on the other hand, a different form of error prevailed among some Judaizing Christians, and required correction; and they who propagated it, may have endeavoured to derive some pleas on its behalf, from the arguments of St. Paul, asserting the justifying efficacy of Faith in the merits of Christ.

Many among the Jews relied on their descent from Abraham, as entitling them to God's favour[6]; and boasted their own superior knowledge of spiritual things, and trusted in that knowledge, as sufficient to salvation.

They were instructed in the Will and Word of God; they had faith in His Revelation; and they contrasted their own intelligence and faith with the ignorance and unbelief of the Gentile world[7]; and they flattered themselves, that God would accept and reward them on account of their knowledge and faith.

Many of the Jews, who passed from the Synagogue into the Church, were infected with these notions; and their acceptance of the Gospel as a Revelation from God, considered merely in a speculative light, as increasing their knowledge of divine things, and as enlarging the sphere of their faith, but not as influencing their practice, served to foster their pride and hypocrisy, and to cherish a vain and presumptuous conceit, that they could commend themselves to God, and attain everlasting salvation, by a formal profession of faith, barren of good works.

It has been affirmed by ancient writers, that these theorists in religion appealed to the authority

[6] Matt. iii. 9. John viii. 33, and compare Bp. Bull's remarks on this notion, and on what he calls their "Solifidianism," in his Harmonia Apostolica, Diss. ii. chap. xvii. Both these errors are refuted by St. James.

[7] Compare St. Paul's own statement of their case as compared with that of the Gentiles, "Thou art called a Jew, and restest in the Law, and makest thy boast of God, and knowest His Will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the Law;" and his remonstrance with them on their hypocritical profession, apart from moral practice, Rom. ii. 17—29. St. Paul has there anticipated the argument of St. James.

of St. Paul, asserting that we are justified by Faith in Christ, apart from the works of the Law[1]; and that they took advantage of his arguments, in order to fortify themselves in their assumption, that they might claim an eternal reward from God on the ground of the clearness of their knowledge, and the orthodoxy of their faith, irrespectively of holiness of life, and of fruitfulness in good Works.

It was also supposed by some in early times, that St. Peter alludes to this antinomian perversion of St. Paul's doctrine, when, referring to St. Paul's Epistles, he says that there are "some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest unto their own destruction[2]."

The notions just described were current in Apostolic times, especially among the Jewish Christians[3]; and this presumption of the sufficiency of a speculative faith, independently of practical holiness and charity, developed itself, even in the first century of the Christian Church, into the moral lawlessness of the Gnostic Teachers, such as Simon Magus, Cerinthus, and the Nicolaitans; who, under the plea of superior knowledge and illumination in spiritual mysteries, dispensed with the practice of Christian virtue, and indulged themselves and their votaries in voluptuous and riotous excesses of libertinism and debauchery, and provoked the severe censure and stern condemnation, with which they are denounced by the Holy Spirit in the Second Epistle of St. Peter, and in the Epistle of St. Jude, and the Apocalypse, or Book of Revelation.

The Epistle of St. James holds a middle place between the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans and those just mentioned, of St. Peter, St. Jude, and the Apocalypse.

It does not deal, as they do, with those monstrous extravagances of doctrine and manners, which exhibited themselves afterwards in their hideous deformity in the deadly heresies and foul practices of the Gnostics. But St. James exposes the unprofitableness of a dry barren faith. He does not refute the errors of heterodoxy, but condemns the sin of hypocrisy[4]. Thus the present Epistle occupies a place of its own. It warns the Church of every age against the delusive notion, that it is enough for men, to have religious emotions, to talk religious language, to have religious knowledge, and to profess religious belief, without the habitual practice of religious duties, and the daily devotion of a religious life.

In modern times, it has been sometimes said, that some ingenuity is required, in order to reconcile St. Paul and St. James.

Such was not the language of Christian Antiquity. St. Paul and St. James do not disagree; and therefore they do not need to be reconciled. The Holy Spirit of God speaks by each of them; and provides a remedy against two different spiritual maladies by the instrumentality of both; and the work done by St. James completes the work done by St. Paul.

If we attend to the mode of the working of the Spirit by means of the two Apostles, we shall recognize the proper uses of the doctrine of both.

This has been well stated by S. Augustine[5], whose words may be adopted here;

"Many persons boast of their good works; and some decline to become Christians on this account. A good life is necessary. 'Yes,' they say, 'it is; but I already lead a good life. What will Christianity teach me? I do not commit murder. I do not steal, I do not covet. I am not guilty of adultery. Let any one find any thing in my life to reprove, and let him, who reproves me, make me a Christian.' The man who speaks thus has glory, but not in the eyes of God. Not so Abraham. He was not justified by works. For what saith the Scripture? 'Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness[6].' Abraham therefore was justified by Faith.

"But here" (adds Augustine) "is a whirlpool, in which we may be swallowed up, if we are not on our guard. Abraham was not justified by Works, but by Faith. Another man listens to this statement, and says, 'Well, then, I will live as I like; and then, although I have not good Works, and only believe in God, yet it will be counted to me for righteousness.' If a man speaks thus, and makes up his mind to live thus, he will be drowned in the whirlpool.

"I therefore take the case of Abraham, and cite concerning him what I read in the Epistle of another Apostle, who desired to set those right, who had misunderstood the Apostle St. Paul. I refer to St. James, and his Epistle, which he wrote against those who presumed on their faith, and would not do good Works; and in which he commends Abraham's Works, as Paul had commended Abraham's Faith.

"The two Apostles are not opposed to each other. St. James commends Abraham's work—a work known to all—the offering of his son Isaac[1]. 'Magnum opus, sed ex Fide.' A great work indeed that was, but it was a work growing out of Faith. I praise the superstructure of the work, but I see the foundation of Faith. I praise the fruit of the work, but I recognize the root of it in Faith. If Abraham had done this work without a sound Faith, it would have been of no use, whatever the work might be. On the other hand, if Abraham had faith in such a sort, that when God had commanded him to offer up his son, he had said, 'No, I will not do it, and yet I believe that God will save me, although I slight His commands,' then his Faith, being without Works, would have been dead, and would have remained barren and dry, like a root without fruit.

"Abraham, then, was justified by Faith; but although Works did not go before Faith, yet they came after it. Shall your Faith be barren? No; it will not be barren, unless you yourself are barren. 'Tene ergo fidem.' Have therefore Faith; have faith, as one who is about to work. But you may say, This is not St. Paul's doctrine. Yes, I reply, it is. I do not appeal from St. Paul to St. James; but I appeal from St. Paul to St. Paul. What does he say? He says, 'In Christ Jesus neither Circumcision availeth any thing, nor Uncircumcision; but Faith which worketh by Love[2].' And again he says, 'The end of the Law is Charity[3].' And again, 'Although I have Faith, so that I could remove mountains, but have not Charity, it profiteth me nothing[4].' And yet he says, 'that a man is justified by Faith without the works of the Law.' And why? Let the Apostle himself reply. On the one hand I would teach thee (he says) not to presume on thy works, as if thou hadst received the free gift of faith through any merit of thy own; therefore rely not on thy works done before faith. Let no one boast of his works done before faith. On the other hand, let no one be slothful in good works, after he has received faith. 'Nemo jactet bona opera sua ante fidem; nemo sit piger in operibus bonis, acceptâ fide[5].' Good works do not go before him who is yet to be justified by Faith, but they follow him who has been justified[6]. And the Faith which is described by St. Paul is not any sort of Faith, by which we believe in God; but it is that healthful, evangelical Faith, whose Works spring from Love. And therefore St. Paul teaches that the Faith which some men deem sufficient for salvation, profiteth nothing, because it is without Charity[7].

"St. Paul therefore agrees with the rest of the Apostles in asserting that eternal life is given only to those who live well. But St. James is vehemently indignant against those who imagine that Faith without works is sufficient to salvation; and he even likens them to the devils themselves. 'Thou believest that God is one; thou doest well; the devils also believe and tremble.' And he affirms that Faith without works is dead[8]. How great therefore is the delusion of those who rely on dead faith as the means of eternal life[9]!"

Thus the teaching of each of the two Apostles, St. Paul and St. James, illustrates and confirms that of the other.

St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, had refuted all presumptuous notions of human merit, and had established the doctrine of God's free grace to all, and the plenary virtue of Christ's sufferings endured once for all on the Cross.

St. James vindicates the true character and genuine functions of Faith, as the energetic principle and vivifying spring of a holy life; and strips off the disguises, and detects the delusions, of empty professions of belief, and of speculative spiritual knowledge, and declares that such professions of faith and knowledge are hypocritical and vain. He teaches that the propitiatory sufferings of Christ's meritorious Death are availing only to those who follow the blessed steps of His holy life; and that those sufferings were endured, in order to redeem us from the power, as well as from the guilt and penalty, of sin; and will only aggravate the punishment of those, who pervert them into a plea for neglect of His grace, and for violation of His laws.

Thus the two Apostles lend their aid in establishing the doctrine, that the Faith by which we are justified is that living principle of the soul, which fixes its eye on God's power and love in His dear Son, and lays its hand on Christ; and lives and moves in constant harmony with His revealed Will and Word[10].

II. In another respect the Epistle of St. James holds a peculiar place.

At first, perhaps, a reader may be surprised, that it contains so little of explicit statement of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, as distinguished from natural religion, or from the Mosaic Law.

But, on further consideration, the reason of this will appear.

St. James was writing an Epistle, not only for the use of Christians, but of Jews [1]; and of Jews who at that time were exasperated against Christianity.

In this respect the Epistle of St. James may be compared to the speech of St. Stephen, pleading the cause of Christ before the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem.

That holy Martyr had the love of Jesus in his heart; but the name of Jesus never broke forth from his lips, till the close of his speech, when his murderers were stoning him, and he cried, "Lord JESUS, receive my spirit [2]."

So St. James. He has the faith of Christ in his heart; and writes from a deep inner feeling of love to Christ; and inculcates those Christian virtues, which are genuine fruits of faith working by love. He has also, like St. Stephen, a solemn message to deliver to the Jews, who did not believe.

Hence he practises a holy and reverential reserve; and like that blessed Martyr, he will not expose that holy Name to contumelious blasphemy [3].

He has a warning to speak to them from Christ. "Ye killed the Just One, He no longer resisteth you [4]." "The Judge standeth at the door [5]."

Almighty God gave to the Jews a period of forty years for repentance, after the Crucifixion of Christ. That period was now near its end. Doubtless many of the Jews, who came to Jerusalem for the three Annual Festivals, had heard and received the Gospel from the Apostles and other Preachers of Christianity. And many at Jerusalem itself, even of the Priests themselves, had become 'obedient to the faith [6].' But the Jewish Nation, as represented by its Rulers, remained obdurate. They had imprisoned Peter and John, and murdered Stephen, and persecuted the Church [7], and had slain James the brother of John, and endeavoured to kill Peter [8], and to destroy St. Paul [9], and in a short time they would conspire against and kill this other James, the writer of this Epistle [10].

In the last century of its existence, especially in the period of forty years after the Crucifixion, the City of Jerusalem was the scene of the worst crimes. It was torn by intestine factions, agitated by tumultuous riots, maddened by the wild fanatical phrenzy of false Christs and false Prophets, and deluged by blood shed by the hands of assassins [11]. There St. James dwelt; like Lot in Sodom.

Amid such circumstances as these, he, the Apostle and Bishop of Jerusalem, wrote this Epistle; an Epistle of warning to Jerusalem: the last warning it received from the Holy Spirit of God. He thus discharged the work of a Hebrew Prophet, and a Christian Apostle. He came forth as a Christian Jeremiah, and a Christian Malachi [12]. A Jeremiah in denouncing woe; a Malachi, sealing up the roll of Divine Prophecy to Jerusalem: and not to Jerusalem only, but to the Jews throughout the world, who were connected with Jerusalem, by religious worship, and by personal resort to it on its great festal anniversaries. The Epistle of St. James is the farewell voice of Hebrew Prophecy.

It has been well said by some [13], that its intrepid language of stern rebuke exasperated the leaders of the Jews, and hastened the writer's Martyrdom. And ancient authors were of opinion, that the shedding of the blood of St. James was the filling-up of the sins of Jerusalem, and made its cup of guilt to overflow [14].

Its short and impassioned sentences, darted forth with vehement ejaculations, and almost with sobbings of grief, and throbbings of indignation, express the anguish of his soul [15], as he beholds the obstinate ingratitude, and malignant virulence of the Rulers of Jerusalem against the Just One, who had shed His blood to save them, and whom they still persecuted in His Church [16]; and as he looks forward to the tremendous chastisement which would soon be inflicted by God's retributive justice on the guilty City. "Your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as fire: ye heaped treasure together for the last days [1]."

Perhaps there is not a nobler specimen of heroic courage and holy eloquence, and of poetical fervour, sublimity and pathos, in the range of Hebrew Prophecy, than is to be found in the last chapter of this Epistle. There the writer, having declared the indignation of God against His people, who had rebelled against Him, suddenly changes his tone, and turns with an aspect of love and gentleness, and comforts those who were obedient, and suffering under persecution for His sake. "Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Be ye patient, stablish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Behold, we count them happy which endure [2]."

III. Viewed in this light, the Epistle of St. James possesses a special interest and importance for Christian nations and Christian citizens, even to the end of time.

The last days of Jerusalem are, as we know from Christ Himself, prophetical and typical of the last days of the World [3]. The sins of the last days of Jerusalem will be the sins of the last days of the World. Hollow professions of religion [4], empty shows and shadows of Faith, partiality and respect of persons [5], slavish idolatry of riches, observance of some of God's commandments, together with open and impious defiance of others [6]; arrogant assumption of the office of religious teaching, without due call and authority; encouragement and patronage of those who set themselves up to be spiritual guides [7]; sins of the tongue, evil speaking against man and God [8]; envying and strife, factions and party feuds, wars and fightings [9]; adulteries [10], pride, and revelry [11]; low worldliness, and presumptuous self-confidence; a Babel-like building up of secular plans and projects, independently of God's will, and against it [12]; vainglorious display of wealth; hard-heartedness towards those by whose industry that wealth is acquired [13]; self-indulgence and sensuality [14]; an obstinate continuance in that evil temper of unbelief which rejected and crucified Christ [15]; these were the sins of the last days of Jerusalem as described by St. James: for these she was to be destroyed by God; for these she was destroyed; and her children were scattered abroad, and have now been outcasts for near two thousand years.

Here is a prophetic picture of the world's state in the last days. Here is a prophetic warning to men and nations, especially to wealthy commercial nations in the last times.

Here also is instruction and comfort for those who endure patiently, and look beyond the transitory things of this world, like husbandmen waiting for the harvest [16]; and who live in habitual preparation for the second Coming of the Lord, to judge the quick and dead.

IV. Concerning the Author of this Epistle.

The writer calls himself JAMES.

No ancient author ascribes this Epistle to James the son of Zebedee, and brother of John, who was martyred by Herod Agrippa, about fourteen years after the Ascension [17].

It is generally agreed, that the writer of this Epistle was James, "the brother of our Lord," and Bishop of Jerusalem [18].

That a James was our Lord's brother is evident from Holy Writ [19]; that James the Lord's brother was appointed Bishop of Jerusalem soon after the Ascension, is affirmed in the early records of the Church [20]; that a James was Bishop of Jerusalem appears from Holy Scripture itself, especially from the Acts of the Apostles [21], as elucidated and confirmed by the consent of Christian Antiquity; and the concurrent tradition of early ecclesiastical writers ascribing this Epistle to James the Lord's brother, Bishop of Jerusalem, called also James the Less [22] and James the Just [23], and also Oblias [24],—is confirmed by the internal evidence of the Epistle itself, which is addressed to [1] This unique character of the Epistle of St. James as distinguished from all the other twenty Epistles in the New Testament, shows itself in this particular respect, that it alone (with the exception of the First Epistle of St. John, which has no Epistolary address) has no Benediction or Message of Peace, either at the beginning or end. He was writing, not only to Christians, but to Jews; he was writing at Jerusalem, and to Jerusalem; and though her name was the City of Peace, yet since she had killed the true Melchizedek, the King of Righteousness, and King of Peace (Heb. vii. 2), and would not repent of her sins, "the things belonging to her peace were now hid from her eyes." The word περιοχὴ is often used by the Septuagint for a strong fortress and rock (see Ps. cvii. 11. 2 Kings v. 9. 1 Chron. xi. 7); and Oblias is probably derived from עֹפֶל, hill, or fortress (Isa. xxxii. 14. Micah iv. 8), Jews and Jewish Christians of the dispersion, and pre-announces in prophetic language the woes coming on Jerusalem.

There remain, however, two questions to be considered in regard to the Author of this Epistle.

I. Was the writer the same person as the James who is described in the Gospels as son of Alphæus, and who was one of the Twelve Apostles[1]?

II. What is the meaning of the appellation by which James is distinguished as the "Lord's Brother?"

I. As to the first of these questions, it seems most probable that he was an Apostle.

(1) The Apostle St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians, when asserting his own claims to be received as an Apostle of Christ, on a par with the other Apostles, relates that after his Conversion he did not go up to Jerusalem, to those who were Apostles before him, but went to Arabia; and thence returned to Damascus, and after three years went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and remained with him fifteen days, but that he saw none other of the Apostles, "save James, the Lord's brother[2]."

The whole drift of St. Paul's argument here is to show, that he himself "was an Apostle not of men, or by men," and had learnt nothing from any other Apostle: that he had indeed gone up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and had remained with him a short time, but had not seen any other Apostle there, but James, the Lord's brother.

The natural inference from these words, especially when taken in connexion with the context, is this; that James, the Lord's brother, was an Apostle; and that he was an Apostle in the same sense as St. Peter was an Apostle, namely, as one of the Twelve.

(2) This inference is confirmed by the terms in which this same James is mentioned by St. Paul. He says that "James, Cephas, and John" were pillars of the Church; he places James before Peter and John; which he hardly would have done, if James had not been one of the Apostles as well as Bishop of Jerusalem.

(3) The Apostolic Catalogues in St. Luke's Gospel and in the Acts of the Apostles mention James the son of Alphæus, and mention "Jude[3], brother[4] of James." And in several places of the Acts of the Apostles, a James is presented to us in his character as Chief Pastor at Jerusalem[5]. But no intimation whatever is given in that History, that this James is a different person from James the son of Alphæus, who had been specified in the same book as one of the Twelve, and as having a brother called Jude.

(4) St. Jude in his Epistle calls himself the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James. Since there was a Jude who was an Apostle, and had a brother called James, it seems most probable, that the Jude who wrote the Epistle, would have added some discriminating token by which his own brother James might be distinguished from the Apostle bearing the same name, if the James, whose brother Jude was, was not the same as James the Apostle.

(5) In the catalogue of the Apostles we find this combination, "Jude brother of James[6]." And if we refer to the beginning of the Epistle of St. Jude, we there read "Jude brother of James."

The Jude who wrote that Epistle is called an Apostle by ancient writers[7], and by the Church of England in the title to her Collect for his festival[8]; and he would hardly have designated himself as "brother of James," if the James, whose brother he was, had been a different person from that James, who, when St. Jude wrote, was celebrated in Christendom as the Lord's brother, and Bishop of Jerusalem, and a blessed Martyr for Christ. That James was the James who was best known in the Church. Since therefore St. Jude designates and distinguishes himself as "the brother of James," therefore the James whose brother he styles himself, was the most conspicuous person of all who bore that name; viz. the brother of our Lord, and Bishop of Jerusalem; and if Jude was an Apostle, as is also asserted by ancient testimony, then since Jude the Apostle had a brother called James, who was also an Apostle; therefore the James who was Bishop of Jerusalem, and is claimed as a brother by St. Jude, was also one of the Apostles.

tower (2 Kings v. 24. 2 Chron. xxvii. 3), and עָם people. Cp. Neander, Pflanzung, &c., ii. p. 486, and the remarkable passage of Eusebius, ii. 23, quoted below in the note on chap. v. 3. And if this is the true etymology, it is worthy of remark, that, he who, for his sanctity and eminence was called a bulwark of the people, and was a pillar of the Church (Gal. ii. 9), was called also, probably by his own modest desire, "James the Less."

[8] "St. Simon and St. Jude Apostles." See on Acts i. 13, 2nd edit., and below, Introduction to the Epistle of St. Jude.

(6) James the Apostle is described by St. Matthew as "son of Alphæus[1]." Alphæus is the same name as Cleophas[2], or Clopas. The wife of Clopas was called Mary[3]; and that Mary was ἀδελφὴ of Mary the mother of Jesus[4]; and[5] we find that this Mary, the wife of Clopas, was mother of James called the Less, and Joses; and James and Joses and Simon and Jude are mentioned as the names of our Lord's ἀδελφοὶ in the Gospels[6]; where our Lord is called the ἀδελφὸς of James and Joses and Jude and Simon. Hence we may infer, that James the ἀδελφὸς of our Lord and Bishop of Jerusalem, who had a brother called Jude, and who was son of Clopas, which is the same name as Alphæus, was the same person as James who is called the Son of Alphæus by St. Matthew[7] and St. Mark[8], and who had a brother called Jude[9], and who was an Apostle.

(7) These inferences are confirmed by records of primitive Ecclesiastical testimony. Papias, a disciple of St. John, makes the following statement on this subject. He says that there are four Marys mentioned in the Gospel, namely,

1. "Mary the Mother of our Lord."
2. "Mary the wife of Cleophas or Alphæus; and mother of James the Bishop and Apostle, and of Simon, and Thaddæus (Jude)[10]."
3. "Mary Salome, the wife of Zebedee."
4. "Mary Magdalene."

"These four," he adds, "are mentioned in the Gospel. James, and Jude, and Joseph (or Joses) were sons of our Lord's mother's sister[11]."

(8) In the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was of very early date, the following incident was recorded: "Soon after His Resurrection from the Dead, the Lord went to James and appeared to him. For James had sworn that he would not eat bread from the hour in which he had drunk the Cup of the Lord, until he could see Him rising from among them that sleep. . . . And the Lord took bread and blessed and brake it, and gave it to James the Just, and said to him, 'My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of Man is risen from among them that sleep[12].'"

It is evident, that the writer of this narrative believed James the Just to be an Apostle; for the first Holy Eucharist was administered to the Twelve alone.

(9) In the Acts of the Apostles[13], we have the following list of names among the Twelve; "James the son of Alphæus, and Simon Zelotes, and Jude the brother of James;" and the same list of names thus arranged occurs in the catalogue of Apostles in St. Luke's Gospel[14].

In the Gospels of St. Matthew[15] and Mark[16] we have the following three names of "our Lord's brethren;" "James, Simon, and Jude;" arranged in this order.

The name Simon is only another form of Symeon[17]. We learn also from Ecclesiastical History, that Symeon (or Simon) the son of Clopas (or Alphæus), and one of the Lord's brethren, succeeded his brother James in the Bishopric of Jerusalem[18]; and the ground on which he was appointed to that office appears to have been, that he was a brother of our Lord.

These circumstances are confirmatory of the opinion, that "James, Simon, and Jude," who are mentioned in the Apostolic Catalogue, are the same as "James, Simon, and Jude" who are mentioned as "our Lord's brethren[19]."

We arrive therefore at the conclusion that James, the Author of this Epistle, and brother of our Lord, and Bishop of Jerusalem, was also an Apostle.

Against this opinion it has been objected[20],

On the other hand, the identity of James the son of Alphæus, the Apostle, with James the Bishop of Jerusalem, has been main-

1. That St. John records the following speech of St. Peter to Christ, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life; and we have believed (πεπιστεύκαμεν) and know (ἐγνώκαμεν) that Thou art the Christ." Jesus answered, "Did I not choose you Twelve, and one of you is a Devil." He was speaking of Judas Iscariot, for he was about to betray Him, being one of the Twelve [1].

In the next Chapter to this, St. John narrates, that 'the Feast of Tabernacles was at hand;' and "His brethren said to him, Depart hence and go into Judæa, that Thy disciples also may behold Thy works which Thou doest; for no one doeth anything in secret, and seeketh to be himself in public; if Thou doest these things, manifest Thyself to the world; for not even were His brethren believing (ἐπίστευον) on Him."

Here then the question arises—How could it be said by St. Peter, in the name of the Twelve, that they believed in Christ, and yet be asserted by the Evangelist, that "not even His brethren were believing on Him,"—if two of His brethren were of the number of the Twelve?

This objection has been considered by some in recent times to be decisive against the opinion that James, the brother of our Lord, was one of the Twelve.

But it does not seem of sufficient force to invalidate the arguments above adduced.

Peter says—"we have believed and know that Thou art the Christ," and he was speaking of the Twelve. But he was not aware what was in the hearts of those, concerning whom he was speaking. Our Lord Himself corrected his assertion. "One of you is a devil." Judas was one of the Twelve, and betrayed Christ; Peter himself denied Him; the rest of the Twelve forsook Him and fled; they did this, after they had seen many more of His mighty works than they had seen at the time of St. Peter's speech; and they did this in about twelve months after that speech was uttered.

Besides, although it is said by St. John a few verses only after this speech of St. Peter, that our Lord's brethren were not then believing [2] on Him, yet the fact is, that nearly half a year elapsed between St. Peter's speech, and that of our Lord's brethren. The one was spoken at a Passover [3], the other was not spoken till the approach of the Feast of Tabernacles, that is, after an interval of nearly six months.

If now it was true, that notwithstanding Peter's profession of belief on the part of the Twelve, all of them were very weak in faith [4], one of the Twelve betrayed Him, and another denied Him, and the rest deserted Him, in about twelve months' time after that profession was made, is there any great reason for surprise, that at a particular time, at a period of six months after that profession, some of that number were not believing on Him? Besides, it might be quite possible for persons to believe Him to be the Christ, and yet not have that belief in His true character as a suffering Messiah, whose kingdom was not of this world, which alone could justify the Evangelist in saying that they were believing on Him [5].

2. It has been said that none of our Lord's brethren—and therefore not James—could have been Apostles; because we read in Acts i. 14, "These all" (the eleven Apostles) "were continuing with one accord in prayer with the women, and with Mary the mother of Jesus, and with His brethren."

But to this it may be replied,—we do not say, that all our Lord's ἀδελφοὶ were Apostles; and the assertion of the Sacred Historian communicates the fact, that those of that number, who were not Apostles, were then gathered together with the Apostles. And even if all of them had been Apostles, this specification of them would not create any difficulty. We here read of Mary, in addition to the women; and in another place we read "the rest of the Apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas [6]," who certainly was an Apostle.

3. It has been alleged, that if we suppose that St. James, who was placed as Bishop at Jerusalem, was also one of the Twelve, we are adopting an hypothesis which is not consistent with the general commission to the Apostles, to go and teach all nations [7].

But to this it may be replied, that the Apostles were first to be witnesses to Christ at Jerusalem [8], and that they remained at Jerusalem many years after the Ascension [9]; and that, as far as we know, James, the other Apostle of that name, the son of Zebedee, never left Jerusalem [10].

[10] Acts xii. 2.

It is probable, that Peter was placed, for a time at least, as Bishop at Antioch; and St. John, as Metropolitan, at Ephesus; and the Apostles would not have been acting in accordance with the long-suffering of Christ towards Jerusalem, if they had not placed one of their own number there, as Chief Pastor "of the lost sheep of the House of Israel [1]."

Besides, we find notice of the ordination of St. Matthias to the Apostolic office, in the Acts of the Apostles [2]. We find, in the same book, a notice of the ordination of Saul and Barnabas to the same office [3]. And in like manner, if James, Bishop of Jerusalem, had not been already ordained to the Apostolic office, we might reasonably expect to find, in the Acts of the Apostles, some notice of his ordination to that office at Jerusalem, of which he is already exercising the functions, when he is presented to us in the Acts of the Apostles [4].

4. It has been alleged, that if James, the brother of our Lord, had been an Apostle, and Jude, his brother, an Apostle, then we should not have the names of the sons of Cleophas and Mary arranged in the following order by two Evangelists, in the New Testament. "James, and Joses, and Simon, and Jude [5];" and again, "James, and Joses, and Jude, and Simon [6];" but that Jude would be placed before Joses.

But to this it may be answered, that those Evangelists are citing the names as spoken by the people of Nazareth, who were disparaging the credit of Christ, and would care little, and perhaps did not know, who among His brethren were Apostles, and who were not.

It is true, that the Evangelists themselves sometimes describe Mary, the wife of Cleophas, or Clopas, as the mother of "James and Joses," who was not an Apostle, to the omission of Jude [7]; and she is sometimes described as the mother of James only [8]. Perhaps Jude was the youngest of her sons; and however this may be, the allegation in question does not affect the claim of James, the brother of our Lord, who is always placed first in the list [9], to be recognized as an Apostle.

It is also true, that the testimonies of the writers of the second, third, and fourth centuries are not uniform and consistent on this question.

Some were of opinion that James, the Lord's brother, was not the same as James the son of Alphæus, and was not an Apostle [10]. But after passing through a period of doubt and discussion, the Western Church seems to have been settled in the opinion that James the Lord's brother, the author of the Epistle, was also an Apostle [11]; and this opinion has been adopted in many Ancient Versions [12] of this Epistle, and is embodied by the Church of England in her Liturgical offices for the Festival of St. Philip and St. James [13].

Apostolorum, Lect. iv. p. 350, ed. Churton, where he expresses himself in favour of the opinion that St. James the Bishop of Jerusalem was an Apostle. It is also maintained with force and clearness by the late learned Editor of an Analysis of Bp. Pearson's Work, Dr. W. H. Mill, in his dissertation on the Brotherhood of Jesus, p. 240; and by one of Bp. Pearson's worthiest successors in the Chair of the Lady Margaret's Professorship of Divinity at Cambridge, the Rev. J. J. Blunt, whose words may be cited here. (Lectures on the History of the Early Church, p. 70.)

"St. James, another of the Apostles of the greatest distinction, was yet more circumscribed in the range of his personal services, Jerusalem itself being the compass within which they were confined. There were two of this name amongst the Apostles: the one, the son of Zebedee and brother of John, sufficiently distinguished from any other by his parentage and relationship, and soon ceasing to create any confusion in the Annals of the Twelve by disappearing from the scene altogether, being killed of Herod by the sword (Acts xii. 2); the other, presented to us in the Sacred History under several designations, but still the identity of the individual under them all probably admitting of being proved. Among the women who stood watching the crucifixion, were, according to St. Mark, 'Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less' (Mark xv. 40. According to St. John, 'Mary Magdalene, and Mary the wife of Cleophas,' John xix. 25); therefore we conclude that Mary the mother of James the Less was the same as Mary the wife of Cleophas, or, in other words, that James the Less was the son of Cleophas. But James the Apostle, according to St. Matthew, was the son of Alphæus (Matt. x. 3), which is merely another pronunciation of the same Hebrew name; so that James the Apostle and James the Less were one and the same person, the son of Mary the wife of Cleophas, who is further described in the passage of St. John already referred to, as Jesus' mother's sister, and accordingly St. James is discovered to be the cousin of our Lord, or, as he is elsewhere called in the language of the Hebrews, 'The Lord's brother' (Gal. i. 19); a circumstance which perhaps secured to him the primacy of the Church of Jerusalem, as episcopal chairs were afterwards assigned to the grandsons of St. Jude, related in the same degree to our Lord, for a similar reason. (Hegesipp. apud Eus. iii. c. 20.) In Jerusalem, then, he exercised his high functions, and from Jerusalem he wrote his Catholic Epistle, the internal evidence of which indicates a date later than the death of St. James the brother of St. John, to whom some have ascribed it, an event which must have occurred as early as A.D. 43 or A.D. 44. For that Epistle deals with errors and defects of the Church as if they were already chronic, and, moreover, anticipates, from no great distance it may be thought, the calamity which was coming on the country in the downfall of Jerusalem.—'Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain: whereas ye know not what shall

II. On the designation of St. James as "the Lord's Brother."

What is the relationship to Christ, which is indicated by this title?

On this point there were two opinions in ancient times.

1. That "the Lord's Brethren" were children of Joseph by a former marriage [1].

2. That they were children of Cleophas and Mary the ἀδελφὴ of our Lord's mother; and so were ἀδελφοὶ of Christ; and that the word ἀδελφοὶ, as applied to them, does not mean children of the same parent or parents, but near kinsmen or cousins [2].

It has been alleged by some, that this opinion is not earlier than the age of S. Jerome. But the testimony cited above from Papias, shows that it is of a more ancient date.

3. A third opinion has been adopted by some in recent times [3], viz. that James and his brothers, Jude, Joses, and Simon, and also his sisters, mentioned Matt. xiii. 56; Mark vi. 3, were children of Joseph and Mary the Mother of our Lord; and so were literally brothers and sisters of our Lord.

This third opinion, however, has no ground in the testimony of primitive Christian Antiquity. Not a single Christian writer who lived in the Apostolic age, or for two hundred years after the Apostles, can be cited as saying that James the Bishop of Jerusalem, or any of those who are called our Lord's brothers and sisters in the New Testament, were children of Mary the Mother of our Lord. And when the opinion, that they were her children, was first broached, as it was by Helvidius in the fourth century, it was condemned as novel and erroneous by S. Jerome [4], who wrote a Treatise against it, and it has been proscribed by the general consent of the Eastern and Western Churches [5], and by the most learned and judicious divines of our own Church [6]; and this notion of Helvidius, and of those who were called Helvidians, was even included by S. Augustine in a catalogue of heresies [7].

Besides, if the blessed Virgin had several children living at the time of the Crucifixion, and one of them, St. James, of such approved piety as to be called James the Just, and to be appointed Bishop of Jerusalem,—and all of them were united in prayer with the Apostles and Blessed Virgin on the day of the Ascension of Christ [8],—it seems improbable, that our Lord should not have commended His Mother to the care of St. James, or to that of any other of her children, and His own brothers by blood; and that He should have said to His Mother, "Woman, behold thy son," meaning thereby St. John; and that from that hour she should have been taken by St. John to his own home [9].

Again, we know from the Gospels that—

(1) Mary the wife of Cleophas, or Clopas, was the ἀδελφὴ of Mary the mother of Christ [10].

(2) That Mary the wife of Cleophas had sons whose names were James and Joses; and probably also Jude [11]; be on the morrow;' and again yet more significantly, 'The coming of the Lord draweth nigh.' Still, however far the decrees established at Jerusalem might reach, and whatever might be the circulation of his Epistle, in Jerusalem, as I have said, he constantly abode, and thus gave still more vital force to the action of that heart of Christendom, till death, in his case a violent one, overtook him. For the Jews, incensed at the progress of Christianity, and profiting by the anarchy of the moment, when, Festus dead, and his successor not yet appointed, they could do what seemed good in their own sight, urged St. James to address the people of Jerusalem at the Passover, numbers being assembled, and a riot apprehended, and inform them rightly concerning Jesus, disabusing them of their confidence in Him, and allaying the feverish expectation of His advent. In order that he might be the better heard, they set him on a wing of the temple; but when the reply of James to their violent and importunate appeal proved to be, 'Why question ye me concerning Jesus the Son of Man? He is now sitting in the heavens at the right hand of power, and is about to come in the clouds of heaven,' they put him effectually to silence, by casting him down headlong, and afterwards despatching him with a fuller's club." Euseb. Eccl. Mill*, pp. 260—269, who supposes that this opinion took its origin from Apocryphal Gospels; as also the other opinion that St. James, the brother of our Lord, was not an Apostle.

[2] This is the statement of St. John's disciple Papias (see on Matt. xii. 46), and of Jerome c. Helvid. c. 7 and c. 8, and in Matt. xii., and Script. [8] Acts i. 13.

[9] John xix. 27. This argument has been already stated by ancient Christian writers. S. Hilary in Matt. i., writing against some whom he condemns in strong language for saying that James was the son of Mary, the Mother of our Lord, thus speaks, "Verum homines pravissimi hinc præsumunt opinionis suæ auctoritatem, quod plures Dominum nostrum fratres habuisse traditum est; qui si Mariæ filii essent, nunquam in tempore passionis Joanni Apostolo transcripta esset in matrem." The same argument is urged by S. Chrysostom in Matt. hom 5, and S. Epiphanius, Hær. 78.

[10] John xix. 25.

[11] Matt. xxvii. 56. Mark xv. 40. Luke xxiv. 10, compared with Jude 1.

(3) That three of our Lord's ἀδελφοὶ were also named James, Joses, and Jude[1].

It is therefore highly probable from this identity of three names, and from the relationship between Mary the mother of our Lord, and Mary the wife of Cleophas, that the James, Joses, and Jude, who were sons of Mary the wife of Cleophas, were no other persons than the James, Jude, and Joses, who are called "brethren of the Lord."

But here it may be said; it is not likely that two sisters should both be called by the same name Mary, and therefore James and our Lord could not have been first cousins.

Let this be allowed; and then it may be suggested, that when Mary the wife of Clopas is called the ἀδελφὴ of Mary the Blessed Virgin, as she is by St. John[2], the word ἀδελφὴ is not to be taken in its literal acceptation of sister in blood, but, according to Scripture use, means a cousin, or near relative.

This is probable; and this use of ἀδελφὴ in her case, would also explain the use of the word ἀδελφοὶ in the case of her children James, Joses, and Jude. They are called in Scripture ἀδελφοὶ of our Lord; she is called in Scripture the ἀδελφὴ of His mother. Perhaps, Mary their mother was the cousin of the Virgin Mary His mother: and they were second cousins of her ever-blessed Son.

The above observations are offered to the reader's consideration with feelings of diffidence. The questions which have been now examined (namely, whether St. James the Less was an Apostle, and what is the precise relationship which is expressed by his appellation "the Lord's brother[3]"), exercised the ingenuity of many learned writers in the earlier ages of the Church, who possessed ancient documentary aids for the solution of them, which are not now extant.

It would therefore be presumptuous to dogmatize upon these two points.

Rather we may reasonably believe, that a providential purpose may be subserved even by the uncertainty which surrounds them. The Holy Spirit, if He had been so pleased, might have made them perfectly clear by a few additional words in Holy Scripture; but He has not done so. He foreknew the doubts which would arise in the Church in regard to these questions. There is therefore a moral in His reserve; there is a meaning in His silence.

And what is that? Perhaps by such difficulties as these He designed to make us more thankful for those essential verities of saving doctrine, which are fully revealed to us in Holy Writ. There seems also to be a special lesson to be learnt from the particular questions which have now passed under review. The Holy Spirit has thrown a veil over the personal history of the Blessed Virgin. He has not clearly disclosed to us the precise nature of the relationship which is indicated in Holy Scripture by His own words "the Lord's brethren," "the Lord's sisters." And why was this? Might it not be, in order to wean our hearts from laying too much stress on carnal relationships even to Christ Himself? Might it not be, for the purpose of reminding us of the high and holy nature of our own privileges as brethren and sisters of Christ, by virtue of our own incorporation in His mystical body, and our relation to our heavenly Father by filial adoption, in His Ever-blessed Son? Might it not be, for the sake of inculcating more forcibly that holy and joyful truth, which Christ Himself vouchsafed to declare to us, when He said, "Who is My Mother? and who are My Brethren? And He stretched forth His hand toward His disciples, and said, Behold My mother and My brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of My Father which is in heaven, the same is My brother, and sister, and mother[4]."

This divine truth—that brotherhood to Christ consists in obedience to His heavenly Father,—is the sum and substance of this Epistle, written by St. James, the Lord's Brother.

V. The canonical authority, and Divine Inspiration of this Epistle, are abundantly attested by early Christian writers[5], and by the consent of the ancient Church Universal[6], and the fact that many sentences of it were adopted and incorporated by St. Peter in his first Epistle[1], is a sufficient proof of the esteem in which it was held by the Apostles.

On this point, which is of great importance for the complete establishment of the proof of the Canonical Authority of the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, St. John, and St. Jude, more will be said below, in the Introduction to the Second Epistle of St. Peter.

VI. The date of the Epistle must be placed before the Passover of A.D. 62, when St. James was martyred[2] by the rulers of the Jews, who were disappointed and exasperated by the escape of St. Paul from their hands, A.D. 61, and turned their rage against St. James who remained at Jerusalem[3]; and it was posterior to St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, which was written A.D. 58; and it is not unlikely that the fury of the Jews, which vented itself in the murder of St. James, was excited by the publication of this Epistle[4]; and it bears internal evidence of having been written at a time when the sins of Jerusalem were being filled up to the brim, and the time of her probation was drawing near to its close[5], and the day of her destruction at hand. It was probably written about A.D. 60 of the common era.

1. Ἰάκωβος] James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ. Concerning the Author of this Epistle, see above, Introduction.

He does not call himself an Apostle. Neither does St. Paul, in his Epistles to the Thessalonians, Philemon, and the Philippians (see on 1 Thess. i. 1, and Phil. i. 1). Nor St. John, in his Epistles, or Apocalypse.

It cannot, therefore, be hence inferred, that James, the author of this Epistle, was not an Apostle. He might be induced to forego the Apostolic title by feelings of modesty, a grace which specially characterizes the writer, "James the Less" (Mark xv. 40), who does not speak to his readers as his children, but as his brethren, see below on v. 2.

He might also be induced to withhold the Apostolic title, because he did not go forth as an Apostle, to preach to those whom he addresses, but remained stationary at Jerusalem until his death in that city.

He also foregoes two other titles, which belonged to him, viz. "the Lord's brother" (cp. Jude 1) and "Bishop of Jerusalem" (see Acts xxi. 18).

— ταῖς δώδεκα φυλαῖς] to the twelve tribes that are in the dispersion. On the various διασποραί, or dispersions of the Jews, see above, note on Acts ii. 9—11.

The address is general to the twelve tribes; not only to the Jewish Christians, but to the Jews also, to whom some of the latter portions of the Epistle are specially applicable, see iv. 1. 4. 8, v. 1—6, and above, Introduction. As is observed here by Bede, "James writes not only to those who suffered persecution for righteousness' sake, nor only to them who believed in Christ, but were not careful to maintain good works: but he writes also to those who persecuted the believers; and he exhorts the unbelieving Jews to repent of their guilt in crucifying Christ, and in their other criminal acts, in order that they may escape the Divine Vengeance now hanging over their heads." So Estius, Grotius, Hammond, Lardner, and others.

Hence in the beginning of this Epistle there is no announcement of Grace, Mercy, and Peace, nor is there any such expression at its close. In this respect this Epistle stands alone in the New Testament.

James the "brother of the Lord,"—who came to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matt. x. 16,—and Bishop of Jerusalem, had a special labour of love to perform to the twelve tribes. "Jure Jacobus circumcisionis Apostolus his qui ex circumcisione sunt scribit" (Didymus). The reader may observe throughout this Epistle many points of resemblance to the Gospel of St. Matthew (see below, i. 26. 27; ii. 13; iii. 1. 18; iv. 9; v. 6. 12. 13), the Gospel specially designed for the Jews, see above, Introduction to the Four Gospels, p. xli, and to St. Matthew, pp. xlix—lii. In the Synopsis Scripturæ inserted in the works of S. Athanasius (tom. ii. p. 55), there is mention of a tradition that "Evangelium secundum Matthæum hebraicâ dialecto conscriptum et editum Hierosolymis, et interpretante Jacobo fratre Domini secundum carnem expositum, qui et primus à sanctis Apostolis Hierosolymarum Episcopus constitutus est."

The Epistle is addressed to the twelve tribes in the dispersion. How,—it may be asked,—could copies of it be transmitted to those twelve tribes, scattered abroad throughout the world? See John vii. 35.

The answer is, By God's good providence, the Temple at Jerusalem was allowed to stand for forty years after the Crucifixion. Jews and Jewish Christians resorted to it year after year for the great annual Festivals (cp. Acts xviii. 21). St. James remained at Jerusalem as Bishop of that city (Acts xxi. 18). Thus he could communicate with them; and they could carry copies of the Epistle to their several homes throughout the world; and so in this respect, as in many others, the pilgrim tribes of the Law became preachers of the Gospel. See above on Acts ii. 1.

— χαίρειν] salvere: greeting. This form of salutation is used in the apostolic decree of the Council of Jerusalem, framed, probably, by St. James, Bishop of Jerusalem, Acts xv. 23, and is not employed by any other writer of the N. T.

2. πᾶσαν χαρὰν ἡγήσασθε] count it all joy. Do not deem it sorrow, but regard it rather as joy—joy unmixed with sorrow: "merum gaudium existimate;" like a vessel containing pure and agreeable beverage, and filled up to the brim; count even sorrow to be joy, and only joy, as the Apostles did, Acts v. 41, and as St. Paul did, Col. i. 24, and as our Lord commands his disciples to do, Luke vi. 22, 23.

On this use of πᾶς, see Huther here, who quotes Homer, Od. xi. 507, πᾶσαν ἀληθειαν μυθήσομαι, and cp. Winer, § 18, p. 101. So merus in Latin: "accipies meros amores" (Catull. xiii. 9), and "mera libertas," "ærugo mera," "sermo merus" (Horat.).

This precept, inculcating patience under trial, was suggested by the circumstances of the Jewish Christians to whom St. James was writing, and who were exposed to peculiar hardships and sufferings from the malice of their Jewish fellow-countrymen, treating them as Apostates; and were thus tempted to faint and falter in the faith. This their condition has been already presented to our view in the Acts of the Apostles, see on ii. 44, and in the first Epistle to the Thessalonians (1 Thess. ii. 14, 15), and in the Epistle to the Hebrews. See Heb. iv. 1; vi. 1—10; x. 34, and Introduction to that Epistle, toward the end.

Besides,—the Twelve Tribes in the dispersion, who were without home, or nation, and were soon about to witness the destruction of the Temple and City of Jerusalem, to which they had hitherto resorted at stated times, needed special consolation. They were to be cheered by the assurance that, wherever they were, they might find a home in Christ, and a Jerusalem in His Church,—"ipsis debuit consolatio præstari, qui maximè videbantur affligi." Cassiodorus.

Hence St. James begins with inculcating the duty of patience; and the blessedness of endurance under temptation.

St. James says, Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations, or trials: but he also warns them against the notion that they are at liberty to run into temptation, or that temptation is from God (see below, v. 13). No, they must pray that He would not lead them into temptation (see on Matt. vi. 13), and no temptation is from God (see below, v. 13). But God sometimes allows His servants to be tempted, as He did Job (i. 12; ii. 5), and St. Paul (2 Cor. xii. 7), in order that His grace may be magnified in them and by them, and that they may attain an increase of glory by overcoming the Tempter, as Christ did. And therefore they may well count it all joy when they fall into divers temptations, for these trials are the occasions of their triumphs: they are the leaves and flowers of which the heavenly crown is to be woven.

— χαίρειν—χαράν] One of the characteristics of the style of this Epistle is, that, after the introduction of a leading word, the Author follows it up by some precept growing out of that word; a mode of writing called by grammarians anadiplosis; see here the repetition of the word ὑπομονή, v. 3; and cp. λειπόμενοι, v. 4 and 5; and διακρινόμενος, v. 4, cp. v. 13, and following; and v. 19. 21, 22. 26, and Bengel's note.

— ἀδελφοί μου] my brethren; an address occurring oftener in this Epistle than in any other of its size: i. 16. 19; ii. 1. 5. 14; iii. 1. 10. 12; iv. 11; v. 7. 9, 10. 12. 19; in three of which places (viz. i. 16. 19; ii. 5) it is joined with ἀγαπητοί, beloved. The Jews were addressed as ἀδελφοί by the Apostles (see Acts xxii. 1, and note xxii. 5). And this address is very suitable in an Epistle like the present, characterized by the language of stern rebuke; inspired, like the reproof of St. Stephen, by the Spirit of Love. James the "Lord's brother," having the spirit of the Lord, addresses even them as "brothers."

3. γινώσκοντες] since ye know. Such an appeal to the knowledge of the believers is characteristic of this and the other Catholic Epistles, designed to correct the errors and presumption of the knowledge falsely so called (1 Tim. vi. 20) of the Gnostic false Teachers, and also of those who relied on knowledge apart from practice, see below, ii. 20; iii. 13; iv. 4. 17; v. 20. 2 Pet. i. 20; iii. 3. 1 John ii. 3—5. 13.

— τὸ δοκίμιον] the trial. Herodian ii. 10, δοκίμιον στρατιωτῶν κάματος, that which is grievous in opere, is joyous in fructu. See Heb. xii. 11, and cp. Prov. xvii. 3; xxvii. 21. δοκίμιον is a word specially applied to metals, cp. 1 Pet. i. 7. See also below, v. 12, where another metaphor is used.

4. ἡ δὲ ὑπομονή] but let patience have her perfect work, in firm endurance unto the end, for "he that endureth to the end shall be saved," Matt. xxiv. 13; an exhortation necessary for those whom St. James addressed, cp. Heb. iii. 6. 14; vi. 11.

On this text see the sermon of S. Augustine, Serm. 159, and compare the treatises of Tertullian and S. Cyprian "De Patientiâ."

— ὁλόκληροι] a word properly applied to those who are heirs to the whole inheritance (κλῆρος), and thence applied in a moral sense to what is sound and entire in all its parts. Hence it is used by Josephus (Ant. iii. 12. 2) to describe the sacrificial victims which must be without blemish; and so Philo ap. Loesner, p. 452; and the ancient lexicographers interpret it by σῶος and ὑγιὴς, sound and healthful. Cp. Acts iii. 16; and 1 Thess. v. 23.

5. εἰ δέ τις] but if any of you lacketh wisdom, namely, is deficient in that moral wisdom, which may qualify you to bear up patiently and thankfully under your sufferings, and to refute the cavils of your adversaries, who gainsay the truth as it is in Christ: such was the σοφία of St. Stephen. Acts vi. 10.

See the treatise of Lactantius "on true and false Wisdom," and the distinction drawn between γνῶσις (mere theoretical knowledge) and σοφία (practical wisdom) by Etym. Mag.

Every man needs wisdom, and εἴ τις is not to be understood as if there were any exceptions to this statement; but the hypothetical conjunction "if" is often used, not as if the supposition were doubtful, but to introduce a precept built on an acknowledged fact. 'If I am a Father, where is My honour?' Malachi i. 6, and εἴ τις, ἐάν τις, ἐὰν μή τις, are often employed, where quicunque would be used in Latin, and in English 'whosoever.' See John iii. 3. 5, and on Phil. iv. 8.

This text (as Bede observes) contains a warning against the erroneous notion of Pelagianism, that men may obtain wisdom by their own free will, without Divine grace. Cp. v. 16, 17.

The word λείπομαι occurs only in this Epistle in the New Testament, see v. 4, and 11, 12.

— αἰτείτω, κ.τ.λ.] let him ask it from God (as Solomon did, 1 Kings iii. 11; cp. Proverbs ii. 6) who giveth to all men, not as the Jews give, only to their own nation, but to all; and who giveth ἁπλῶς, liberally, that is, sine laxo, expanding the lap of His bounty, and pouring forth its contents into your bosom. Cp. 2 Cor. viii. 2; ix. 11, and the use of the word ἁπλοῦν, dilatare, by the LXX in Isaiah xxxiii. 23; and therefore the word ἁπλῶς is rendered affluenter here by the Vulgate, and copiously by the Syriac Version.

A second sense of ἁπλῶς, sincerely, when a gift is given with a single eye, and without any sinister view to self, may also be admitted here. Cp. note above on Rom. xii. 8. God gives ἁπλῶς, and they who pray must pray ἁπλῶς.

The description of the Divine bounty is like a summary of our Lord's words, exhorting to prayer. Matt. vii. 7—12.

— καὶ μὴ ὀνειδίζοντος] and upbraideth not. And in this respect also God is not like human benefactors, who often upbraid the recipients of their bounty by an humiliating and invidious commemoration of the benefit ("exprobratio beneficî," Terent.) conferred by them, and of the inadequate returns which they receive for them. "After thou hast given, upbraid not," says the son of Sirach (Ecclus. xli. 22), μετὰ τὸ δοῦναι μὴ ὀνειδίζε.

This text presents the strongest motives to genuine liberality, as Bishop Andrewes says to the wealthy of his own age. It concerneth your homage, which is your trust in God, that you trust Him with your service of body and soul, Who hath trusted you with His plenty and store, and hath made you in that estate that you are trusted with matters of high importance both at home and abroad. For it is the argument of all arguments to the true Christian, because God hath given him, saith St. James (James i. 5), "without exprobration;" and given "all things," without exception of any; and that "to enjoy," which is more than competency; and that "plenteously," which is more than sufficiency; therefore, even therefore, to trust in Him only. If there be in us the hearts of true Christians, this will show it, for it will move us to place our trust in that God Who beyond all our deserts giveth: if we respect the quantity, "all things;" if the manner, very "plenteously;" if the end, "to joy" in them; yet so, that our joy and repose end in Him—a very blessed and heavenly condition. Bp. Andrewes (Sermons, v. p. 31).

6. αἰτείτω δὲ ἐν πίστει] but let him ask in faith. We may here cite the words of Bp. Sanderson, "If any man lack wisdom," saith St. James, "let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally; and it shall be given him." A large and liberal promise; but yet a promise most certain, and full of comfortable assurance, provided it be understood aright, viz. with these two necessary limitations: if God shall see it expedient, and if man pray for it as he ought. Thou mayest pray with an humble and upright affection, and put to thy best endeavours withal, and yet not obtain the gift thou prayest for, because, being a common grace, and not of absolute necessity for salvation, it may be withheld by the wisdom of God, who best knoweth what is best, and when not expedient for thee, or not for His Church, at that time, and in that manner, or measure. Necessary graces, such as are those of sanctification, pray for them absolutely, and thou shalt absolutely receive them.

But if it be expedient, it will not yet come for asking, unless it be asked aright. But let him pray in faith, saith St. James. Whoso doth not, let not that man think to receive any thing of the Lord. Now, that man only prayeth in faith, who looketh to receive the thing he prayeth for, upon such terms as God hath promised to give it; for Faith ever looketh to the promise. And God hath not made us any promise of the end, other than conditional; viz. upon our conscionable use of the appointed means. And the means which He hath ordained both for the obtaining and the improving of spiritual gifts, are study and industry, and diligent meditation.

To make all sure, then, here is your course. Wrestle with God by your fervent prayers; and wrestle with Him too by your faithful endeavours; and He will not, for His goodness sake, and for His promise sake He cannot, dismiss you without a blessing. But omit either, and the other is lost labour. Prayer without study is presumption, and study without prayer is Atheism. Bp. Sanderson (Serm. ii. p. 92).

— μηδὲν διακρινόμενος] nothing doubting: for he that doubteth is like a wave of the sea driven by the wind and tossed. At one time he is raised aloft by hope, at another he sinks downwards, in the abysses of despair; as St. Peter did in the storm, when he doubted. See Matt. xiv. 30, 31. Then the Apostolic Petros, or Stone, became like a wave of the sea; but afterwards he was settled in faith, and was set for ever in the foundation of the Church. Rev. xxi. 14.

The word ῥιπιζόμενος is applied, as here, to the sea agitated by winds, by Philo de Mundo, § 18, and by Dio Chrys. xxxii. p. 368.

7, 8. μὴ γὰρ οἰέσθω] for let not that man suppose that he will receive any thing of the Lord—being, as he is,—a two-minded man, unstable in all his ways. On the construction, see Winer, § 59. 10, p. 472. A similar apposition is in 1 Cor. v. 7. 2 Cor. vii. 6. Rom. viii. 24; and so Wiesinger and Huther.

This exhortation of St. James to faith in prayer, and this warning against double-mindedness, appear to have been before the eyes of a primitive writer, the author of "The Shepherd," Hermas, in his Mandates viii.—xi. (referred to in the Ancient Catena here, p. 4), where he says, "Cast away from thyself double-mindedness" (διψυχίαν); be "not in any wise two-minded (μὴ διψυχήσῃς) in asking of God; say not, how can I ask of God, and obtain it, when I have sinned so much against Him? Nay, but rather turn with thy whole heart to the Lord, and ask of Him without hesitation, and thou shalt feel the abundance of His mercy, for He is not like men, who remember injuries; but if thou doubtest in thy heart, thou wilt receive nothing from Him, for they who doubt concerning God, are the double-minded men, and obtain none of their requests." Hermas, Pastor, Mandat. ix. p. 596, ed. Dressel.

The whole of that and the following chapter appears to be an expansion of the precept of St. James in this place. Compare also the words of the Apostolic Father S. Clement, c. 23, where the word δίψυχος is used in the same sense as here, and below, iv. 8; and so Barnabas, Epist. c. 19.

9. καυχάσθω] let the brother of low degree glory in his exaltation: having been made a son of God by adoption in Christ, and an heir of His glory and kingdom, which are promised to the meek and lowly of heart, Matt. v. 3; xxiii. 12. Luke vi. 20; and which raise the lowliest of earth above the princes of this world, and make them to be Kings and Priests to God. Cp. Rev. i. 6.

An appropriate exhortation from James the Less (Mark xv. 40), who had been exalted to the high dignity of Bishop of Jerusalem, and was called Oblias (or "high fortress of the people"), and was a pillar of the Church, Gal. ii. 9 (see above, Introduction, p. 5), and perhaps took the title 'the Less,' not only to distinguish himself from the other James, but as a moral memento to himself that he should not be elated by his exaltation, but remember that he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. Matt. xxiii. 12; cp. below, iv. 6, and on Acts xiii. 9, on the name of Paul. Cp. 1 Cor. xv. 9. Eph. iii. 8.

10. ὁ δὲ πλούσιος] but let the rich man glory in his abasement; let him not be grieved by it as too many are; let him not be distressed, because as a Christian he is exposed to suffer ignominy and reproach from his Jewish friends, and from the world; and is shunned and hated, and reviled by them, and perhaps is spoiled of his goods (Heb. x. 34), and endures violence and persecution (Heb. x. 32), and is thus debased and brought low in the eyes of men. No, let him glory in his low estate; let him rejoice and be exceeding glad in his humiliation; for he is thus delivered from the snares of wealth and worldliness, and from placing his trust in what is fickle and fleeting (v. 11), and from perishing as Dives did, who despised Lazarus (Luke xvi. 19), and is led to look up to God, and to trust in Him alone. He is now made like to Christ in suffering, and will be made like to Him hereafter in glory. Cp. Heb. xii. 3; xiii. 13.

Some expositors render ὁ δὲ πλούσιος κ.τ.λ., but the rich man rejoiceth in that which is his debasement; i. e. his affluence and luxury; but this interpretation seems to be rather forced and unnatural.

— ὅτι ὡς ἄνθος] because he will pass away as the flower of grass, that is, the rich man, as such, will fade away. See v. 11.

11. ἀνέτειλε γὰρ ὁ ἥλιος] for the sun arose. The aorists here give liveliness to the picture, and signify that no sooner the sun arose than the flower suddenly faded. See Winer, § 40, p. 248, who compares the Latin veni, vidi, vici: ibid. p. 417, note.

— σὺν τῷ καύσωνι] with the burning heat. See Matt. xx. 12. Luke xii. 55. Some interpreters suppose καύσων to mean the dry parching east wind (קָדִים), as in Job xxvii. 21. Jonah iv. 8, but this does not seem to be the sense here, for St. James is speaking of what is usual, and not of what is partial and casual, as the rise of a particular wind. Accordingly, in the Vulgate, Syriac, Arabic, and Æthiopic Versions, the word is rendered heat.

— ὁ πλούσιος—μαρανθήσεται] the rich man will fade away. He does not mean that the rich brother, i. e. Christian, will fade away; no, he οὐ μαρανθήσεται, but will have an amaranthine crown (1 Pet. v. 4); he will himself bloom for ever as a spiritual amaranth; for he will lay up treasure in heaven (Matt. vi. 20), and make to himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, who will receive him into the bosom of Abraham, who was a rich man and yet "the friend of God" (see Luke xvi. 22. 25, note), and into the everlasting habitations of heaven. (Luke xvi. 9.) But the rich man, as far as he is rich in this world, and trusts in his earthly riches (cp. Mark x. 24), will fade away like the flower of the field. Compare Wisdom v. 8, 9. 1 Pet. i. 24. With ὁ πλούσιος here compare τὸν πτωχόν, the poor, as such, ii. 6.

— ἐν ταῖς πορείαις αὐτοῦ] in his ways—another lively picture: he will fade away in his ways; when actively and eagerly engaged in some worldly pursuit or pleasure, in the midst of his joy and jollity, suddenly will he be cut off.

12. δόκιμος γενόμενος] when he has become approved, like an athlete or racer. This allusion was not strange to the Jewish mind. Cp. 1 Cor. ix. 24—27, and Phil. iii. 14; and so Philo Judæus uses the word δοκιμασθείς. Cp. Loesner, p. 454; and so Krebs, Augusti, and others here.

— τὸν στέφανον τῆς ζωῆς] the crown of life. Observe the contrast. The rich man, as such, is only a fading flower (v. 10) withered by the sun; but he who stands the scorching heat of trial, shall receive the crown of life, which never fadeth away. (Rev. ii. 10. 1 Pet. v. 4.) Earthly trials are the flowers of which the heavenly garland is made. The wild flowers which grow on the wayside of life will become an undying wreath of glory on the head of the Saints of God. Therefore, blessed is he who endureth trial, for when he is approved, he shall receive the crown of life. Cp. Wisdom v. 17.

13. μηδεὶς πειραζόμενος λεγέτω] let no man, being tempted, say, I am being tempted of God; ἀπὸ marks the immediate cause of temptation. Cp. Matt. iv. 1, and Huther here.

St. James here anticipates and answers an objection which might be raised on his previous declaration, that they were to consider it all joy, when they fell into divers temptations (v. 2).

If this is so, then, it might be rejoined, that temptation is a good thing, and from God; or, if it is an evil thing, then God is the author of evil. No, says the Apostle, no one is tempted of God, for God is neither tempted nor tempts.

— ὁ γὰρ Θεὸς ἀπείραστός ἐστιν κακῶν] for God is not capable of being tempted, as the Devil is, by evil things, whether moral, such as pride and envy, or physical, such as pain; and being not affected by these things in Himself, but being perfectly and eternally holy, and infinite in wisdom and love, and felicity, He is not like the Tempter. He tempteth no one. Αὐτὸς, Ipse, is emphatic. He is not tempted, and He Himself tempteth no one.

This is the sense given to the word ἀπείραστος in the Syriac and Arabic Versions, and by the ancient Greek Expositors, such as Œcumenius and Theophylact, who cite the saying of an ancient heathen writer to this effect, that τὸ θεῖον οὔτε πράγματα ἔχει, οὔτε ἄλλοις παρέχει, the Divinity neither is troubled nor troubles any one. Compare Ecclus. xv. 11. "Say not thou, It is through the Lord that I fell away; for thou oughtest not to do the things that He hateth; say not thou, He hath caused me to err;" and v. 20, "He hath commanded no man to do wickedly, neither hath he given any man licence to sin." And so Bp. Andrewes, "God is not tempted with evil, and He doth not tempt to evil. Ascribe it not to the Father of lights, but to the Prince of Darkness. But ascribe all good, from the smallest spark to the greatest beam, from the least 'good giving' to the best and most perfect gift of all, to Him, the Father of Lights." (Bp. Andrewes, Serm. iii. p. 363. 373.) And so Theile and other modern Expositors.

Some interpreters render ἀπείραστος unversed in, inexperienced in; that is, God does not make experiments in evil things: and this sense is consistent with grammatical usage (see Winer, p. 175), and St. James may perhaps refer to the false tenet of some of the heretics of the early Church, who said that it was the duty of men to have experimental knowledge of all evil, in order to the attainment of perfection. See below on 1 John i. 6. But the other sense seems best to suit the context, and there is evidently a connexion between the words ἀπείραστος and πειράζει; and the fundamental sense, that of temptation, is to be preserved throughout. On the form of the word ἀπείραστος, intentatus, or intentabilis, see Winer, § 16. 3, p. 88; and on the structure with the genitive, see ibid. § 30, p. 175, where he compares Soph. Antig. 847, ἄκλαυτος φίλων: so Eurip. Hippol. 962, ἀκήρατος κακῶν. Cp. Kühner, Gr. Gr. § 513.

Thus St. James delivers a caution against errors which afterwards showed themselves in the heresies of Apelles, Hermogenes, Valentinus, Marcion, and the Manichæans, which represented God as the author of evil, or as subject to evil, and unable to resist and overcome it.

S. Augustine raises a question on this passage. If God tempts no one, how is it that he is said in Scripture to tempt Abraham (Gen. xxii. 1)? To which he replies that St. James is speaking of temptations arising from evil motives, with a view to an evil end. No such temptations are from God. But God is said to have tempted, that is, to have tried Abraham, from a good motive and for a good end. He tried him, in love to him and to all men, in order that he might become the Father of the faithful, and be an example of obedience to all ages of the world. See also Tertullian de Orat. c. 8, who says, "God forbid, that we should imagine, that He tempts any one, as if He were ignorant of any man's faith, or desired to make any one fall. No; such ignorance and malice belong not to God, but to the Devil. Abraham was commanded to slay his son, not for his temptation, but for the manifestation of his faith, as a pattern and proof to all, that no pledges of love, however dear, are to be preferred to God. Christ, when tempted by the Devil, showed who it is that is the author of temptation, and who it is that is our Guardian against it." Cp. Augustine, Tractat. in Joann. 43; and de Consensu Evang. ii. 30; and Bp. Andrewes, Sermons, vol. v. pp. 443—447.

14. ἐξελκόμενος καὶ δελεαζόμενος] being drawn away from doing good, and lured as by a bait to do evil. Cp. Philo de Agric. p. 202, πρὸς ἡδονῆς δελεασθὲν εἵλκυσται, and p. 888, E, πρὸς ἐπιθυμίας ἑλαύνεται, ἢ ὑφ' ἡδονῆς δελεάζεται. (Loesner.) Cp. Aristot. Polit. v. 10, παρὰ τῆς γυναικὸς ἐξελκυσθείς, and in Test. xii. Patrum. Joseph says of Potiphar's wife, πρὸς πορνείαν με ἐφελκύσατο. (Kypke.)

Concupiscence is the womb of sin, and the offspring of sin is death. All these are evil, and none of these are from God, who is the author of all good.

If then temptations prevail against us, St. James tells us where to lay the blame—not on God, for He tempteth no man; nor even on the Devil, for though he can tempt us to evil, he cannot compel us. But every man, when he is tempted cum effectu, so as to be overcome by temptation, is tempted of his own lust; drawn away by affrightments from doing good, or enticed by allurements to do evil. The common saying holdeth most true in temptations, "no man taketh harm but from himself." See Bp. Sanderson, i. p. 408.

No man is tempted by God; but "sibi cuique Deus fit dira cupido." Virgil, Æn. ix. 185.

15. τίκτει ἁμαρτίαν] bringeth forth sin. Concupiscence is here personified, as doing the work of an unchaste woman, soliciting (πειράζουσα; cp. Ruhnken, Tim. v. πειρῶντα, p. 210) man to sin, and inducing him to comply with her allurements (cp. Prov. vii. 7—23), and giving birth to sin, the offspring of their illicit union.

St. James traces the progress of temptation, which has three steps, "1. Suggestio, 2. delectatio, 3. consensus: suggestio est hostis; delectatio autem vel consensus est nostræ fragilitatis." Bede, who says, "Si delectationem cordis partus sequitur pravæ actionis, nobis jam mortis reis victor hostis abscedit." Joseph was tempted by Potiphar's wife, but he did not give way to the "suggestio hostis," and gained glory from his temptation. David was tempted, and yielded to the temptation, and became guilty before God. Temptation may be the occasion of death, but blessed is he who endureth it, for he shall receive a crown of life.

— ἀποκύει θάνατον] bringeth forth death. The word ἀποκύω, or ἀποκυέω, is "propria prægnantium quæ fœtum maturum emittunt." Schleusner. See also Wetstein, p. 662; and see below, v. 18.

16. μὴ πλανᾶσθε] be not ye deceived. The formulas μὴ πλανῶ, 'be not thou deceived,' and μὴ πλανᾶσθε, 'be not ye deceived,' are the preambles used in Scripture and by ancient Fathers, in order to introduce cautions against, and refutations of, some popular error, as here. Cp. 1 Cor. vi. 9; xv. 33. Gal. vi. 7. S. Ignat. Ephes. 16. Phil. 3. Smyrn. 6. S. Hippol. Phil. p. 286, with notes by the present Editor.

— πᾶσα δόσις ἀγαθή] every giving that is good, and every gift that is perfect, is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, nor shadow of turning. It would seem as if St. James designed to give more currency to this sacred axiom, by presenting the first portion of it in the form of an Hexameter verse, the last syllable in δόσις being lengthened by the arsis, as Winer remarks, § 68, p. 564. Cp. note above on Heb. xii. 13—15, for similar examples of metrical structure in the New Testament.

Δόσις may perhaps be distinguished here from δώρημα. Δόσις may mean donatio or giving (cp. Phil. iv. 5), δώρημα is donum or gift; and so the Geneva Bible and Bp. Andrewes, who has two Sermons on this text, iii. 361, and v. 311, and observes (v. 313) that δόσις ἀγαθή, donatio bona, or good giving, represents rather that act of giving which bestows things of present use for this life, whether for our souls or bodies, in our journey to our heavenly country; but δώρημα τέλειον, or perfect gift, designates those unalloyed and enduring treasures which are laid up for us in Eternity. They all come from one source. They are from above, and come down from the Father of Lights. There are divers stars, and one star differeth from another in glory. (1 Cor. xv. 41.) So there are diversities of gifts (1 Cor. xii. 4), but God is the Author of them all.

Observe the present participle καταβαῖνον, coming down, always descending in a perpetual stream of love. Observe also the plural number, lights. God is not the author of any evil, but He is the author of all good.

The ministry of good is directly and indirectly from God; but evil comes only per accidens, indirectly and mediately, for the correction of man, who is chastened by suffering. Didymus.

God is the Father of all lights; the light of the natural world, the sun, the moon, and stars, shining in the heavens; the light of Reason and Conscience; the light of His Law; the light of Prophecy, shining in a dark place; the light of the Gospel, shining throughout the world; the light of Apostles, Confessors, Martyrs, Bishops, and Priests, preaching that Gospel to all nations; the light of the Holy Ghost, shining in our hearts; the light of the heavenly city: God is the Father of them all. He is the Everlasting Father of the Everlasting Son, Who is the "Light of the World." John ix. 5.

Father is something more than Author or Giver. All Lights are His offspring, His children, His family.

To cite the words of two learned English Bishops: "As the Sun, who is the father of lights in the natural world, whereunto St. James alludes, giveth light to all, and nowhere causeth darkness, so God communicateth goodness to every thing He produceth, so that He cannot produce any thing at all but what is good. Let no man therefore say when he hath done evil, that it is God's doing. God is not the cause of any evil, either in sin or punishment; but He is the cause of all the good that there may be in a sinful action, or that may arise from the infliction of evil by way of punishment. We are unthankful if we impute any good but to Him, and we are unjust if we impute to Him any thing but good." Bp. Sanderson (iii. 150).

Though of man it be truly said by Job, "he never continueth in one stay" (Job xiv. 2); though the lights of Heaven have their parallaxes; yea, "the Angels of Heaven, He found not stedfastness in them" (Job iv. 18); yet, for God, He is subject to none of them. He is Ego sum Qui sum (Ex. iii. 14); that is, saith Malachi, Ego Deus, et non mutor (Mal. iii. 6). We are not what we were awhile since, what we shall be awhile after, scarce what we are; for every moment makes us vary. With God it is nothing so. "He is that He is; He is and changeth not." He changes not His tenor; He says not, Before Abraham was, I was; but, "Before Abraham was, I am." (John viii. 58.)

Yet are there "varyings and changes," it cannot be denied. We see them daily. True, but the point is per quem, on whom to lay them? Not on God. Seems there any recess? It is we forsake Him, not He us. (Jer. ii. 17.) It is the ship that moves, though they that be in it think the land goes from them, not they from it. Seems there any variation, as that of the night? It is umbra terræ makes it, the light makes it not. Is there any thing resembling a shadow? A vapour rises from us, and makes the cloud, which is as a penthouse between, and takes Him from our sight. That vapour is our lust, there is the apud quem. Is any tempted? It is his own lust doth it; that entices him to sin; that brings us to the shadow of death. It is not God. No more than He can be tempted, no more can He tempt any. If we find any change, the apud is with us, not Him: we change, He is unchanged. "Man walketh in a vain shadow." (Ps. xxxix. 6.) His ways are the truth. He cannot deny Himself.

Every evil, the more perfectly evil it is, the more it is from below; it either rises from the steam of our nature corrupted; or yet lower, ascends as a gross smoke, from the bottomless pit, from the prince of darkness, as full of varying and turning into all shapes and shadows, as God is far from both, Who is uniform and constant in all His courses. . . . . The "lights" may vary, He is invariable; they may change, He is unchangeable, constant always, and like Himself.

Now our lessons from these are—

1. Are they given? Then, quid gloriaris? let us have no boasting. Are they given, why forget the Giver? Let Him be had in memory, He is worthy so to be had.

2. Are the "giving" as well as the "gift," and the "good" as the "perfect," of gift, both? Then acknowledge it in both; take the one as a pledge, make the one as a step to the other.

3. Are they from somewhere else, not from ourselves? Learn then to say, and to say with feeling, Non nobis, Domine, quia non à nobis. (Ps. cxv. 1.)

4. Are they from on high? Look not down to the ground, then, as swine to the acorns they find lying there, and never once up to the tree they come from. Look up; the very frame of our body gives that way. It is nature's check to us, to have our head bear upward, and our heart grovel below.

5. Do they descend? Ascribe them then to purpose, not to time or chance. No table to fortune, saith the Prophet. Isa. lxv. 11.

6. Are they from the "Father of lights?" (Jer. x. 12,) then never go to the children, à signis cœli nolite timere: "neither fear nor hope for any thing from any light of them at all."

7. Are His "gifts without repentance?" (Rom. ii. 29.) Varies He not? Whom He loves, doth "He love to the end?" (John xiii. 1.) Let our service be so too, not wavering. O that we changed from Him no more than He from us! Not from the light of grace to the shadow of sin, as we do full often.

But above all, that which is ex totâ substantiâ, that if we find any want of any giving or gift, good or perfect, this text gives us light, whither to look, to whom to repair for them; to the "Father of Lights." And even so let us do. Ad Patrem luminum cum primo lumine: "Let the light, every day, so soon as we see it, put us in mind to get us to the Father of Lights." Ascendat oratio, descendet miseratio, 'let our prayer go up to Him that His grace may come down to us,' so to lighten us in our ways and works, that we may in the end come to dwell with Him, in the light which is φῶς ἀνέσπερον, 'light whereof there is no even-tide,' the sun whereof never sets, nor knows tropic—the only thing we miss, and wish for in our lights here, primum et ante omnia. Bp. Andrewes (Sermons, iii. p. 374).

Cp. Bp. Bull, Harm. Apostol. Diss. ii. ch. xv., who supposes that St. James here refers to the Pharisaic notion of the influence of the changes of the heavenly bodies upon human actions.

God is always in the meridian. Wetstein.

18. βουληθεὶς] by the act of His own will He brought us forth; not by any necessity or caprice, but by the deliberate act of His Divine Will—a proof of His freedom, power, and love. See above on Eph. i. 11. Titus iii. 5.

Here is an Apostolic protest against two errors prevalent among the Jews, (1) that men are what they are either by necessity, as the Pharisees held, or else (2), as the Sadducees taught, by the unaided action of their own will, independently of Divine grace. See Maimonides in his Preface to Pirke Aboth, and Josephus, Antiq. xiii. 5. 9; xviii. 1. 3. Bp. Bull, Harm. Apost. Diss. ii. ch. xv. Thus they disparaged the dignity of the Divine Will.

— ἀπεκύησεν ἡμᾶς] He brought us forth. A remarkable word, made more striking by its use in v. 15, and by the contrast there. It is properly used, as there, of maternal conception and generation (cp. ἔγκυος, Luke ii. 5), and we are taught by its use here, as compared with its use there (the only two places in the New Testament where the word occurs), that while, as to sin, the conception is in the concupiscence of our appetite, which is impregnated by the consent of our Will, and so brings forth sin, and sin (ἀποκύει) gives birth to death, it is God, and God alone Who acts in our New Birth.

With reverence be it said, in the work of our Regeneration, He is both our Father and Mother; and this statement well follows the declaration of the Apostle that every good giving and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of Lights. He is a Father, the Father of lights, and He is like a Mother also, and gives birth to us by the word of truth.

Compare the use of the maternal word ὠδίνω, parturio, used by St. Paul in one of his tenderest expressions of affectionate yearning for his spiritual children. Gal. iv. 19.

By this word ἀπεκύησεν, He brought us forth, St. James declares God's maternal love for our souls. "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee." (Isa. xlix. 15.) "When my father and my mother forsake me, the Lord taketh me up." Ps. xxvii. 12.

"Deus nobis Ipse Patris et Matris loco est." Bengel.

— λόγῳ ἀληθείας] by the word of truth. So St. Peter declares (1 Pet. i. 23), that we have been born again, not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible, by the Word of the Living God.

Some ancient Expositors interpret the Word here as signifying the Eternal Word, Who, for our sakes, became Incarnate, and by being Incarnate gave "to those who receive Him, power to become sons of God," who are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God (John i. 13), and through whom we cry, "Abba, Father" (Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iii. 26), and become "partakers of the Divine nature." (2 Pet. i. 14.)

This is the sense assigned to this passage by S. Athanasius (contra Arianos iii. § 61, p. 483), who thus speaks, "Whatsoever the Father determines to create, He makes and creates by Him (the WORD), as the Apostle (St. James) says, By His will He brought us forth by the Word. Therefore the Will of the Father, which concerns those who are born again, or which concerns those things that are made by any other way, is in the Word, in whom He makes and regenerates what He thinks fit." So S. Bernard, Serm. ii. ad Fratres, in Ps. xxiv. 6, and Serm. xvi. in Cantica, and Œcumenius and Theophylact here.

This sense of the word Λόγος, signifying a Divine person, was already familiar to the readers of St. James, from their paraphrases of the Old Testament, and from the writings of such authors as Philo (see above on John i. 1); and accordingly it is found in those portions of the New Testament which are addressed, as this Epistle is, to Jewish Christians. See above on Heb. iv. 12.

Bp. Pearson says (p. 219), "this use of the term Word was familiar to the Jews, and this was the reason that St. John delivered to them so great a mystery in so few words," as he has done at the beginning of his Gospel; and the same remark is applicable to the language of St. James. See also Bp. Bull, Defensio Fidei Nicænæ, book i. chap. i. § 17—19, and his Harmon. Apost. Diss. ii. ch. xv., where he declares the meaning of St. James to be that our Christian graces proceed from "the good pleasure of God through Christ, and from the regeneration which the Holy Spirit works in us through the Gospel." And cp. Westcott, Introd. to the Gospels, pp. 136—141.

This sense, as will be seen, gives force to the Apostle's words, n Prov. 17. 27. Eccl. 5. 1, 2. o Eccl. 7. 9.

19 n Ὥστε, ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί, ἔστω πᾶς ἄνθρωπος ταχὺς εἰς τὸ ἀκοῦσαι, βραδὺς εἰς τὸ λαλῆσαι, βραδὺς εἰς ὀργήν· 20 ο ὀργὴ γὰρ ἀνδρὸς δικαιοσύνην Θεοῦ οὐ κατεργάζεται.

p Col. 3. 8. 1 Pet. 2. 1. Ps. 25. 9. Acts 13. 26. Rom. 1. 16.

who appears to use the term λόγος in a twofold sense, and to pass by a natural transition from the incarnate Word to the spoken Word; from Christ Incarnate to Christ preached; as does St. Paul, Heb. iv. 12, where see note; and on Eph. v. 26, and Titus i. 3. And St. Paul unites the two senses of Λόγος when he says that in preaching the Word of God again to the Galatians he is in travail with them, till Christ be formed in them. (Gal. iv. 19.)

Our Lord Himself seems to make a transition of this kind, when some were blessing His holy Mother, who had conceived in her womb Him Who is the Eternal Word. "Blessed rather are they who hear the Word of God and keep it" (Matt. xii. 50. Luke xi. 27), a speech to which St. James seems to allude. (See v. 25.)

"Adoro Scripturae plenitudinem," I adore the fulness of Scripture, said an ancient Father (Tertullian c. Hermog. c. 22); and it seems to be inconsistent with sound and enlightened Criticism to restrain that fulness, by limiting the terms employed by the Holy Ghost, to one sense exclusively, instead of conceding to them that freedom and richness of meaning which is their peculiar characteristic. See above, note on Rom. xii. 19.

We may rather suppose, that as our Lord said many things to His disciples in His teaching which could not be understood by them at the time when they were spoken, but afterwards became clear (see above, the Review, &c. at the end of John vi. p. 302); so the Holy Ghost, writing by St. James and other Apostles, used expressions of a prophetical kind, which were not altogether perspicuous to those who first read their Epistles, but afterward were more fully explained. They, whom St. James addressed, being born again by adoption, and created anew in Christ Jesus, the Eternal Word (Eph. ii. 10), might well be said to be designed by God to be a first-fruit of His creatures, for they were new creatures in Christ (Gal. vi. 15. 2 Cor. v. 17), Who is the first-begotten of every creature (Col. i. 15), the beginning of the creation of God (Rev. iii. 14), by whom all things were created (Col. i. 16). By virtue of His Incarnation, and of their Incorporation and Filiation in Him, who is the First-born among many brethren (Rom. viii. 29), they were made the first-fruits of Creation, being advanced to a high pre-eminence and primacy, beyond that which was given to Adam before the Fall (Gen. i. 28), and even above the Angels themselves; cp. Heb. i. 5—13; ii. 5. 7—16.

This secondary and higher sense of the word ΛΟΓΟΣ is illustrated by the theological statements of early Christian writers on this subject. With St. James they affirmed, that God is the Father of all, the πηγὴ or Fountain of all. The Logos or Word is ἐνδιάθετος and συναΐδιος, coeternally existing with Him, and eternally coming forth by His Will, as προφορικὸς, or produced from Him, and as προηδῶν κατ' ἐνέργειαν and κατὰ συγκατάβασιν, and sent forth in His προόλευσις or going forth, to create the World and to become Incarnate, and so being πρωτότοκος or first-born of all things.

Thus Irenæus says (ii. 25. 3), "Thou, O man, art not uncreated, nor wert thou always coexistent with God, like His own Word, but thou art gradually learning from the Word the dispensations of God who made thee." See also Clemens Alexandrin. Protrepticon, p. 68, "The Word who at first gave us life has manifested Himself as our Instructor, and has taught us to live well; that as God, He might give us eternal life."

Tertullian, in a passage which illustrates the word ἀπεκύησεν, says, "Christus primogenitus et unigenitus Dei propriè de vulvâ cordis Ipsius" (c. Praxean. c. 7), and so S. Athanasius (orat. c. Arianos, v. § 24), speaks of the Logos as coming forth from the Father, from His heart, and begotten of His womb.

Novatian (de Trin. 31) says, "There is one God, without any origin, from whom the Word, the Son, was born. He, born of the Father, dwells ever in the Father."

And Theophilus of Antioch says (§ 10), "God, having His Own Word indwelling in His own bowels (σπλάγχνοις), begat Him, having breathed Him forth before all things, and through Him He hath made all things; and He is called the Beginning, because He is the Principle and Lord of all things which were created through Him." See also § 22, and Bp. Bull, Defensio Fidei Nicænæ, book ii. ch. vi., and book iii. ch. v., and ch. vii., on the language of the Fathers, describing the Word as "insitum et inclusum visceribus Dei;" he well observes (book iii. ch. ii.), that the Son of God, born from Eternity, is said by the Fathers to have certain other births in time. He was born into the world when He came forth to create the world. He was born again in a wonderful manner, when He descended into the womb of the Virgin, and united Himself to His creature. He is daily born in the hearts of those who embrace Him by faith and love.

S. Hippolytus, in his recently recovered treatise (Philos. p. 334), thus speaks,—The one Supreme God generates the Word in His own mind. The Word was in the Father, bearing the Will of the Father Who begat Him; and when the Father commanded that the World should be created, the Word was executing what was pleasing to the Father.

The Word alone is of God, of God Himself; wherefore He is God. The Word of God regulates all things, the First-born of the Father. Christ is God over all, Who commanded us to wash away sin from man; regenerating the old man, and having called man His image from the beginning; and if thou hearkenest to His holy commandment, and imitatest in goodness Him who is good, thou wilt be like Him, being honoured by Him, for God has a longing for thee, having divinized thee also for His glory.

See the present Editor's S. Hippolytus, pp. 278—302, where some other ancient authorities on this subject are collected.

The Eternal Generation of the Divine Logos or WORD, and His subsequent Incarnation in time, and our filial adoption in Him before the foundation of the world, were acts of the Divine Volition, and were effected with the co-operation and instrumentality of the Divine Logos Himself, and it may well be supposed that the Holy Spirit, in writing this Epistle, had these transcendental mysteries of Christian Theology in His mind when He said by St. James, that "by His Will He brought us forth by the Word of Truth, that we might be a kind of first-fruit of His Creatures."

This higher sense of λόγος includes also the lower one, God brought us forth by the Word of Truth, preached to the World. See further below on v. 21, and on 1 Pet. i. 23—25.

— εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἀπαρχήν] that we should be a kind of first-fruit ("quasdam quasi primitias") of His creatures. The whole Creation partakes in the blessings of Redemption, and waits with hope for a more glorious state thereby; see on Rom. viii. 19—22, which is the best exposition of this passage. But man, redeemed by Christ, who has taken human nature, and has restored to us the free use of all the creatures (see on 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23), and has united our nature to God, and raised it from the grave, and carried it to God's right hand, is the first-fruits of the glorious harvest. Man in Christ is the wave sheaf of the harvest. See 1 Cor. xv. 20—23.

Some Expositors limit ἀπαρχὴ to the earliest Christian converts; but this seems too narrow a view.

19. ὥστε] wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear. Since we are born again by the Word of God revealed to us, and dwelling in us, let us be swift to hear it.

Instead of ὥστε B, C have ἴστε, ye know, or know ye, and A has ἴστε δὲ, for ἔστω. B, C have ἔστω δέ. This variety is very worthy of notice. ἴστε, ye know, may seem to be preferable in one respect, on internal grounds, because St. James is dealing with persons who boasted much of their knowledge (see on i. 3; iv. 4. 17); and he is endeavouring to convince them that knowledge without practice is vain. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." (John xiii. 17. See below, v. 22.)

Ἴστε is received by Lachmann and Alford, and was adopted by Tischendorf in his earlier editions, but in his last edition he has ὥστε, and this reading is sanctioned by G, H, and by the great body of the cursive MSS., and by the Syriac, Æthiopic, and Arabic Versions, and by Theophyl., Œcumen., and the Catena, and there seems to be a strong objection to ἴστε introduced at the beginning of the sentence, without any adjunct specifying what is the thing known. The only other instance where this word occurs thus placed in N. T. is Heb. xii. 17, where it is followed by ὅτι, and in Eph. v. 5 it is preceded by τοῦτο γάρ. On the whole, therefore, it seems better to retain the received reading. On this use of ὥστε, wherefore, see 1 Pet. iv. 19, and Winer, § 41, p. 269.

20. ὀργὴ γάρ] for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God, produceth not that fruit of righteousness (Heb. xii. 11) which cometh forth from God, and is pleasing in His sight.

21. διὸ ἀποθέμενοι] wherefore, having put away all filthiness, and superabundance of malice, which are like rank weeds in a foul soil, which cumber the ground, and render it unfit to receive the seed sown, and must therefore be first purged away; or, like wild branches of unpruned trees, which must be cut away before the graft is inserted, receive ye with meekness τὸν ἔμφυτον λόγον.

The meaning of this expression (τὸν ἔμφυτον λόγον) has been the subject of much controversy.

Ἔμφυτος is properly innate, τὸ ἐν φύσει (Hesych.). Xenophon asks (Mem. iii. 7. 5), "Are not modesty and fear ἔμφυτα in men?" and κακία is described as ἔμφυτος in evil men, in Wisdom xii. 10, and ἔμφυτος was a term used in the ancient schools of Philosophy to describe whatever was, or became a part of the natural constitution of man; see Wetstein, p. 663; and St. Paul uses the word σύμφυτος to signify connate, i. e. with Christ. See above on Rom. vi. 5.

This is the sense given to ἔμφυτον here in the Syriac Version, and so the word seems to be used by St. Barnabas (Epist. 9), where he says, οἶδεν ὁ τὴν ἔμφυτον δωρεὰν τῆς διδαχῆς αὐτοῦ θέμενος ἐν ἡμῖν, and in cap. 1, "naturalem gratiam accepistis," and so Ignat. ad Ephes. 1, ὃ κέκτησθε φύσει δικαίᾳ, κατὰ πίστιν καὶ ἀγάπην ἐν Ἰησοῦ χριστῷ.

We are here exhorted by St. James to put away all filthiness and malice, because they will choke the growth of the heavenly seed of the Word in our hearts; and we are admonished to receive with meekness the innate Word,—that Word which has been born in our nature. In the highest sense, a sense which may reasonably be supposed to have been in the mind of the Apostle, that Word is Christ. Let us receive Him with meekness, because to all who receive Him, He giveth power to become sons of God (John i. 12), and St. Paul's exhortation is, "as ye have received Christ, so walk ye in Him" (Col. ii. 16), "be ye holy, as He is holy:" see 2 Cor. vi. 18; vii. 1; cp. 1 Pet. i. 15, 16. 1 John iii. 3.

Here, with reverence be it said, is the solution of the difficulty which otherwise would perplex us in interpreting this passage. For, if the λόγος here mentioned is only the written or spoken word, or Gospel preached, it can hardly be said to be innate in us, nor even if we adopt the other rendering, sometimes given to ἔμφυτος, and say that it here signifies engrafted, or implanted, or sown, can it be explained how we are to receive what is already inserted in us; or what is already sown in another soil.

By not confining the sense of λόγος to the word spoken, but by enlarging and elevating its signification, and by applying it to Christ, the difficulty is removed.

For while it is true that Christ by His Incarnation is properly said to be ἔμφυτος, innate, born in us, and to be indeed Emmanuel, God with us, God manifest in our flesh, God dwelling for ever in the nature of us all; or, if we adopt the other sense of ἔμφυτος, while it is true, that Christ is indeed grafted in us as our Netser or Branch (see on Matt. ii. 23), yet will not this avail for our Salvation, unless we receive Him by faith. We must be planted in Him, and He in us by Baptism (Gal. iii. 27), we must dwell in Him and He in us, by actual and habitual Communion with Him in the Holy Eucharist, we must abide and bring forth fruit in Him, by fervent love and hearty obedience. Christ, Who is the Branch (Zech. vi. 12), is engrafted on the stock of our Nature; but a scion grafted on a tree will not grow unless it is received and take root in the stock; so His Incarnation will profit us nothing, unless we receive Him into our hearts, and drink in the sap of His grace, and transfuse the life-blood of our wills into Him, and grow and coalesce with Him, and bring forth fruit in Him.

Compare the remarks of A Lapide here, who observes that in a primary sense, this precept is to be interpreted of reception of Christ the Incarnate Word, but may be adapted also to the reception of the Inspired Word of God. See also Bp. Andrewes (i. 16), who says that we must apprehend Christ, that is, with St. James, we must lay hold of, or receive insitum Verbum, the word which is daily grafted into us. For "the Word" He is, and in the Word He is received by us.

Compare also the note above on Acts xx. 32, "I commend you to God, and to the Word of His grace, which (Word) is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among those who are sanctified." The expressions there, τῷ λόγῳ τῷ δυναμένῳ κ.τ.λ., are very similar to these words here, τὸν λόγον τὸν δυνάμενον σῶσαι, see also note above on v. 19, and on Heb. iv. 13, and below on 1 Pet. i. 23—25.

In all these passages, the sense doubtless includes the word written or preached, but may not be limited and restricted to it, without violence to the context, and loss of its meaning; and ought to be extended to the Incarnate Word: see on v. 18.

St. James here,—as the other Apostles do (see Heb. iv. 12, 13),—takes advantage of the double sense of the word Λόγος, and passes by a natural transition from the one sense to the other.

22. γίνεσθε δὲ ποιηταὶ λόγου] but become ye doers of the word, and not hearers only: for, says St. Paul, Rom. ii. 13, "not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of it shall be justified." Cp. below, iv. 17, where St. James says, that "to him who knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, there is sin," and thus the two Apostles unite in censuring the notion prevalent among many of the Jews, who relied on their descent from Abraham (Matt. iii. 8, 9), and imagined that the knowledge of the law, apart from the practice of it, would secure their acceptance with God, and procure them the rewards of heaven; see further above, Rom. ii. 27—29. This was specially the case with the zealots of that age; see Josephus, B. J. vii. 30, and above, Introduction, p. 2.

On this text see the sermon of Bp. Andrewes, v. p. 195. "As S. Augustine saith, accedat ad verbum, unto the word that we hear let there be joined the element of the work, that is, some real elemental deed; et sic fit magnum sacramentum pietatis, and so shall you have 'the great mystery,' or sacrament 'of godliness.' For indeed godliness is as a sacrament; hath not only the mystery to be known, but the exercise to be done; not the word to be heard, but the work also to be performed. Which very sacrament of godliness is the manifesting of the word in the flesh; which itself is livelily expressed by us when we are doers of the word; as it is well gathered out of our Saviour Christ's speech to them which interrupted Him in His sermon and told Him 'His mother was without.' 'Who is my mother?' saith He (Matt. xii. 50). These here that hear and do My word are My mother, they 'travail' of Me till I am fashioned in them (Gal. iv. 19). Hearing they receive the immortal seed of the word (1 Pet. i. 23); by a firm purpose of doing they conceive; by a longing desire they quicken, by an earnest endeavour they travail with it; and when the work is wrought, verbum caro factum est, they have incarnate the word (John i. 14). Therefore to the woman's acclamation, 'Blessed be the womb that bare Thee' (Luke xi. 27), True, saith Christ, but that blessing can extend only to one and no more. I will tell you how you may be blessed too; blessed are they that so incarnate the written word by doing it, as the blessed Virgin gave flesh to the eternal Word by bearing it." See also Bp. Sanderson, iii. p. 360.

23, 24. ὅτι εἴ τις] for if a man be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like a man who considers his natural face in a glass (or mirror); for he considered himself, and is gone away (perfect tense, and he remains absent), and straightway he forgat what manner of man he was, as reflected in the glass.

On the use of the aorists here, see above, v. 11, and Winer, p. 249, and on the word ἔσοπτρον, a mirror, see above, on 1 Cor. xiii. 12. The perfect ἀπελήλυθεν is introduced between the two aorists to denote that the absence is continual.

The Apostle has been insisting on the duty of hearing (v. 19), and now he guards against the notion that it is enough to hear. Hearing is necessary; but it is not enough. To hear and not to do, is self-deceit. He who hears the Word is like a man who considers his natural face in a mirror. For the Word of God is the mirror of the soul. It shows us to ourselves as we are. Especially does it show our πρόσωπον γενέσεως, our natural face; our faciem nativitatis (Vulg.), our condition by nature. It, and it alone, reveals to us what we are by nature in the first Adam, and what we become by grace in the Second Adam. Cp. Augustine in Ps. 118, vol. iv. p. 1834.

So far he does well. But the Word of God is something more than a mirror to be looked into, it is a perfect Law (v. 25) to be obeyed. And whosoever hears it and does not obey it, treats it only as a mirror, and looks at himself in it; and goes forth from hearing the Scripture or the Sermon in the Church, and mingles with the world; or passes from reading the Bible to other books and to other pursuits; and forgets what manner of man he is; how frail and sinful in God's sight; he forgets his need of repentance, and of pardon, and of grace; and the warnings of Death and Judgment that he has heard in the Sermon, or read in the Bible, and the promises of heavenly glory, and the threats of future punishment, pass away from his mind and disappear from his memory, like evanescent reflexions from a glass.

II. 1 a Ἀδελφοί μου, μὴ ἐν προσωποληψίαις ἔχετε τὴν πίστιν τοῦ Κυρίου

Matt. 22. 16.

25. ὁ δὲ παρακύψας] but he who turneth aside from all earthly contemplations, and bends his eyes downward and rivets them on the Word of God,—not considered merely as a mirror wherein he is reflected,—but knows it to be the rule of his life, and the perfect law, the law of liberty, and who abideth therein, and doth not become a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, he shall be blessed in his doing. On this meaning of the word παρακύψας see 1 Pet. i. 12, and Wetstein i. p. 823, and the use of the word ἐγκύπτειν, applied to studying the Scriptures, by S. Clement, i. 40, and i. 53, and by S. Polycarp, Phil. 3. The sense of παρὰ in παρακύψας is explained by παρὰ in παραμείνας. It indicates also that the Law of God is a fixed object; like a book or chart, which lies before his eyes, and below them, and on which he rivets them. "O Lord, how I love Thy law! all the day long is my study in it." Ps. cxix. 97. Cp. Ps. i. 2. Josh. i. 8.

— νόμον τέλειον τὸν τῆς ἐλευθερίας] the perfect law—that of liberty. Christ has redeemed us by His blood from the slavery of sin and Satan into the glorious Liberty of the Sons of God. See on Gal. v. 1—13. Rom. viii. 21. He has redeemed us from the curse of the Law (Gal. iii. 13), and purchased us to Himself (1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23), and has thus made us free (John viii. 36), and has conveyed to us these blessings effected by the operation of the Holy Ghost, which is therefore called God's free Spirit (Ps. li. 12. 2 Cor. iii. 17); and has revealed to us these things in the preaching of the Gospel, which is the perfect Law of Liberty, the Law of emancipation from evil, and of obedience to God, whose service is perfect freedom, and has bound us to obey the Law of Love, and to serve one another thereby (Gal. v. 13) as servants of God (1 Pet. ii. 16). So that while we are all free by faith, we must all serve by love. And let him take heed to obey this law of liberty, for by it he will be judged (ii. 12). See below on 1 Pet. ii. 16, and Theophylact here, and Bp. Sanderson, Serm. iii. 276.

He who binds himself to study and to observe this Law, and does not become a hearer of forgetfulness, that is, a hearer who is not characterized by obeying, but by forgetting what he hears (on this use of the Genitive, see below, ii. 6, and above on 1 Thess. ii. 13, and on Matt. xxi 11. Luke xviii. 6. Acts ix. 12), but a doer of the work, is blessed in his doing. There seems to be a reference to our Lord's own speech, Matt. xii. 46—48. Luke xi. 27, 28, and cp. the close of the Sermon on the Mount, vii. 24—27.

26. εἴ τις δοκεῖ θρῆσκος εἶναι] if any one deemeth himself to be religious, or devout; or "would be holden" for such, as Bp. Andrewes renders it (iii. 216). On this sense of δοκεῖ, putat se (Vulg.), see Mark x. 42. Luke xxii. 24. 1 Cor. x. 12. Winer, § 65, Art. 7, p. 540.

θρῆσκος is applied specially to external acts of religious worship, and public exercises of devotion (see Acts xxvi. 5. Col. ii. 18), and is, therefore, explained by εὐσεβὴς, and even by δεισιδαίμων, by Hesychius. See Dean Trench, Synonyms N. T. xlviii., and below, note on v. 27.

— μὴ χαλιναγωγῶν] not bridling his tongue: a moral duty of primary necessity in God's sight, without which all professions of piety and devotion are odious to Him. On this text see Bp. Butler, Sermon iv., and Dr. Barrow, Serm. xiii., vol. i. p. 283.

On the metaphor cp. Ps. xxxi. 1, and Philo ap. Loesner, p. 459, and below, iii. 2, 3.

27. θρησκεία καθαρά] worship that is pure and undefiled before God (whatever it may seem in the sight of men) . . . is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction; ἐπισκέπτεσθαι, to visit, is the word specially applied to visiting the sick and needy. See Matt. xxv. 36. 43.

St. James uses the word θρησκεία, repeated from θρῆσκος in v. 26, to show that no external acts of worship are of any avail without Charity, and that mercy and charity itself are the devotion and the worship which God most loves. See Matt. ix. 13; xii. 7, and on Luke xvii. 15. Compare Isa. lviii. 6, 7, "Is not this the fast that I have chosen,—to deal thy bread to the hungry?"

This declaration of the Apostle may suggest guidance to Christian Pastors, for such a regulation of the frequency of the public services of religion in their Parishes, conformably with the Laws of the Church, as will leave sufficient and ample time for the visitation of the sick and needy in their flocks. Compare the precept below, v. 14, and the words of S. Polycarp there cited.

By the words παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ, before God, St. James intimates, that, however fair may be the appearance of devotion separate from Charity, in the sight of men, it is unclean in the eyes of God; and he designates God here as the Father, because God is God of the widow, and Father of the fatherless, Ps. lxviii. 5; cxlvi. 9.

The exhortation of St. James concerning widows and orphans was rendered specially appropriate by the circumstances of the Jewish Christians at this time. See Acts ii. 44; vi. 1.

— καθαρὰ—ἀμίαντος—ἄσπιλον] pure—undefiled—unspotted. St. James, by using these words, studiously indicates the duty of the true θρησκεία or worship, as distinguished, in its purity and holiness, from that of those who relied on external acts of purification in ceremonial washings and cleansings, as the Jews did (Mark vii. 4. 8. Heb. ix. 10), who made long prayers, and devoured widows' houses (Matt. xxiii. 25, 26), and laid much stress on other ritual observances in the eyes of men, and cared little for the holiness of heart in the sight of God, and whose lives were fair externally like whited sepulchres, but within were full of uncleanness (Matt. xxiii. 27).

— ἄσπιλον ἑαυτὸν τηρεῖν] to keep himself unspotted. There is no καὶ prefixed to this clause. St. James loves asyndeta. See v. 6. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners, purify your hearts, ye double-minded (iv. 8). See Theophylact here.

He also here delivers a protest against that hypocritical religion of formal and speculative professions of knowledge, which characterized some of those to whom he is writing, and who are thus described by one of the Apostolic Fathers: "They have no care for the widow, nor for the orphan, nor for the afflicted, nor for the hungry and thirsty." Ignatius, ad Smyrn. 6.

CH. II. 1. Ἀδελφοί μου] My brethren. He begins with a memento of brotherhood, in order to correct their infractions of its laws.

On these verses, 1—10, see S. Augustine's Epistle to S. Jerome, Ep. clxvii., vol. v. p. 890.

— μὴ ἐν προσωποληψίαις] hold not ye the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ of glory, in respectings of persons. Ye, who boast of your faith,—hold not the faith of Christ, the faith delivered by Him, and of which he is the object, Who took the nature of us all, and Who, although He is the Lord of glory, vouchsafed to become poor for your sakes; and in Whom there is neither rich nor poor, and Who will judge all without respect of persons, and Who has made you all brethren in Himself, and Who will reward with heavenly glory works of love done to the least of His brethren in love to Him (Matt. xxv. 40),—hold not ye that faith in respectings of persons, so as to distinguish one brother, and fellow-member of Christ, from another, in spiritual matters, in His sight; and thus to contravene the primary principles of communion and fellowship in the body of Christ.

Be not ye guilty of such inconsistency as this. Mark the contrast between faith and respect of persons; similar to that in Rom. i. 18, "holding the truth in unrighteousness;" and so S. Polycarp (Phil. 6), "bearing the name of the Lord in hypocrisy."

This partiality, of which St. James speaks, is similar to that censured by St. Paul (1 Cor. xi. 21) in regard to personal distinctions in spiritual matters. We are commanded to render honour to those to whom honour is due. (Rom. xiii. 7.) Differences are fitly made between man and man in regard to social order and degree, but not in spiritual respects, such as the administration of the Lord's Supper, of which St. Paul is speaking, and in Christian assemblies for public worship, to which St. James refers. Such differences are differences between brother and brother in the very condition of Christian brotherhood. See Bp. Sanderson's remarks, i. 78, and compare those of S. Augustine, Epist. 167

[b] Luke 6. 20. & 12. 21. John 7. 48. 1 Cor. 1. 26, &c. 1 Tim. 6. 18, 19. Exod. 20. 6.
[c] 1 Cor. 11. 22.

(cited by Bede and Lapide), censuring the preferment of personal friends and relatives, as such, to ecclesiastical dignities.

Observe, τῆς δόξης, of glory, placed emphatically at the end of the sentence; and so translated by the Vulgate, Arabic, and Æthiopic Versions. The words τοῦ Κυρίου may be so extended as to apply to τῆς δόξης, the Lord Jesus Christ of Glory.

This separation of the genitive, τῆς δόξης, from the word on which it depends, Κυρίου, need not create any difficulty; but it adds force to the sentence. The words, 'of Glory,' are purposely reserved for the end, for the sake of the argument which they contain; and they follow Κυρίου, as ὀργῆς follows τέκνα in Eph. ii. 3. Cp. the collocation of the words in Phil. ii. 10. 2 Pet. iii. 2; and Wiesinger here; and Winer, p. 172; and Acts vii. 2, ὁ Θεὸς δόξης, the God of Glory.

Contemplate the Lord of Glory (1 Cor. ii. 8), who humbled Himself, and took the poor man's nature, and joined all in Himself, and promises glory to humility. (Luke xiv. 11. James iv. 10.)

This consideration is the groundwork of the Apostle's argument and exhortation. This is the glory which Christ Himself offers to you,—not the vain glory of this world, which ye seek by preferring the rich to the poor, and by having men's persons in admiration for the sake of advantage to yourselves. (Jude 16.)

2. εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν ὑμῶν] into your place of assembly: the assembly of you who are all brethren, and which is held for the purpose of manifesting your brotherhood in Christ. St. James uses the word συναγωγή, synagogue, to show that he is speaking of a place of assembly which was to them Christians, what the Jewish synagogue was to the Jews, a place for religious worship. Cp. Huther, p. 92. This word is very appropriate here, as showing to the Jewish and Jewish-Christian readers of this Epistle, that the Christian religion is not contrary to the Mosaic Law, and that the worship of the Church is the legitimate expansion of that of the Synagogue. Compare the word ἐπισυναγωγή (Heb. x. 25), applied to the assembling together of Christians for religious exercises. There were synagogues of various nations at Jerusalem (see Acts vi. 9), and at the time when this Epistle was written, the Christians had not wholly severed themselves, as a distinct religious body, from the Jews. The Christians, in a spirit of charity and wisdom, did all in their power to retain unbroken the unity and the continuity of the Church of God—the Church of Abraham, Moses, and the Prophets. Evidence of this desire is seen in the conduct of St. Paul always resorting to, and preaching in, the synagogue of the great cities which he visited; and in his language to the Jews at Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 5); and in this expression of St. James applying the word synagogue to a Christian Church. The Christian places of worship at Jerusalem were "synagogues of Christians." The word συναγωγή passed from the mouth of Jews into that of Christians. See Suicer, in v. συναγωγαί means religious meetings of Christians in Ignatius, ad Polyc. 4.

Some Expositors suppose that συναγωγή here means a civil assembly; but in civil assemblies personal distinctions are fit and necessary (see above on v. 1), and such an interpretation is inconsistent with the Apostle's argument here.

— χρυσοδακτύλιος] literally, golden-ringed: making an ostentatious display of golden rings on his hands, as the rich and effeminate did; "digiti omnes onerantur annulis," says Pliny, H. N. xxxiii. 6; and "per digitos currit levis annulus omnes," Martial, v. 11; and cp. Juvenal, vii. 140.

3. κάθου] sit thou: for κάθησο, Matt. xxii. 44. Luke xx. 42. Acts ii. 34; not found in classical Greek. Winer, § 14, p. 75.

4. καὶ οὐ διεκρίθητε ἐν ἑαυτοῖς] and were ye not contentious among yourselves? did ye not thus become litigants among yourselves? Καί, and, is here said with an abrupt burst of vehement indignation. And, while ye were making, by your practice, such an invidious and uncharitable distinction between the poor man and the rich in your religious assemblies, what was it that you were doing all the while? did you not thus constitute yourselves virtually into parties in a suit?

The aorist here has a special fitness, as marking a thing done already, while another action was going on. While ye were making these distinctions ye made yourselves to become like disputants in a law-suit.

This aorist (διεκρίθητε) of the passive form has a middle sense, as ἀπεκρίθην in the New Testament, and numerous other words; indeed, διεκρίθην itself, Matt. xxi. 21. Mark xi. 23. Rom. iv. 20; see Lobeck, Phrynich. p. 108; Winer, § 39, p. 233, and διακρίνομαι has this sense of litigation in the LXX, Jer. xv. 10, ἄνδρα διακρινόμενον, a disputatious person; and so διακριθήσομαι, I will contend. Ezek. xvii. 20. Joel iii. 2. Cp. Ezek. xx. 36, διεκρίθην πρὸς τοὺς πατέρας ὑμῶν.

The sense therefore is, By such partiality as this, did ye not convert the Christian Church—where all are brethren—into a court of assize? and did ye not abdicate your character of brotherhood for that of litigants with those who are your brethren, and thus wage an intestine warfare among yourselves?

Some interpreters suppose that οὐ διεκρίθητε ἐν ἑαυτοῖς signifies, and did ye not, by such inconsistent conduct as this, put yourselves at variance with yourselves? but the former exposition is more consistent with the usual meaning of διακρίνομαι, and with the context.

There are two distinct grounds of censure—

(1) That by this partiality they become like disputants in a law-suit (cp. 1 Cor. vi. 6, ἀδελφὸς μετὰ ἀδελφοῦ κρίνεται), instead of being brethren: this is the rebuke in this clause.

(2) That they thus constitute themselves into Judges: this is developed in what follows.

— καὶ ἐγένεσθε κριταὶ δ. π.;] and did ye not become judges—not acting calmly on principles of equity, but swayed passionately by the party-bias of evil surmises and contentious cogitations?

The genitive διαλογισμῶν is the genitive of the quality. See above, i. 25; and compare Luke xvi. 18, τὸν οἰκονόμον τῆς ἀδικίας; and xviii. 6, ὁ κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας. The sense of the word διαλογισμοί is best illustrated by St. Paul's use of it, Rom. xiv. 1, where see note.

5. ἀκούσατε, ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί] Hearken, my beloved brethren. After a vehement rebuke, St. James changes his tone, and reasons with them. These contrasts, frequent in this Epistle, impart to it the liveliness of a spoken address, and place before our eyes the sacred writer in a clear light. Cp. below, on v. 6, 7.

The same may be said of the rapid succession of short questions (see here v. 6, 7), and brief apothegms (see iv. 7—9), and sharp reproofs (see v. 5, 6), and the introduction of other parties speaking, as in a dramatic dialogue (see ii. 15—18); all these features of this Epistle give to it a character of freshness, vigour, energy, earnestness, and sometimes of oratorical sublimity.

— τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῷ κόσμῳ] those who are poor to the world, i. e. in the eyes of the world, opposed to πλουσίους ἐν πίστει, rich in faith. The dative κόσμῳ is in A*, B, C*, and Vulg., and may be compared with its use in Acts vii. 20, ἀστεῖος τῷ Θεῷ, and 2 Cor. x. 4, δυνατὰ τῷ Θεῷ, and so mihi in Horat. (1 Ep. xvi. 66), "liber mihi non erit unquam." Elz. has the genitive τοῦ κόσμου τούτου. Cp. 1 Cor. i. 27.

6. ὑμεῖς δὲ ἠτιμάσατε τὸν πτωχόν] but ye dishonoured the poor man: τὸν πτωχόν, the poor man, as such, ye dishonoured him for his poverty. Cp. ὁ πλούσιος, i. 11; "pauperem exhonorâstis." (Vulg.) ἀτιμάζω is more forcible than despise: it is to degrade from the condition of honour, which he has as a member of Christ, Who vouchsafed to wear the garb of poverty (2 Cor. viii. 9); and it is to reduce him to a state of ἀτιμία, as by an ignominious sentence of condemnation in a law-suit, and to disfranchise him of his legitimate privileges of Christian citizenship.

— οὐχὶ οἱ πλούσιοι] Do not the rich drag you into courts of justice? Do they not do this on account of your Christian profession, as if you were disturbers of the public peace? as the Jews did to St. Stephen at Jerusalem (Acts vii. 12); and to St.

— τὸ καλὸν ὄνομα] the glorious name which was invoked over you: especially when ye were baptized into it (Matt. xxviii. 29); and which is invoked in all the benedictions which are pronounced over you in the holy offices of those religious assemblies, which you desecrate by unchristian partialities. Some read ἐπικληθὲν ὄνομα ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, the name by which ye are called, and this sense is authorized by Hebrew use, Gen. xlviii. 16. 2 Sam. vi. 12. 1 Kings viii. 43; but the words ἐπικαλεῖσθαι ὄνομα are often used in the sense of invoking a name in the LXX, and this sense seems preferable; and so Bede renders the words in his note on v. 5, "Nonne blasphemant bonum nomen quod invocatum est super vos?"

Indeed, there appears to be a contrast between the blasphemy of that Name in the Jewish synagogues on the one side (1 Cor. xii. 3), and the invocation of it on the other, in the Christian συναγωγαί; and this sense is sanctioned by the sacred language of the Christian Church, applying the word ἐπίκλησις to the act of solemn invocation of the most Holy Name in her Liturgies. Bingham, Eccl. Ant. xv. 1.

— νόμον βασιλικόν] the law royal: either as given directly by the King, Christ, and as such distinguished from the Levitical Law, given by the ministry of the servant, Moses (Heb. iii. 5); or as being the first and great commandment, the sovereign law under which all other laws concerning moral duty to man are ranged, and from which they are derived. (Matt. xxii. 39, 40. Rom. xiii. 8–10.) Cp. Bp. Andrewes, iii. p. 111. Bp. Sanderson, ii. 276; iv. 153.

— κατὰ τὴν γραφήν] according to the Scripture. Lev. xix. 18. Matt. xxii. 39.

10. ὅστις γὰρ ὅλον τὸν νόμον τηρήσῃ] for whosoever shall have kept the whole law (if this were possible), but have offended in one, has become guilty of all.

Almighty God declared in the Levitical Law, "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the Law to do them." (Deut. xxvii. 26. Gal. iii. 10.) And though the rigour of this curse is now taken away by Christ, yet the obligation to obedience remains. See notes above on Gal. iii. 12; and on 2 Cor. v. 4.

Whosoever, therefore, willingly and wilfully allows himself in the indulgence of any sin, which is the breach of God's law (Rom. iv. 15), is guilty of breaking the whole law of God.

Although men may be diligent therefore in the observance of many portions of God's service, yet if they knowingly and deliberately neglect any other part of it, they virtually observe no part. The same God who gave one commandment, gave all; and whosoever breaks one wilfully, keeps none truly. Whoever allows himself in the breach of one part of the law, convicts himself of loving and serving himself, more than the Lawgiver. Whoever loves and prizes one of God's commandments, will love and prize all; for real obedience is grounded in love to Him Whom we obey; and whoever disobeys Him wilfully and habitually in one respect, proves that he does not really love God, and therefore his observance of other parts of God's Law is not grounded on a right foundation, it is not true obedience, and so he is guilty of all, and therefore cannot expect a reward from God for obedience, Who will give a crown of glory to them, and them only, who love Him (i. 12), and who prove their love by obedience. John xiv. 15.

On this text the reader may compare S. Augustine's Epistle above quoted (who understands the word ἑνί, one, as applicable to the one law, that of love) with the remarks of Bp. Bull, Harmon. Apostol. Diss. ii. ch. vii., and Dean Jackson on the Creed, bk. iv. ch. v., and bk. xi. ch. xxx. and ch. xxxiii.

The connexion of the Apostle's reasoning is this: he had blamed them for showing partiality and respect of persons in their acts of religion; he had shown them that such acts of partiality were inconsistent with the royal law of brotherly love, and he therefore now warns them, that, however careful they might be in their own devotional exercises in those public religious assemblies (cp. i. 27), and however scrupulous they might be in the observance of other parts of Christian duty, yet by such acts of partiality they were guilty of sin, and were convicted by the law as transgressors (v. 9), and vitiated all their other works, and showed that those works were built on a wrong foundation, and not on love to God; and that they virtually violated the whole law by this wilful violation of one part, especially so fundamental a part as that of love.

This declaration would have had a peculiar pertinency for the Jewish Christians, who were in danger of being led astray by the errors of Pharisee teachers, who were accustomed to inquire, "Which is the great commandment in the Law?" and who imagined that if a man took pains to observe some portion, especially the ceremonial portion of the Law, he might safely indulge himself in the neglect of others, and in the commission of acts contrary to the spirit and letter of the Law. See above on Matt. xxii. 23. 36, and xxiii. 13, and cp. Bp. Bull (Harm. Apost. Diss. ii. chap. xvi.), and Dr. Pococke (on Hosea xiv. 2), who recite the rabbinical saying, that "God gave so many commandments, in order that by doing any of them they might be saved," in opposition to what St. James teaches, that by wilfully breaking any of them, they are guilty of the breach of all.

12. οὕτω λαλεῖτε] so speak ye, and so do ye, as being to be judged by the law of liberty: which has made you all dear children and brethren in Christ (i. 25), and therefore by love serve one another (Gal. v. 13), and prove, by obedience, your love to Him Who redeemed you by His own blood, from bondage into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. (Rom. viii. 21.)

13. ἡ γὰρ κρίσις] for the future judgment will be without mercy to him who did not show mercy; mercy glorieth against judgment; triumphs over it. See iii. 14, and the Parable of the Heavenly King, Who, when His servant had nothing wherewith to pay, freely forgave the debt of the 10,000 talents, and thus set an example to His servants how they are to deal with their fellow-servants, namely, in such a spirit, that mercy may triumph over sternness and severity; and also gave a warning of the woe which will overtake them if they are not merciful to others, as He has been merciful to them. (Matt. xviii. 23—35.) Elz. has καὶ before κατακαυχᾶται, but it is not in B, C, G, H. Cp. i. 27.

Some Expositors understand this sentence as declaring that mercy shown on man's side to his brother man, has power to triumph over, and disarm, the justice of God. See Augustine in Ps. cxliii., and so Chrysostom in an eloquent passage cited here in the Catena, p. 13: "Mercy is dear to God, and intercedes for the sinner, and breaks his chains, and dissipates the darkness, and quenches the fire of hell, and destroys the worm, and rescues from the gnashing of teeth. To her the gates of heaven are opened. She is the queen of virtues, and makes men like to God, for it is written, Be ye merciful as your Father in heaven is merciful. She has silver wings like the dove, and feathers of gold, and soars aloft, and is clothed with divine glory, and stands by the throne of God; when we are in danger of being condemned, she rises up and pleads for us, and covers us with her defence, and enfolds us in her wings. God loves Mercy more than Sacrifice."

The lines of Shakspeare on the quality of Mercy (Merchant of Venice, act iv. sc. 1), may have been suggested by this passage of St. James. The meaning however of St. James seems rather to be, as given above, that as God's throne of grace is His highest court of appeal, so Mercy ought to sit supreme in the soul of man. See Bp. Andrewes, iii. 152; v. 3.

On the form ἀνίλεως see Winer, § 16, p. 91.

These words ἡ γὰρ κρίσις—ἔλεος are quoted by S. Hippolytus de Consummatione Sæculi, c. 47.

14. τί τὸ ὄφελος] What is the profit, my brethren, if a man say that he has faith, but have not works? can his faith (ἡ πίστις) save him? Can a mere speculative belief, apart from the good works, which are the natural fruit of faith, save him?

St. James had been showing above, that external acts of worship (θρησκεία), unaccompanied with works of charity, are of no avail; and that love and holiness constitute the religion which God requires (i. 27), and that acts of partiality toward the rich, for the sake of worldly advantage to ourselves, and of disdain of our poorer brethren, especially in religious respects, are infractions of God's Law, as a whole, and cannot be compensated by any obedience to single precepts of it.

He now proceeds to show that professions of faith, distinguished from religious practice, are null; and thus he counteracts and corrects an erroneous notion prevalent among other Jews and Jewish Christians, that they might be justified in God's sight by superiority of religious knowledge and theoretic belief.

This error, with which St. James had to contend, is thus described by Tertullian (de Pœnit. c. 5): "Some persons imagine that they have God, if they receive Him in their heart and mind, and do little for Him in act; and that therefore they may commit sin, without doing violence to faith and fear; or, in other words, that they may commit adulteries, and yet be chaste, and may poison their parents, and yet be pious! At the same rate they who commit sin and yet are godly, may also be cast into hell and yet be pardoned! But such minds as these are offshoots from the root of hypocrisy, and are sworn friends of the Evil One." Cp. S. Jerome (in Michæam iii. 5) inveighing against those who said, "Have faith, and it matters little what your life is; you will inherit all the promises of God."

St. James in this Epistle is censuring those religionists who relied on faith, not bringing forth the fruit of good works. St. Paul, in his Epistles to the Galatians and Romans, had corrected those who supposed that they could obtain justification from God by their own works, done by their own strength, irrespectively of the meritorious obedience and sufferings of Christ and the grace procured by Him, and independently of faith in His death as the sole efficient cause of man's justification with God.

By a consideration of the different designs of these two Apostles, all difficulties in their respective statements may easily be cleared away. See above, Introduction to this Epistle, pp. 1—3, and to the Epistle to the Romans, pp. 298—303.

There is opus fidei (says Bp. Andrewes, i. p. 194), the work of faith; fides quæ operatur, faith that worketh; that is St. Paul's faith (1 Thess. i. 3. Gal. v. 6); and faith that can show itself by working, that is St. James's faith (ii. 18). And without works it is but a dead faith, the carcase of faith; there is no spirit in it. No spirit, if no work; spectrum est, non spiritus: a flying shadow it is, a spirit it is not, if work it do not. Having wherewith to do good, if you do it not, talk not of faith, for you have no faith in you, if you have wherewith to show it and show it not. (Bp. Andrewes, v. 36.)

17. οὕτω καὶ ἡ πίστις] so also faith, if it have not works, is dead by itself; it is dead, not only as regards the signs of external fruitfulness, but it is dead in itself. A tree in winter may not have signs of life, but is not dead in itself; it will put forth shoots and leaves in the spring. But faith has no winter; if it has not works, it has no life in it, and ought not to be called Faith, for (as Didymus says here) dead faith is no faith. Faith without works is dead; and works without faith are dead also. S. Cyril (in Conc. Ephes. p. 3, c. 43).

18. ἀλλ' ἐρεῖ τις] Nay, some men will rightly say; ἀλλὰ means sanè, imò, and introduces a new and cumulative argument. 1 Cor. vi. 6. John viii. 26; xvi. 2. Acts xix. 2. See Winer, pp. 392. 400.

— χωρὶς] apart from. So the best MSS. and Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf.—Elz. has ἐκ.

19. σὺ πιστεύεις] thou believest that God is one: thou hast more light and knowledge than the heathen, who worship gods many and lords many (1 Cor. viii. 5), thou doest well, but this is not enough, for even the devils (even those false gods themselves which the heathen worship, 1 Cor. x. 20), they believe this, and show their belief by fearing Him; they believe and tremble. They said to Christ, "Art thou come to torment us before the time?" "I adjure Thee that Thou torment me not." "I know Thee who Thou art, the Holy One of God. Thou art Christ the Son of God" (Matt. viii. 29. Mark i. 24. 34; v. 7. Luke iv. 41), and thus they showed their fear and their belief. But (as Augustine well says in Joann. tract. 29, and in Psalm. 130), "Aliud est credere Illi, aliud credere Illum, aliud credere in Illum. Credere Illi est credere verum esse quod loquitur; credere Illum est credere quòd Ipse sit Deus; sed credere in Illum est diligere Illum. Credere Ipsum esse Deum, hoc et dæmones potuerunt;" but to believe in God, this is what is done only by those who love God, and who are not only Christians in name, but in deed, and in life. See above on Matt. xviii. 6.

For without love, faith is void. The only true faith is the faith which worketh by love (Gal. v. 6). The faith that is joined with love is the faith of Christians, but the faith that is without love is the faith of devils. An infidel who does not believe in Christ is not so far advanced in knowledge as the devils are. And they who believe Christ, but do not love Him, they fear the punishment of Hell as the devils do, but do not love the heavenly crown. See also Augustine in Joann. Tract. vi. 21, and Serm. 53, and Bede here.

20. θέλεις γνῶναι] willest thou to know? is it thy will to know? Thou professest great zeal for γνῶσις, knowledge, and gloriest in knowledge, is it really then thy will to have knowledge? Cp. v. 20.

— κενέ] vacue; vain; for thy faith is only a hollow profession; a mere void without solidity.

— χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων] apart from the works (observe the article τῶν), which are its natural fruit.

Faith is the root which turns the rain of grace into fruit. (Cp. Augustine in Ps. 139.) Faith cleaves to the soil of the soul, as a root which has received the shower of divine grace, in order that when it is tilled it may shoot forth branches and bear the fruit of good works. The root of righteousness does not grow from works; but the fruit of works grows from the root of righteousness, that is to say, from that root of righteousness whereby God accepts righteousness without work, namely, from Faith; see Origen in Rom., vol. iv. p. 523, cited by Bp. Beveridge (on Article xii. "of good works"), who says, "Though it be for our faith only, and not for our works that God accepts us, yet our works as well as faith are acceptable unto God, yea, and they necessarily spring out from a true and lively faith, so that it is as impossible there should be true faith without good works, as that there should be good works without true faith; for as without faith our works are bad, so without works our faith is dead. And therefore a true faith may be as evidently known by its works, as a tree is clearly discerned by its fruit. If I see fruit growing upon a tree, I know what tree it is, upon which such fruit grows. And so if I see how a man lives, I know how he believes. If his faith be good, his works cannot but be good too; and if his works be bad, his faith cannot but be bad too. For wheresoever there is a justifying faith there are also good works; and wheresoever there are no good works there is no justifying faith."

This last statement needs some qualification. For suppose the case of a person who has been baptized, and has a lively faith and earnest resolve to serve God, and that he is suddenly taken away from this life, without having time to show his faith by his works. Or suppose the case of an infant dying after baptism. Then Faith saves. No man can do good works without Faith; but Faith without works saves a man, if God thinks fit to remove him out of this life, without giving him time for working, and if God knows that he would have worked, if he had had time for working. Indeed in such a case, Faith itself is work; according to our Lord's saying, This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He sent (John vi. 28, 29). Cp. Bede here.

21. Ἀβραάμ] Abraham our father, was not he justified by works, when he offered Isaac his son at the altar? On ἐδικαιώθη, was justified, see note above, Rom. iii. 26.

Abraham, the Father of the faithful, united in his own person those qualities which were necessary to be commended both by St. James and by St. Paul (Rom. iv. 2—16).

Abraham is cited by St. James as an example of practical faith, in opposition to the hollow conceits of those who imagined that knowledge would suffice, without the fruits of obedience.

Abraham is also appealed to by St. Paul, as showing that faith in God, as the sole spring of all good, and firm reliance on His word, and entire self-devotion to His will, in contradistinction to any conceit of any thing in himself as enabling him to work, and entitling him to reward, is on man's side the cause of justification with God.

The example of Abraham therefore stands forth in the Epistle of St. James, as a warning against a barren speculative faith; and is adduced by St. Paul as a protest against proud and presumptuous self-righteousness.

This example of the Father of the Faithful is displayed by these two Apostles as an encouragement to that genuine Faith, which, forgetting and sacrificing self, and building on the foundation of God's Power, and Love, and Truth, and cleaving and clinging to that, rises up in the goodly superstructure of Obedience, in a sober, righteous, and religious life, dedicated to His glory and service. "Abraham believed in God, and it was counted to him for righteousness," but he proved his faith by his patience, when he was commanded by God to slay his son, and when in will he offered him (ἀνήνεγκεν) at the altar. See Heb. xi. 17.

It has been said by some modern interpreters that ἀνενέγκας ἐπὶ τὸ θ. does not mean having offered up at the altar, but simply having led up, brought up, to the altar; but such an interpretation weakens the sense; and the usage of the word in the N. T. (Heb. vii. 27; xiii. 15. 1 Pet. ii. 5), and the authority of the Ancient Versions,—Syriac, Vulgate, Æthiopic, and Arabic,—confirm the interpretation adopted above, which is that of our Authorized Version. The preposition ἐπὶ with the accusative offers no difficulty. See Winer, § 49, l. p. 362.

22. ἡ πίστις συνήργει] faith was working together with his works: his faith was itself a fellow-worker with his works. Faith is a worker and a work. John vi. 28, 29. Cp. Irenæus iv. 16. 2, citing these words to show that Justification is not to be had by observance of the ceremonial law.

24. ἐξ ἔργων] Justification, pardon, acceptance with God springs out of works (ἐξ ἔργων). But these works themselves are ἐκ πίστεως, they spring out of faith; as branches spring from their root; and as a stream springs out of its source.

St. James never denies that a man is justified by faith (διὰ πίστεως), which is St. Paul's assertion (Rom. iii. 22), and which is never contravened in the least degree by St. James. But he asserts that a man is not justified ἐκ πίστεως μόνον, from out of faith only: that is, he affirms that justification does not grow out of that kind of faith which does not work when it has the means of working, and which therefore does not deserve the name of faith, being dead, v. 20. 26. See above, Introduction, pp. 1—3.

25. ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ Ῥαάβ] in like manner even Rahab, the harlot, was not she justified from out of works? In her case did not justification grow out of works? Yes, certainly: because they grew out of a lively faith in God, working by love to man, for she said, "I know that the Lord hath given you this land . . . therefore swear unto me that ye will save alive my father and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters, and all that they have, and deliver our lives from death." Josh. ii. 9—13.

The word πόρνη is applied to Rahab, as an "argumentum ad verecundiam." See above on Heb. xi. 31. To such religionists as those who are censured by St. James, the words of our Lord apply; Matt. xxi. 31, 32.

He cites an example from Rahab a proselyte, such as were many in the dispersions to which he wrote. (Wetstein.) Rahab received the spies, who were sent before Joshua, the type of Jesus, and who were types of the Apostles of Christ, and hearkened to their message, and sent them forth in speed (ἐκβαλοῦσα) by a cord, by another way (other than that by which they had come), viz., by the window, from which she tied the scarlet cord by which they were let down (Josh. ii. 15—18), and thus obtained deliverance for herself and family by her faith, when her city was destroyed. Thus she was an example very applicable to those whom St. James addressed, who, by receiving the Gospel preached by the Apostles, might escape the woes impending on Jerusalem, as she escaped those which fell upon Jericho (cp. Heb. xi. 31), and who would be overwhelmed in that destruction, if they neglected so great salvation. (Heb. ii. 3.)

The Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews designedly refers to and corroborates the teaching of St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, in this and other respects; compare what is said of Abraham in Heb. xi. 17—19 with what is here said, v. 21, concerning the offering up of Isaac. Cp. below, iii. 18.

The Epistle to the Hebrews illustrates and confirms this Epistle, and affords clear proofs of the unity of the teaching of its Author, and of St. James. Cp. Introduction, p. 3.

CH. III. 1. μὴ πολλοὶ διδάσκαλοι] Become not ye many teachers: set not up yourselves for teachers without due call and mission. Such assumption of authority was a prevalent vice among the Jews, who loved to be called Rabbi, Rabbi (Matt. xxiii. 7), and affected to be teachers of the Law (1 Tim. i. 7), and were confident of their ability to be guides to the blind. (Rom. ii. 19.) Thence the contagion passed into the Church, and many, especially of the Jewish Christians, distracted the Church by diversity of psalms and doctrines (1 Cor. xiv. 26), and rent it into parties, which called themselves by names of different leaders. (1 Cor. i. 12.)

Such were those whom St. James had censured at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts xv. 24), and who seem to have given out that they came from him, when they went down to Antioch and troubled the Church there. (Gal. ii. 12)

St. James in like manner, at the close of his Epistle, inculcates the obligation of maintaining a due respect for the office and persons of those who are regularly ordained to the work of the Christian Ministry, and of not intruding into their office, or of encouraging any who usurp it. "Is any one sick among you? let him send for the Elders of the Church," v. 14.

— μεῖζον κρῖμα ληψόμεθα] we shall receive greater condemnation, by setting ourselves up for Teachers. He says "we shall receive;" and again he says, "in many things we offend all," thus condescending to the infirmities of the weak, giving an example of that meekness and mildness of language which he commends (v. 2. 17, 18). So St. Paul; see on 1 Cor. vi. 12.

2. πολλὰ γὰρ πταίομεν ἅπαντες] for in many things we offend all. This avowal does not in any way invalidate the writer's claim to Inspiration. Moses "spake unadvisedly with his lips" at the waters of strife. (Ps. cvi. 33.) St. Paul was betrayed into a hasty speech before the Sanhedrim. (Acts xxiii. 5.) St. Peter was condemned at Antioch because he walked not uprightly. (Gal. ii. 11—14.) But notwithstanding these human infirmities in the persons of those who were employed by God as instruments in writing the books of the Bible, there is no flaw or blemish in those Scriptures which the Holy Ghost wrote by their instrumentality, and which have been received by the Church of God as the Word, not of man, but of God. They had this treasure of Inspiration in earthen vessels, "in order that the excellency of the power of the Gospel might be seen to be not of man, but of God." 2 Cor. iv. 7. See above on Acts xv. 38; and on Gal. ii., note at end of chapter, sect. vi.

— εἴ τις ἐν λόγῳ] if any man offend not in word he is a perfect man,—תָּמִים (tamim).

These words (says Dr. Barrow in an excellent sermon on this text) assert that man, who offends not in speech, to be perfect, and they imply that we should strive to avoid offending therein; for to be perfect, and to go on to perfection, are precepts the observance whereof is incumbent on us. (Deut. xviii. 13. Matt. v. 48; xix. 21. Luke vi. 40. 2 Cor. xiii. 11. Heb. vi. 1.)

To offend originally signifies to infringe, to stumble upon somewhat lying across our way, so as thereby to be cast down, or at least to be disordered in our posture, and stopped in our progress: whence it is well transferred to our being through any incident temptation brought into sin, whereby a man is thrown down, or bowed from his upright state, and interrupted from prosecuting a steady course of piety and virtue. By an apposite manner of speaking (Ps. xxxvii. 23, 24), our tenor of life is called a way, our conversation walking, our actions steps, our observing good laws uprightness, our transgression of them tripping, faltering, falling. By not offending in word, we may then conceive to be understood such a constant restraint and such a careful guidance of our tongue, that it doth not transgress the rules prescribed by Divine law, or by good reason; that it thwarteth not the natural ends and proper uses for which it was framed, to which it is fitted; such as chiefly are promoting God's glory, our neighbour's benefit, and our own true welfare.

By a perfect man is meant a person accomplished and complete, one of singular worth and integrity, who, as to the continual tenor of his life, is free from all notorious defects and heinous faults (Acts xiii. 22); like David, fulfilling all God's will, and having respect to all God's commandments (Ps. cxix. 6); like Zachary and Elizabeth, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. (Luke i. 6.) Thus was Noah (Gen. vi. 9), thus was Abraham, thus was Job perfect. (Job i. 1.) This is the notion of perfection in Holy Scripture: not an absolute exemption of all blemish of soul, or blame in life; for such a perfection is inconsistent with the nature and state of man here, where none with modesty or truth can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin (Prov. xx. 9); where every man must confess with Job, If I justify myself, mine own mouth shall condemn me; If I say I am perfect, it shall prove me perverse. (Job ix. 20.) For there is not, as the preacher assures us, a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not (Eccles. vii. 20); and, In many things we offend all; that is, there is no man absolutely perfect: but if any man offend not in word (that is, if a man constantly govern his tongue well), that man is perfect; perfect in such a kind and degree as human frailty doth admit; he is eminently good; he may be reasonably presumed upright and blameless in all the course of his practice; able, as it follows, to bridle the whole body, that is, qualified to order all his actions justly and wisely. So that in effect the words import this: that a constant governance of our speech according to duty and reason is a high instance and a special argument of a thoroughly sincere and solid goodness. Dr. Barrow.

3. εἰ δέ] But if. So A, B, G, K, and Lach., Tisch., Alf. Winer, p. 528. C has τὲ. Elz. has ἰδοὺ, behold.

St. James follows up the metaphor of the preceding verse with an argument à fortiori. We can rule irrational animals with a bit; how much more ought we to be able to govern ourselves! And if we rule our tongues, we do in fact govern the whole man; for the tongue is to man what a bit is to horses, and a rudder is to ships; it rules the whole; let it therefore be governed aright.

5. ἰδοὺ ἡλίκον πῦρ] behold, what a great forest (ὕλην, materiam), what a little fire makes to blaze!

For ἡλίκον A*, C, G, K have ὀλίγον, a little; but ἡλίκον is in A, B, C*, and Vulg., and is received by Lach., Tisch., and Alford, and so De Wette, Huther, and others. Cp. Theocrit. iv. 5, δασιχόν ἐστι τὸ τύμμα, καὶ ἀλίκον ἄνδρα δαμάσει, and Seneca (Controv. v. 5), "quàm lenibus initiis quanta incendia oriantur."

The word 'matter' in the English Version here, is only an adaptation of the Latin materies (ὕλη), wood, considered as fuel. The Vulgate has silvam.

The conflagration of a large forest even by a casual spark was not a rare event in the countries where the readers of this Epistle lived. See Wetstein, p. 670, citing Homer, Il. xi. 115. Plutarch, Sympos. viii. p. 730. Pindar, Pyth. iii. 66; to which may be added the poetical description in Virgil, Georgic ii. 303:

> "Nam sæpe incautis pastoribus excidit ignis,
> Qui furtim pingui primùm sub cortice tectus
> Robora comprendit, frondesque elapsus in altas
> Ingentem cœlo sonitum dedit; inde secutus
> Per ramos victor, perque alta cacumina regnat
> Et totum involvit flammis nemus; et ruit atram
> Ad cœlum piceâ crassus fuligine nubem;
> Præsertim si tempestas à vertice sylvis
> Incubuit, glomeratque ferens incendia ventus."

This description, mutatis mutandis, displays a lively picture of the incendiary ravages produced in human society by the Tongue; especially, it is to be feared, in the present age.

6. ὁ κόσμος τῆς ἀδικίας] that world of iniquity, that universe of mischief, as containing within it the elements of all mischief; as the World contains within itself mineral combustibles, and volcanic fires, and electric fluid, which may blaze forth into a conflagration.

After ἀδικίας Elz. has οὕτως, thus; and this is sanctioned by the Syriac and Arabic Versions and by some Cursives; but it is not in A, B, C, K, and is rejected by Lach., Tisch., and Alford. The sense is as follows:—

— ἡ γλῶσσα καθίσταται] the tongue makes itself in our members (acting in them as in an intestine war) the polluter of the whole body. The Apostle is reprobating, with holy indignation, the sin of those who abuse the tongue, "the best member that they have" (Ps. cviii. 1), and make it to be the worst, so as even to defile all; "Corruptio optimi fit pessima."

The word καθίσταται (as Huther observes) is used here as in iv. 4, ἐχθρὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ καθίσταται, makes himself an enemy of God. So the Tongue, by acting in and upon the members, makes itself to be the defiler of the whole body. It is so made ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ἡμῶν, which, as their name intimates, ought to move in harmonious melody and amicable concert with each other; and so glorify their Maker. But the Tongue mars their music by its discord. It is even like an intestine Volcano; and sends forth a dark stream of lava, and a murky shower of ashes and of smoke, and is thus a source of pollution, sullying and staining as with foul blots (σπιλοῦσα) the beauty of all around it; and also, like a Volcano, it emits a flood of fire. See next note.

— φλογίζουσα τὸν τροχὸν τῆς γενέσεως] setting on fire the wheel of nature. On the accent of τροχὸς see Winer, p. 51.

The τροχὸς γενέσεως is the wheel of nature, the orbis terrarum, the world itself, in its various revolutions; in which one generation follows another, and one season succeeds another; and so τροχὸς γενέσεως is used by Simplicius in Epictet. p. 94, and other like expressions in authors quoted here by Wetstein, p. 670.

In a secondary sense, this τροχὸς γενέσεως is the wheel of human nature, of human life, of human society, which is compared to a wheel by Solomon (Eccl. xii. 6); and so Greg. Nazianz. (in Sentent. ap. A Lapide), and Silius Ital. iii. 6, "rota volvitur ævi," and Boethius (de Consol. ii. pr. 1), "hæc nostra vita est; rotam volubili orbe versamus." This wheel is ever rolling round, ever turning apace, whirling about, never continuing in one stay, seeking rest and finding none. So these words of the Apostle are expounded by Œcumen., Bede, and Bishop Andrewes, i. 361; ii. 294. 319.

The functions of a wheel, set on fire by the internal friction of its own axis, are deranged; and so the organization of human Society is disturbed and destroyed by the intestine fire of the human Tongue; a fire which diffuses itself from the centre, and radiates forth to the circumference by all the spokes of slander and detraction, and involves the social framework in combustion and conflagration.

This inner fire consumes every thing, and is itself kindled from hell—the lake of fire. And its punishment is accordingly. "What reward shall he given unto thee, O thou false tongue? Sharp arrows of the mighty, with hot burning coals" (coals of rethem. Ps. cxx. 2).

The Rich Man in torment desires that "Lazarus may dip his finger in water and cool his tongue;" for he is tormented in a flame (Luke xvi. 24); and St. James says that the tongue is set on fire of hell. At the tables of the rich, men are often tempted to sins of the tongue, and tongues there set on fire of hell, may hereafter be scorched, and have no water to cool them.

By the faculty of speech man is distinguished from the rest of creation: by it his thoughts are borne, as upon eagles' wings, to the remotest shores, and are carried to distant ages; by it they are endued with the attributes of omnipresence and immortality; by it men are reclaimed from savage ignorance; by it cities are built and peopled, laws promulgated, alliances formed, leagues made; by it men are excited to deeds of heroic valour, and to prefer eternity to time, and the good of their country to their own; through it the affairs of the world are transacted; it negotiates the traffic of commerce, and exchanges the produce of one soil and climate for that of another; it pleads the cause of the innocent, and checks the course of the oppressor; it gives vent to the tenderest emotions; it cheers the dreariness of life. By it virtuous deeds of men are proclaimed to the world with a trumpet's voice; by it the memory of the dead is kept alive in families. It is the teacher of arts and sciences, the interpreter of poetic visions, and of subtle theories of philosophy; it is the rudder and helm by which the state of the world is steered; it is the instrument by which the Gospel of Christ is preached to all nations, and the Scriptures sound in the ears of the Church, and the world unites in prayer and praise to the Giver of all good, and the chorus of Saints and Angels pours forth hallelujahs before His throne.

Such being the prerogatives of speech, it is a heinous sin to pervert the heavenly faculty, to insult the name of the Giver Himself, or to injure man, made in the image of God. All true Christians will put away profane and impure language, calumny and slander, injurious to God's honour, the welfare of society, and their own eternal salvation. They will abhor it worse than a pestilence; and they will pray to Him from whom are the preparations of the heart, and who maketh the dumb and the deaf, the seeing and the blind, who quickened the slow speech of His servant Moses, and put words of fire into his mouth, and whose Spirit on the Day of Pentecost descended in tongues of fire on the Apostles, and filled them with holy eloquence, so to direct their thoughts and words, that both now and hereafter they may ever sing His praise.

7. πᾶσα φύσις—δαμάζεται καὶ δεδάμασται] Every nature of wild beasts, &c. is being tamed, and hath been tamed, by the nature of man: the work of taming is being repeated often, and has been completed successfully.

On the dative of the agent, τῇ φύσει τῇ ἀνθρωπίνῃ, see Winer, p. 196. Cp. below, v. 18, σπείρεται τοῖς ποιοῦσιν εἰρήνην.

Observe the contrast between the φύσις of beasts and the φύσις of man. The one is made subordinate to the other by God. (Gen. i. 26. 28.)

8. τὴν δὲ γλῶσσαν οὐδεὶς δύναται ἀνθρώπων δαμάσαι] but the tongue can no man tame. No one among men can tame his own tongue; to do this work we require the grace of God (Augustine and Catena, p. 22); but St. James does not therefore excuse those who do not tame their tongues, for he says, "these things ought not so to be" (v. 10).

Or the sense may be; Men can tame savage animals, but no one can tame the tongue of the slanderer, liar, and blasphemer; it is more furious than the wild beasts; they may be subdued and pacified, but not it; it is an evil which cannot be controlled (Petr. Damian. Epist. ii. 18), being full of deadly poison. The slanderer and liar "have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adders' poison is under their lips." (Ps. cxl. 3.) Such was the tongue of Doeg the Edomite, of which the Psalmist speaks in that Psalm and in Ps. cxx. Cp. 1 Sam. xxii. 9—19.

This interpretation (as Estius has observed) seems to offer the best solution of the Pelagian objections examined by Augustine, de Nat. et Grat. c. 15.

Both the above interpretations are specified by ancient Expositors, e. g. Bede, p. 184.

— ἀκατάσχετον] uncontrollable. A, B have ἀκατάστατον, and so Lach., Tisch., Alford.

9. ἐν αὐτῇ] The whole course of nature is contravened and disturbed by sins of the Tongue. With the tongue we bless our Lord and Father; and this is the proper office of the Tongue, to praise God; and with it we curse men who have been made after the image of God. This unnatural inconsistency is censured Ps. l. 16—20, "What hast thou to do to declare My statutes; whereas thou givest thy mouth to evil; thou sittest and speakest against thy brother? Whoso offereth Me praise, he glorifieth Me; and to him that ordereth his conversation right will I show the salvation of God." Thus the Psalmist offers the clue to the connexion of the reasoning of St. James here, and in what follows (v. 13), "Let him show from his good conversation (i. e. behaviour) his works with meekness of wisdom."

From this sentence it is clear, that though the image of God in man was marred by the Fall, it was not destroyed. See also Gen. ix. 6, where murder is forbidden after the flood, on the ground that man was made in the image of God. And the divine image, defaced in Adam, has been restored in Christ. (Col. iii. 10. Eph. iv. 24.)

Man's intellectual nature presents an image of God; and from a consideration of that image, as seen in man, we may derive some clear and cogent evidences of the Being and Attributes of God,—a proposition excellently proved in Dr. Barrow's Serm. vii. on Gen. i. 27, vol. iv. p. 163.

11. ὀπῆς] The ὀπὴ of a fountain is its eye, and the word itself is connected with ὄψ, ὄπτομαι, to see, and so the word Ænon (the place of springs) is derived from the Hebrew עַיִן (ayin), an eye. (John iii. 23.)

12. οὔτε ἁλυκὸν γλυκύ] nor can water that is salt produce

13—15. τίς σοφὸς καὶ ἐπιστήμων ἐν ὑμῖν] Many among you lay claim to wisdom and knowledge; let such prove the justice of their claim by their good conversation in meekness of wisdom; for where meekness is not, there is no real wisdom; if ye have bitter envy and party spirit (see on Gal. v. 20; cp. 2 Cor. xii. 20. Rom. ii. 8, and on Phil. i. 17) in your heart (whatever pretence there may be to knowledge in the intellect), boast ye not, and lie not against the truth, which is the only genuine end and object of wisdom. This is not the wisdom that is coming down from above (see i. 17), but is earthly, carnal, devilish: it is earthly and allures the eye; it is carnal, not spiritual (see 1 Cor. ii. 14. Jude 19), and stimulates the lust of the flesh; and it is devilish, and ministers to pride. See the threefold division 1 John ii. 16.

On the difference between ἐπιστήμη, knowledge, natural or acquired, of facts, and σοφία, the higher faculty of using knowledge in wise and virtuous practice, see Acts xix. 15; below, iv. 14. Eph. i. 8. Col. i. 9.

16. ὅπου γὰρ ζῆλος] for where envy and party spirit is, there is perturbation, disorder, disorganization, disruption of all that is constituted and settled in society, ecclesiastical and civil. See 1 Cor. xiv. 33. 2 Cor. xii. 20. Phil. ii. 3. Strife and party spirit would destroy Sion, and can build up nothing but Babel. Cp. Bp. Sanderson, i. pp. 214. 350, and see Clemens R. i. capp. 3—9.

17. ἡ δὲ ἄνωθεν σοφία] but the wisdom that is from above, is first pure ('sancta,' holy, free from taint, and hallowed to God), then peaceable, equitable (see on 1 Tim. iii. 3), compliant (Xenophon, Mem. iii. 4. 8), full of mercy and good fruits, not partial, not censorious, not taking upon itself the office of judging (Matt. vii. 1); and perhaps the meaning may also be, not contentious, not disputatious (see on ii. 4). Indeed all these senses may well be accepted here. And it is not hypocritical: neither making any pretensions to what it is not, nor disguising what it is; without semblance and without dissimulation. Being ἀδιάκριτος, it does not spy out motes in a brother's eye, and being ἀνυπόκριτος, it does not hide the beam in its own. Cp. Luke vi. 42, where partiality and hypocrisy are coupled together.

On the active sense of such adjectives as ἀδιάκριτος see Winer, p. 88.

18. καρπὸς δικαιοσύνης] the fruit of righteousness is sown by them who make peace. The fruit of righteousness: the genitive of apposition, as κόκκος σινάπεως, σίτου (Matt. xiii. 31. John xii. 24. 1 Cor. xv. 37), and καρπὸς δικαιοσύνης, Phil. i. 11, and Heb. xii. 11, a chapter in which St. Paul appears to be inculcating the lessons taught in this Epistle by St. James. Cp. above, on ii. 25. This fruit is sown by them who make peace. The fruit is, as it were, contained in the seed; and they who sow the seed enjoy the fruit. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." (Gal. vi. 7.) The dative is the dative of the agent, as in v. 7. Compare the beatitude in Matt. v. 9. This beautiful picture of true Wisdom may be placed side by side with that of Charity portrayed by St. Paul (1 Cor. xiii.).

CH. IV. 1. πόθεν πόλεμοι] whence are wars and whence are fightings among you? Whence are wars? from lusts, warring in you; warring against the soul (1 Pet. ii. 11). He refers to the feuds and factions, prevalent among the Jews and Jewish proselytes at that time; and a main cause of the Fall of Jerusalem. See above, note on Matt. xxiv. 15, and the authorities from Josephus there quoted. This passage seems to be imitated by S. Clement, Rom. i. 46, ἵνα τι ἔρεις . . . πόλεμός τε ἐν ὑμῖν.

2. φονεύετε] ye commit murder: which was specially true of those bands of Λησταί, sicarii, robbers and assassins, who, under the name of zealots, infested Jewish society at this time, and at last made the Temple itself a den of assassins. See Matt. xxi. 13. Evidences of the blood-thirsty spirit of rage, which now like a fiend possessed the heart of large numbers of the people, may be seen in the murderous plots and violent and frequent outbreaks at this period, mentioned in Josephus (cp. Whitby here) and in the Gospels and Acts, such as that of Barabbas (Matt. xxvii. 16. John xviii. 40), and of Judas of Galilee, and Theudas (Acts v. 36, where see the notes) and the Egyptian (Acts xxi. 38), and the conspiracy against St. Paul (Acts xxiii. 12—14). There may also be a reference here to the cry of the multitude assembled from all parts of the Jewish dispersions at the Passover, "Crucify Him" (Mark xv. 13, 14). See below, v. 6, ἐφονεύσατε τὸν δίκαιον.

The writer himself of this Epistle, St. James, fell a victim to this murderous spirit. See below, v. 6.

It is observed by Dr. Hammond, that the Epistle of St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, and especially the latter part of it, was designed for the use of Jews as well as of Christians. St. James was revered by the Jews (as appears from the passage of Hegesippus in Euseb. ii. 23); his censures of sins, and his warnings of coming calamities were specially applicable to them; and after his death, when his prophetic denunciations had been fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem, his words would be carefully noted, and a fresh argument would thence arise in behalf of the cause of the Gospel which he preached.

4. μοιχαλίδες] Ye adulteresses. A bold figure, used with vehement indignation, characteristic of this Epistle, in which St. James speaks in the δεινότης and stern language of a Hebrew Prophet in denouncing sin. Ye were espoused to God: "Thy Maker is thy husband" (Isa. liv. 5), but where is the love of thine espousals? (Jer. ii. 2.) Ye are as a wife that committeth adultery (Ezek. xvi. 32). Ye are an adulterous generation (γενεὰ μοιχαλίς) (Matt. xii. 39; xvi. 4. Mark viii. 38).

Some MSS., K, L, and many Cursives, have μοιχοὶ καὶ μοιχαλίδες, and so Elz. But the feminine μοιχαλίδες placed alone, is more expressive, as describing the conjugal relation of the soul to God: cp. St. Paul's language 2 Cor. xi. 2, I have espoused you as a chaste Virgin to Christ; and μοιχαλίδες (without μοιχοὶ καὶ) is the reading of A, B, and of most versions, which render the word by fornicatores: and so Lachmann, Tisch., Alford; and the feminine does not present a bolder figure here than in the passage of St. Peter, ὀφθαλμοὺς ἔχοντες μεστοὺς μοιχαλίδος (2 Pet. ii. 14), which affords the best illustration of this text.

Accordingly, the words are expounded in a spiritual sense by Augustine, Serm. 15, and Serm. 162, and are applied to souls lured by earthly love from loyalty and fealty to God, which are guilty of spiritual harlotry and adultery; see Matt. xii. 39, and Ps. lxxiii. 26, Thou hast destroyed all them that commit fornication against Thee. Cp. Rev. ii. 20—22; xvii. i. 5. 15; and so Theophylact and Bede.

The censure of St. James is also to be applied to Communities which break their troth to God. Cp. Wiesenger and Huther.

4—9.] Observe in these verses, the rapid succession of questions, and of short pungent sentences, like arrows drawn forth from a quiver, and discharged in a thick volley from the bow, by the hand of the spiritual archer.

After the vehement and indignant emission of this sacred artillery against the enemies of the truth, the Apostle changes his tone, and in calm and gentle accents, made more touching by the contrast, he exhorts and encourages the faithful. Compare the similar strain in v. 1—6, 7—19, with which he concludes.

— οὐκ οἴδατε] Know ye not? Ye who profess knowledge, and rely on that. See ii. 20; iv. 17; v. 20.

— καθίσταται] makes himself. See above, iii. 6.

5. ἢ δοκεῖτε] Do ye imagine that the Scripture speaketh in vain? Ye boast that ye have the Scripture committed to you. This is your highest privilege (see Rom. iii. 2). Do ye imagine that the words of the Scripture are mere idle illusions? Hath God spoken, and shall He not do it? (Numb. xxiii. 19. 1 Sam. xv. 29.) He has said that ye shall not follow after other gods, but serve the Lord only. (Deut. x. 20. 1 Sam. vii. 3.) He has condemned the love of this world; He has said that "ye cannot serve two masters, God and Mammon." He has said that "the love of the world is enmity with God;" and He has declared that "all his enemies shall feel His hand, and be made His footstool." Do ye suppose that such declarations as these, uttered by God Himself in Holy Scripture (see Ps. lxxiii. 27. Matt. vi. 24. Ps. xxi. 8; xcii. 9), are mere empty sounds, uttered in vain? This cannot be.

For examples of λέγω, to speak, without any special recital of the words spoken, see Rom. iii. 5; xi. 13. 1 Cor. x. 15; xv. 34. 2 Cor. vi. 13; vii. 3; viii. 8; xi. 21.

This is the first question. Next follows a second;

— πρὸς φθόνον ἐπιποθεῖ] Doth the Spirit, which abode in you, lust to envy? Ye have been made Temples of the Holy Ghost. Ye are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit (1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 16). Doth that good Spirit, with "which ye were sealed unto the day of redemption" (Eph. iv. 30), yearn toward envy? No: surely the Spirit of God is a loving, peaceable Spirit: it longs for the good of others, it teaches you to seek their benefit, and to edify them in love, (1 Cor. x. 24, 33; xiii. 5. Phil. ii. 4,) and to lay down your lives for the brethren (1 John iii. 16). Ye say, that ye have the Spirit. Prove the truth of your vauntings by bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit, "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, goodness, gentleness" (Gal. v. 22). Or if the Spirit that took up his abode in you, does lust unto envy, then be assured it is not the Spirit of God; but it is the spirit of the Devil who "was a murderer from the beginning" (John viii. 44. 1 John iii. 15).

Some MSS. (A, B) have κατῴκισεν; but κατῴκησεν seems to be preferable, with the sense came and dwelt, took up his abode and dwelt in you. See Eph. iii. 17.

The punctuation of these two clauses, as two distinct questions, removes all the difficulty, which some have found in this verse; and such a punctuation had already been suggested by earlier interpreters, e. g. Bede, p. 191, and cp. Whitby here, and Bp. Wilson.

6. μείζονα δὲ δίδωσιν χάριν] No; the Spirit does not lust to envy, but He is giving greater grace. If therefore ye really have the Spirit, as ye profess to have, then the proof of it will be seen in your continual growth in grace. For the Spirit is ever giving fresh accessions of grace to those who really have him, that is, to all who use his gifts; whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance (Matt. xiii. 12). But if the graces of the Spirit, which are peaceable, amiable, and gentle, are not seen in your actions, and if on the contrary ye bring forth the works of the flesh, which are adultery, hatred, variance, wrath, strife, envyings (Gal. v. 19—21), then ye convict yourselves of not having the Spirit, and prove that all your professions are vain.

— διὸ λέγει] wherefore He saith. See Ps. cxxviii. 6. Prov. iii. 34. Matt. xxiii. 13.

8. δίψυχοι] ye double-minded; ye two-minded men. The word is here used in a larger sense than above, i. 8. A man with two minds is one who prays to God, and yet has a secret yearning for some darling sin, which he will not leave; and therefore has an inward sense that his prayers are vain, and does not pray with faith. A man with two minds is one who desires to rejoice with the world now, and to reign hereafter with God. A man with two minds is one, who in doing good to men looks not to the glory of God, but to the praise of the world. Such an one is unstable in all his goings (i. 8); and of him it is said, "Woe to the sinner that goeth two ways." Ecclus. ii. 12. Cp. Bede here.

9. πενθήσατε] mourn ye. Cp. Matt. v. 4. Luke vi. 25.

— ἡ χαρὰ εἰς κατήφειαν] Let your joy be turned into sadness; shown by a pensive downcast look of shame and sorrow, and produced usually by some sudden shock. See Loesner, p. 466, and Wetst.

11. μὴ καταλαλεῖτε ἀλλήλων] Cp. S. Clement, ii. 4.

— καταλαλεῖ νόμου] he speaketh against the Law, and judgeth the Law; which is summed up in one word, 'Love,' and that is set at nought by thee who judgest thy brother. See ii. 8. Rom. xiii. 8, 9. Gal. v. 14.

12. εἷς ἐστιν ὁ νομοθέτης] One only is the Lawgiver, who is able to save and to kill; and thou invadest His office when thou presumest to judge the servant of Him Who will judge thee.

This text is important as a caution against the sin of those who usurp the prerogative of God, and assume a dominion over the conscience.

This is done by many in the following ways, (1) by enacting laws as of force to bind the Conscience by their own proper vigour; (2) by dispensing with any of the Divine Laws; (3) by enacting any thing contrary to the Law of Him Who is the Supreme Legislator, and Who alone has power to kill and to destroy.

This divine declaration is therefore condemnatory—

(1) Of sundry assumptions of the Papacy. See Matt. xv. 9. 2 Thess. ii. 2. 1 Tim. iv. 3. Rev. xiii. 5.

(2) Of all enactments of civil powers, contravening the Law of God. See Matt. v. 32.

(3) Of all theories of policy and government which represent human societies of men as sources of power. Such theories contradict the affirmation of St. James, and disparage the Supremacy of God, and encourage usurpations of His prerogatives.

Human laws, which are not contrary to God's Law, and which are enacted by competent lawful authority, do not oblige the conscience by any thing inherent in themselves, but they oblige the conscience by reason of the power which lawful authority derives from God, "the only Legislator who is able to save and to destroy." See above on Rom. xiii. 1—3; and the Lecture of Bp. Sanderson on this text, de Consc. Prælect. iv., vol. iv. § 9, p. 65; and Præl. v. § 23, p. 109.

The words of St. James (he says) assert, that there is but one Lawgiver—not one selected out of many, nor one above all the rest, but one exclusively; that is, one, and but one alone, who is able to save and destroy.

What was usually applied to the prerogatives of Kings, may be justly said of the Conscience of every man, that it is subject to none but God, and knows no superior upon earth. Memorable is the observation of the Emperor Maximilian, To offer to domineer over the conscience, is to assault the citadel of Heaven.

That man is a plunderer of the Divine Glory, and an invader of the authority that belongs to God, whosoever he be, that claims a Right over the consciences of men, or usurps upon them. Let the Popes of Rome, and the train of Canonists, Jesuits, and Sycophants, that flatter and fawn upon them, clear themselves, if they can, of this sacrilege; and let such as submit their Consciences to the power of any creature, which only ought to be subject to God, be careful lest by transferring the honour of that service that belongs to God, to any creature upon earth, they make a God of that creature, and so, in effect, become guilty of idolatry.

From this first conclusion thus proved, follows this remarkable inference, that the proper rule of the Conscience is that which God, the Supreme Lawgiver, hath prescribed to it; and besides that, there is no other that ought to be admitted.

Yet this hinders not, that there may be other Lawgivers of an inferior order, who by authority derived to them from the Supreme Power, may have a just right to make laws, and consequently to bind the Conscience to obedience. We do not say that God has committed to the Magistrate a power to oblige the Consciences of his people by Laws, but rather (to speak with more care and propriety) that God has given to the Magistrate a jurisdiction to make Laws, which by virtue alone of the Divine authority, do oblige the Consciences of the subject; for properly speaking, the Magistrate does not oblige the Conscience to obey the Law, but God obliges the Conscience to obey the Magistrate. Bp. Sanderson.

— τὸν ἕτερον] thy neighbour. See Rom. ii. 1; xiii. 8. 1 Cor. vi. 1. Gal. vi. 4.

13. ἄγε νῦν, οἱ λέγοντες] Go to now, ye that say. Cp. v. 1.

On the use of the singular ἄγε, with the plural noun or participle, see Hom. Il. i. 62, and passim; so "age," in Latin: see Wetst. p. 676.

14. ἀτμὶς γάρ ἐστε] for ye are a vapour. Elz. has ἐστι, it is (i. e. your life is) a vapour; but the reading ἐστε, ye are, authorized by many MSS., and received by Lach., Tisch., Huther, is more expressive. Not only your life, but ye yourselves are a vapour. Cp. i. 10. B has ἐστε; and A, K have ἔσται, which is probably the same reading as ἐστε (αι and ε being often confused in MSS.), and either ἐστε or ἔσται are in numerous MSS. and some Versions. Compare Horat. (Od. iv. 7. 16), "Pulvis et umbra sumus."

15. ἀντὶ τοῦ λέγειν ὑμᾶς] instead of your saying. This is to be construed with v. 13, Woe unto you who say, 'To-day and to-morrow we will set forth to that city,' instead of saying (as ye ought to do), If the Lord will, we shall both live, and shall do this or that.

On the reading and construction cp. Winer, p. 256, who does not however seem to be aware that A, B have both ζήσομεν and ποιήσομεν, in the future. This reading (which is received by Tisch., Lach., Alf.) makes both life and action to depend on the will of God.

16. νῦν δὲ καυχᾶσθε] but now ye are glorying (not in the Lord as ye ought to glory, 1 Cor. i. 31, but) in your own vain vauntings; in your own confident and presumptuous boastings, of your own wisdom and power. On the sense of ἀλάζων, see Rom. i. 30. 2 Tim. iii. 2. Cp. 1 John ii. 16.

17. εἰδότι οὖν] to him therefore who knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, there is sin.

This conclusion of St. James is added as the summing-up of the argument, in the same manner as the aphorism with which St. Paul closes his reasonings concerning a doubting conscience, where he says, "Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin;" that is, whenever a man does any thing without being persuaded in his mind that he may lawfully do it, he is guilty of sin. Rom. xiv. 23.

St. James appears to have his eye here on this statement of St. Paul.

St. James adds to it another maxim of general import, viz. that whensoever a man omits to do any thing which he is persuaded in his own mind that he ought to do, he is guilty of sin.

Thus these two Apostolic verdicts, delivered in a similar manner, constitute two fundamental rules of human action, as to what men are bound to forbear doing, and as to what they are bound to do.

Those persons whom St. Paul addressed, were tempted to do many things, which they did not, in their consciences, approve; and the Apostle warns them, that if they do any thing against their conscience, they commit sin.

They to whom St. James wrote, were vainglorious of their religious knowledge; but they were not careful to show forth their religious knowledge by religious practice; and the Apostle teaches them that their knowledge will only increase their guilt, unless they do what they know to be right.

Hence, while it is a sin to shun knowledge, and there is some sin of ignorance (cp. Augustine, vi. 661), and it is a sin to shut the ears to instruction; and it is a duty to get knowledge, to increase in knowledge, to abound in knowledge, we must beware not to rest in knowledge. We must add to our knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, charity. Without these knowledge is unprofitable; nay, will only increase our condemnation. See Bp. Sanderson, iii. p. 232–4. Cp. Luke xii. 47. John ix. 41; xv. 22; and see the woes pronounced on Chorazin and Capernaum, Matt. xi. 21.

Ch. V. 1. Ἄγε νῦν, οἱ πλούσιοι] Go to now, ye rich, weep and howl. He continues his address to the Jews, and especially the Sadducees, noted for wealth and worldliness. Among the Christians few were rich (see above, ii. 5–7), and therefore this portion of the Epistle is not to be restricted to them; see v. 6. St. James, like a Christian Jeremiah, is uttering a divine prophecy, of the woes that are coming on Jerusalem and on the Jews throughout the world.

2. ὁ πλοῦτος ὑμῶν] your wealth is mouldering in corruption, and your garments (stored up in vain superfluity in your wardrobes) are become moth-eaten. Although they may still glitter brightly in your eyes, and may dazzle men by their brilliance when ye walk the streets, or sit in the high places of this world; yet they are in fact already cankered. They are loathsome in God's sight. The divine anger has breathed upon them and blighted them; they are already withered and blasted, as being doomed to speedy destruction: for ye lived delicately on the earth (see v. 5), and have not laid up treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt (Matt. vi. 20).

— ὁ χρυσός] your gold and your silver are eaten up with rust. The sentence is figurative, and is shown to be such by this expression. Literally gold does not contract rust (see Theognis, 451. Pliny, N. H. xxxiii. 19, and other authorities in Wetstein, p. 678): but those precious metals, which naturally are incapable of rust, do, by being abused, or not rightly used, morally and spiritually contract rust; and not only so, but are, as St. James says, eaten up with rust. Even while shining in your coffers, they are, in God's eye, sullied and corroded, and they will not profit you in the day of trial, but be consumed by His indignation: and the rust they have contracted by lying idle as κτήματα, and not been used as χρήματα, will be a witness against you at the Great Day; and will pass from them by a plague-like contagion, and devour your flesh as fire.

3, 4. ἐθησαυρίσατε] ye laid up treasure in the last days. He speaks of this laying up as past, and as done in the last days.

f ch. 2. 6.

6 f Κατεδικάσατε, ἐφονεύσατε τὸν δίκαιον· οὐκ ἀντιτάσσεται ὑμῖν.

Such is the divine language of prophecy. The Holy Spirit, speaking by St. James, utters a voice as it were from the Divine Throne and from the Day of Judgment.

The judicial sentence is pronounced, and is as good as executed, in the eye of God. A sublime and awful picture. God is seated on His throne. The wages of the poor, defrauded by their proud and wealthy oppressor, have cried aloud, and their cries have entered into the ears of God, styled here by His awful and majestic title in authentic Hebrew words, to make it more striking to the Jews,—The Lord of Sabaoth; the Lord of Hosts of Angels, with which He cometh to execute judgment.

St. James here takes up the prophetic warnings of Malachi (iii. 5), where God declares that He will "come near to them to judgment, and that He will be a swift witness against the adulterers and false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages" (τοὺς ἀποστεροῦντας μισθὸν μισθωτοῦ: cp. Ecclus. xxxiii. 27), the widow and the fatherless (see above, i. 27), and "that fear not Me, saith The Lord of Hosts." "For I am the Lord, I change not" (see above, i. 17). And now we call the proud happy! (Mal. iii. 15.)

On this use of ἀπὸ, on your part, by you, after the passive verb ἀπεστερημένος, see above, i. 13, ἀπὸ Θεοῦ πειράζομαι, Winer, p. 332, note, and above on Luke vi. 18. Some expositors connect κράζει with ἀφ' ὑμῶν, cries from out of your hands, or coffers, in which it is detained; but this seems to be a forced interpretation, and not authorized by any Ancient Version.

5. ἐτρυφήσατε ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς] ye revelled upon earth. Ye have not had your treasure in heaven. Ye have not found delight in spiritual things, such as God's sabbaths (Isa. lviii. 13), and in the pleasures of His house (Ps. cxxii. 1; lxv. 4), and in doing His statutes (Ps. cxix. 72. 97), but in what is earthly and perishable: ye have had your good things in this life, and therefore ye will suffer loss and torment in the life to come. Luke xvi. 25.

— ἐσπαταλήσατε] instead of devoting your worldly wealth—which was God's gift—to God's service, ye lavished it in luxury and riot, and indulgence on yourselves.

On the word σπαταλῶ, from σπάω, distraho, σπαθῶ, dissipo, cp. 1 Tim. v. 6. Prov. xxix. 21. Amos vi. 4, and Wetstein, ii. p. 340.

— ἐν ἡμέρᾳ σφαγῆς] A striking contrast. Ye feasted jovially in a day of sacrifice, when abundance of flesh of the sacrificed animals is on the table at the sacrificial banquet. Ye ought to have ruled the people gently and mildly; but ye "have fed yourselves and not the flock," ye nourished your own hearts and not those of your people; ye have sacrificed and devoured them like sheep or calves of the stall fatted for the pampering of your own appetites. Cp. Ezek. xxxiv. 1—10. Cyril, in Caten. p. 33.

Ye did this at that very time when ye yourselves were like victims appointed to be sacrificed in the day of the Lord's vengeance, which is often compared by Hebrew prophets to a sacrifice, see below, Rev. xix. 17. Cp. Œcumenius and Theophylact here.

This was signally verified by the event. The Jews from all parts of the world came together to the sacrifice of the Passover, A.D. 70, and they themselves were then slain as victims to God's offended justice, especially in the Temple. See above on Matt. xxiv. 1. 15; and particularly the rich among them, as recorded by Josephus in B. J. vi. passim. Their wealth excited the cupidity and provoked the fury of the factious Zealots against them, and they fell victims in a day of slaughter to their own love of mammon; what was left of their substance was consumed by the flames which burnt the city. Josephus, vii. 29. 32. 37.

Elz. inserts ὡς, as, before ἐν ἡμέρᾳ, but ὡς is not in A, B, and is rejected by Lach., Tisch., Alf.

6. κατεδικάσατε] ye condemned, ye murdered the Just One: Christ (Cassiodor., Œcumen., Bede, Bengel): this was your crowning sin, the cause of your coming woe: and after many years of long-suffering on God's part, ye have not been brought to repentance; "ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and killed the Prince of Life." (Acts iii. 14, 15.) Ye have also slain His faithful witness St. Stephen (Acts vii. 59), and St. James the brother of John (Acts xii. 2), and thus ye prove yourselves the children of your fathers who slew the prophets, who "pre announced to you the coming of the Just One (τοῦ Δικαίου) of whom ye became the betrayers and murderers" (φονεῖς, Acts vii. 52), as was said to the Jewish Sanhedrim by the first Martyr, St. Stephen, in the speech which seems to have been in the mind of St. James when he wrote these words.

It has been alleged by way of objection to this interpretation, that the Jews of the age in which this Epistle was written, could not be charged with having condemned and killed Christ, who had been crucified about thirty years before. But this objection is of little weight. Our Lord asserts that they who persecuted Him had even killed Zacharias the son of Barachias, slain many centuries before (Matt. xxiii. 35).

Those words, like many other sayings of Christ, especially these recorded in the Gospel of St. Matthew, seem to have been in the mind of St. James when he wrote this Epistle. The just blood of the just Abel, and of all the other just men slain from the beginning, were drops in their cup of guilt, which overflowed at the shedding of the blood of the Just One, typified by Abel, and by all the Martyrs to the days of Zacharias; see the note on that passage; ὅπως ἔλθῃ ἐφ' ὑμᾶς πᾶν αἷμα δίκαιον ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος Ἀβὲλ τοῦ δικαίου, ἕως τοῦ αἵματος Ζαχαρίου υἱοῦ Βαραχίου ὃν ἐφονεύσατε.

By clinging to the sins of their fathers the Jews identified themselves with them; they committed their sins. They who persecuted the Christians after the Ascension persecuted Christ (Acts ix. 4, 5). Hence Justin Martyr, writing a century after St. James, says to the Jews, "Ye killed the Just One and His prophets before Him." Dialog. c. Tryphon. c. 16. The same may still be said to the Jews even at this day.

Observe the eloquent vehemence (δεινότης) of this grand appeal, made more forcible by the omission of all connecting particles; an example of asyndeton well deserving the notice of any Christian Longinus, who may write a treatise "on the sublime" (περὶ ὕψους), as displayed in Holy Writ, Ye nourished your hearts in a day of sacrifice; ye condemned, ye murdered the Just One; He doth not resist you. Cp. above, vv. 4—9. He doth not resist you. His long-suffering is exhausted, He no longer strives with you. He lets you alone (Hos. iv. 17). This is the worst punishment of all; He leaves you to yourselves. Your house (no longer His house) is left to you desolate (Matt. xxiii. 38). He chooses your delusions (Isa. lxvi. 4), and chastises you by your own devices (Jer. ii. 19), and gives you over to a reprobate mind (Rom. i. 28), and your cup of guilt and punishment has now brimmed over, and all the righteous blood shed by your fathers will be required of this generation (Luke xi. 50, 51). A warning and prophecy rendered more striking by the fact that he who uttered it was called by the Jews "James the Just," and was murdered by them at Jerusalem at a time of sacrifice, as a victim at the Passover (as his Master was before him), when great multitudes came up to Jerusalem (A.D. 62).

Eight years after that murder, and also at a Passover, Jerusalem itself was destroyed. Hegesippus, ap. Euseb. ii. 23. Cp. Euseb. iii. 7, where he speaks of God's long-suffering toward the Jews for forty years after the death of Christ, and of His mercy to the Jews in allowing holy men to remain at Jerusalem, especially James, the first bishop of Jerusalem, the Lord's brother, who was to the city like a very strong bulwark (ἔρκος ἐχυρώτατον. Cp. his name Oblias, see above, Introduction, p. 5), while God's providence was still bearing long (μακροθυμούσης) with them if haply they would repent. By killing St. James they stripped themselves of that strong defence, and provoked the overflowing of God's wrath upon them.

The words of Eusebius (ii. 23), citing the narrative of Hegesippus, concerning the death of St. James, deserve to be cited at large; they are thus rendered by Lardner, History of the Apostles (ch. xvi. vol. iii. p. 36), "When Paul had appealed to Cæsar, and Festus had sent him to Rome, the Jews being disappointed in their design against him, turned their rage against James, the Lord's brother, to whom the Apostles had assigned the episcopal chair of Jerusalem. And in this manner they proceeded against him. Having laid hold of him, they required him in the presence of all the people to renounce his faith in Christ. But he with freedom and boldness beyond expectation, before all the multitude, declared our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to be the Son of God. They not enduring the testimony of a man, who was in high esteem for his piety, laid hold of the opportunity when the Country was without a Governor, to put him to death. For Festus having died about that time in Judea, the province had in it no Procurator. The manner of the death of James was shown before in the words of Clement, who said that he was thrown off from the pediment of the temple (see on Matt. iv. 5. Luke iv. 9), and then beat to death with a club. But no one has so accurately related this transaction as Hegesippus, a man in the first succession of the Apostles, in the fifth book of his commentaries, whose words are to this purpose,—James the brother of our Lord, undertook together with the Apostles the government of the Church. He has been called the Just by all from the time of our Saviour to ours. Some of the seven sects, which there were among the Jews, asked him, Which is the Door of Jesus: or, What is the Door of salvation? And he said: Jesus is the Saviour, or the way of salvation. Some of them therefore believed that Jesus is the Christ. . . . . And when many of the chief men also believed, there was a disturbance among the Jews and among the Scribes and Pharisees, who said that there was danger, lest all the people should think Jesus to be the Christ. They came therefore to James and said: We beseech thee, restrain the errour of the people. We entreat thee to persuade all that come hither at the time of Passover to think rightly concerning Jesus. For all the people, and all of us put confidence in thee. . . . . Stand therefore upon the pediment of the temple, in order that, being placed on high, thou mayest be conspicuous, and thy words may be easily heard by all the people. For because of the Passover, all the tribes are come hither and many Gentiles. Therefore the Scribes and Pharisees before named placed James upon the pediment of the temple, and cried out to him, and said: O just man, whom we ought all to believe, since the people are in an errour following Jesus who was crucified, tell us what is the door of Jesus? And he answered with a loud voice: Why do you ask me concerning the Son of Man? He Himself sitteth in heaven at the right hand of the great power, and will come upon the clouds of heaven. And many were fully satisfied, and praised God for the testimony of James, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David. But the Scribes and Pharisees said to one another: We have done wrong in procuring such a testimony to Jesus. Let us go up and throw him down, that the people being terrified may not give credit to him. . . . . They went up presently and cast him down, and said, Let us stone James the Just. And they began to stone him, because he was not killed with the fall. But he turning himself kneeled down, saying: I entreat thee, O Lord God the Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. As they were stoning him one said, Cease, What do ye? the just man prayeth for you. And one of them, a fuller, took a club with which he was used to beat clothes, and struck him on the head. Thus he suffered martyrdom. And they buried him in that place, and his monument still remains near the temple. This James was a true witness to Jews and Gentiles that Jesus is the Christ. Soon after this Judea was invaded by Vespasian." So writes Hegesippus at large, says Eusebius, agreeably to Clement. James was so excellent a man, and so much esteemed by many for his virtue: that thoughtful men among the Jews were of opinion, that his death was the cause of the siege of Jerusalem which followed soon after his martyrdom. These are the things which are related of James, whose is the first of the epistles called catholic. (Eusebius, ii. 23.)

The narrative in Josephus (xx. 9. 1) contains several things at variance with this account, but it may admit of a doubt whether the words τὸν ἀδελφὸν Ἰησοῦ τοῦ λεγομένου Χριστοῦ, Ἰάκωβος ὄνομα αὐτοῦ are not interpolated. Cp. Lardner, c. xvi. They are enclosed in brackets in Richter's edition, Lips. 1826.

7. μακροθυμήσατε οὖν, ἀδελφοί] be ye patient, therefore, brethren. Remember what the Lord suffered, and how He was made perfect through suffering; and that He will soon come to visit those who persecute you.

St. James here turns himself from the Jews to the Christians; and preaches to them patience: an exhortation requisite in their circumstances; compare the similar language of St. Paul, Heb. xii. 1—28, which is like an enlargement of this admonition of St. James: and see also Heb. vi. 7. 11, 12, where St. Paul compares the hearts of the faithful to good soil which drinketh in the rain, and produceth herbage meet for the use of those for whom it is tilled (γεωργεῖται), and receives blessing from God; and exhorts them to show earnestness for the full assurance of hope unto the end; in order that they may be imitators of them who "through faith and patience (μακροθυμία) inherit the promise." Observe the repetition here of the word μακροθυμία, v. 8, and μακροθυμία, v. 10, as if the Apostle would leave this admonition to long-suffering and patience as a parting bequest to the faithful.

Probably St. Paul had St. James in his mind, and thought of his martyrdom, when he wrote to the Hebrews,—in the interval between the death of St. James and the destruction of Jerusalem,—"Remember your spiritual Guides, who spoke to you the word of God; whose faith follow ye (μιμεῖσθε), contemplating the end of their conversation." Heb. xiii. 7, where see note.

— μακροθυμῶν ἐπ' αὐτῷ] bearing long with it; showing long-suffering towards it; see Matt. xviii. 7.

— ὑετὸν πρώϊμον καὶ ὄψιμον] the early and latter rain: the early rain was that which fell in the autumn; the latter that of the spring about the end of April; see Jerome in Amos iv. 7, and the commentators on Ezek. xxvii. 17, and Joel ii. 23. Zech. x. 1. Hos. vi. 4, and the rabbinical citations in Wetstein, p. 678.

9. κριθῆτε] So the best MSS. and editions. Elz. has κατακριθῆτε.

— ἰδοὺ, ὁ κριτὴς πρὸ τῶν θυρῶν ἕστηκε] behold, the Judge standeth before the doors. Cp. Matt. xxiv. 33, ἐγγύς ἐστιν ἐπὶ θύραις, and in a different sense Rev. iii. 20, ἕστηκα ἐπὶ τὴν θύραν.

Christ is at hand, He is even now at the Door, ready to execute vengeance on the guilty city of Jerusalem for her sins (Œcumen.). This saying: The Judge standeth at the Door, suggests a reference to the remarkable incident recorded by Hegesippus (see on v. 6), that the religious sects at Jerusalem were accustomed to ask St. James "which is the Door of Jesus?" and that at a Passover (that of A. D. 62) they placed him on a lofty eminence of the temple and cried out, The people are gone wild after Jesus who has been crucified, tell us, which is the Door of Jesus?

This question was doubtless put in bitter irony and malignant mockery: as is proved by the murder of St. James perpetrated by those who uttered it. The saying is an enigmatical one. Perhaps this passage in this Epistle may explain it.

This latter portion of the Epistle contains a solemn prophecy of the woes coming on the Jews for the murder of the Just One; and denounces their sins and predicts their punishment (see vv. 1—6). It then proceeds to announce that the presence of the Lord is at hand, and that, behold, the Judge standeth at the Door.

This Epistle, published abroad throughout the world, and thus pre-announcing the doom impending on Jerusalem for the sin of its Rulers in crucifying Jesus, would be as offensive to Jews, especially the great and wealthy among them, as the prophetic roll of Jeremiah was to the King and Princes of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvi. 10—32). And the language of this chapter may serve to explain their malignant menaces and blood-thirsty rage against the Apostle. It was to them what the speech of St. Stephen had been to the Sanhedrim; and probably St. James, as well as St. Stephen, was a victim of the wrath excited by his courageous rebukes of their sins, and by the constancy of his testimony to Jesus.

The words of St. James, "Behold! the Judge standeth at the doors," perhaps became current among them? Perhaps those words may have also excited the question put in a tone of derision, "which is the Door of Jesus?" at what Door is He standing? By what Door will He come? show Him to us and we will go out to meet Him.

This supposition is confirmed by the reply of St. James, "Why do ye ask me concerning the Son of Man? He sitteth in heaven; and will come in the clouds of heaven." There is His Door. The words of the murderous flatterers to St. James, as recorded by Hegesippus, seem to contain another similar ironical reference to the rebukes of this Epistle, "Thou art no respecter of persons" (πρόσωπον οὐ λαμβάνεις). No, forsooth! thou hast preached to the world to make no difference between rich and poor, and to show no respect to persons (see above, ii. 1—9). Therefore doubtless thou wilt speak the truth.

Other interpretations of that saying, "Which is the Door of Jesus?" may be seen in Bp. Pearson on S. Ignatius, ad Phila-

Thus he shows that the Gospel of Christ is in harmony with the Old Testament; and guards against the cavil of the Jews that it would undermine the authority of their Scriptures.

11. Ἰώβ] Job, the patriarch of the ancient Church, not of the stock of Abraham.

Thus all unite—Prophets, Patriarchs, and Apostles—in teaching the duty of Patience. The Patriarch Job is propounded here as an example by the Apostle St. James. Hence we may conclude that the book of Job is not (as some have supposed) an allegory, but a true history, and this is further evident from the words of Ezekiel, combining Job with two other historical personages, Noah and Daniel. Ezek. xiv. 14. 20.

— τὸ τέλος Κυρίου] the end of the Lord, i. e. of His dealings with Job, by which he "was more blessed at his latter end than at the beginning," Job xlii. 12: cp. Augustine, de Symbolo, 10.

12, 13. πρὸ πάντων] but above all, my brethren, swear not.

The connexion of this precept with the preceding may be stated in the words of Bp. Sanderson (Lectures on Oaths, vii. 11). "Set the examples of antient Prophets, and holy men before your eyes. If ye suffer adversity, imitate their patience. If in all things you cannot attain to that perfection, yet thus far at least, except ye be very negligent, you may go with ease; above all things, take heed lest too impatient of your grief, or too much transported with your joy, ye break forth into rash oaths, to the dishonour of God, and shame of Christian conversation. But rather contain yourselves, whether troubled or rejoicing, within the bounds of Modesty: mingle not Heaven and earth, let not all things be filled with your oaths and clamours; if you affirm a thing, let it be with calmness, and a mere affirmation or negation. But if either of these passions be more impetuous, and strive to overflow the narrow channels of your bosoms, it will be your wisdom to let it forth unto the glory of God. Do you demand by what means? I will tell you: Is any amongst you afflicted? Let not his impatience break forth into Oaths and Blasphemies, the Flood-gates of wrath; but rather let him pray; and humbly implore God that he would vouchsafe him Patience, till His heavy hand be removed. Is any merry? Let him not bellow it forth in Oaths, like a Bacchanalian, but rather sing it in Hymns and Psalms unto the Praise of God; who hath made his cup to overflow, and crowned him with happy days." Bp. Sanderson.

In these words St. James doth not mean universally to interdict the use of oaths: for that in some cases is not only lawful, but very expedient, yea needful, and required from us as a duty; but that swearing which our Lord had expressly prohibited to His disciples, and which thence, questionless, the brethren to whom St. James did write, did well understand themselves to forbear, having learnt so in the first catechisms of Christian institution; that is, needless and heedless swearing in ordinary conversation, a practice then frequent in the world, both among Jews and Gentiles; the invoking of God's name, appealing to His testimony, and provoking His judgment, upon any slight occasion, in common talk, with vain incogitancy, or profane boldness. From such practice the holy Apostle dehorteth in terms importing his great concernedness, and implying the matter to be of highest importance: for, Before all things, my brethren, do not swear; as if he did apprehend this sin of all other to be one of the most heinous and pernicious. Could he have said more? would he have said so much, if he had not conceived the matter to be of exceeding weight and consequence? Dr. Barrow, Serm. xv. vol. i. p. 329.

On the subject of Oaths, see above, notes on Matt. v. 34. Heb. vi. 16, and the expositors of Art. XXXIX. of the Church of England.

12. μήτε τὸν οὐρανόν] neither by heaven nor by earth, lest ye give to the creature the honour due only to the Creator, see Caten. p. 36, for an oath is an act of worship to be paid only to God. Cp. Matt. v. 34.

14. προσκαλεσάσθω τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας] Let him call to himself the Elders of the Church, and let them pray over him. Observe the plural "Elders;" let him call for them, in order that by united prayer they may prevail (Matt. xviii. 19), and that they may be witnesses of the effects of prayer.

Our Lord sent forth His twelve Apostles and His seventy Disciples two and two (Mark vi. 7. Luke x. 1), and St. James prescribes that the sick should send for the Elders of the Church.

Where, however, only one Elder can answer the call, this precept enjoins that he should be sent for; and it can hardly be supposed that in some cases the Elders would be summoned in a body to a sick room; but the precept is general, and the application of it in particular circumstances is left to be determined by the wisdom and piety of the faithful.

Here is remarkable evidence of the diffusion of the Gospel and extension of the Church, and of the existence of the order and Ministry of the Christian Priesthood in divers parts of the world in that early age. This Epistle was written before A.D. 62, when St. James died; it was addressed to the twelve tribes dispersed throughout the world (i. 1), and it gives them this precept,—"Is any sick among you? Let him send for the Elders of the Church."

This admonition would not have been given, if it could not be complied with. In the Acts of the Apostles we see St. James the Bishop of Jerusalem surrounded by, and presiding over, his Presbyters, or Elders, there (xxi. 18), and we may infer from his words in this place that Apostles and Apostolic men had now gone forth into a great part of the world (cp. Titus i. 5, and note before 1 Tim. iii.), and had ordained Presbyters in the principal cities.

In the Apocalypse we see in each case, one Person at their head (see on Rev. ii. 1); as their Angel, or Bishop.

The sick are enjoined to send for the Presbyters of the Church. It follows, therefore, that it is a necessary part of the Priest's duty to visit the sick. St. James had before asserted, not without reference to this duty, that "pure worship in the sight of God is to visit the orphans and widows in their affliction" (i. 27), and he here enjoins the sick to send for the Presbyters of the Church, and comforts the faithful with the assurance that the ministry of God's Priests, in prayer and other offices of religion, will be conducive to their comfort in soul and body.

Hence the Church of England prescribes, that "when any person is sick, notice shall be given thereof to the Minister of the Parish" (Order for the Visitation of the Sick); and she specifies it as part of "the Office of a Deacon, to search for the sick, &c., and to intimate their names unto the Curate." (Form, &c., of making Deacons.)

S. Polycarp, the Bishop of Smyrna, a disciple of St. John, and martyr, referring, it would seem, to the words of St. James, gives this ministerial direction (ad Philipp. c. 5), "Let the Presbyters be tender-hearted, merciful to all, converting the erring, (see below, v. 19), visiting all who are sick (ἐπισκεπτόμενοι πάντας ἀσθενεῖς); not neglecting the widow or orphan or needy (see above, i. 27), and providing always what is good in the sight of God, abstaining from all respect of persons (see above, ii. 1. 9), not sharp in judgment, knowing that we are all sinners" (see above, iii. 2). These words of S. Polycarp show that he was familiar with this Epistle of St. James.

— προσευξάσθωσαν ἐπ' αὐτόν] let them (the Presbyters) pray over him, the sick man. There is therefore a special efficacy in the prayers of those whom God has set apart for that office.

16 Ἐξομολογεῖσθε ἀλλήλοις τὰ παραπτώματα, καὶ εὔχεσθε ὑπὲρ ἀλλήλων,

Every Priest being taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God (Heb. v. 1), that he may offer prayers; the prayers he offereth he offereth out of his office, and so, even in that respect there is, cæteris paribus, a more force and energy in them, as coming from him whose calling it is to offer them, than in those that come from another whose calling it is not so to do. Bp. Andrewes, Sermons, v. 230, 231.

The authority of the Priest's calling is a furtherance, because if God have so far received him into favour as to impose upon him by the hands of man that office of blessing the people in His Name, and making intercession to Him in theirs, which office He hath sanctified with His own most gracious promise, and ratified that promise by manifest actual performance thereof, when others before in like place have done the same; is not his very Ordination a seal, as it were, to us, that the self-same Divine Love that hath chosen the Instrument to work with, will by that Instrument effect the thing whereto He ordained it, in blessing His people, and accepting the prayers which His servant offereth up unto God for them? Hooker, V. xxv. 3.

— ἀλείψαντες αὐτὸν ἐλαίῳ] anointing him with oil.

A question here arises;

Why the Church of England has not retained the practice of Anointing the Sick, as here prescribed by St. James?

And if the Early Church discontinued doing so, when and why?

St. Mark says of the Apostles (vi. 13), "They cast out devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them."

From a comparison of this passage with the parallel places in St. Matthew (x. 1—8) and St. Luke (ix. 1—6), it appears that they did this in the exercise of the extraordinary and miraculous powers of Healing bestowed on them by Christ.

The application of oil to the body of the Sick was a visible proof that they who applied it (viz. the Apostles) were Instruments employed by God for the conveyance of those benefits which accompanied its application.

It was a manifest evidence that Miracles of Healing were wrought by God through their agency; it was like a credential to their mission; and it served to call attention to the Doctrine taught by them, as coming from God.

The miraculous powers of Healing given to the Apostles were for some time continued in the Church.

Thus St. Paul says (1 Cor. xii. 8, 9), "To one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing; to another prophecy; to another tongues;" and again (1 Cor. xii. 28), "God hath set some in the Church, first Apostles, secondarily Prophets, thirdly teachers, after that Miracles, then gifts of healing.... Have all the gifts of healing? Do all speak with tongues?"

Our Lord Himself promised this gift to His disciples (Mark xvi. 18): "They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." This was done by the Apostles in the time of our Lord's ministry (says Œcumenius here): they anointed the sick with oil and healed them.

It appears that St. James is speaking with reference to this miraculous power of healing then existing in the Church, when he says (v. 14), "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." That is to say, If any one is sick, let him avail himself of the gifts which God has bestowed upon His Church; let him send for the Presbyters of the Church, and let them pray over him; and the prayer of faith (i. e. the faithful prayer made in full trust that God will do what is best for the sick) will (if it be God's good pleasure) save the sick, and God will raise him up, and restore him to health; and if he has committed sins, and if he is penitent for his sins, and has faith in Christ, they shall be forgiven him.

Whatever was instituted by Christ or by His Apostles, under His guidance and that of the Holy Ghost, for the purpose of conveying grace to the soul, and for the attainment of everlasting glory, is of perpetual and universal obligation: for all men need grace, and all men desire glory. Such things are the Two Sacraments and Confirmation. See on Acts viii. 16, 17.

But things which were practised and prescribed by Christ Himself and His Apostles are not of perpetual obligation, unless they are conducive to an end which is of perpetual necessity, namely, to the bestowal of spiritual grace to the soul, and to its everlasting salvation. If such is not their character, they are mutable, and may be omitted or foregone by the Christian Church, according to the wisdom and discretion with which God has endued her. See this proved at large by Hooker, I. xv., and III. x., and xi. 15—18.

This is evident from the non-use of feet-washing, a thing done and enjoined by Christ Himself (see on John xiii. 14), and from the discontinuance of the holy kiss prescribed by His Apostles. (1 Thess. v. 26. Rom. xvi. 16. 1 Pet. v. 14.)

There is no evidence that anointing with oil was ever used in primitive times as a sacrament for the conveyance of spiritual grace to the sick in danger of death.

For a considerable time the Church retained the gift of healing (Irenæus, v. 6. Tertullian, de Bapt. c. 10. Euseb. v. 7. S. Jerome, vit. Sulp. Sever. vit. Martini, c. 15), and the practice of anointing with oil, with a view to recovery from sickness, was continued in the Eastern and Western Churches. Indeed (as may be seen in the Greek Euchologium), it is continued in the Eastern Church to this day for this purpose: see Dr. Covel on the Greek Church, 308. 340.

The Latin Church has adopted a different course.

She perceived in course of time that the effect mentioned by St. James ("the Lord shall raise up the sick") did not ordinarily ensue from the anointing with oil; she saw that the miraculous and extraordinary powers of healing granted by Christ to the Apostles and other primitive disciples in the Apostolic ages, had gradually been withdrawn, as was the case with those other miraculous gifts, coupled with that of healing by St. Paul (1 Cor. xii. 28), viz., the gift of tongues.

But she would not lay aside the practice of anointing the sick. She retained the practice, but she abandoned the design for which the practice had been instituted.

At length, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the Latin Church had diverted the practice into a direction quite contrary to the purpose for which it was originally prescribed.

The Apostle St. James had enjoined the practice with a view to the recovery of the sick; as Cardinal Caietanus allows, in his note on the passage, where he says, "Hæc verba non loquuntur de Sacramentali unctione extremæ unctionis;" but the Church of Rome prescribes, in the Councils of Florence (A.D. 1438) and Trent (A.D. 1551), that the anointing should not take place except where recovery is not to be looked for (Council of Trent, Sess. xiv., "qui tam periculosè decumbunt ut in exitu vitæ constituti videantur"), and therefore she calls this anointing "extreme unction," and "sacramentum exeuntium," and she regards it as a Sacrament for conveying grace to the soul.

Thus, on the one hand, the Greek Church is a witness by her present practice, that the Anointing was designed with a view to bodily recovery; and the Roman Church, on the other hand, is a witness, that the miraculous effects on the body, which were wrought in primitive times by God through the instrumentality of those who anointed the sick, and which accompanied that unction, have ceased.

In the first Prayer Book of King Edward VIth, the Church of England (in her Office for the Visitation of the Sick) provided that "if the sick man desired it," he might be anointed with a view to his recovery. But on further consideration of the matter, and reflecting (it may be supposed) that the anointing of the sick implied something of a claim to the exercise of miraculous powers of healing, and might be chargeable with presumption, and with ignorance of God's dispensations in regard to miraculous powers, and might tempt men to rely for grace and pardon on an outward ceremony administered to them in a state of insensibility; she has thought fit to lay aside the sign, now that the thing signified has ceased, and to limit herself soberly and wisely to what is certain and indisputable, and what is the main thing for the sick man to consider, viz., that if he avails himself, as he ought to do in his sickness, of the ministry of his spiritual Guide, the prayer of faith will save the sick, and (if it be most expedient for him) God will raise him up; and if he has committed sins, they will, on his faith and repentance, be forgiven him, and that he will receive pardon, and grace, and peace, through the merits of Christ, and by the love and mercy of God, especially as conveyed, dispensed, and applied in the reception of the blessed and most comfortable Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, which she enjoins, in a special Office, to be ministered to the sick.

Compare Dr. Hammond here and Dean Comber's remarks in his "Companion to the Temple," in the Introduction to the Office of Visitation of the Sick.

to another. Observe the word παραπτώματα, offences, breaches of law: here particularly the law of love: and ἀλλήλοις, one to another, as friends and brethren; and compare our Lord's precept, "If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him, and if he repent forgive him, and if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again unto thee saying, I repent, thou shalt forgive him" (Luke xvii. 3, 4).

The doctrine of private confession preparatory to the reception of the Holy Communion, and as a part of the discipline of Repentance, cannot rightly be grounded on this text.

Public confession of sins to Almighty God has ever been a necessary part of Christian religion and worship; but private confession to a Minister of the Church was never enforced in the earliest ages of the Church. The Church of England gives her advice to the penitent, in certain cases, and under certain circumstances, "to open his grief to some discreet and learned Minister of God's Word" (not indiscriminately to any one who may claim a right to hear confession, without due qualification for the difficult work of guiding the conscience aright), "that by the ministry of God's Holy Word he may receive the benefit of Absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice, to the quieting of his conscience and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness." See Hooker, VI. iv. 4, and VI. iv. 6.

— ὅπως ἰαθῆτε] that ye may be healed in body and soul. Matt. xiii. 15. Luke iv. 18; ix. 2. Heb. xii. 13, where St. Paul seems to refer to this precept.

Observe the connexion of this sentence with what goes before. "The greatest thing that made men forward and willing to confess their sins, and in no wise to be withheld from this confession by any fear of disgrace or contempt which might ensue, was their fervent desire to be helped with the prayers of God's faithful people, wherein as St. James doth exhort unto mutual confession, alleging this for a reason, that just men's devout prayers are of great avail with God, so it hath been heretofore the use of penitents for that intent to unburthen their minds even to private persons and to crave their prayers." Hooker, VI. iv. 7, referring to Tertullian de Pœnit. c. 10, and S. Ambrose de Pœnit. ii. 10.

— πολὺ ἰσχύει] Great is the efficacy of the prayer of a righteous man working inwardly. Do not imagine, as many do, that prayer will avail without holiness of life. Some make long prayers and devour widows' houses (Matt. xxiii. 14), and therefore shall receive greater damnation (Luke xx. 47). The sacrifice of the wicked is abomination (Prov. xv. 8; xxi. 27), but the prayer of the righteous availeth much.

Again some may suppose, that the prayers of the lips will avail, without the inner working of the heart. They draw nigh to God with their lips, but their heart is far from Him (Matt. xv. 8). "They use vain repetitions in prayer, and think that they will be heard for their much speaking." (Matt. vi. 7. Cp. Ecclus. vii. 14.) But ye shall not be so. It is the inner working of the heart, moved by a spirit of love, that prevails with God. The wrestlings of Jacob in prayer, the yearnings of Hannah's heart, these gain a blessing from Him. "Hæc vis Deo grata est." Tertullian.

On the word ἐνεργουμένη, inwardly energising in devotion and love to God, so as to produce external effects in obedience; see 1 Thess. ii. 13. Gal. v. 6. 2 Cor. i. 6. Col. i. 29. Eph. iii. 20; and see the note of Maximus here (in Catenâ, p. 37), where he says the "power of prayer is not in words when it comes forth from the tongue in an empty sound of the voice;" such a prayer is ἀργὴ καὶ ἀνυπόστατος, but a prevailing prayer is that which is ἐνεργὸς καὶ ζῶσα, energetic and living, animating obedience.

Observe, therefore, how happily the two emphatic words δικαίου and ἐνεργουμένη are reserved for the end of the sentence, to give weight and force to the whole; and to make it sink into the ears and hearts of hearers and readers of the Epistle; and to teach the faithful of every age, that it is holiness of life and devotion of heart which give efficacy to Prayer.

The martyrdom of St. James himself affords a beautiful comment on these words (see Euseb. ii. 23, quoted above on v. 6), especially where it is related that after St. James had been cast down by his enemies from the pediment of the Temple, and they were stoning him, he fell on his knees and prayed for them, and some, who stood by, said, adopting the very words of this Epistle, —"Hold, what do ye? εὔχεται ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ὁ δίκαιος," "the just man is praying for you."

17. Ἠλίας ἄνθρωπος ἦν ὁμ. ἡ.] Elias was a man of like passions with us; and once his patience failed him (1 Kings xix. 4. 10. 14), yet God heard his prayer; and gave him power to shut and open heaven (1 Kings xvii. 1; xviii. 42. 45. Cp. Rev. xi. 6). It is not indeed expressly affirmed in the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, that Elijah's prayers were the cause of the drought for three years and a half, and of the rain at their close; but his own declaration that there should not be rain but according to his word (1 Kings xvii.), and also his actions on Mount Carmel (xviii. 42), first praying to God for the acceptance of his sacrifice, and then casting himself down upon the earth, putting his face between his knees, though they might not lead an uninspired Expositor to the inference drawn here by the inspired Apostle St. James, yet they find a very apt exposition in that inference which we may thankfully accept at his hand.

When the prophet Elias said, that the gift of rain should depend on his word, he could not mean the word of command, but the word of prayer. Be not ye therefore disheartened, serve God and Pray earnestly; and He will protect you.

— προσευχῇ προσηύξατο] he prayed with prayer, there was true ἐνέργεια in his prayer. This is marked by the Hebraistic addition of the substantive to the verb. Cp. on Acts iv. 17, and on 2 Pet. iii. 3.

— τοῦ μὴ βρέξαι] that it should not rain. On the infinitive see on Acts xxvii. 1, and on Rev. xii. 7, and on the word βρέχω, to rain, Matt. vii. 25. 27.

— ἐνιαυτοὺς τρεῖς καὶ μῆνας ἕξ] three years and six months; equal to 42 months, or 1260 days,—a chronological period of suffering. See above on Luke iv. 25, and below on Rev. xi., note at the end of the chapter.

19, 20. ἀδελφοὶ—ἁμαρτιῶν] Brethren, if any man among you shall have strayed from the truth, and any one shall have converted him,—brought him back to the way of the truth from which he had gone astray,—let him know, that he who hath turned a sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall cover a multitude of sins.

20. γινωσκέτω] let him know. This is genuine γνῶσις, or knowledge, that by imitating Christ's love, we are made partakers in His work, and in His glory. By doing the work of Christ in seeking to save that which is lost (Matt. xviii. 11. Luke xix. 10), the Christian will be admitted to be a sharer in the dignity and office of Christ; he will save a soul from death. So Timothy is said by St. Paul to save those who hear him, i. e. by applying the means instituted by Christ for their salvation (1 Tim. iv. 16. Cp. Rom. xi. 14. 1 Cor. vii. 16; ix. 22. Jude 23). And so Christ Himself gave His own title to His ministers when He said "Ye are the Light of the world" (Matt. v. 14. Cp. John ix. 5). Therefore he who has turned a sinner from the error of his way will have a saving office and dignity, because he will have applied those means which God has instituted for the salvation of sinners. Cp. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 139.

Nor is this all; he will cover a multitude of sins, and in this respect also will be admitted to be a fellow-worker with Christ; and have a share in another of His glorious titles. Christ alone is the true Propitiatory, or Mercy Seat; He is the Covering of the Ark on which God sits (Ps. lxxx. 1), as on a Throne of Grace, to which we must flee for mercy (Heb. iv. 16; cp. Mather on the Types, pp. 407, 408. 411), and which covers the sins of the whole world. Christ, and Christ alone, in that primary sense, covers a multitude of sins; see Heb. ix. 5, and on Rom. iii. 21—26, and Rom. iv. 7; which afford the best exposition of this text. "Blessed is the man whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered; blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin." (Ps. xxxii. 1, 2.)

The contrast is in the words of Nehemiah, iv. 5, "O God, cover not their iniquity, and let not their sin be blotted out from before Thee."

That man, therefore, who has reclaimed a sinner from the error of his way, and has brought him back to Christ, and to the use of those means which God has instituted in the Church for his salvation in Christ, may be justly said to cover a multitude of sins by means of the Saviour's righteousness; and he who has thus done the work of Christ, according to the command of Christ, will hear the joyful speech at the great Day, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (Matt. xxv. 21.)

This covering of a multitude of sins by Christ, and the ministerial application of the means instituted by Him for the casting of this covering of Christ's righteousness over a multitude of sins, is a different work from that of saving the sinner, specified in the former clause.

For, if we suppose the sinner to be saved, and yet the remembrance and record of his sins to be not covered, but to be ever visible to his own eyes, and to the eyes of men and Angels, and of God, in Eternity, this consideration would much abate his happiness in another world.

But the comfort here specified by the Apostle is, that by reclaiming an erring brother from the ways of sin, and by bringing him to Christ, we may not only save an immortal soul from eternal death, but may be instrumental in casting over his sins —however great their multitude—the spotless robe of Christ's righteousness, so that they may be covered for ever by the mantle of His merits.

Here is one of the strongest motives to the work of Christian love, in endeavouring to convert the sinner from the error of his way.

With this precept St. James ends his Epistle; and in the practice of it he ended his life, when, according to the example, and in the words of His Saviour, dying on the cross for the salvation of the souls of all men, and for the covering of their sins from the wrath of God, St. James prayed for his murderers, "I pray Thee, Lord, God and Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." (Euseb. ii. 23. See above on v. 6.)

There are no salutations nor benedictions at the close of this Epistle for the reason stated above on i. 1.

INTRODUCTION

TO

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. PETER.

When the Holy Ghost came down from heaven, on the Day of Pentecost, St. Peter stood up with the Eleven, and preached to the Jews and Proselytes, who had come from all parts of the civilized world to Jerusalem for that Festival.

They whom he addressed are enumerated by the Historian of the Acts of the Apostles in the following order:—

1. Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judæa.

2. Cappadocia, Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia.

3. Egypt, the parts of Libya towards Cyrene; and strangers of Rome, Jews and Proselytes, Cretes and Arabians.

These Three Classes of persons, as has been shown in another place[1], represent the principal Dispersions, as they were called, of the Jews, scattered abroad in the countries to the East, North, West, and South of Jerusalem.

St. Peter was their Apostle, the Apostle of the Circumcision[2], as St. Paul was of the Gentiles. And as St. Paul performed the office of Apostle to the Gentiles, by preaching in person, and also by writing Epistles to the Gentile Churches, so St. Peter did to those of the Circumcision.

He did that work in regular order.

The Commission which had been given by Christ to His Apostles had specified certain stages of missionary progress; "ye shall be witnesses unto Me in Jerusalem," this was the first stage; "and in all Judæa," this was the second; "and in Samaria," this was the third; and, lastly, "unto the uttermost part of the Earth[3]."

The Apostle St. Peter had received from Christ a solemnly repeated charge, "Feed My sheep[4]." He discharged the duties of the pastoral office entrusted to him, and he performed them according to the order prescribed by Him who gave the charge.

He bore witness to Christ, first, in Jerusalem, and in Judæa; next, "in Samaria[5];" and lastly, he bore witness to Christ unto the uttermost parts of the Earth.

This final and extended witness, to the uttermost parts of the Earth, is that which is presented to us in his Epistles, and in his Martyrdom.

He preached the Gospel and wrote his first Epistle in the eastern territory of the Roman world; and his Martyrdom took place in the West. This Epistle was written from the Eastern Babylon; and afterwards he bore witness to Christ by dying for Him in the Western Babylon,—Rome[6].

[5] Acts viii. 14—25. Cp. ix. 32.
[6] See below, p. 39. Whether St. Peter was ever at Rome before the time of his martyrdom in that City is doubtful.

Justin Martyr (Apol. ii. c. 26) asserts that Simon Magus came to Rome in the time of Claudius; and after Justin Martyr it is said in the Chronicon of Eusebius, ad A.D. 42, that he was encountered there by St. Peter; and so Euseb. ii. 14. Cp. Euseb. ii. 15—17.

But the silence of Holy Scripture, and especially the absence of any reference to St. Peter in St. Paul's Epistles written to Rome and from Rome, and the scantiness and ambiguity of other testimony on that subject, render it at least very doubtful, whether St. Peter was at Rome before his last visit in the reign of Nero, which ended in his martyrdom there. Cp. Basnage, Annales ad A.D. 42, vol. i. p. 525.

It is probable, that he encountered Simon Magus at that time; Nicephorus (Chronog. in Scaliger. Thesaurus Temp. p. 308) assigns two years to St. Peter's Episcopate at Rome, and those two years are, in all likelihood, coincident with St. Peter's visit to Rome at the close of Nero's reign, when St. Paul was also at Rome; and this opinion is confirmed by the testimony of some authors, S. Cyril. Catech. 6. Sulpic. Sever. ii. p. 369, who

Thus he completed his testimony to Christ, "in Jerusalem, Judæa, Samaria, and the uttermost part of the Earth."

The place from which this Epistle is dated is Babylon[1].

Reasons will be assigned hereafter for adherence to the opinion, that the literal interpretation of that word is the true one; and that this Epistle was written from the site of the Assyrian city, on the river Euphrates; the city celebrated of old in the history of the Jewish people.

Reserving the further details of the evidence on this point for another place, we may here content ourselves with observing that the Historian of the Acts places the Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia as the first in order among those strangers scattered abroad, who had come up to Jerusalem for the Feast of Pentecost, and who were then addressed by St. Peter. No less a number than three thousand of them received his word and were baptized[2]; being the first-fruits of many similar spiritual Harvests which would be gathered in by St. Peter and others on many like occasions at Jerusalem, at the Jewish Festivals in succeeding years.

It might reasonably be anticipated, that St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, would go in person and visit those to whom he had preached, and whom he had converted by his preaching, and see how they fared[3].

Among all the cities in the region of the Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia, none had been so renowned as Babylon.

The announcement that the Cross of Christ had been planted in Babylon, and that there was an Elect[4] Church,—a Christian Sion,—in that place, which had been the cause of so many woes to Jerusalem, would indeed be joyous tidings to the faithful Israelites throughout the world. "The land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, Galilee of the Gentiles," which had been the first to endure the calamities inflicted by the Assyrian invasion, were the first to enjoy the blessings of the Gospel, and the gracious presence of the Messiah; and the people which sat in darkness saw a great light in the glorious Advent of Him Who is the Light of the World[5]. And if now it could be said, that by the preaching of a Galilæan fisherman, Babylon, the land of the captivity of Judah, had heard the sound of an Evangelical Jubilee, this intelligence would be hailed with gladness by all faithful Israelites, and would impart consolation to them for the distresses which their forefathers had endured at Babylon; and would be like the opening of a door of hope, that all their brethren, wheresoever scattered abroad over the face of the earth, would find a home in the Gospel, and a Jerusalem in the Church of God; and it would be an earnest and pledge of future victories to be achieved by the Cross of Christ over all the Babylons of this world.

These and other considerations, which will be stated in the proper place[6], lead us to adopt the literal interpretation of St. Peter's words, and to believe that he was at Babylon, when he wrote this Epistle.

This interpretation, it will be found, imparts clearness and beauty to its contents.

To specify some particulars;

The Epistle itself is sometimes cited by ancient Authors, as "Epistola ad Ponticos[7]," an Epistle to those of Pontus. The reason is, that among the regions specified by the Apostle at the beginning of this Epistle, the first place is assigned to Pontus.

Pontus was the most eastern region of Asia Minor. This circumstance confirms the opinion above stated, that the place in which the Epistle was written, did not lie to the west of Asia Minor,—and therefore was not Rome, as some have supposed,—but lay to the east of Asia Minor.

Still further, on examining the order in which the Asiatic regions are arranged in the com-represent that Simon Magus was encountered at Rome by St. Paul as well as St. Peter. See Ittig, Hæres. p. 28, and the testimony in the recently discovered work of S. Hippolytus, which is of more importance from the author's connexion with Rome, p. 178. "This Simon," says he, "bewitched many in Samaria with his sorceries, and afterwards came as far as Rome, and entered into conflict with the Apostles; and Peter greatly resisted him when he was seducing many by his magical arts." Cp. Basnage, Ann. A.D. 64, vol. i. p. 731, and the authorities in Winer, R. W. B. ii. p. 238. Davidson, Intr. iii. pp. 352—362.

The obscurity in which the history of St. Peter is involved after his delivery from his imprisonment in A.D. 44 (Acts xii. 17) is very remarkable. It seems providential. It may be ascribable to the same causes as the silence of Holy Scripture with regard to the Blessed Virgin Mary. It is like a prophetic protest against the errors which grew up afterwards in the Church, and fastened themselves with a semblance of reverence on his venerable name; like ivy, which injures the tree which it dresses up with its foliage. If St. Peter had been the Supreme Head of the Church of Christ, and had possessed sovereign authority over all the Apostles, it is not at all probable that his personal movements for a period of twenty years would have been involved in obscurity as they are. How much would the advocate of Papal Supremacy have made of the Acts of the Apostles, if the person who is there brought most prominently forward had been St. Peter, instead of St. Paul! If we knew as much of St. Peter's history as we do of St. Paul's, how many arguments would thence have been derived in favour of that Supremacy! There is therefore, it is probable, an eloquent significance in this silence.

mencement of this Epistle, we find that they are placed in such a geographical series as that in which they would present themselves naturally to the mind of a person writing from the east of Asia Minor; and thus also we are confirmed in the opinion that the word Babylon at the close of the Epistle is to be received in its natural sense, and means the celebrated Assyrian city bearing that name.

If, now, we refer again to the recital in the Acts of the Apostles concerning the preaching of St. Peter, on the day of Pentecost, to the Jewish strangers who had flocked to Jerusalem for that Festival, we find that after the mention of those who had come from Parthia and its neighbourhood, namely, Babylonia and the regions about it, those who are next specified are the dwellers in Judæa[1], Cappadocia, Pontus, and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia.

He went forth from Jerusalem and preached in Judæa. Suppose him next to be at Babylon, which was then under the sway of the Parthians[2], and to have confirmed in the faith of Christ those believing Jews who were scattered in Media, Elam, that is Persia, and Mesopotamia. It was very reasonable that he should next turn his eyes and his thoughts toward those who formed the second great group of the dispersed Israelites; namely, to those of Pontus, Cappadocia, and Asia, who were an offset of the Babylonish dispersion, and are placed next to it by St. Luke in the Acts of the Apostles.

What more natural, therefore, than that, being at Babylon, he should write an Epistle to those of Pontus and Asia?

He had received a charge to show his love to the Good Shepherd, Who had laid down His life for His sheep; and the manner in which that love was to be proved was by feeding His sheep[3]. The lost sheep of the house of Israel were committed to his special charge. They were scattered abroad throughout the world. But they were gathered together from time to time as in a sheepfold at Jerusalem at the great annual Festivals. St. Peter had fed them there.

But he must also go forth to feed them.

It was ordered, providentially, that though the sheep of the house of Israel were scattered upon the mountains of the world, yet, if we may venture so to speak, there were certain great spiritual sheep-walks in which they ranged, like the patriarchal flocks of Arabia, stretching themselves in their pastoral encampments far and wide over the hills, and along the valleys. And when Christian folds had been formed in these great spiritual sheep-walks, ready means were afforded of spiritual communication among them; and they might in fine be gathered as one flock under one Shepherd[4] in the Church of Christ.

The first of these great spiritual sheep-walks was in Babylonia and the adjacent countries, to which the Ten Tribes had been carried captive. There St. Peter was, when he wrote this Epistle.

The second of these spiritual sheep-walks was in Asia Minor.

The third was in Egypt[5].

Therefore, being at Babylon, and tending the sheep of the Good Shepherd there, St. Peter next directed his attention to those sheep of the house of Israel who were scattered abroad in Asia Minor; of whom not a few had heard his voice in Jerusalem, and had perhaps been already visited by him in the interval between the day of Pentecost and the date of this Epistle[6].

Thus he performed the double work enjoined him by Christ, that of tending and feeding His sheep. He tended them by his presence; and he fed them by his Epistles, which afford a constant supply of spiritual nourishment to the sheep of Christ[7].

The mention of "Marcus his son," in the salutation from Babylon[8], supplies another illustration here.

"Marcus his son," is doubtless the Evangelist St. Mark, whose Gospel was written under the eye of St. Peter, his father in the faith[9].

This salutation itself proves, that St. Mark was known to the Asiatic Jewish Christians, whom St. Peter is addressing in the Epistle. This inference is confirmed by the mention of St. Mark by St. Paul, when writing from Rome in his Epistle to the Asiatic Church of Colossæ[10]. And it may [7] The word ποιμαίνειν, to tend, implies the presence of the ποιμήν, or Shepherd. But βόσκειν is a work which he may perform when absent, as well as when present. St. Peter ἐποίμαινεν at Babylon; and when there he ἔβοσκεν those of Asia. He ἐποίμαινεν by his presence, and ἔβοσκεν by his writings. He tended Christ's sheep when he was alive; but he is always feeding them in his Epistles.

probably be concluded from the request of St. Paul, writing from Rome to Timothy, the Bishop of Ephesus, to bring with him Mark, "for he is profitable to me for the ministry[1];" that Mark was afterwards again at Rome, before the martyrdom of that Apostle.

Subsequently, St. Mark is presented to our notice in Ecclesiastical History as Bishop of Alexandria, the capital of Egypt, and as having been sent thither by St. Peter[2]. Egypt and its neighbouring countries was the third great spiritual sheep-walk of the dispersed of Israel: and Alexandria was their central fold[3]. Accordingly, Egypt and the parts of Libya toward Cyrene are mentioned in the third place by the Historian of the Acts of the Apostles, in his enumeration of those to whom St. Peter preached on the Day of Pentecost.

St. Peter, as far as we know, never went in person into Egypt, nor did he ever write an Epistle to the inhabitants of that country; but he sent thither "Marcus his son," and fed the flock there by his instrumentality, both by his Gospel, written under St. Peter's superintendence, and by the pastoral ministrations of St. Mark, the first Bishop of Alexandria.

Thus then, in another sense, St. Peter executed Christ's commission to him, "Feed My Sheep," "Tend My Sheep." And he did this in the same order as that which is set down by the Holy Spirit in the Acts of the Apostles, describing St. Peter's first preaching, as the Apostle of the Circumcision, when he had just been empowered to preach by the "Holy Ghost sent down from heaven[4]," and when he gathered in that spiritual harvest of souls, which may be regarded as the first-fruits of his labours.

The Tending of Christ's flock by personal presence, and preaching; the Feeding of Christ's flock with the healthful food of sound Doctrine, in the writing of Epistles, to endure for all ages after his decease[5]; the continual oversight of Christ's flock by the appointment of Chief Pastors to be continued in succession;—these were the acts of this Apostolic Shepherd, done in obedience to the pastoral Charge of the Chief Shepherd and Bishop of our souls[6]. And by doing these things St. Peter set an example to all Christian Bishops and Pastors, and cheers them with a blessed hope, that if they follow him, as he followed Christ, then, when "the chief Shepherd shall appear, they will receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away[7]."

But the crowning act of St. Peter's pastoral Ministry still remained to be performed.

The Good Shepherd layeth down His life for the sheep[8], and Peter had received a commission from the Good Shepherd, "Follow thou Me[9]." He would imitate the Good Shepherd, and obey His command. When he had become old, he had provided for the oversight of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, scattered abroad in Parthia, in Asia, and in Egypt. But his commission was not yet fulfilled. It extended to the uttermost parts of the earth. He had been to the East, to Chaldæa; he must also go to the West, to Italy; he had been to the Eastern Babylon; he must also go to the Western Babylon; he must visit Rome.

Here also he followed the order set down by the Apostolic Historian. There the mention of Mesopotamia is succeeded by the mention of Asia, and the mention of Asia is succeeded by that of Egypt, and the mention of Egypt is succeeded by that of Rome[10]. At Rome his course was to end.

Our Lord had charged him to prove his love to Him by feeding His lambs, and by tending His sheep, and by feeding His sheep[11]. And immediately after the delivery of this charge to St. Peter, He had proceeded to utter a prophecy concerning the manner of St. Peter's death: "This He spake, signifying by what manner of death he would glorify God[12]. And when He had spoken this, He said, Follow thou Me." So it came to pass. After St. Peter had tended Christ's sheep by his presence and preaching, and had fed Christ's sheep by his doctrine and writings, and by the ministry of Marcus his son, it remained only that he should perform the finishing work of a Christian Shepherd, in following Him Who is the Good Shepherd, and Who showed His love for His sheep by laying down His life for them[13]. "Follow thou Me," were the words of Christ to him; and Christ pre-announced to Peter that he would have grace to follow His Master, not only in His death, but in the manner of it[14], and would thus prove his love for the Great Shepherd of the Sheep, and would glorify God.

This the blessed Apostle did, in the great city of the West, the Metropolis of the world[15]—

Rome. St. Peter himself declares[1] that he foresaw the approach of his death; and probably it was not without divine direction that he went to that place, where the evidence of his own love for Christ, in dying after His example, would be most edifying to the Christian Church. His Master had gone up to Jerusalem to die; St. Peter went for the same purpose to Rome.

Thus he fulfilled the pastoral commission which he had received from Christ, and completed the work which had been given him to do, and which had been delineated in outline by the divine record of his preaching on the Day of Pentecost, when he received the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which enabled him to feed the flock committed to his care.

St. Peter's First Epistle derives special interest from his personal history.

One of its characteristics is its quiet tone of Christian gentleness and humility. This is the more remarkable, because the Author was distinguished among the Apostles by the eager forwardness and fervid vehemence of his character. This natural impetuosity seems to be subdued and chastened, in his Epistle, by an inward self-restraint. That self-restraint was probably produced by a recollection of the former confidence of his professions, and by the result of his self-reliance in the hour of trial. He seems to write under the remembrance of the transactions of the High Priest's hall, at the arraignment of Christ[2]. His Epistle breathes the spirit of Christian meekness and humility, and of submission for Christ's sake. "If ye be reproached for Christ's sake, happy are ye[3]." "If any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf[4]." Memorable words from one who had denied his Master.

The example of Christ's demeanour in the last days of His earthly ministry, which St. Peter had seen, seems to have wrought its full effect in his heart.

"Be ye clothed with humility," writes St. Peter[5]. The word there used[6] by the Apostle has been aptly illustrated by a reference to our Saviour's actions when He took a towel and girded Himself, like a servant, and poured water into a basin and washed His Apostles' feet[7]. St. Peter's language on that occasion, as recorded by St. John[8], shows that he was much affected by that gracious act of humility; and in his Epistle he seems to refer to it, and to commend it for imitation.

The patient bearing of our Lord before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrim, which St. Peter had witnessed, is also presented as a pattern to his readers. "Even hereunto were ye called: for Christ also suffered for us, leaving you an example, that ye should follow His steps; Who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth; Who being reviled was not reviling[9] again; when He was suffering, He was not threatening; but was committing Himself to Him that judgeth righteously[10]." And again, "It is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing. For Christ also once suffered for sins, just for unjust, that He might bring us to God[11]." And again, "Forasmuch then as Christ suffered for us in the flesh, arm ye yourselves also with the same mind[12]."

All these exhortations come with special force from him who was a witness of Christ's sufferings[13], and received a solemn charge from Him, "Follow thou Me;" and who had been commanded by Christ to "strengthen his brethren[14]."

Other characteristics also of this Epistle receive light from St. Peter's personal history.

The Epistle itself contains frequent intimations of the near approach of "a fiery trial" of severe persecution; and of the exposure of Christians to indignities and sufferings for Christ[15]. But the Apostle was not dismayed by what he foresaw. He not only manifests a spirit of resignation under suffering, but even of joy and exultation. The mention of trial is ever coupled in this Epistle with the language of triumph. The source of that language is to be found in his personal intercourse with Christ.

St. Peter had been with Christ on the Mountain of Transfiguration. Our Lord then talked with Moses and Elias, who appeared in glory. He conversed with them concerning that future event which, though sorrowful and shameful in itself, was to be His passage to glory. He talked of His death[1] which He should accomplish at Jerusalem. After the accomplishment of that decease, St. Peter was a witness of Christ's victory and majesty in His Ascension into heaven.

Accordingly, in his Epistle, St. Peter views all the sufferings of Calvary as glorified by triumph. He sees Christ's decease, he sees his own decease, he sees the decease of all Christ's faithful followers, as invested with a heavenly radiance, by the light of the Transfiguration. He writes his Epistle[2] in the joyful light of that prophetic Vision of Glory. And soon after the date of the Epistle[3] he went to Rome, and proved the sincerity of his words by dying joyfully for Christ.

At the time of the Transfiguration St. Peter had attempted to dissuade Christ from suffering[4]; and in the hour of his human frailty had shrunk from bearing witness to Christ, and denied his Master. But when he wrote this Epistle he rejoiced in the prospect of suffering for Christ, because he saw the "glory that would follow[5]," and he teaches others to do the same. Great indeed was the spiritual change which had now been wrought in him by the Holy Ghost; and we may thence derive a cheering assurance, that the same Divine Comforter, whose perpetual presence was promised to the Church by Christ[6], will never fail to shed His gracious influences on the soul, and inspire it with courage in distress.

One of the most interesting characteristics of St. Peter's history is his connexion with St. John. In the Gospel history the riper age of St. Peter is blended in happy combination with the youthful years of St. John; and the ardour of the one is mellowed by the calmness of the other. The one is the Apostle of practical energy, the other of quiet contemplation. And both are joined together in tender bonds of fraternal love. What Mary and Martha were as sisters, St. John and St. Peter were as Apostles. By the side of the Lake of Galilee, after the Resurrection of Christ, they are seen together in the society of their risen Lord, Who uttered a prophecy concerning the future lot of both[7]. And in the Acts of the Apostles, this holy pair of Apostolic friends and brothers is joined together by the Holy Spirit in a sacred union. They go up to the Temple together; they pray together; they preach to the people together; they are sent to prison together; they are delivered together; they go to Samaria together[8]. Then, as far as the Sacred History is concerned, their union seems to be severed. But there is reason to believe that this union subsists for ever in their Epistles in Holy Scripture. St. Peter wrote his Epistle from Parthia to the Churches of St. John's province—Asia Minor; and St. John, it would seem, wrote from Asia to the Christians of Parthia, after St. Peter's death. And if this was so, then this circumstance confirms the arguments already adduced, to prove that the Babylon of St. Peter's first Epistle is the Assyrian city of that name. The evidence of this Epistolary intercourse will be produced hereafter[9]; in the mean time, let it be enough to have submitted it here for the reader's consideration.

Lastly, this Epistle possesses a special interest and value in regard to the relation of St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, to St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles.

St. Peter received the Keys from Christ[10]: and he was the first to unlock the door of the Church to the Jewish and Gentile world.

He admitted the Jews of the Dispersions, by the ministry of the Word and Sacraments[11], on the Day of Pentecost. He afterwards admitted the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius at Cæsarea[12].

After this initiatory work had been performed by St. Peter, a division of Missionary labour was made between him and St. Paul.

"He that wrought effectually in Peter to the Apostleship of the Circumcision," says St. Paul[13], "was mighty in me also toward the Gentiles[14]."

About five years after this partition, a difference arose between St. Paul and St. Peter, at the Syrian Antioch.

Whether St. Peter was Bishop of Antioch[15] at this time, is uncertain; but he had great influence in that city. In a moment of vacillation he yielded to the solicitations of those, who, in [14] St. Paul's Ordination to the Apostleship to the Gentiles probably took place about five years after the Conversion of Cornelius, the first-fruits of the Gentile world. See the Chronological Tables prefixed to the Acts, and to St. Paul's Epistles.

[15] The testimonies concerning the Episcopate of St. Peter at Antioch may be seen in Euseb. iii. 22 and 36. S. Hieron de Scr. Eccl. c. 1, and c. 16, and in Gal. ii. 11.

their zeal for the ceremonial Law, desired to impose it on the Gentile Christians; and he withdrew himself from the communion of those who declined to receive that Law as necessary to salvation.

In this critical emergency, St. Paul came forward to plead the cause of Evangelical Liberty, and to maintain the plenary and all-sufficient efficacy of Christ's Sacrifice, as the only cause of Justification, and to demonstrate the transitory and preparatory character of the Levitical Ritual, and its fulfilment in Christ; and he openly resisted and rebuked St. Peter [1].

About four years after this difference, St. Paul, in the vindication of his own Apostolic claims, and in the maintenance of the doctrine of Christian Liberty, and of Justification by faith in Christ, was constrained to make a report of the circumstances of that controversy in writing his Epistle to the Churches of Galatia; which had been seduced by Judaizing Teachers from the foundation, on which he had settled them, of faith in Christ Crucified [2].

Here was a severe trial for St. Peter.

He, to whom Christ had given the Keys; he who had been admitted to His nearest intimacy and most private retirements; he, whose house at Capernaum had harboured Christ [3]; he who had preached to the Jews and Jewish strangers on the Day of Pentecost; he whose preaching had been sealed with sanctions and benedictions from heaven; he who had been twice miraculously delivered from prison by an Angel; he who had opened the door of the Church to the Gentiles; he was publicly reproved at Antioch—perhaps his own Episcopal city—by one who had not been of the Twelve, and had been a Persecutor of the Church; and the narrative of this rebuke had been communicated to the world by his reprover in an Epistle addressed to the Churches of Galatia, and was openly read in Christian Congregations.

Yet further, many persons, especially the Judaizing Christians, were jealous of St. Paul's influence, and were zealous for St. Peter. They were desirous of claiming him as their champion, and of setting him up as a rival to St. Paul. And the fervid spirit and impassioned temper of St. Peter may have led them to expect that he would have been stung to the quick by the rebuke of St. Paul, and would be ready to accept the leadership which his partizans would have assigned to him.

What, then, was the conduct of the blessed Apostle St. Peter under these circumstances?

This is an interesting inquiry; and, happily, St. Peter's Epistles supply the answer.

The question debated between him and St. Paul was concerning Christian Liberty; and the circumstances of that debate had been narrated by St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, in his Epistle to the Gentile Christians of Galatia, and was doubtless familiar to other Churches of Asia.

St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, wrote this his First Epistle to the Jewish Christians of Asia—"Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia."

In it he delivers a memorable precept concerning Christian Liberty.

That sentence is as follows; it consists of three clauses—

1. "As free;
2. "And not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness;
3. "But as servants of God [4]."

Turn now to St. Paul's Epistle to the Gentile Christians of Galatia.

There also we find a precept concerning Christian Liberty. That sentence is as follows; it also consists of three clauses—

1. "Brethren, ye were called to Liberty;
2. "Only use not your Liberty as an occasion to the flesh,
3. "But by love serve one another [5]."

Thus we see in both these Epistles the same triple division; the same assertion of Liberty; the same caution against its abuse; the same rule for its use.

The resemblance between these paragraphs from these two Epistles is more remarkable, because they were addressed by the two Apostles to the same Countries; and because they concern that very question of Christian Liberty, on which those two Apostles had formerly been at variance; and because the history of that altercation had been communicated by one of them, St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians, who are also specially addressed by St. Peter in this Epistle.

St. Peter therefore, we see, did not manifest any resentment toward St. Paul for the rebuke given at Antioch, and for the publication of its history to the world. He frankly comes forward and adopts St. Paul's own language on that very question which had been the subject of their dispute.

Here is a noble specimen of victory over self, and of generous confession of error; here is a beautiful practical application of his own precepts concerning Christian humility, meekness, and gentleness, and of love for the sheep whom Christ purchased with his blood.

Would to God that they who call themselves St. Peter's successors would copy St. Peter's example!

Here also was clear evidence to the Jewish and Gentile Christians, and to the world in every age, that the two great Apostles, of the Circumcision and of the Gentiles, who had formerly differed at Antioch, were now in perfect unity with each other, in preaching the great doctrines of Evangelical Liberty, and of the all-sufficient efficacy of the Death of Christ; and in guarding their hearers against abusing that Doctrine, and in exhorting them to regulate their use of Liberty by the law of Love.

Again. St. Paul had addressed another Epistle to the greatest Gentile Christian city of those Asiatic regions to which St. Peter was now writing—the Epistle to the Ephesians.

The Holy Spirit, who had spoken by St. Paul in that Epistle, now speaks by St. Peter to the Jewish Christians of the same country. He proclaims here the same doctrines; and applies them in the same way to the inculcation of the same duties, and almost in the same language as He had done by the agency of St. Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians.

He declares, that our Regeneration, and filial Adoption in Christ, by the Love of our heavenly Father, sending His only begotten Son to take our nature, and to incorporate us into Himself, and to reconcile us to God by His blood shed for us on the Cross, are the very source and well-spring of all Christian Duty, of man to God, and of man to man; of subjects to kings; of servants to masters; of wives to husbands; and of husbands to wives; and are the origin of all personal holiness, and of all comfort under sufferings on earth, and of all hope of future glory and endless felicity in heaven.

This great argument had been handled by the Apostle of the Gentiles, St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Gentile Christians of Asia [1]; it is now treated by the Apostle of the Circumcision, St. Peter, in this Epistle to the Jewish Christians of the same country [2].

Thus the consent of Apostolic Teaching on the fundamental verities of Christian Faith and Practice is manifested to the world.

This brotherly unity exhibits itself also in incidents of a private character.

The person chosen by St. Peter to be the bearer of this Epistle to the Asiatic Churches is Silvanus [3]. Silas, or Silvanus, had been taken by St. Paul as his companion in his second missionary tour in Asia [4]; and he had been associated by that Apostle with himself in writing his two earliest Epistles [5].

St. Peter's choice of Silvanus as a messenger for the conveyance of this Epistle to the Jewish Christians of Asia Minor, and his designation of him "as the faithful brother," are happy expressions of his own love, not only to Silvanus, but to St. Paul.

The value of this testimony is enhanced by the addition of another name to that of Silvanus, at the close of this Epistle. Silvanus, "the faithful brother," is joined with "Marcus my son [6]."

Some years before, St. Paul had declined to take Mark with him into Asia, because Mark "had formerly departed from him in Pamphylia [1];" and the person who was then taken by St. Paul with him into Asia, in the place of Mark, was no other than Silas,—as he is called in the Acts,—or, as he is called by St. Paul, Silvanus [2]. But now St. Mark had returned to the work, and was in much esteem with St. Paul [3]; and he is honoured by St. Peter with the affectionate title—"Marcus my son."

Here then we have another indication of the fraternal relation of St. Peter to St. Paul; and of the graces of love, joy, and peace shed by the Holy Spirit on their hearts, and on those of their friends; graces which soothed every angry passion, and joined them together in Christ.

The Second Epistle of St. Peter was written soon after the first, and it was addressed to the same persons as the First Epistle [4]; and the reference which he makes at its close to "all the Epistles" of his "beloved brother Paul," and the testimony which he bears to his wisdom, and to the divine inspiration of those Epistles [5], complete the evidence of St. Peter's affectionate regard for the Apostle of the Gentiles; and of his perfect agreement with him in the holy doctrine which he taught.

Finally, Almighty God, Who had called these two great Pastors of His flock, and had assigned to each of them his proper work, in tending and feeding the sheep which He had purchased to Himself with the precious blood of His dear Son, was pleased to bring them together in their old age to the same place [6].

That place was the capital of the world, Rome [7]. The Apostle of the Circumcision was united there with the Apostle of the Gentiles in a blessed martyrdom for Christ; and thus the great Head of the Church vouchsafed to manifest to the world their perfect brotherhood in life, doctrine, and death; and He commended their example to the imitation of all Pastors and People; and taught the world, by their means, that temporary failings of our frail humanity may, under the gracious influence of the Holy Ghost, be corrected by watchfulness and prayer, humility, gentleness, meekness, and charity; and be made occasions of spiritual victories; and He has displayed a cheering vision of that blessed consummation, when Jew and Gentile will be brought together into one fold under one Shepherd, Jesus Christ our Lord.

Ch. I. 1. Πέτρος, ἀπόστολος] Peter, an Apostle of Jesus Christ, to the elect sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.

Concerning the authorship and design of this Epistle see the Introduction.

They, to whom St. Peter writes, are addressed as elect:

The Jews gloried in being the elect people of God (see Deut. iv. 37; vii. 6. Ps. cv. 6. 43); and St. Peter assures them that by becoming Christians, they do not cease to be God's favoured people, but are a chosen generation in Christ. (See ii. 9.)

He also declares that they are at home in Christ's Church, although they are sojourners and strangers in the world (παρεπίδημος = πάροικος, Hesych.), being removed far away from Jerusalem and Judæa, as their fathers were, by their exile in Babylon, from which place St. Peter is now writing; and although they are scattered abroad in many heathen lands.

Upon this their condition as pilgrims in this world he grounds an admonition to them as strangers and sojourners (ii. 11; cp. Heb. xi. 13) to abstain from fleshly lusts, having their conversation, or intercourse, honest among the Gentiles, among whom they are commingled in their Dispersions, and to set their affections on their heavenly inheritance, their "promised land" above. Cp. Phil. iii. 20. Heb. xiii. 14.

He addresses them all as elect, according to the foreknowledge of God: and thus he teaches, that all members of the visible Church, who profess the Faith, and partake in the Sacraments, of Christ, are to be regarded by men as elect, and foreknown by God in Christ. Vocation presupposes election; and wherever we see men called, we are to presume them to be elect.

In the same manner St. Paul addresses the Ephesian Christians, as chosen in Christ by God the Father, before the foundation of the world, and as predestined to the adoption of sons in the Beloved, according to the gracious purpose of God's will in Him. See on Eph. i. 3—5, and the Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans, p. 195.

But though the members of the Visible Church are elect, and are addressed by the Apostles as such, they are not yet finally assured of salvation; but they are exhorted by St. Peter "to give diligence to make their calling and election sure." (2 Pet. i. 10.)

— Πόντου] of Pontus; placed first among the Asiatic regions here specified; whence this First Epistle of St. Peter is cited by some ancient Fathers as addressed "ad Ponticos." Tertullian, Scorp. c. 12. Cyprian, Lib. Test. iii. 36, 37.

— Πόντου, Γαλατίας, κ.τ.λ.] of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. The Jewish Christians to whom St. Peter writes in his two Epistles (as is affirmed by the ancient Expositors, Euseb. iii. 4, Didymus in loc., Hieron. Cat. Scr. i., Œcumenius, and others) are specially those of the Asiatic dispersion (see here and 2 Pet. iii. 1); and he enumerates them in the order in which they would occur to the mind of a writer addressing them from the east. (See below on v. 13.) This consideration confirms the opinion, that Babylon, from which this Epistle is dated (v. 13), is not any city west of Asia Minor, as Rome, but the literal, Assyrian, Babylon. See Introduction, p. 37.

This observation is illustrated and confirmed by a passage in the writings of St. Peter's brother Apostle, St. John. St. John, writing his Revelation from Patmos to the Christian Churches of Asia, specifies them in their geographical order, from West to East (see Rev. i. 11; ii. 1; iii. 14, inclusive). Here they are reckoned by St. Peter in the opposite order, i. e. from East to West. St. John was writing from the West of Asia, namely, from Patmos; St. Peter is writing from the East, namely, from Babylon. Hence the difference.

St. Peter, on the Day of Pentecost, at Jerusalem, had preached to the various Dispersions of Jews who had come up to Jerusalem to that Feast. (Acts ii. 9—14.) Those several Dispersions are thus enumerated in the Acts of the Apostles:—

(1) Parthians, Medes, &c., i. e. the Babylonish Dispersion.

(2) Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia; i. e. the Asiatic Dispersion.

(3) Ægypt, and the parts of Libya toward Cyrene; i. e. the Alexandrine Dispersion.

(4) Strangers of Rome; those especially which had been carried thither by Pompey the Great.

See above, note on Acts ii. 9—11.

St. Peter, as a wise master-builder, is now consolidating the work which, by the aid of the Holy Ghost, he had begun at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. He does this as follows:—

(1) He went in person to Babylon (v. 13), and edified the Assyrian Dispersion of Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia.

(2) From Babylon, he wrote this Epistle to the Asiatic Dispersion of the strangers scattered abroad in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia, i. e. Proconsular Asia. See above on Acts xvi. 6; xix. 10; and below on Rev. i. 4.

(3) He afterwards sent St. Mark, Marcus his son (v. 13), to reach to the Ægyptian, or Alexandrine, Dispersion. See above, Introduction to St. Mark's Gospel, p. 112.

(4) Finally, he himself strengthened the faith of the Roman Dispersion, by visiting Rome, and dying as a martyr there.

Thus St. Peter completed the work which he had begun on the day of Pentecost. Thus this Fisher of men (Luke v. 10) drew the net of the Gospel through the sea of the world to the shore of eternal life, and enclosed therein a large multitude, and finished the labour, symbolized by the miraculous draught of fishes, after the Resurrection of Christ. See above on John xxi. 1—14; and Introduction to this Epistle, pp. 36—40.

2. ἐν ἁγιασμῷ Πνεύματος] by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. See next note.

— εἰς ὑπακοὴν καὶ ῥαντισμὸν αἵματος] unto hearkening to the Gospel, and joyful acceptance of it (see Rom. i. 5; xv. 18; and below, vv. 14. 22), and unto the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. St. Peter had begun with a recital of privileges; here is a declaration of duty. Ye are elect, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, Whose paternal love is the source of all good to men; but ye are elect, not to any presumptuous self-assurance, much less to any recklessness of living; but ye are elect to hearkening unto His word; ye are elect to obedience; or, as St. Paul expresses it (Eph. i. 3—5), ye are elect and predestined to holiness in love, to the praise and glory of His grace; ye are elect to the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ, which was once shed on the cross, and was actually and personally applied to you by the sanctifying operation of the Holy Spirit, and was sprinkled on you, the covenanted people of God; as the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean under the Law, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh. See Heb. ix. 12—14, and compare x. 22. Exod. xxiv. 8.

That blood was sprinkled upon you, and was made effectual for your salvation, when you professed your faith in Christ, Who sprinkleth many nations (Isa. lii. 15), and cleanseth from all sin (1 John i. 7); and when you received the Sacrament of Baptism, which derives its efficacy from Christ's blood; and it is ever and anon sprinkled on you,—at your sincere repentance,—in the administration of the Holy Communion of His body and blood, and saves you, the true Israel of God, from the wrath to come, as the blood of the Paschal Lamb, when sprinkled on the lintels and door-posts of the Israelites, procured their deliverance from destruction (see Exod. xii. 22, 23); and it makes atonement with God for your sins, as the sprinkling of the Blood of the sin-offerings, which was sprinkled seven times before the Lord, i. e. towards the veil (Lev. iv. 4—6); and on the great day of atonement was sprinkled within the Veil, upon, and before, the Mercy Seat. Lev. xvi. 14.

For, as St. Paul says to the Ephesians, they have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace.

These blessings, which flow from the love of God the Father, through the mediation of God the Son, are applied personally to each believer by the sanctification of the Spirit,—God the Holy Ghost.

Thus, as is observed by Cassiodorus, each of the Three Persons of the ever-Blessed Trinity is here presented to us by the Apostle, as co-operating in the work of our salvation. Compare the words of St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 13, "God from the beginning chose you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth, whereunto He called you by our Gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ," and Eph. ii. 17, 18; and note on 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

The preamble of St. Paul's Epistle to the greatest Church of Asia, Ephesus, bears a remarkable resemblance, in the exuberant flow, and majestic splendour of its diction, and in the sublime grandeur of its substance, to that of this Epistle of his brother Apostle, St. Peter, to the Jewish Christians of the same country. These two Epistles throughout present clear evidence of the unity of teaching of the two Apostles on the doctrines of Universal Redemption, Election, and Predestination. See above on Eph. i. 1—3, and the Introduction to this Epistle of St. Peter, p. 43, and below, Introduction to the second Epistle.

— χάρις—πληθυνθείη] Grace to you and Peace be multiplied.

This salutation of the Apostle from Babylon recalls to the mind the greeting sent forth from the same City to all its provinces, by the two Kings of the two successive Dynasties,—the Assyrian and Medo-Persian,—under the influence of the Prophet Daniel, and other faithful men of the first Dispersion. They proclaimed in their royal Epistles the supremacy of the One true God, the God of Israel. "Nebuchadnezzar the king to all people . . . to you Peace be multiplied" (εἰρήνη ὑμῖν πληθυνθείη, Dan. iv. 1). Darius the king wrote to all people, "to you Peace be multiplied." (Dan. vi. 25.)

Daniel and the three children turned the hearts of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius, and moved them to declare the glory of the true God in Letters written "to all people." The Apostle St. Peter now carries on the work of the ancient Prophets, and writes an Epistle from Babylon, by which he builds up the Christian Sion in all ages of the world (cp. 2 Pet. i. 1, 2, and below on v. 13), and proclaims to all, "Peace be multiplied unto you!"

On this Oriental salutation, very suitable to be used in an Epistle from the East, see Schoettgen here.

Grace is put before Peace, because Peace is the fruit of Grace.

3. εὐλογητός] Blessed be God, Who is also the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and Who of His great mercy has begotten us again to a living hope, through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

God the Father is the Fountain of all Blessing; and all Blessing descends through God the Son; and is applied by God the Holy Ghost; and so St. Paul teaches, Eph. i. 3—17; cp. note above, 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

St. Peter presents to us the three several ways in which we are sons of God. He is our Father—

(1) By Creation. (See v. 2.)

(2) By our New Birth in Baptism, when the Blood of Christ was sprinkled on us, and we were delivered from death. (See v. 2.)

(3) And now we, who have been already born again into a life of Grace, are born again into a living hope of future and everlasting Glory, by the Resurrection of Christ.

By that Resurrection, we, who are in Christ, our Representative and Head, were publicly declared by God to be pardoned and accepted; for He rose again for our Justification. (See on Rom. iv. 25.) We are already the sons of God, and "we know that, when He appears, we shall be like Him." (1 John iii. 2.) We have been baptized into His death,—that is, into conformity to it, and to a participation n its benefits; and if we have become connate, or born together (σύμφυτοι), with Him by the likeness of His Death, we shall also be born together with Him in the likeness of His Resurrection. See above on Rom. vi. 5. Cp. Bp. Andrewes, ii. pp. 198. 266. 322; and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. i. p. 50; and on the analogies between Birth, and Baptism, and Resurrection, see below, Rev. xx. 5.

— εἰς ἐλπίδα ζῶσαν] to a living hope: to a hope that liveth; and which, as living, and bearing fruit, is contrasted with the state of death in which we once were, "having no hope, and being without God in the world" (Eph. ii. 12), "and having fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph. v. 11).

This is the hope which springs forth from the Grave, by the Resurrection of Christ our "First-fruits" (1 Cor. xv. 20), Who "was dead and is alive and liveth for evermore" (Rev. i. 18).

This hope therefore never dies, as earthly hopes do; and, it is not like the hope of those among your fathers, who looked only for an earthly Canaan (Theophyl.), but the hope of the true Israel is a hope which is ever growing, till it is consummated in everlasting fruition in the heavenly Jerusalem; and by "this hope we are saved" (Rom. viii. 24).

3, 4.] On these two verses see the exposition of Bp. Andrewes, Sermons, vol. ii. pp. 364—382.

4. εἰς κληρονομίαν ἄφθαρτον] to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, unfading: the first of these epithets concerns the inner being of the inheritance; the second, its unalloyed being; the third, the continuance of its beauty. The Heavenly Inheritance is perfect in every one of these three respects; but all earthly inheritances are imperfect in them all. Cp. Bp. Andrewes, ii. p. 378.

The inheritance of the earthly Canaan was an object of earnest desire to your fathers; and they were settled in the allotments of their κληρονομία by Joshua; but you, though scattered abroad, have a better inheritance than they, an inheritance typified by theirs, and one in which the true Joshua will settle you for ever.

Didymus (the master of St. Jerome) in his note on this passage says, "Since the inheritance which the Apostle here propounds to our desires is in heaven, and is eternal, surely they (the Millenarians), who put before us the hope of an earthly Jerusalem for a thousand years, propose to us what is unsatisfying and vain."

— τετηρημένην] reserved in heaven for you, or unto you.

The Inheritance is reserved; therefore do not look for it now; but wait patiently, and strive earnestly for it; and it is reserved in heaven, and therefore it is safe from all changes and chances of earth (cp. 2 Tim. iv. 8). God Himself is your portion. Here is another contrast to the hopes of those who have their portion in this life. Ps. xvii. 14. Cp. Bp. Sanderson's Sermons, i. p. 379.

5. τοὺς ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ φρουρουμένους] you who are being guarded by the power of God; as sheep are safely guarded in a fold against the wolf; or, as citizens are securely garrisoned in a fortress against the enemy, so ye are protected from your ghostly Enemy by the power of God, in the Fold and City of His Church. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it, and is safe" (Prov. xviii. 10). Salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks (Isaiah xxvi. 1). And ye are guarded, not as prisoners to be brought out εἰς ὄλεθρον, to execution, but ye are guarded for salvation: ye are caught and kept in the Net of the Church, but ye are there ζωγρούμενοι, caught and kept alive, and in order to live for ever (see on Luke v. 10). And ye are kept through faith; if ye hold fast the beginning of your confidence unto the end. (Heb. iii. 14.)

Faith is a second cause of your preservation; because it applies the first cause, which is the power of God. Cp. 1 John v. 4, and Abp. Leighton here.

6 ἐν ᾧ ἀγαλλιᾶσθε] in which ye exult; though now for a little while, if need be—for ye are not chastened by God without need, but for your profit—and He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men (Lam. iii. 33. Heb. xii. 10),—ye were grieved in manifold temptations.

Ye exult in the last season (cp. Œcumen.), because ye do not live in the present season, but ye look forward, and dwell by faith on the glory that shall be revealed in you hereafter (cp. v. 8), and ye compare its greatness with the light afflictions of this transitory time (Rom. viii. 18), which lead you on to, and qualify you for, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory (2 Cor. iv. 17), and ye "rejoice and are exceeding glad," even in persecution, because "great is your reward in heaven" (Matt. v. 10). "Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh" (Luke vi. 21).

— ποικίλοις πειρασμοῖς] by divers temptations, see James i. 2. By this phrase and by many others in the beginning of this Epistle, St. Peter connects his own Epistle with that of his brother Apostle, St. James. See Introduction to it, p. 12.

Some of these parallelisms between the two Epistles may be cited here.

These are the only two passages in the Epistles of the N. T. where the word παρακύπτω occurs.

St. Peter does not mention St. James by name; indeed the writers of Holy Scripture seem purposely to have abstained from lauding one another with personal eulogies. St. Peter's reference to St. Paul in his second Epistle (iii. 15), is an exception, produced by special considerations which render it more remarkable. See the note on that passage.

But St. Peter, in this Epistle, adopts much of the substance, and often the words, of St. James; and thus he shows his reverence for that Apostle, and commends his Epistle to the thankful acceptance and pious meditation of the Church; and gives a precept and example of unity to all Christians, and especially to Christian Ministers.

This remark may be extended to the allusions which St. Peter makes to St. Paul's Epistles.

Cp. i. 5	Gal. iii. 23.
i. 21	Rom. iv. 24.

This silent interweaving of one Apostolic Epistle with another, and of one Gospel with another (see Introduction to the Four Gospels, p. xlv), may serve to remind the Christian reader, that all the Books of the New Testament form one harmonious whole. They are like the coat of Christ, woven throughout, without seam (John xix. 23). Although written by the instrumentality of different men, they come from the same Divine Author,—the Holy Ghost.

7. ἵνα τὸ δοκίμιον] in order that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than gold, which is perishing (even in the using; cp. John vi. 27. Col. ii. 22), but is tried by fire, and is purified by it, and passes through the fire, and endures (cp. Job xxiii. 10. Prov. xvii. 3), may be found to redound to praise, and honour, and glory of God, the Giver of all the graces, by which you endure trial; and to your own praise and honour, and glory, and endless felicity in the day of the revelation of Jesus Christ the Judge of all.

A, C have πολυτιμότερον here, and so Griesb., Scholz, Tisch., Lach., Alf. That form is, indeed, in harmony with the style of St. Peter, who loves composite words. But B (see Mai), G, K, and Vulg., and the major part of the cursive MSS., and Clement, Origen, and the other Fathers, have πολὺ τιμιώτερον, and see the passage quoted below from S. Polycarp's Martyrdom.

Observe, it is the trial itself, δοκίμιον, which is said here to be more precious. Compare James i. 3, "the trial (δοκίμιον) of your faith by temptations worketh patience." Δοκίμιον is the test or touchstone by which a thing is tried (see the examples in Wetstein, p. 682). Hence it describes afflictions and calamities which are the trials of virtue; as here.

Some Interpreters suppose δοκίμιον here to mean the thing proved and purged by trial; the smelted ore of faith, tested and cleansed by the fire of affliction. But this seems to be rather a strained exposition. Δοκίμιον is the trial; it is not the residuum after suffering, but it is the suffering itself, which tries and proves (δοκιμάζει) the faith. St. Peter's words seem to be formed on those of the Psalmist, "Precious (τίμιος) in the sight of the Lord is the death of His Saints" (Ps. cxvi. 15). The Apostle appears to allude here to that passage, and to adopt the word τίμιος from it. Our very sufferings, which are our trials, even they are precious in God's sight, Who knows to what they lead. The trial, says Bp. Andrewes (v. p. 443), of our faith is more precious than gold, as in Abraham, or when He trieth our patience, as in Job; for while we live in this world, we are made a spectacle to men and angels (1 Cor. iv. 9).

Do not therefore imagine, that even your present trials are not glorious. They make you like to Christ, they are seen and prized by God. He putteth all your tears into His bottle, they are all noted in His book (Ps. lvi. 8. 10), and will one day redound to your everlasting glory.

St. Peter acted in the spirit of this declaration when he departed from the presence of the Jewish Council, rejoicing that he was counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake (Acts v. 41). For Christ had said, "Blessed are ye when men shall persecute you, Rejoice, and be exceeding glad" (Matt. v. 11, 12). And in a like spirit, Paul and Silas in prison, at midnight, sang praises to God (Acts xvi. 25), and St. Paul glories in tribulations (Rom. v. 3), and is exceeding joyful in them (2 Cor. vii. 4), and takes pleasure in persecutions for Christ (2 Cor. xii. 10). And St. Peter himself bids them rejoice, in that they are partakers of Christ's sufferings,—and if any one suffer as a Christian, let him glorify God (1 Pet. iv. 13—16).

In a like spirit of Evangelical piety, one of St. Peter's successors at Antioch, the Martyr S. Ignatius, calls his chains, his "spiritual pearls" (Ignat. Ephes. ii.), and S. Cyprian, speaking of the dress of Virgins, says, that when Christian women suffer Martyrdom with faith and courage, then their sufferings are like "pretiosa monilia," costly bracelets. The garb of suffering for Christ is a robe of beauty, precious in God's sight; far more lovely than any gilded attire; and therefore the instruments of torture by which the Martyrs suffered death (such as the sword of St. James the Great, and the fuller's club of St. James the Less, and the sword of St. Paul, the cross of St. Peter, and the lance of St. Thomas, and the gridiron of St. Laurence), are associated with them for ever in their pictures as the noblest badges of their glory. Cp. note below, v. 8.

This passage seems to be imitated by Hermas, "Aurea pars vos estis; sicut enim per ignem aurum probatur, et utile fit, sic et vos probamini; qui igitur permanserint et probati fuerint, ab eis purgabuntur; et sicut aurum emendatur, et remittit sordem suam, sic et vos abjicietis omnem tristitiam (ὀλίγον λυπηθέντες) et emendabimini in structuram turris." Hermas, Pastor, lib. i. Visio iv. p. 440, ed. Dressel.

See also Martyr. Polycarp. c. 15, and c. 18, where there is a description of the body of the holy Martyr in the flames, "like gold or silver tried in the furnace:" and after his decease his bones are gathered up as τιμιώτερα λίθων πολυτελῶν καὶ δοκιμώτερα ὑπὲρ χρυσόν.

The words of St. Peter are appropriately inserted by the Church of England in her Office for the Visitation of the Sick.

8. ὃν οὐκ ἰδόντες, ἀγαπᾶτε] Whom though ye saw Him not on earth, as I have done, ye love, as I do, John xxi. 15—17.

Elz. has εἰδότες with A, G, K, but ἰδόντες is in B, C, and several cursives, and in the Syriac, Æthiopic, and Arabic Versions; and St. Peter seems to refer to our Lord's saying, "Blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed" (John xx. 29), which he himself heard; and S. Polycarp thus quotes this passage in his Epistle to the Philippians (cap. i.), εἰς ὃν, οὐκ ἰδόντες (where the old translation has videntes) πιστεύετε, πιστεύοντες δὲ ἀγαλλιᾶσθε χαρᾷ ἀνεκλαλήτῳ καὶ δεδοξασμένῃ, εἰς ἣν πολλοὶ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν εἰσελθεῖν, εἰδότες ὅτι χάριτί ἐστε σεσωσμένοι, οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων, ἀλλὰ θελήματι Θεοῦ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. Cp. Eph. ii. 8, 9.

It is worthy of remark that this Apostolic father, S. Polycarp, a disciple of St. John, and a Bishop of a Church in Asia, Smyrna, blends together two passages from two Apostolic Epistles to the Christians in Asia,—namely, from this Epistle of St. Peter, and from St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. On S. Polycarp's references to this Epistle, see further below on v. 13.

S. Irenæus (iv. 9. 2) also, in the West, refers to this passage, "Petrus ait in Epistolâ suâ, Quem non videntes diligitis." And again (v. 7), "Quem, quùm non videritis, diligitis; in quem, nunc quoque, non videntes, creditis, credentes autem exultabitis gaudio inenarrabili."

— χαρᾷ—δεδοξασμένῃ] with joy unspeakable and glorified; with joy unutterable,—so great is it; and with joy even now invested with glory; such as shone in the face of the first Martyr St. Stephen, at his passion (Acts vi. 15), and such as shone in the raiment and countenance of our Lord Himself, which St. Peter saw, when Christ was conversing with Moses and Elias concerning His Death. See on Luke ix. 31.

St. Peter throughout this Epistle represents the present sufferings of the Christian as occasions for joy; he seems to write the Epistle with a vivid recollection of the glory which he saw at the Transfiguration, which revealed the splendour of Christ made perfect by sufferings, and of all Christians who suffer for Him; and which is reflected upon them, even in this life, by lively Faith in Him. Therefore, he adds, that even now they are receiving the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls. Even whilst they are sowing in tears, they see, with the eye of Faith, the future harvest of joy; even now they reap it with the hand of Hope.

He now proceeds to describe the blessedness of that Harvest of salvation through Christ; and proves its felicity by two arguments,

(1) that this salvation was the object of the earnest inquiries, and longing desire, of all the Ancient Prophets; and,

(2) that the Angels of heaven themselves desire to stoop down and look into it.

Be sure therefore, that the Gospel of Christ is not, as some of your Jewish fellow-countrymen allege, a novelty. No, the Hebrew Prophets inquired after it, and foretold it. And it is a thing of surpassing excellence, because they were employed in ministering to it; and the Angels of heaven are engaged in admiring it. Compare Abp. Leighton here.

9. σωτηρίαν ψυχῶν] the salvation of your souls. Your enemies imagine, that you lose your ψυχὰς (lives) by dying for Christ; but by so doing you save them. Matt. xvi. 25. Mark viii. 35. Luke ix. 24.

10. περὶ ἧς σωτηρίας] Concerning which salvation the Prophets, who prophesied concerning the grace of the Gospel which has come to you, did seek and search diligently. The Prophets of old prophesied, but were not enabled fully to understand and interpret their own prophecies. See below on 2 Pet. i. 20, 21, which text is the best comment on this passage. The Prophets had some intimation of the grace and glory which was to be revealed afterwards in the Gospel, which has been preached to you; and they were informed that they were ministering to you, and not to themselves, those things which are now declared to you by those who have preached the Gospel to you by the Holy Spirit Who spake of old in the Prophets, but has now been sent down from heaven to us. So great are your privileges. Cp. Matt. xiii. 17.

11, 12. ἐρευνῶντες] So great is the blessedness of the salvation purchased for you by the sufferings of Christ, and to be obtained by you, treading in the road of suffering, which led Him to glory, that the ancient Prophets searched and inquired diligently, to what season and what kind of season (whether one of distress or joy, Theophyl.), the Spirit of Christ that was in them was pointing, when it was testifying beforehand the sufferings that were appointed for Christ (Winer, p. 174), and were to be laid upon Christ (εἰς Χριστὸν), on whom "God laid the iniquities of us all;" for, "He bare our griefs and carried our sorrows" (Isa. liii. 4—6); and the glories (plural, both of Him and of us) that would follow after, as fruits and rewards of those sufferings: see Phil. ii. 8, 9. Rom. xiv. 9. Col. ii. 15. Heb. ii. 9, 10. 14; ix. 7—13: and cp. the exposition of Œcumenius, Erasmus, Hottinger, Knapp, and others.

The Spirit of CHRIST, Who is the everlasting LOGOS, and declares God's will (John i. 1. 18) by the Holy Ghost, spake in the Prophets concerning His sufferings and glory.

"The divine Prophets," says Ignatius (ad Magnes. 8), "lived according to Jesus Christ, being inspired by His grace." The Prophets pre-announced the Gospel, and had their hopes fixed on Christ, and waited for Him, and by belief in Him they were saved. They were in the unity of Christ; and were attested by Christ, and were numbered together with us in the Gospel, which is the common hope of all. S. Ignatius (ad Phil. 5). Cp. Justin Martyr, Apolog. i. p. 49; ii. p. 76; and compare Didymus here, who refers to Matt. xiii. 17. Heb. xi. 26.

Here therefore is a clear proof of Christ's Pre-existence and Godhead. "The very Truth itself, the Son of God, the Mediator of God and Man, the Man Christ Jesus, spake first by the Prophets, then by Himself, and afterwards by His Apostles," says S. Augustine, de Civ. Dei (xi. 2).

St. Peter here asserts the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, as well as from the Father. See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. viii. pp. 601, 602, and notes; and above, notes on John xv. 26.

The Holy Spirit presignified by the Prophets that the Messiah should suffer, and so enter into His glory. (Luke xxiv. 26.)

St. Peter himself had once been slow to admit this truth. "That be far from Thee!" he had said to Christ, and had been rebuked by Him for that remonstrance. (Matt. xvi. 22, 23.)

But his eyes were now enlightened by the Holy Ghost; and he who had endeavoured to dissuade Christ from suffering, rose up after the day of Pentecost, and declared to all the people at Jerusalem, that "these things which God before had showed by the mouth of all His Prophets that Christ should suffer, He hath so fulfilled" (see Acts iii. 18). He now preaches this truth to the world; and he refers to his own illumination by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven on the day of Pentecost, Who enabled him to interpret the Prophecies of the Old Testament (see below on 2 Pet. i. 20, 21), and to preach those things which the Prophets were ministering of old, not to themselves, but to the Church, and which they desired to see (Matt. xiii. 17); and which the Angels themselves longed to look into.

Thus St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, vindicates the Gospel of Christ from Jewish allegations that it was a new religion, and that it was contrary to the Law and the Prophets; as his brother Apostle St. Paul has done in the Epistle to the Romans (see Introduction, pp. 186—198), and in the Epistle to the Hebrews (see Introduction, pp. 366—368).

On the sense of the word παρακύψαι, to bend aside, and stoop, and rivet the eyes down upon, see James i. 25; and the citation of this passage by S. Hippolytus, who reads ἐγκύψαι, p. 220, Mai, p. 185, Lagarde. And on the wonderful announcement, that the Angels themselves derive heavenly knowledge from the Holy Scriptures, in the hands of the Church, see above on Eph. iii. 10; and cp. 1 Tim. iii. 16.

This high and holy Mystery, which represents the Angels themselves bending over the Word of God enshrined in the Ark of the Church, was symbolized by the figures of the Cherubim of Glory spreading their wings, and bending their faces, and shadowing the Mercy seat, in the Holy of Holies, upon the Ark, in which were kept the Tables of the Law written by God (Exod. xxv. 18—22. Heb. ix. 4, 5); and by the side of which was the Pentateuch. Deut. xxxi. 24—26.

St. Peter's declaration that the Prophets were ministering to us (διηκόνουν), is adopted by S. Hippolytus (de Antichristo, c. 31), addressing the Prophets, τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγια διηκονήσατε πάσαις γενεαῖς. Cp. his Philosophumena, p. 336, in his imitation of 2 Pet. i. 20, quoted below on that passage.

12. ὑμῖν] So A, B, C, G, and Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf. Elz. has ἡμῖν.

13. διὸ ἀναζωσάμενοι] Wherefore,—since the salvation purchased for you is so glorious a prize,—gird up the loins of your mind. He keeps up the metaphor of pilgrims, i. 1; see also ii. 11. Gird up the loins of your mind. Keep your affections from trailing on the earth (cp. Phil. iii. 20). And be sober, and hope constantly: run onward, as it were, on the wings of hope, in your Christian course, unto the grace which is being brought to you—it is not of your own earning, but a free gift of God, "to which ye bring nothing but thirst," cp. Rev. xxii. 17—in the revelation of Jesus Christ: cp. 2 Pet. iii. 12, σπεύδοντες τὴν παρουσίαν.

He addresses them as strangers, journeying onward in hope to their home, and exhorts them to gird up the loins of their mind, and to have a clear intellectual view of the glory which is before them, and a resolute endeavour of volition to attain it. On this twofold sense of διάνοια, see Matt. xxii. 37. Eph. ii. 3; iv. 18. Col. i. 21. Heb. viii. 10. 2 Pet. iii. 1. 1 John v. 20.

So S. Polycarp, writing to the Philippians, c. 2, ἀναζωσάμενοι τὰς ὀσφύας ὑμῶν δουλεύσατε τῷ Θεῷ . . . ἀπολιπόντες τὴν κενὴν ματαιολογίαν, πιστεύσαντες εἰς τὸν ἐγείραντα τὸν Κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν (see v. 21), καὶ δόντα αὐτῷ δόξαν . . . ὁ δὲ ἐγείρας αὐτὸν καὶ ἡμᾶς ἐγερεῖ, ἐὰν ποιεύμεθα ἐν ταῖς ἐντολαῖς αὐτοῦ, ἀπεχόμενοι πάσης ἀδικίας.

It is interesting to observe, that S. Polycarp, the disciple of St. John, and Bishop of Smyrna, the great city of Asia, appears to have been familiar with the present Epistle of St. Peter (as Eusebius has observed, iv. 14), the beloved friend and companion of St. John, who governed the Asiatic Churches, and lived and died at Ephesus. (Acts iii. 1. 3. 11; viii. 14.) S. Polycarp's testimony to it is more important, because this Epistle is addressed to the Churches of Asia. He often adopts its words, and incorporates them in his own Epistle (see here and below, ii. 11, 12. 17. 22. 24; iv. 7); as he does also St. Paul's Epistle to the Asiatic Church of Ephesus. Cp. Eph. ii. 8, with Polycarp, Ep. c. 1; Eph. iv. 26, with Polycarp, c. 12; and Eph. v. 1, with Polycarp, c. 2.

— τελείως ἐλπίσατε] hope ye perfectly, without any wavering of doubt, and with perseverance to the end. Observe the aorist, ἐλπίσατε. Their whole life is to be one act of hope. On this use of the aorist, see below, v. 2.

— φερομένην] being borne: present tense. Hope ye on to the grace that is being borne toward you, in and by the Revelation of Jesus Christ. Christ is ever at hand; He is ever bringing grace and glory to you; and ye must ever be hastening on to Him with hope and desire.

14. τέκνα ὑπακοῆς] children of obedience; to whom Obedience is as a mother, communicating her nature to yours; and thus ye are prepared to invoke God as your Father, v. 17; contrast κατάρας τέκνα, 2 Pet. ii. 14.

— μὴ συσχηματιζόμενοι] not conforming yourselves to your former lusts. An allusion probably to St. Paul's precept, Rom. xii. 2, which is further imitated below, ii. 5.

— ἐν τῇ ἀγνοίᾳ ὑμῶν] in your ignorance. See Eph. iv. 14. This word ἄγνοια, ignorance, may seem to intimate that this portion of the Epistle is addressed also to Gentiles. Many of St. Peter's readers were proselytes, and had been Gentiles. But ignorance is also predicated of the Jews. See Matt. xxii. 29; xxiii. 16—24. John ix. 39. Acts iii. 17. Rom. ii. 4; x. 3; xi. 25. 2 Cor. iii. 14. 1 Tim. i. 13. Indeed, all, whether Jew or Gentile, are in a state of ignorance, before they come to Christ. Cp. below on v. 18, and ii. 10.

15. ἀλλά] nay, rather.

16. ἔσεσθε] ye shall be. So A, B, C, and Lach., Tisch., Alf. Elz. has γένεσθε.

17. καὶ εἰ Πατέρα ἐπικαλεῖσθε] and if—(as ye do in the Lord's Prayer: cp. on Acts xxi. 14, as to its primitive use)—ye call upon Him as Father, Who judgeth without respect of persons according to each man's work, pass ye the time of your sojourning here in fear. "Meditemur timorem Dei; Dominus non acceptâ personâ judicat mundum: unusquisque secundùm quod facit accipiet." S. Barnabas (Ep. 4).

Here is a connected series of arguments and motives to holiness, derived from a consideration,

(1) Of the holy nature of Him Whom we invoke as Father, Whose children we are, Whom therefore we are bound to imitate and to obey.

(2) Of His office as Judge, rewarding every man according to his work; Whom therefore we ought to fear.

(3) Of Christ's office as Redeemer, and of His nature as an all-holy Redeemer, paying the costly price of His own blood to ransom us from a state of unholiness, and purchasing us to Himself with His blood. Therefore we are not our own, but His; and being His, bought by His blood, we owe Him, Who is the Holy One, the service of love and holiness. See above on 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20. Eph. i. 7. 14; and cp. Clem. Rom. i. 7, ἀτενίσωμεν εἰς τὸ αἷμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, καὶ ἴδωμεν ὡς ἔστι τίμιον τῷ Θεῷ πατρὶ αὐτοῦ, ὅτι διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν σωτηρίαν ἐκχυθέν. Cp. S. Augustine, Serm. 36.

(4) Of our transitory condition in this life. On the special allusion in παροικία, sojourning, see below, ii. 11.

(5) Of the gift of the Spirit of holiness.

(6) Of our new birth by the living Word of God.

See Matt. xx. 28. Mark x. 45. Rom. iii. 24. Eph. i. 7. 14. Heb. ix. 12. 1 Tim. ii. 6.

Know you not that Christ redeemed you, not by silver or gold, but by His precious blood? You have been redeemed by Him, and therefore you owe Him service as your Lord and as your Redeemer. S. Ambrose, de Isaac, c. 3.

He is a Lamb without blemish and without spot; "white, and yet ruddy," says the spouse in the Canticles (v. 10); white in spotless innocency, red in His bloody death, and He is her well beloved, because He redeemed her thereby. Cp. Abp. Leighton here.

— πατροπαραδότου] delivered by your fathers—a passage which has been supposed by some to intimate that this Epistle, designed primarily for Jewish Christians, was intended for Gentile Christians also. Cp. ii. 10; iv. 3. Doubtless many of St. Peter's readers had been originally Gentiles, and had then become Jewish Proselytes, and so passed into the Church. The Proselytes were the "seminarium Ecclesiæ." See Introduction to the Acts, p. 9. But this statement of the Apostle may also have been designed to declare to the Jewish Christians that all their ἀναστροφή, or conversation, as delivered to them by tradition from their fathers, was vain without Christ, Who redeemed them from the curse of the Law (see Gal. iii. 13), and delivered them from the yoke which, as St. Peter himself says (Acts xv. 10), neither they nor their fathers were able to bear. Cp. above on v. 14.

The numerous quotations in this Epistle from the Hebrew Scriptures (cp. v. 24), show that it was not addressed to Gentiles. Cp. note above, on 1 Thess. i. 9.

19. ἀμώμου] without blemish: as the sacrifices offered under the Law were required to be. Levit. iii. 1. 6; xiv. 10; xxi. 18; xxii. 20. Num. vi. 14. He tells them that this Lamb without blemish, the Lamb of God, was anterior to all sacrifices of the Levitical Ritual; that He was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world (cp. Rev. xiii. 8); and that therefore the Gospel is not a new religion (as the Jews alleged), but older than the Law; and he declares that they are delivered by the blood of Christ the true Passover (John xix. 36. 1 Cor. v. 7), as their fathers were from the destroying Angel by the blood of the Paschal Lamb. Exod. xii. 13.

Observe the distinction between ἀμώμου and ἀσπίλου. Christ, the true Passover (1 Cor. v. 7), had no blemish of sin in Himself, nor did he contract any stain, or spot of sin, from the world.

20. προεγνωσμένου] foreknown. Cp. St. Peter's language on the same subject in his speech in Acts ii. 23.

— ἐσχάτου] So A, B, C. On this substantive sense of ἐσχάτου, see Acts i. 8; xiii. 47. Elz. has ἐσχάτων.

Christ was manifest in the last times (see Heb. i. 2), in the end of the world (Heb. ix. 26). The Paschal Lamb was slain in the evening. (Exod. xii. 6.)

On the meaning of πιστοὺς εἰς Θεὸν, see on Matt. xviii. 6. James ii. 19.

22. ἀληθείας] Elz. has διὰ Πνεύματος, not in A, B, C.

— ἐκτενῶς] earnestly, intensely. Let your love for one another be ἐκτενὴς, stretched out continuously and intently, without interruption or relaxation. See below on iv. 8.

23. ἀναγεγεννημένοι] having been born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the Word of God which liveth and endureth for ever.

Λόγου is not to be coupled with Θεοῦ, but with ζῶντος (so Didymus, Luther, Bengel, De Wette, Huther, and others), in contrast with σπορᾶς φθαρτῆς, corruptible seed; and the participles are thus placed for the sake of emphasis, to declare that the Word here mentioned, is not like man's word, a thing that dies and disappears, but that it is the Word of God; the Word that liveth and abideth. So ii. 4, λίθον ζῶντα, the stone that liveth; namely, Christ.

St. Peter reminds them that they had been born again of incorruptible seed, even of God Himself; as St. John says, "they were the sons of God, because they believed on His Name, and had been born, not of blood, nor of the will of man, but of God." (John i. 12, 13.)

God had made them His own children in Christ by virtue—

(1) Of Christ's eternal Sonship;

(2) Of His Incarnation; and

(3) Of their Faith and baptismal Incorporation in Him.

For Christ was sent "that He might bring many sons to God" (Heb. ii. 10); so that Christ says to the Father, "Behold, here am I, and the children which God hath given Me" (Isa. viii. 18); and so "per Filium filii," by this Son they are sons. Bp. Andrewes (i. p. 298). Thus was Christ born in Sion (Ps. lxxxvii. 4), and He is even born in the Morians' Land; for in every place that receiveth the Word of Him Who is the Incarnate Word of God, there is He born. (See ibid. pp. 298, 299.) Cp. 1 John iii. 1.

They are born again of God, διὰ λόγου ζῶντος, through the living Word; that is, through the Word preached, and especially through Christ the Incarnate Word. As Didymus here says, "The Word is living and abiding; that Word which was in the beginning with God, the Word of God." Our first birth is by Adam, our second birth is by Christ.

Some Expositors here limit the Word to the Word written or preached.

But though this sense was doubtless in the Apostle's mind when he wrote this passage, yet it seems an error to suppose that this was all that was in his mind.

Christ is the Word (John i. 1). "His Name is the Word of God." Rev. xix. 13. By virtue of His Eternal Sonship, and by the condescension of the Word to become flesh, and to pitch His tent in our Nature (John i. 14), and to become our Emmanuel, God manifested in our flesh (1 Tim. iii. 16), and by our faith and baptismal incorporation in Him, we are born again. As to our flesh, considered in itself, we are but grass, and all our glory is as the flower of grass. But since our flesh has become the flesh of Him Who is the Word of God, and Who liveth for ever, we are partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4); and if we endeavour to be holy as He is holy, we shall be partakers of His glory.

On examining carefully the chapter of Isaiah—the fortieth—which St. Peter is quoting here, we see reason for believing that these truths were in St. Peter's mind when he wrote these words; and we shall be confirmed in this opinion by the consideration that one of the main purposes of this Epistle is to show the benefits which result to all mankind from the Eternal Sonship of the Word of God, and from His susception of our Flesh. Isaiah is first pre-announcing the preparatory witness of "the Voice crying in the wilderness," and he contrasts that transitory testimony of the Voice with the permanence of Him Who is the Word; he contrasts the ministry of him who prepared the way of our God with the Eternity of Him Who is the Way (John xiv. 6); he is contrasting the perishable nature of human flesh, which is as grass, and the goodliness of it as the flower of the field, with the glory of the Lord—the glory of Him Who is the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth (John i. 14), and with the glory of the salvation which all flesh should see revealed in Him. . . Behold your God! v. 9.

He then passes on to describe Him as a Judge, and the Shepherd of His flock (vv. 10, 11).

That portion of Holy Scripture, which is fitly appointed by the Church as the Epistle for St. John Baptist's Day, is a prophecy of the Incarnation of Christ, the Everlasting God, and of His offices to us, and of our blessedness in Him. St. Peter, in citing that prophecy here, doubtless intended that it should serve as a commentary on his own words, and be used to elucidate them; and that his words, on their part, should also illustrate that prophecy. It would seem, therefore, to be a narrow view of his meaning, to imagine that he intended here to speak only of God's Word as preached or written.

It is, unhappily, a characteristic of modern Biblical interpretation, to pare down the rich exuberance and beautiful efflorescence of Holy Scripture, and to lop off and amputate its ramifications of meaning, and—if we may venture so to speak—to reduce them to the bare trunk and stunted pollard of one signification.

In this way, much of the goodliness and fruitfulness of Scripture is in danger of being lost to the present generation.

The Apostles and Evangelists proceeded on a very different plan in interpreting the Old Testament, and in expounding our Lord's words. They do not confine them to one sense only. Thus St. Matthew applies the prophecy of Isaiah (liii. 4) to Christ's acts of mercy to the body; and St. Peter adapts it to His vicarious and expiatory sufferings for the salvation of their souls. (Cp. Matt. viii. 17. 1 Pet. ii. 24.) Cp. Acts xiii. 33, with Heb. i. 5; v. 5.

St. John quotes our Lord's saying, which the Evangelist himself had recorded (John xvii. 12), "Those whom Thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost," and which was spoken of their faith and adherence to Him; and applies it to the care which Christ took of the safety of His disciples, when He Himself was arrested in the Garden. (John xviii. 9.)

The primitive Interpreters of Holy Scripture pursued a similar method of exposition, and many of our own Divines, who were reared under their discipline, followed in their steps.

Thus Dean Jackson, commenting on this passage, says, "If Christ's flesh and blood be the seed of Immortality, how are we said to be born again by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever? Is this Word, by which we are born, the same with that immortal seed of which we are born? It is the same, not in nature but in person. May we not, in that speech of St. Peter, by the Word, understand the word preached unto us by the Ministers who are God's seedsmen? In a secondary sense we may, for we are begotten and born again by preaching, as by the instrument or means. Yet born again we are by the Eternal Word (that is, by Christ Himself), as by the proper and efficient cause of our new birth . . . And Christ Himself, Who was put to death for our sins, and raised again for our justification, is the Word which we all do or ought to preach.

"The Son of God manifested in the flesh, was that Word which, in St. Peter's language, is preached by the Gospel. And if we do not preach this Word unto our hearers,—if all our sermons do not tend to one of these two ends, either to instruct our auditors in the articles of their creed concerning Christ, or to prepare their ears and hearts that they may be fit auditors of such instructions, we do not preach the Gospel unto them, we take upon us the name of God's ambassadors, or of the ministers of the Gospel, in vain." (Dean Jackson on the Creed, book vii. ch. xxviii. vol. vii. p. 270.)

See also A Lapide here, who says, "This sense is a genuine and sublime one; because in our Regeneration, Christ Himself is personally communicated to us, so that the Deity thenceforth dwells in us as in a Temple, and we are made partakers of the Divine Nature, 2 Pet. i. 4." Cp. note above on James i. 18—21.

The Word preached is the preparatory instrument for the conveyance of the divine principle of life, which flowing from God in Christ, is infused into the heart of man by means of the Holy Sacrament. It is the Ministry of the Word which brings men to the Sacraments: as was shown in the example of St. Peter himself, who preached to the Jews of the dispersion on the day of Pentecost, and then in answer to their question, "What shall we do?" he said, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the Name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." (Acts ii. 38.)

This order of things is not in any way at variance with what was done in the extraordinary case of Cornelius the first-fruits of the Gentiles, when the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word; and Peter said, "Can any forbid water, that these should not be baptized? and he commanded them to be baptized in the Name of the Lord." (See note above on Acts x. 44—48.) See also the case of St. Philip and the Ethiopian, who having heard the word, asked, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" (Acts viii. 36.)

This is what is briefly expressed by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians; which St. Peter appears to be studiously imitating and confirming in this Epistle (see above, i. 1, 2). Christ loved the Church, and gave Himself for it, that He might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing of Water with the Word. Eph. v. 25, 26, where see note.

After μένοντος Elz. has εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, but this is not in A, B, C, and is rejected by Griesb., Scholz, Lach, Tisch., Alf.

24. πᾶσα σάρξ] all flesh is grass. The life of flesh considered as flesh, is contrasted here with the spiritual life imparted to the sons of God, by their adoption into the "Word made flesh," and by their participation in the divine nature, in Him. See above on v. 23. Cp. John i. 12. 14, and 2 Pet. i. 4.

For αὐτῆς Elz. has ἀνθρώπου, but αὐτῆς is the reading of A, B, C, G, K, and is received by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf.

The quotation here is almost literally from the Septuagint, Isa. xl. 6—8. And this is the case with almost all the quotations from the Old Testament in this Epistle, see

ii. 6 . . . . . cp. Isa. xxviii. 16,
ii. 7 . . . . . Ps. cxviii. 22,
ii. 9 . . . . . Exod. xix. 6,

25. τὸ δὲ ῥῆμα] But the thing spoken by the Lord endureth for ever. (Cp. Matt. iv. 4. Luke i. 37.) Λόγος is the Word, coming forth from God, and energizing by His Divine Power; and hence is applied to the everlasting Son of God.

This entire passage may be compared with, and is best illustrated by, the words of the same Apostle St. Peter, in his speech at Cæsarea, see Acts x. 36, where is a similar transition from λόγος to ῥῆμα.

The transition from the Incarnate Word to the spoken or written Word, and vice versâ, is, as might be anticipated, of not unfrequent occurrence in Holy Writ: see on Heb. iv. 12. James i. 18—23.

Observe, also, that St. Peter here returns to the principal Person, Christ, and speaks of Him, who is the Living Word, as being also the Living Stone, ii. 4.

Ch. II. 1. ἀποθέμενοι οὖν] Put away, therefore, all malice and all guile: which ye renounced in your baptism, when ye put on the new man; see Eph. iv. 22. Col. iii. 9, 10, and James i. 2, imitated by Clemens Romanus, i. 13.

On the difference of these words S. Augustine says, "Malitia malo delectatur alieno; invidia bono cruciatur alieno; dolus duplicat cor; adulatio duplicat linguam; detractio vulnerat famam."

2. ὡς ἀρτιγέννητα βρέφη] as new-born babes. He had been speaking of their baptismal new birth from the divine seed of immortality in Christ (i. 23), and he now exhorts them to crave earnestly the unadulterated rational (not carnal) milk, as babes yearn for the milk of their mothers' breasts, and to suck it in with eagerness; in order that they may grow thereby to salvation. The words εἰς σωτηρίαν are omitted by Elz., but are in A, B, C, K, and are received by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf.

On the word λογικὸν cp. Rom. xii. 1, λογικὴν λατρείαν, interpreted by Chrys. as πνευματικὴν, spiritual.

By this mention of milk, as contrasted with strong meat, he teaches them a lesson of humility. Cp. 1 Cor. iii. 2. Heb. v. 12, 13.

This metaphor from milk, and its adulteration, is adopted by an ancient writer quoted by S. Irenæus (iii. 17), "In Dei lacte gypsum malè miscetur" (cp. Routh, R. S. i. pp. 48. 62). Here is implied a protest against adulterations of the pure nourishment of divine truth, by the admixture of human corruptions, and a precept of vigilance against them. Cp. 2 Cor. ii. 17.

3. εἴπερ ἐγεύσασθε] if indeed—as it is to be supposed that ye did, when ye drank in the milk of the divine Word; see this use of εἴπερ Rom. viii. 9. 2 Thess. i. 6—ye tasted that the Lord is gracious. Cp. Ps. xxxiv. 9, LXX.

Observe the aorist, ἐγεύσασθε, pointing to a particular time, viz., their baptism, when they tasted the goodness of the Lord. And on this spiritual application of the word γεύσασθαι, see note above, on Heb. vi. 4.

Therefore an ancient Bishop, commenting on St. Peter's words, thus addressed those who had been just baptized: "These words are specially applicable to you, who are yet fresh in the infancy of spiritual regeneration. For to you mainly the Divine Oracles speak, by the Apostle St. Peter, Having laid aside all malice, and all guile, as new-born infants, earnestly desire ye the 'rationabile et innocens lac, ut in illo crescatis ad salutem,' if ye tasted that the Lord is gracious (dulcis). And we are witnesses, that ye have tasted it. . . . . Cherish, therefore, this spiritual infancy. The infancy of the strong is humility. The manhood of the weak is pride." S. Augustine, Serm. 353.

Hence an argument may be derived for Infant Baptism. These converts of St. Peter are compared to ἀρτιγέννητα βρέφη, new-born babes. They had been conceived by nature of unclean seed (Job xiv. 4), in a sinful womb (Ps. li. 5), and there is not an infant of a day old, who needs not the baptismum lavacri. "Let them all be baptized, men and infants all." Bp. Andrewes, iii. p. 244.

4. λίθον ζῶντα] a stone that liveth, even by Death; and giveth life, making others also to be stones that live, by union with Him, and participation in His life, and death; for He says, "Because I live, ye shall live also" (John xiv. 19).

Thus, by a prophetic protest, Peter disclaims all notion of being what some would represent him to be, the Rock of the Church (see Matt. xvi. 18). He was indeed a true Petros, hewn out of the Divine Petra, and founded upon it (cp. 1 Cor. iii. 11). He was one of the Apostolic foundations of the heavenly city (Rev. xxi. 14), whose builder and maker is God (Heb. xi. 10).

Tertullian, speaking of the Twelve wells at Elim, and the Twelve precious stones on the breast-plate of Aaron, and the Twelve stones taken from Jordan by Joshua, as typical of the Twelve Apostles, says that Christ gave to Simon the name Peter, as a derivative from His own name; because Christ is the Rock (Petra) and Stone; and is set for a stone of stumbling and rock of offence. Tertullian (c. Marcion. iv. 13).

See further, v. 8, and Introduction to this Epistle, and above, notes on Matt. x. 1, 2, and on Matt. xvi. 18.

5. οἰκοδομεῖσθε] ye are being built. Observe the present indicative. The work of building is still going on, ye are not yet finally established, as are the stones in the heavenly Temple; Rev. xxi. 14. 19. Eph. ii. 22; and cp. the present participle σωζομένους, Acts ii. 47.

— οἶκος πνευματικὸς, ἱεράτευμα ἅγιον] In Christ ye are not only living stones, making a spiritual temple, but ye are also a holy priesthood (see below, v. 9), ministering to God in the oblation of spiritual sacrifices, which are more precious than the carnal victims of the Levitical Temple at Jerusalem, and are acceptable to God in Christ.

These sacrifices are offered by you in prayer and praise, and in the oblation of the Holy Eucharist (see on Heb. xiii. 10. 15), and in the offering of your alms (Heb. xiii. 16), and in the presentation of yourselves, your souls and bodies, as a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your rational worship and service (Rom. xii. 1, 2).

Therefore be not dismayed, because ye are cut off from the service and worship of the literal Temple at Jerusalem, which will soon be destroyed: for ye yourselves are a spiritual Temple, ye are a holy Priesthood, ye offer sacrifice and oblations well pleasing to God through Christ the One Mediator, and Everlasting High Priest. See Heb. xiii. 15. Col. iii. 17.

Some persons (the Schwenckfieldians and others of modern days) have perverted this text into an argument, that all Christians are Priests; and that there ought to be no Priests or distinct orders of Ministers in the Christian Church.

But to this allegation it may be replied, that the words, "ye are a holy priesthood," were applied also to the Jews in the Old Testament (Exod. xix. 6), and yet, "Korah and his company" were punished by God for saying that "all the congregation is holy," and for invading the office of the Priesthood (Num. xvi. 3—40). And Uzziah the King was smitten for presuming to offer incense (2 Chron. xxvi. 18), and the Apostle St. Jude declares that the sin of the gainsaying of Korah may be committed in Christian times (Jude 11).

The special ministration of God's Word and Sacraments is committed to certain persons, who accordingly have, in Scripture, special designations, as being separated for the work whereunto they are called (Acts xiii. 2); and "Ecclesia non est," says S. Jerome (adv. Lucif.) "quæ non habet Sacerdotes" (cp. S. Ignatius, ad Trall. 3), χωρὶς τούτων Ἐκκλησία οὐ καλεῖται. Christ gave not all, but some to be Apostles, and some to be Prophets, for the work of the ministry (Eph. iv. 11, 12). "Are all Apostles? are all Prophets? are all Teachers?" (1 Cor. xii. 29.) No, every one in his own order. And St. James would not have commanded Presbyters to be sent for (James v. 14), and St. Peter would not have enjoined Presbyters to feed the flock committed to their care (1 Pet. v. 1), if every one was a Priest. And if all men are equally Priests, then all men are equally Kings. For the Scripture says that Christ hath made us Kings and Priests (Rev. i. 6), and according to this notion all civil order must be abolished.

But the true exposition is, that all Christians are to be distinguished from the world, as the Jews were distinguished from other Nations, and as Priests are distinguished from those to whom they minister; and that all persons who are Christians, and distinguished as such from those who are not Christians, are to be a holy priesthood, and to consecrate their souls as altars to God, and to offer themselves as living sacrifices to Him. See Augustine, Tract. in Joan. 51.

6. περιέχει ἐν τῇ γραφῇ] it is extant in the Scripture: περιέχει is used in a middle sense, as many other verbs in the N. T. (see on Mark xiv. 72. Luke xv. 12), and so περιέχει in Josephus (Ant. xi. 4. 7), καθὼς ἐν αὐτῇ ἐπιστολῇ περιέχει. Winer, p. 225. The verb ὑπερέχω in ii. 13, is an example of similar usage, and παρεδίδου in ii. 23.

— λίθον] stone. See Ps. cxviii. 22, LXX. Matt. xxi. 42. Cp. Barnabas (Epist. 6, p. 10, Dressel), who appears to imitate these verses of this Epistle.

Here also is another parallel between this Epistle of St. Peter (ii. 4—8) and St. Peter's speeches as recorded by St. Luke in the Acts. See there, iv. 10—12.

7. ὑμῖν οὖν ἡ τιμή] to you therefore, who believe in Him, the worth of this stone is imparted.

The sense is well expressed in the Syriac Version, "Vobis igitur datus est hic honor," and so the Vulg. and Arabic, "Vobis igitur est honor." That is to say, ye are not put to shame as unbelievers will be (v. 6), but are made sharers in the honour and value (τιμὴ) which belongs to this living stone, Christ, which is precious and honourable (ἔντιμος).

This honour and value are imparted to you, on your profession of faith, in your baptism, by which ye are cemented in Him; and by your stedfast adherence and continuance in belief in Him, you, coming to Him who is the Living Stone, became also living stones. See Didymus here.

Ye are not dead stones, like the stones of the material Temple at Jerusalem, which will soon be cast down, and not "one stone be left upon another" (Matt. xxiv. 2. Luke xix. 44). And ye are not diseased stones, like the stones infected with leprosy, which were to be taken out of the wall of the house (Lev. xiv. 40—44). Ye are living, healthful stones, joined together in unity, and compacted and growing in Christ; and being built up in Him ye have been made to be sharers and partakers of His glory, so that by your inedification on Him, who is set in Sion as the Stone elect, precious, ye become like the jewels and precious stones in the wall of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). Thus His honour and worth (τιμὴ) is given to you, who believe; it is given to you by virtue of your faith in Him; for those who honour Him will His Father honour (John xii. 26).

As to the sense of the dative participle, cp. Winer, p. 485.

— εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας] to the head of the corner. See Matt. xxi. 42. 44, and Acts iv. 11. St. Peter's own speech. Cp. Eph. ii. 20.

— καὶ λίθος προσκόμματος] And a Stone of stumbling, and Rock of offence to them who stumble at the word, i. e. at the preaching of the cross (ὁ λόγος τοῦ σταυροῦ), which is to the Jews a stumbling stone. (1 Cor. i. 18.)

8. εἰς ὃ καὶ ἐτέθησαν] to which they were also set, or appointed. Christ is the Stone who is set for the fall, and for the rise, of many in Israel. (Luke ii. 34.) Christ is set for the rise of all who believe in Him; and He is set for the fall of all who disobey Him.

No man is set for disobedience; but all, who are disobedient, are set for a fall; and whosoever falleth on this stone shall be broken, and on whomsoever it shall fall, it shall grind him to powder. (Matt. xxi. 44.) Cp. Jude 4, and Didymus here, who says, that their voluntary unbelief was the cause of their appointed fall; and see the remarks above, Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans, p. 194; and Dr. Hammond here.

9. ὑμεῖς δέ] but ye, who are believers in Christ, are Israelites indeed, and enjoy all the titles and privileges which are promised by God in the Old Testament to His chosen People. (See above, i. 2.) The literal Israel who reject Christ have fulfilled the prophecies, which declared that the elect corner stone (Isa. xxviii. 16) would be also a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to some (Isa. viii. 14); and that the stone which the builders, or chief workmen in God's Temple in Jerusalem, refused, should become the Head of the corner. Do not therefore be staggered by that rejection; nor imagine that ye have forfeited any privileges by embracing the Gospel. Ye are now God's people indeed, a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, being members of the mystical body of Him Who is the everlasting Priest and King, and being partakers of the holy unction of His Royalty and Priesthood: ye are a holy nation, a peculiar people, λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν (from LXX, Exod. xix. 5. Deut. vii. 6. Cp. Isa. xliii. 21. Mal. iii. 17); i. e. literally, a people for a purchasing, or acquisition, סְגֻלָּה (segullah, peculium), and specially for the purchase effected by the precious blood of Christ.

The peculiar people, or people for the purchase, is the Universal Church which Almighty God has purchased to Himself by the precious blood of His dear Son. Cp. Acts xx. 28; and see above on Titus ii. 14, and Eph. i. 14.

— ἀρετάς] virtutes, God's attributes and works of love and mercy to you in Christ. Cp. 2 Pet. i. 3. St. Peter is adopting the language of Isaiah (xlii. 12), τὰς ἀρετὰς αὐτοῦ ἐν ταῖς νήσοις ἀπαγγελοῦσι.

10. οἱ ποτὲ οὐ λαός] who were formerly not a people: for ye are scattered in all lands, and have no king or country; but now ye are a people, for ye have a home in the Church, and a King in Christ. St. Peter is appropriating the words of Hosea (ii. 23), where God is pre-announcing His reconciliation with Israel: a circumstance which may serve as an evidence that these words do not show (as some have supposed) that this Epistle was written to Gentiles. See above, i. 14. 18.

— οἱ οὐκ ἠλεημένοι, νῦν δὲ ἐλεηθέντες] Observe the difference of tense in these two participles, the perfect and aorist; the former describing a state, the latter an act. Ye were formerly not ἠλεημένοι, not pitied by God; ye were continuing in that state, one of remoteness from God's mercy; but ἠλεήθητε, ye were made an object of mercy by His act of free grace to you in Christ. Cp. Winer, § 45, p. 307.

11. ἀγαπητοί] Beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims. He had been speaking of their new birth in Christ (i. 23), and had just been describing them as a people redeemed and purchased by God to Himself; redeemed from the captivity of Satan, and purchased by the blood of Christ to Himself, and to the hope of an eternal inheritance in the heavenly Canaan.

The mercies they now enjoy are the antitypes of those vouchsafed to their fathers, the Israelites of old, when they were redeemed out of the house of bondage in Egypt, and saved from the destroying angel by the blood of the Paschal Lamb; and became God's peculiar people, dedicated to Him, and were made inheritors of the land of Promise. Cp. 1 Cor. x. 1—6.

St. Peter had exhorted them to sing praises to God for their deliverance out of darkness into light (ii. 9). as Moses and Miriam sang praises to Him for the salvation of the people out of Egypt, after their passage through the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 1—22), the type of Baptism. And now by a happy connexion he exhorts them to march onward in their journey, as the Israelites did in their pilgrimage through the wilderness; and to abstain from fleshly lusts, which they had renounced in their baptism, and which war against the soul; and to be warned by the fate of their fathers, whose carcases fell in the wilderness; and to remember the fires of Taberah, and the judgments of Kibroth-hattaavah, the graves of them that lusted. Num. xi. 4—34. Ps. cvi. 14. 1 Cor. x. 6.

This address to them as strangers and pilgrims was specially pertinent to the first readers of this Epistle (see above on i. 1 and 17); but is also applicable to all, who have no continuing city here, and seek for a home above. See Heb. xi. 13—15. Cp. Phil. iii. 20. 1 John ii. 15.

— ἀπέχεσθε] abstain ye. The imperative mood. Elz. has the infinitive here, ἀπέχεσθαι, and so B, K, and most editors. But the imperative, ἀπέχεσθε, is sanctioned by A, C, G, and many cursives, and the Syriac, Coptic, and Æthiopic Versions; and Didymus, Cyprian, and Leo; and this direct address gives more life and force to the appeal. Compare the similar passage of St. Paul, Rom. xii. 2, and note there; and the like structure in this Epistle, v. 1, παρακαλῶ τοὺς ἐν ὑμῖν πρεσβυτέρους, ποιμάνατε.

— αἵτινες] quippe quæ — more expressive than which: it implies the reason why we are to abstain from them; viz. because they war against the soul. On this use of ὅστις, see Rom. i. 25. 32; ii. 15; vi. 2. 1 Tim. i. 4; vi. 9.

— στρατεύονται] are warring: he refers to James iv. 1, "lusts warring in your members."

12. τὴν ἀναστροφήν] having your conversation (social intercourse and behaviour, Gal. i. 13. Eph. iv. 22. James iii. 13) honest among the Gentiles, among whom ye are dispersed and scattered abroad, as a holy leaven to leaven the world, in order that in the very respect in which (ἐν ᾧ, see iii. 16) they speak against you as evil-doers, by calling you disloyal to Rulers, but finding you when tried most loyal to them (see v. 15), they may, from your good works, of which they are spectators (ἐποπτεύοντες, so B, C), glorify God in the day of visitation; that is, in the day when ye are visited by God, the Inspector and Judge of all, and when ye are tried by afflictions (see Luke xix. 44. Isa. x. 3. Jer. vi. 15; viii. 12), and are manifested in your true light by Him, in the eyes of the world, especially of your slanderers and detractors; then in "the time of visitation shall ye shine, for grace and mercy is to His saints and ἐπισκοπὴ to His elect." Wisd. iii. 7. 9; iv. 15. Ecclus. ii. 14; xviii. 20.

The day of Visitation may also be understood more generally as describing God's Judicial Visitations, such as the impending War in Judæa, and other Wars, Famines, Earthquakes, Plagues, and Pestilences. Matt. xxiv. 7.

In such trials as those, the faith and love of the Christians were displayed in striking contrast with the Jews and Heathens.

A memorable instance of this may be seen in the history of the Plague at Carthage, in S. Cyprian's Episcopate, as described ὑμῶν ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν ἔχοντες καλήν, ἵνα ἐν ᾧ καταλαλοῦσιν ὑμῶν ὡς κακοποιῶν, ἐκ τῶν καλῶν ἔργων ἐποπτεύοντες δοξάσωσι τὸν Θεὸν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐπισκοπῆς.

by his Deacon, Pontius, p. 6. "The majority of our brethren," says Pontius, "took care of every one but themselves: by nursing the sick, and watching over them in Christ, they caught the disorder which they healed in others, and breathed their last with joy; some bare in their arms and bosoms the bodies of dead saints; and, having closed the eyes of the dying, and bathed their corpses, and performed the last obsequies, received the same treatment at the hands of their brethren. But," he adds, "the very reverse of this was done by the Gentiles: those who were sinking into sickness, they drove from them; they fled from their dearest friends; they threw them expiring into the streets, and turned from their unburied corpses with looks of execration."

See also S. Cyprian's words in his treatise published on that occasion, De Mortalitate, sive Peste, capp. 9, 10, "Mortalitas ista, ut Judæis et Gentilibus et Christi hostibus pestis est, ita Dei servis salutaris excessus est."

The words ἐποπτὴς and ἐποπτεύειν are applied to spectators of actors in a drama, or of wrestlers in athletic games, or who are admitted to view some sacred Mysteries. See above on 1 Cor. ii. 6, and Wetstein, p. 687.

The Christians in their sufferings were a spectacle (θέατρον) to the world (1 Cor. iv. 9), and the heroism and patience with which they endured them, excited the admiration and elicited the applause of the Heathen; and this applause redounded to the glory of God, Who gave them grace to suffer as they did. Thus the Martyrdoms of Christians were instrumental in the conversion of Heathens, and in the Propagation of the Faith.

This passage is quoted by S. Polycarp, ad Phil. c. 10, "omnes vobis invicem subjecti estote (1 Pet. v. 5), conversationem vestram irreprehensibilem habentes in gentibus, ut ex bonis operibus vestris et vos laudem accipiatis, et Dominus in vobis non blasphemetur."

13. ὑποτάγητε οὖν] be ye subject therefore. A practical application of the general precept just enunciated.

— ὑποτάγητε πάσῃ ἀνθρωπίνῃ κτίσει] be ye subject, submit yourselves, to every power, to every ordinance appointed by man.

The ruling Power, to which they are to submit, is called here κτίσις ἀνθρωπίνη, an ordinance of man: because the choice of the particular form of Government in a State, whether it is to be Monarchical or Republican, is commonly determined by men: and the persons who are appointed to govern,—whether by hereditary succession, or election,—are often designated by men.

But the Authority (ἐξουσία) itself, which Rulers have and exercise, when they have once been appointed by men, is not derived from man, but it is from God alone. (See Rom. xiii. 1—3.)

This important proposition, which is plainly set forth in Holy Scripture, by St. Peter here, and by St. Paul (Rom. xiii. 1—4), and which declares the true grounds of all allegiance and obedience to Rulers and all in authority, may be thus illustrated;

Water may be made to assume different forms, in fountains and cascades, and be made to flow in different channels or aqueducts, by the hand of man: but the Element itself, which flows in them, is from God. So again, Marble may be hewn by man's hand into different shapes: under the sculptor's chisel it may become a statue, a frieze, or a sarcophagus; but the Marble itself is from the quarry, it is from the creative hand of God.

So it is with Civil Power. The Form which Power may assume, and the Person who may be appointed to exercise it, may be κτίσεις ἀνθρώπιναι, ordinances of man: but the Authority itself (ἐξουσία) is from God.

Consequently, as St. Peter teaches, we are bound to submit to every ordinance of man, in all lawful things, "for the Lord's sake," Whose ministers and vicegerents our Rulers are; and as St. Paul declares, "he that resisteth the Authority, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist, shall receive to themselves damnation." See notes above on Rom. xiii. 1—3.

All the Kingdoms and Governments of the whole earth are Thy ordinance, O Lord (Rom. xiii. 2), albeit an institution of man (1 Pet. ii. 13). Bp. Andrewes (Private Devotions, p. 48, ed. 1830). Cp. Bp. Sanderson, Præl. vii. 15. Abp. Bramhall and Bp. Horsley in Christian Institutes, iii. 39. Abp. Leighton here, and Hooker (VIII. ii. 6), who says, "Unto kings by human right, honour by very divine right is due."

Submission therefore is to be paid to Authority in ll commands that are not contrary to divine law. As to our duty in those cases where the human Governor commands any thing which is forbidden by God, or forbids any thing which God commands, St. Peter's own conduct may be our guide. See above, Acts iv. 19, 20; v. 29.

There is a particular emphasis in the word πάσῃ here, every ordinance of man; because some Jewish Christians, and especially the Gnostics, held and taught that they were exempt from submission to human rule, particularly to heathen rule. See on 1 Tim. ii. 1—3. Titus i. 10; iii. 1, and below, ii. 16, and on 2 Pet. ii. 10, and Jude 16, for corrections of this notion.

St. Paul uses the same word, in order to teach that no one is exempt from the duty of subjection to Rulers. "Let every soul" (πᾶσα ψυχή), he says, "be subject to the higher powers." (Rom. xiii. 1.)

St. Peter here teaches the duty of submission to lawful authority. They who call themselves "successors of St. Peter," have set themselves above, and in opposition to, lawful authority, and have often encouraged others to rebel against it. See above, on 2 Thess. ii. 4, and below, on Rev. xiii. 15, 16; xvii. 3. How much misery would the world have been spared, if they who profess to revere the name of St. Peter, and to be successors of St. Peter, had listened to the precepts of St. Peter, and had followed the example of St. Peter!

— βασιλεῖ] the King—the Roman Cæsar. So βασιλεὺς is used by Josephus, B. J. v. 13. 6. Cp. v. 17. The regions to which this Epistle was sent were provinces of Rome.

— ὑπερέχοντι] as being over you. See on Rom. xiii. 1.

14. ἡγεμόσιν] governors. In our Lord's Ministry and Country Cæsar was βασιλεὺς (John xix. 15), but Pilate was ἡγεμὼν (Matt. xxvii. 2). He submitted to both. (Matt. xxii. 17. John xix. 11.)

15. ὅτι οὕτως] for so is the will of God, that by well-doing we may stop the mouth (φιμοῦν, to muzzle, Matt. xxii. 12. 34. Mark i. 25; iv. 39. 1 Tim. v. 18) of the ignorance of foolish men. We Christians may be maligned by the heathen, as if we were ill affected to Cæsar; but when we are put to the test, it will be found, that we Christians are loyal subjects, and in fact almost the only loyal subjects of Cæsar; because it is our religion alone which teaches men to regard Cæsar as the Minister of God. Cp. Œcumen. here, and see this doctrine eloquently preached by Tertullian in his Apology, § 28—37.

This admonition of St. Peter to the Jewish Christians was very seasonable at this time, when the Jews at Jerusalem, and in various parts of Europe and Asia, were preparing to rise in that Rebellion against Rome which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, about five years after this Epistle was written; and which produced its fatal results in the slaughter of many thousands of Jews collected in Jerusalem from all parts, and in the unutterable woe and final dispersion of the Jews.

The Christians were rescued from those calamities by the prophecies and exhortations of Christ and His Apostles, particularly St. Peter and St. Paul.

Christ was crucified by the power of Rome, as He had foretold that He would be, (Matt. xx. 19). St. Peter and St. Paul, as they also foreknew, were martyred by Rome; but yet they preached submission to Rome.

16. ὡς ἐλεύθεροι] as free, and yet,—although free by reason of that liberty, with which Christ has made you free (Gal. v. 1), —not using your liberty as a cloke (or specious pretext) for maliciousness.

He had exhorted them to be subject to every human ordinance for the Lord's sake; and he now obviates the objection of those Christians who—following the example of the Pharisees, and others among the Jews, pleading that they were God's peculiar people (see v. 9), and that, as children of Abraham, and subjects of Jehovah, they ought not to be in bondage to any man (John viii. 33), and especially ought not to submit to any heathen rule, and could not in conscience pay tribute to Cæsar (see Matt. xxii. 17—21)—alleged, that since they had been made free by Christ, they could not obey any other rule, especially a heathen power, without treachery to Him.

It is well observed by Bp. Sanderson, that St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, usually treats the question of Christian Liberty in reference to the duty of using it in such a manner as not to give offence to weak brethren; and that St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, generally handles it in such a manner as to guard it against being abused into an occasion of insubordination to Authority. The one guards against the danger of scandal; the other inculcates the duty of obedience.

The reason of this was, that St. Peter had to do with Jews "who could not brook subjection, and were of all nations under heaven the most impatient of a foreign yoke." "Seditiosissima gens." Scaliger. Bp. Sanderson, iii. 273. St. Paul dealt with mixed communities of Jews and Gentiles, and had a delicate and difficult part to perform, in preventing the one from giving offence to the other, and from rashly judging the other; and in endeavouring to unite them all by the bonds of Love.

St. Peter asserts their freedom, and exhorts them to live as free; but he also warns them against making their freedom a mask for maliciousness, and against falling into the sins of licentiousness and rebellion, under the sacred guise of liberty, and religion; and against forfeiting their freedom, by making themselves slaves of evil passions.

This twofold duty has been well inculcated in a sermon on this text by Bp. Sanderson. To do God and ourselves right it is necessary that we should with our utmost strength maintain the doctrine and power of that Liberty wherewith Christ hath endowed His Church, without either usurping the mastery over others, or subjecting ourselves to their servitude, so as to surrender either our judgments or Consciences to be wholly disposed according to the opinions or wills of men, though of never so excellent piety or parts.

But yet, lest while we shun one extreme, we fall into another, as we are very apt to do; and lest, while we seek to preserve our Liberty, we lose it; the Apostle, therefore, in the next clause, putteth in a caveat for that also, not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness. We must so maintain our Liberty that we abuse it not, as we shall, if, under the pretence of Christian Liberty, we either adventure the doing of some unlawful thing, or omit the performance of any requisite duty. Bp. Sanderson, v. p. 289. On the grounds and nature of Christian Liberty, and on the rules for its right use, see also note above, on 1 Cor. iii. 4. 22, 23; vi. 12; ix. 19, and Gal. v. 1 and 13.

As free, and not using your liberty as a cloke of maliciousness, but as servants of God.

It is very observable, that St. Peter imitates and adopts here St. Paul's language to the Galatians (v. 13).

(1) St. Peter's words "as free," correspond to St. Paul's words, "brethren, ye are called to liberty."

(2) St. Peter's words, "and not using your liberty as a cloke of maliciousness," correspond to St. Paul's words, "only use not your liberty as an occasion to the flesh."

(3) St. Peter's words, "but as servants of God," correspond to St. Paul's, "by love serve one another."

Thus these two Apostles unite in teaching,

(1) The duty of maintaining Christian Liberty.

(2) The need of caution against its abuse.

(3) The Law by which it is to be regulated, and the manner in which it is to be used.

Observe also, that St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, in this Epistle, which is addressed to Jewish Christians of Galatia (i. 1), refers here to that Epistle of St. Paul, the Epistle to the Galatians (v. 13), in which St. Paul had specially inculcated the duty of maintaining Christian Liberty against the usurpations of Judaizing teachers, who endeavoured to bring them into bondage (Gal. i. 7; v. 1), and in which St. Paul had recorded his own public opposition to St. Peter at Antioch, when, in a moment of weakness, he connived at those Judaizing teachers who would have imposed the yoke of the Levitical Law on the Gentile Christians (Gal. ii. 11—21).

Thus St. Peter now declares his entire concurrence with St. Paul on that matter which had then produced a difference between them; and in which his conduct had exposed him to the rebuke of his brother Apostle. And by the adoption of the language of the Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians, and by incorporating it in his own Epistle to the Jewish Christians of Galatia, he presents a noble example of recovery from error, and of generosity and love of truth. Compare note below, 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16, and Introduction to this Epistle, p. 42.

17. πάντας—τιμᾶτε] Honour all men, Love the brotherhood. On this text see Bp. Sanderson's Sermon, i. pp. 54—81.

— τὴν ἀδελφότητα] the brotherhood (see v. 9). So Clemens R. i. 2, ἀγὼν ἦν ὑμῖν ὑπὲρ πάσης τῆς ἀδελφότητος εἰς τὸ σώζεσθαι, and so S. Polycarp (c. 10), in the old Latin Version, "fraternitatis amatores."

Love the brotherhood; sympathizing with them in grief, succouring them in trouble, rejoicing in their graces, as if they were your own. There is the same blood in your veins; the same Head of the whole brotherhood; the same Spirit knitting all together in one. Cp. Abp. Leighton on i. 22.

— τὸν βασιλέα τιμᾶτε] Honour the King, even Nero. See above, v. 13.

The union of these two Apostolic precepts arranged in this order, "Fear God, Honour the King," shows that Loyalty is to be grounded on Piety; that in order to be good citizens men must begin with being good Christians; that honour to Kings is to be based on the fear of God, by whom Kings rule, and Whose ministers they are. St. Peter follows Solomon (Prov. xxiv. 21), φοβοῦ τὸν Θεὸν, υἱὲ, καὶ βασιλέα.

18. οἱ οἰκέται] ye domestics,—a milder word than slaves. This is the only place in the Apostolic Epistles where the word οἰκέτης occurs in this sense.

This fact may thus be accounted for;

St. Peter is writing specially to Jewish Christians, who would not regard their domestics, especially those of their own nation, in the same light as the Heathen Masters did theirs, namely, as slaves. See Lev. xxv. 39—44, where the Jews are forbidden to reduce any poor man of their own nation to the state of a bondman, and they might not purchase as bondsmen any of their own nation, but of the heathen only.

St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, and writing specially to them, always uses the word δοῦλος (bondsman, slave) in his precepts concerning household service (1 Cor. vii. 21. Eph. vi. 5—8. Col. iii. 11. 22; iv. 1. 12. 1 Tim. vi. 1. Tit. ii. 9).

Many Jewish Rabbis taught, that a Jew might not serve a Heathen (see Lightfoot on 1 Cor. vii. 23. Cp. John viii. 33). Therefore this precept of St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, exhorting servants to be subject to their Masters, was a necessary caution to Jewish Christians; and it proves his courage and honesty; he would not ingratiate himself with them by flattery, and by concessions to their national prejudices. Cp. on Tit. i. 10—12.

19. τοῦτο γὰρ χάρις] for this is acceptable. Properly, this is an act of grace, freely and cheerfully laid up on your part, as a deposit with God, and favourably accepted by Him, and requited to you with praise and benefit. See v. 20, where κλέος explains it; and cp. 1 Tim. ii. 3. Col. iii. 20. Hence Œcumen. renders it by ἀποδοχὴ, and χάρις in Luke vi. 32 is represented in the parallel place of St. Matt. v. 46 by μισθός.

20. ποῖον γὰρ κλέος] for what glory is it? A passage quoted by Tertullian, Scorpiac. c. 12, where he calls this an Epistle of St. Peter ad Ponticos. See above, i. 1.

— κολαφιζόμενοι] buffeted,—as Christ was (see Matt. xxvi. 67): "alapæ, pœna servorum, eaque subita" (Bengel); inflicted on slaves by their masters in outbreaks of passion; cp. note below, v. 24.

— τοῦτο] A, B add γάρ, and some Cursives, and so Lach., Tisch., Alford.

— ἡμῖν ὑπολιμπάνων ὑπογραμμόν] leaving to us (when He went away to heaven) a copy, for us to imitate; properly an exemplar or model, τύπος (2 Thess. iii. 9), to be followed in writing or painting (see Wetstein, p. 688), that we should follow His steps.

This saying has a peculiar force in the mouth of this blessed Apostle, who had been an eye-witness of our Lord's patient bearing, and meek demeanour, when He was arrested in the Garden of Gethsemane; and when He stood before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrim, on the morning before the Crucifixion; and to whom our Lord, after His Resurrection, in reply to his question, "What shall this man do?" (viz. St. John,) said, "Follow thou Me" (John xxi. 22), and who did follow Him even to the cross as a Martyr; and having received the charge, "Feed My sheep" (John xxi. 15—18), laid down his life for them, as Christ, the good Shepherd, had laid down His life for the sheep. Cp. 1 John iii. 16, and Augustine in Joan. Tract. 84.

This passage is also imitated by S. Polycarp, c. 8, Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς ἀνήνεγκεν ἡμῶν τὰς ἁμαρτίας τῷ ἰδίῳ σώματι ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον, ὃς ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἐποίησεν, οὐδὲ εὑρέθη δόλος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ· μιμηταὶ οὖν γενώμεθα τῆς ὑπομονῆς αὐτοῦ . . . . τοῦτον ἡμῖν τὸν ὑπογραμμὸν ἔθηκε δι' ἑαυτοῦ.

Christ is our example of patience; as Tertullian says, He Who is God stooped to be born in the womb of His Mother, and waited patiently, and grew up; and when grown up, was not impatient to be recognized as God. He was baptized by His servant; and repelled the Tempter only by words. When He became a Teacher, He did not strive nor cry, nor did any one hear His voice in the streets; He did not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax. He scorned no man's company; He shunned no man's table. He conversed with publicans and sinners. He poured out water and washed His disciples' feet. He would not injure the Samaritan village which did not receive Him, when His Disciples desired to call fire from heaven to consume it. He cured the unthankful; He withdrew from those who plotted against Him. He had the Traitor constantly in His company and did not expose him. And when He is betrayed, and is brought to execution, He is like a sheep which before his shearers is dumb, and a lamb that doth not open its mouth. He Who was Lord of Angelic Legions did not approve the sword of Peter drawn in His defence. He is spit upon, scourged, mocked. Such long-suffering as His, is an example to all men, but is found in God alone. Tertullian, de Patientiâ, c. 3. Cp. Augustine, Serm. 114 and 284.

23, 24. ὃς λοιδορούμενος οὐκ ἀντελοιδόρει] Who being reviled, was not reviling again. Observe the imperfect tenses here, ἀντελοιδόρει, ἠπείλει, παρεδίδου, was committing, i. e. Himself and His cause (see v. 6). Clem. Alex. here, and Winer, § 64, p. 521.

These imperfect tenses give more significance to the subsequent transition to the aorist in ἀνήνεγκεν, He Himself willingly and alone (αὐτὸς) carried up our sins by one act alone, done once for all; namely, by His death on the cross. He was Himself without sin; but He bare in Himself the sins of those for whom He offered Himself as a sacrifice. Severus (in Catenâ, p. 58).

He Who took the Nature of us all, and incorporates us all in Himself, carried, lifted up, our sins, collected together, as a weight laid upon Him, in His own body, as our proxy, substitute, and vicarious sacrifice, on to the tree on which He offered Himself as an expiatory and propitiatory sacrifice to God (Heb. vii. 27); and on which He became a curse for us, for it is written, "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." (Gal. iii. 13.) Thus He took away the curse in which we were involved by the sin of our first parents eating the fruit of the forbidden tree; and by His perfect obedience took away the curse of the Law for disobedience; for it is written, "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all that is written in the Law to do it." (Gal. iii. 10.)

The Vulgate has "pertulit" here, and the Syriac still more fully, "bajulavit omnia peccata nostra, eaque sustulit in corpore suo ad crucem."

The Socinian exposition of this passage is, that Christ displayed a noble example of patience in our nature, and took away our sins by instructing us in patience.

It is true that the Apostle is here representing Christ as our pattern of patience. But he compares Him also to sacrificial victims, the offerings of the Law, who are described in Scripture as bearing the sins of those who offer them, see Lev. x. 17; and whose blood was to be carried into the holy place, because the blood is the life of man. (Lev. xvii. 11—14.)

St. Peter uses the word ἀνήνεγκε to describe the act of carrying the sins up, i. e. to the cross; as victims (to whom the sins were transferred and laid as a burden upon them, Lev. i. 4; iii. 2; iv. 15) were carried up and offered on an altar. See below on iii. 18; and compare Isa. liii. 12. Heb. ix. 28, ὁ Χριστὸς ἅπαξ προσενεχθεὶς εἰς τὸ πολλῶν ἀνενεγκεῖν ἁμαρτίας.

Christ is here propounded as an example of patience in His act of bearing and carrying, not in His act of taking away, as some Socinians misinterpret the word ἀναφέρειν.

St. Peter goes on to declare that the effect of Christ's patience in taking up our sins in His own body on the cross was to liberate us from the penalty of sin; for St. Peter adds, "by whose stripes ye were healed." See Irenæus, iii. 16. 9. Origen (in Levit. 3), "peccata nostra portavit; vitulum immaculatum, hoc est, carnem incontaminatam obtulit Deo;" so Cyprian, Ep. 8, and Ep. 63, "Christus peccata nostra portabat;" and other citations from ancient Christian Fathers on this subject at the end of the treatise of Grotius, de Satisf. Christi, pp. 229—267, and his own remarks, pp. 14—16, ed. 1675; and Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 140, and the note below on 1 John ii. 2; iv. 10.

On the genitives οὗ—αὐτοῦ, see Matt. iii. 12; the αὐτοῦ adds to the emphasis. Cp. Winer, p. 134. He, and He alone, is our Healer.

On the word μώλωψ, vibex, livor, wound or weal, especially made by scourging, see Wetstein, p. 689.

Here is an Apostolic paradox: ye were healed by His wounds. (Bengel.)

The μώλωψ is the wound produced by the chastisement of slaves, and the ξύλον is the instrument of the death of slaves. Mark the humility of Him, Who, being Lord of all, stooped to be the servant of all, and to suffer scourging and the cross as a slave; and was especially exemplary to that class which St. Peter is here addressing. Cp. κολαφιζόμενοι, v. 20.

24. ἵνα—ζήσωμεν] Christ died for our sins, not that we might continue in them, but in order that we might die to them, and live to God. Cp. Rom. vi. 1—12.

25. ἦτε γὰρ ὡς πρόβατα] for, ye were as sheep going astray, but have now returned to the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls: a reference, it would seem (as Bede remarks), to our Lord's parable of the Lost Sheep. St. Peter had been speaking of Christ, meek and patient as a sheep (vv. 22—24), and tenderhearted and vigilant as a Shepherd, laying down His life for the Sheep; bearing our sins on His own body on to the tree, as the good Shepherd in the Parable "came to seek and save the sheep that was lost," and "when he had found it, laid it upon his own shoulders, rejoicing, and said, Rejoice with me, for I have found My sheep that was lost." Luke xv. 5.

The Lost Sheep of the house of Israel were now scattered in all countries of the world; but Christ the Good Shepherd, stretching forth His hands upon the cross, and laying down His life for them, had borne them all on His shoulders, and brought them all home to the one fold.

A, B have πλανόμενοι, and so Lach., Tisch., Alf. Elz. πλανώμενα (agreeing with πρόβατα, sheep), with C, G, K, and most Cursives, and Theoph., Œcumen. And this reading seems to be confirmed by Ps. cxix. 176. Isa. liii. 6, where the sinners are compared to sheep that are lost, as in our Lord's Parable (Luke xv. 6); and compare Matt. xviii. 12. The reading therefore of Elz.—the textus receptus—seems preferable.

Ch. III. 1. ὁμοίως, αἱ γυναῖκες] In like manner, ye wives, submitting yourselves to your own husbands, for the Lord's sake (ii. 13). He had been exhorting subjects to submit to their Rulers (ii. 14), and servants to their Masters (ii. 18), so do ye: for so, by your meek and gracious demeanour, ye may win your own Husbands, if heathen, to the faith in Christ, and save their souls. See 1 Cor. vii. 16.

3. ὧν ἔστω] of whom, let not that outward adornment of braiding of hair, and of putting round (the head, neck, wrists, &c.) of golden ornaments, be the adornment, on which ye pride yourselves. Cp. Clemens Alexandr. (Pæd. iii. 4), who says, the women that pride themselves in wearing gold, and plaiting their hair, have not the image of God in the inner man . . . but let it be the hidden man of the heart.

St. Peter does not here prohibit a decorous apparel, suitable to the station of the wearer, but he exhorts women to take heed, first, to the dress of the heart, as being ever in the eye of God, who readeth the heart. Then they will never err as to the dress of the body. See Augustine, Epist. 73.

— ἐμπλοκῆς τριχῶν] of the weaving of hair in knots, &c., κόρυμβοι or σκόρπιοι, by means of the pecten, calamistrum, and acus crinalis, used for such purposes. Cp. 1 Tim. ii. 9, ἐν πλέγμασιν, joined with ἢ χρυσῷ, as here. Juvenal, vi. 491, "Altior hic quarè cincinnus? taurea punit Continuò flexi crimen facinusque capilli . . . pectitque comas, et volvit in orbem; Tot premit ordinibus, tot adhuc compagibus altum Ædificat caput;" and see Wetstein, p. 324.

6. Σάῤῥα] Sarah, "who by faith received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child, when she was past age, because she judged Him faithful Who had promised." Heb. xi. 11. Sarah is also described as speaking by divine inspiration, when her son Isaac was persecuted by Ishmael. See on Gal. iv. 28, 29. And the faithful seed are exhorted to look to Abraham and Sarah that bare them (Isa. li. 2); and her name was changed from Sarai to Sarah, because God made her a Princess, and a Mother of Nations (Gen. xvii. 15); and God said to Abraham, "Hearken unto Sarah's voice; for in Isaac, her son, shall thy seed be called." (Gen. xxi. 12.)

— κύριον αὐτὸν καλοῦσα] calling him lord, as the Rabbis observe on Gen. xviii. 12. Wetstein; although she was herself Sarah,—a princess.

— ἧς ἐγενήθητε τέκνα] whose (Sarah's) children ye became (ἐγενήθητε) by doing well, and not being afraid with any trepidation; πτόησιν, terror, panic, alarm, shown by crouching like a hare, and attempting to fly (πτοέω, πτήσσω, πτώξ). The word is used in this sense by Philo, p. 516 (ἡ ἔκπληξις πτόησιν ἐμποιεῖ).

On the cognate accusative after φοβούμεναι, see the examples in Estius here, and Winer, § 32, p. 201. Cp. Mark iv. 41. Luke ii. 9. 1 Tim. vi. 12. 2 Tim. iv. 7. Rev. xvii. 6, and below, iv. 14.

Or the words may be translated, "not being affrighted by any terror," i. e. by any object of terror from without, as in Prov. iii. 25, οὐ φοβηθήσῃ πτόησιν ἐπελθοῦσαν.

This admonition of St. Peter was very necessary for Christian women, specially those who were married, who were subject to vexations and persecutions from Heathens, and even from their own husbands. See Tertullian ad Uxor. ii. 4, 5. Prof. Blunt, Early Church, ch. v. p. 98.

This Apostolic precept, to do good and fear not, was exemplified by St. Peter's wife, who had probably seen the Lord (Matt. viii. 14), and was St. Peter's companion in his Apostolic journeys (1 Cor. ix. 5), and went before her husband to Martyrdom, and was cheered by him in her way, by the consideration suggested here; namely, by the recollection of the sufferings of Christ. "Seeing his wife led to death, Peter rejoiced, because she was being called by God, and returning home; and he, calling her by name, comforted her, saying, O woman, remember the Lord!" (Clemens Alex. apud Euseb. iii. 30.)

7. συνοικοῦντες κατὰ γνῶσιν] cohabiting (with your wives) according to knowledge (not in the lust of concupiscence), rendering honour (τιμὴν, reverent regard and modest forbearance in conjugal intercourse) to them as to the weaker vessel, as being heirs together with them of the grace of life, so that your prayers (that is, the prayers of you and your wife) may not be interrupted.

B, G have the dative συγκληρονόμοις, and so Tisch., Alf.

This is a general precept—as the ancient Expositors observe—to regulate the use of the marriage bed with reverential regard to the spiritual welfare of husband and wife, as fellow-heirs of life eternal; and in such a manner, as may be conducive to mutual edification, and to conjugal union in holy offices of prayer and praise to God. Compare St. Paul's precept, 1 Cor. vii. 5, and Eccles. iii. 5, and S. Jerome c. Jovinian. i. 4, and S. Augustine in Ps. cxlvi., and Œcumenius here.

On the use of the word σκεῦος, vessel, compare 1 Sam. xxi. 5, and see the note above on 1 Thess. iv. 4. Every man ought to regard his own body as a vessel sanctified to the Lord (2 Tim. ii. 21); like those holy vessels for divine service in the Temple (Heb. ix. 21). He ought also to regard the body of his wife as an holy vessel, and as one of more delicate and fragile structure than his own; and to treat it with modest reserve and reverential tenderness and honourable love.

St. Peter's words here are best illustrated by those of St. Paul (1 Thess. iv. 3—5. Col. ii. 23), especially as to the word τιμὴ, honour, which means reverent regard for the body (whether it be our own body, or that of another), as contrasted with πάθη ἀτιμίας, lusts by which the body is dishonoured. See the Apostle's words, Rom. i. 24—26.

This Apostolic precept, to render honour to the wife, as the weaker vessel, is a scriptural warrant for the sentence, against which some have excepted in the plighting of troth in the office of Holy Matrimony in the Book of Common Prayer,—"With my body I thee worship," i. e. I render thee honour. "Habere uxorem non in servæ loco, neque meretricis, sed ut sororis in Christo, et cohæredis regni cœlorum, viri est Christiani." To render due honour to the body by keeping it in subjection, and by abstinence from fornication and uncleanness; and to pay due honour to the body of the wife, by sobriety, modesty, and love, are conjugal offices, requisite for the maintenance of due regard for that holy Ordinance of God, which was instituted by Him in the time of Man's innocency, and by which is represented and signified the spiritual Marriage and Unity betwixt Christ and His Church. (Eph. v. 25—32.)

8. ταπεινόφρονες] lowly-minded. So A, B, C. Elz. has φιλόφρονες.

9. ἵνα εὐλογίαν κληρονομήσητε] in order that ye may inherit blessing, from the lips of your future Judge, saying, "Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom" (Matt. xxv. 34).

10. ὁ γὰρ θέλων ζωὴν ἀγαπᾷν] For he whose will it is to love life: that is, who sets himself by a deliberate act of volition to love that life which is true life; cp. Matt. xvi. 25, ὃς ἂν θέλῃ ψυχὴν σῶσαι, Luke ix. 24, and see S. Basil in Catenâ here.

St. Peter thus gives additional emphasis to the Psalmist's words (ἄνθρωπος ὁ θέλων ζωὴν, ἀγαπῶν ἰδεῖν ἡμέρας ἀγαθὰς, Ps. xxxiii. 12), and shows that love itself (ἀγάπη), in the true sense of the word, is not a mere appetite, but requires a sustained effort of the will.

13. τίς ὁ κακώσων ὑμᾶς, ἐὰν τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ζηλωταὶ γένησθε;] who is he that will harm you, if ye become zealots for that which is good? Many among the Jews and Jewish Christians had zeal, but not according to knowledge (Rom. x. 2), and were not zealots in a good thing (Gal. iv. 17). Many were called ζηλωταὶ, zealots, and under plea of zeal for God were guilty of enormities (see on Matt. xxiv. 15). Be ye zealots, says the Apostle, but let it be for that which is good. Such a Zelotes was St. Peter's fellow-Apostle, Simon, called the Cananite for his zeal (see on Matt. x. 4); and on his history see Introduction to St. Jude's Epistle.

The oldest uncial MSS., A, B, C, have ζηλωταὶ here: but Elz., G, K, and many cursive MSS. have μιμηταὶ, imitators, and this reading (which is received by Tisch. in his last edition) deserves attention.

If it is the true one, the sense is, Who is he that will harm you, if ye become imitators of Him that is good? The word μιμητὴς is used in six other places of the N. T. (1 Cor. iv. 16; xi. 1. Eph. v. 1. 1 Thess. i. 6; ii. 14. Heb. vi. 12), and in all it is followed by a person who is to be imitated (see on 1 Cor. xi. 1), and a Person is here proposed for imitation, namely, Christ (v. 18; iv. 1). And then He, who is the Good One, is here represented as a Defender of those who imitate Him, against the assaults of any person, man or Devil, who would harm them.

14. τὸν φόβον αὐτῶν μὴ φοβηθῆτε] Do not ye fear their fear, that is, the fear with which they would inspire you; but sanctify the Lord of Hosts Himself, and let Him be your fear. Isa. viii. 12. 13. See Ps. lxiv. 1, "Preserve my life from fear of the enemy," and above, v. 6, and cp. Phil. i. 28.

15. Κύριον δὲ τὸν Χριστὸν (so A, B, C. Elz. has Θεὸν) ἁγιάσατε] but sanctify the Lord Christ in your hearts. Even Moses and Aaron were excluded from the promised land, because they did not sanctify the Lord among the children of Israel at the waters of strife (Deut. xxxii. 51), but claimed to themselves some of that honour which belongs to Him alone. Cp. Bp. Andrewes, ii. p. 386, "on sanctifying God's Name."

Christ is to be worshipped as God, in the Temple of our hearts, and all that appertains to Him must be treated with reverential awe. His glory is to be the aim and end of all our actions; His word our law; His grace our strength; His blessed Self the object of our desires.

This precept, "to sanctify the Lord Christ in our hearts," especially when compared with the parallel passage, "Fear ye not their fear, but sanctify the LORD of HOSTS Himself, and let him be your fear" (Isa. viii. 12), is a clear demonstration of the Divine Nature of Christ.

When we say, "Hallowed be Thy Name," in the Lord's Prayer, we pray for the sanctification of the Name of our Lord Christ. Cp. Clemens Alex. here.

We may be thankful, therefore, for the testimonies of the most ancient MSS., and of the Vulgate, Syriac, Armenian, Coptic, Sahidic, and Arabic (Erpenian) Versions, which are followed here by Lachmann, Tisch., Alford, for the restoration of this important reading (Χριστὸν) to the Text.

— ἑτοῖμοι ἀεί] being always ready to give an answer, ἀπολογίαν, an apology, in the theological sense of the term, viz. refutation of objections on the part of Jews and Heathens; and a clear logical statement in behalf of Christianity; in reply to every man who asketh you a reason, or account, of the hope that is in you.

Here (says Didymus) is a caution to those who imagine that it is enough for us to lead what is called a moral life, without a sound foundation of Christian faith; and here (he adds) is a special admonition to the Clergy, to be able to solve doubts and remove difficulties which may perplex their people, and to stop the mouth of gainsayers (Tit. i. 11), and render a satisfactory reason of whatever they do, or teach.

On the duty of examining the evidences of Religion, and of being able to render an account of the reason of the hope that is in us, see above, 1 Thess. v. 21. 1 Cor. x. 15.

— ἀλλά] but: not in Elz., but in A, B, C. This caution was necessary, and it is made more emphatic by the ἀλλά. Be always ready to render to every man a reason or account of the Christian hope that is in you; but (ἀλλὰ) take good heed to do this with meekness, and not with insolence, or presumption.

Some of the interpolated "Acts of the Martyrs,"—for example, those of S. Cæcilia,—afford a comment on this text. In the Acts of her Martyrdom, as recently published, the Christian Virgin is transformed into a bold virago, venting the language of insult against her Roman Judge sitting on the seat of authority. Very different, doubtless, was the real demeanour of S. Cæcilia in the hour of trial. Very different was the demeanour of all genuine Martyrs imitating the example of Christ, who, when He was reviled, reviled not again (Isa. liii. 7. 1 Pet. ii. 23); and obeying this precept of St. Peter.

16. συνείδησιν ἀγαθὴν] a good conscience (see Acts xxiii. 1. Heb. xiii. 18). A good conscience is one which governs itself by sound Reason, and applies to itself, for its own regulation, the Rule of God's will, especially as revealed in His Word. This is the conscience which produces καλὴν ἀναστροφὴν, good conversation. See Bp. Sanderson, iv. pp. 10. 65—90.

18. ὅτι καὶ Χριστὸς] because even Christ suffered once on account of sins (περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, cp. Rom. viii. 3. 2 Cor. v. 21), a just person on behalf of unjust (see above, ii. 24. Rom. v. 6), in order that He might present us to God.

The Sin-offerings in the Old Testament are styled above sixty times in the LXX τὰ περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν. Therefore the Jews, to whom the Apostle writes, would understand his words here to mean, that Christ suffered to make atonement for sins, by suffering the punishment of sin in the stead of those for whom He offered Himself a sacrifice on the Cross.

— θανατωθεὶς μὲν σαρκὶ] having been put to death in the flesh. St. Peter thus guards his readers against the heresy of Simon Magus, and the Docetæ, who said that Christ's flesh was a phantom; and against that of the Cerinthians, and other false teachers, whose errors were propagated in Asia, who alleged that 18—22.] The important statements contained in these verses will be best considered collectively in one note.

Christ suffered, a just person on behalf of the unjust, in order that He might present and bring us near to God (see Rom. v. 2. Eph. ii. 18; iii. 12), Who before was alienated from us; having been put to death in His human flesh, but quickened in spirit (i. e. in His disembodied human spirit), in which (human spirit) He went and preached even (καὶ) to the spirits (disembodied human spirits) which were then in prison (φυλακῇ), which spirits disobeyed (did not hearken, Rom. xi. 30, 31. Heb. iii. 18) formerly, when the long-suffering of God was waiting (ἀπεξεδέχετο, which is the reading of the best MSS. and Editions. Elz. has ἅπαξ ἐδέχετο; compare Rom. viii. 25) in the days of Noe, when the Ark was preparing, into which (εἰς ἣν) few persons (ὀλίγοι A, B), that is, eight souls, entering, were saved effectually (διεσώθησαν. As to the accusative cp. Gen. xix. 19, διασωθῆναι εἰς τὸ ὄρος. Thucyd. i. 110, ἐς Κυρήνην διεσώθησαν) by means of water, which overwhelmed the rest of the world. And so δι' ὕδατος may have also a secondary sense, and mean, "through the water," which drowned the disobedient, while Noah had a refuge and means of escape from and through it, in the Ark.

St. Peter is here exhorting his readers to suffer patiently for doing well; and for this purpose he presents to them the example of Christ; first in suffering: then in the fruits of suffering; namely, in the collation of infinite good to others, on earth, under the earth, and in heaven: so filling all things with His power and love; and in the acquisition of eternal sovereignty and glory to His own Humanity in heavenly places, by virtue of His sufferings in His own human body upon earth.

St. Peter's language is best illustrated by that of St. Paul in Phil. ii. 5—11, where, like St. Peter, he is exhorting to humility and patience by a consideration of the condescension, sufferings, and subsequent exaltation of Jesus Christ; "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, who, when subsisting in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even to the death of the Cross. Wherefore God also highly exalted Him, and gave Him the name, which is above every name, that at the name of JESUS every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

St. Peter shows, that Christ, Who is God (v. 15), and just, and sinless (i. 19), condescended in His love to suffer for sins; that, in His love for us, He vouchsafed to suffer for us, in order to bring us near to God; that He, Who is perfectly just, and therefore not liable to any punishment, consented to suffer for us, when we were unjust: and that He suffered once, and once only.

Here is our pattern and example.

Here also is our comfort.

His sufferings, which were endured once for all (ἅπαξ), were the means of everlasting blessedness to others, and of eternal glory to Himself.

For, says the Apostle, although He was put to death in the flesh, yet that death itself was the occasion of new honour to Himself; and of great good to others, to whom He went after death.

When He was on the cross He breathed forth His human spirit, and gave up the ghost, and died. (Matt. xxvii. 50. Luke xxiii. 46.)

At His death, His human spirit was severed from His human flesh. His human flesh was taken down from the cross, and was laid by Joseph of Arimathæa in a new tomb. (Matt. xxvii. 57—60.)

But His human spirit, being liberated by death from the burden of the flesh, acquired new life by death: it gained new powers of motion; it went forth on a journey (ἐπορεύθη); it travelled on a blessed mission to the region of departed spirits (πνεύματα), and entered the place where they were detained in prison (φυλακῇ).

Christ then went in His human spirit, and preached (ἐκήρυξε) to those spirits in prison, which were disobedient formerly, and did not hearken to the preaching of the Patriarch, when the long-suffering of God was waiting for the space of one hundred and twenty years (Gen. vi. 3), in the days of Noe, when the Ark was preparing, into which only eight persons entered, and were saved by water: and the rest perished in the flood.

Few indeed were they, who were thus saved in the Ark; but we Christians, adds the Apostle, we are now being saved by Baptism, which was typified by the Flood. We are being saved by Baptism, through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, whose spirit, having gone into the place of departed spirits, preached to those who had been disobedient formerly in the days of Noah, when the Ark was a preparing, but not yet built, more than 2000 years before the days of Christ, by whom the Church Universal, typified of old by the Ark, has now been built for all nations: and Who, having gone in His spirit to the lower region of departed spirits, has now raised Himself from the Grave, and has become the pledge and first-fruits of our Resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 20), and having reunited His human body to His human spirit, went on another journey, even to the highest regions of heaven, and is at the right hand of God, Angels and Authorities and Powers having been made subject unto Him.

These important statements may be compared with St. Peter's speech on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 23—36.

St. Peter, in using the word πνεῦμα, is not here speaking of the Holy Spirit, as has been supposed by some; but he is speaking of the action of Christ's human spirit (πνεῦμα), when it departed from His human flesh at His death on the cross.

The word πνεῦμα, or spirit, is here contrasted with the word σὰρξ, flesh: the former being that higher and nobler part of human nature, by which we are akin to God, and recipients of His Spirit; whereas σὰρξ, flesh, represents that side of our nature by which we appertain to earth. See Matt. xxvi. 41. Mark xiv. 38. John vi. 63. Col. ii. 5. Heb. xii. 9; and note above on 1 Thess. v. 23. And see the passages in which the πνεῦμα, or human spirit of Christ, is mentioned, Mark viii. 12. Luke x. 21; xxiii. 46. John xiii. 21; xix. 30.

This is the meaning assigned to the word πνεῦμα, spirit, here, by ancient Expositors, who cited this text, in refutation of the Apollinarian heresy, which denied the reality of our Lord's human spirit. Thus S. Athanasius (c. Apollinar. ii. c. 8) says, "If the soul is only carnal, why does it not die with the body, and why does St. Peter call the souls detained in prison spirits?" And so the Vulgate, Syriac, and Arabic Versions, and many of the best modern interpreters from the times of Estius.

And S. Hilary says (on Ps. cxxxviii.), "This is the condition of our humanity; after our death our bodies are buried, but our souls descend to their appointed place below (ad inferos). And our Lord Himself, in order that He might fulfil all the laws of a real humanity, did not decline that descent."

Elz. has τῷ before πνεύματι here; but this is not in A, B, C, G, K, and is rejected by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf.

Christ was put to death in His σὰρξ, flesh, the earthly part of our nature; but in His human spirit ἐζωοποιήθη, He was endued with new powers of vitality by death. During His lifetime on earth He was restrained by the earthly conditions of His flesh: He preached in person to only a few of His own age and country. He delivered them from the captivity of sin and Satan; He proclaimed liberty to the captives; He preached to them deliverance from prison, and an Evangelic Jubilee. (Luke iv. 18.)

But after death He went in His disembodied spirit to the nether world. Death opened to Him a new sphere of missionary enterprise. He went and preached to the spirits in prison—to spirits of a by-gone generation, to spirits which had lived upon earth in the days of the Patriarch Noah, more than two thousand years before.

Thus Satan's malice recoiled upon himself. He had instigated Judas to betray Christ, and the Jews to kill Him. But by Christ's death new life accrued to Christ, and new comfort was ministered to spirits, which were held in prison in the lower world.

Observe here the word πορευθείς, and again in v. 22. It describes an actual journey of Christ. He is here (in v. 19) described as going to the lower world of Spirits, and He is described there (v. 22) as going into heaven. There is a local transition in both passages. Christ made two journeys: one downward in His human spirit to the nether world of disembodied spirits; and another upward in His risen body, reunited to His spirit, to the heavenly world of angels, and to the right hand of God.

Observe also the word καὶ before πνεύμασιν. Christ, who before had preached on earth to men, in bodily presence, now, after His removal from them by death, preached also, or even, to human spirits in the region under the earth, in the time between His Death and Resurrection.

After the Incarnation, no portion of Christ's time has ever been without benefit to mankind. Wherever He goes, whether on earth, or under the earth, or in heaven (cp. Phil. ii. 10), He carries ποτὲ, ὅτε ἀπεξεδέχετο ἡ τοῦ Θεοῦ μακροθυμία, ἐν ἡμέραις Νῶε, κατασκευαζο-blessings with Him. He fills all things with His love. He suffers, and conquers by suffering. He dies, and lives by Death, and brings eternal life to others, and everlasting glory to Himself.

Next, remark the word ἐκήρυξεν. Thus placed it cannot be understood in any other sense than He preached—preached the Gospel. This word κηρύσσω is placed thus in about fifteen other passages of the New Testament, and in every one it means to preach the Gospel or preach Christ. See Matt. iii. 1; iv. 17; x. 7. 27; xi. 1. Mark i. 7. 38, 39; iii. 14; v. 20; xvi. 20. Luke iv. 44. Rom. x. 14. 1 Cor. ix. 27; xv. 11.

Accordingly, this is the sense assigned to the word κηρύσσω here by the ancient Greek Fathers, e. g. S. Irenæus (iv. 37. 2, p. 347, Grabe), "Dominum in eâ quæ sunt sub terrâ descendisse evangelizantem adventum suum."

And in another place (iii. 33), S. Irenæus speaks of Christ as going down to Hades, and says, "Primogenitus enim mortuorum natus Dominus, et in sinum suum recipiens pristinos patres, regeneravit eos in vitam Dei." And a little after, "Hic illos in evangelium vitæ regeneravit."

These phrases are a comment on the text of St. Peter, He went and preached to the spirits in prison; as is observed by Wall on Infant Baptism, I. ch. iii.

So Clemens Alex., Strom. vi. 6, ὁ Κύριος δι' οὐδὲν ἕτερον εἰς ᾅδου κατῆλθεν, ἢ διὰ τὸ εὐαγγελίσασθαι. So S. Cyril Alex. in John xvi. 16, and his Homil. Paschal. xx. Cp. A Lapide here, p. 214.

Also the word φυλακὴ can hardly have any other sense than prison. See Matt. v. 25; xiv. 3; xviii. 30; xxv. 36. 39. 43, 44. Mark vi. 17. 27. Luke iii. 20; xii. 58; xxi. 12; xxii. 33; xxiii. 19. John iii. 24. Acts v. 19; xii. 4; and in thirteen other places; and 2 Cor. vi 5; xi. 23. Heb. xi. 36. Rev. ii. 10; xx. 7.

Lastly, in the history of Joseph in prison, and in his deliverance and exaltation, we have a type of Christ's Burial and Resurrection and Ascension. See Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. v. p. 475; Art. vi. p. 515; and note above on Acts vii. 1.

The time in which Joseph was ἐν φυλακῇ, in prison (see LXX in Gen. xl. 3), was signalized by a remarkable exercise of his prophetic office in the revelation of deliverance from punishment. Cp. Gen. xli. 43. May not that incident, which is recorded with so much circumstantiality in Holy Writ, concerning Joseph, the type of Christ in His Burial, Resurrection, and Ascension, have some reference to the preaching of Christ to the spirits in prison?

On the whole, then, we arrive at this result,—

Christ in His human spirit preached to spirits in prison; and having done this, He raised His own body from the dead, and went in that body, reunited to His spirit, into Heaven, where He is now in His glorified manhood, at the right hand of God, Angels and Principalities and Powers being made subject unto Him.

Here is the climax of all. Well, then, may the Apostle proceed to add, Since then CHRIST suffered in the flesh, and thus conferred blessings upon mankind on earth, and under the earth, and thus entered into His glory in heaven, arm ye yourselves with the same mind.

Let the same mind be in you which was in Christ Jesus, Who, as St. Paul speaks, first descended into the lower parts of the earth, and then ascended into heaven that He might fill all things (Eph. iv. 9, 10), and being God from Eternity, took on Him the form of a slave, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, and thus obtained the Name that is above every name, that at the Name of JESUS every knee should bow, of not only beings in heaven and on earth, but also under the earth (καταχθονίων), "and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." (Phil. ii. 5—11.)

In like manner, St. John, in the Apocalypse, speaks of beings under the earth (ὑποκάτω τῆς γῆς) as joining with those in earth, and in heaven, in ascribing praise and glory to the Lamb who had been slain. (Rev. v. 12, 13.)

This then is the scope of St. Peter's argument;

He is delivering an exhortation to suffer gladly for well-doing after the example of Christ, God Incarnate, suffering death for man, procuring benefits for all by suffering, and thus entering into His heavenly glory; and by virtue of His Incarnation and Passion, His Resurrection and Ascension, exalting all, who suffer for Him, to bliss eternal.

In this argument the Apostle asserts that our Lord in His human spirit went and preached to the spirits in prison, who were formerly disobedient in the days of Noah.

He states the fact, but he does not declare the subject of the preaching, nor its result.

Our duty therefore here is to receive with reverence what is revealed, and not to aspire "to be wise above what is written." (1 Cor. iv. 6.)

Much consolation and instruction may be derived from what is here revealed.

It is a comfortable thing to know, that the human spirit of Christ was not in any way impaired by death. Hence we receive a blessed assurance, that our own human spirits, on their dissolution from the body, will not lose any of their energies.

It is a joyful thing to know, that Christ's human spirit was quickened by death; thus we learn, that our human spirits, if we die in the Lord, will acquire new life by death. This is also clear from other scriptures, especially from the conveyance of the spirit of Lazarus, on his death, into Abraham's bosom (see on Luke xvi. 22, 23), and from the transition of the spirit of the penitent thief from the cross to Paradise. See on Luke xxiii. 43, and Justin Martyr (c. Tryphon. c. 5), where he says that the "souls of the righteous abide in a better place, and the souls of the wicked in a worse place—awaiting the future judgment," which is quite consistent with the assertion of Lactantius (Inst. vii. 21), that "disembodied spirits are in one region," inasmuch as that region has two distinct compartments, between which "a great gulf is fixed."

By this journey of Christ's spirit to the nether world of disembodied spirits, Death has been despoiled of its terrors, and the Grave has become to us a Passage to peace, and a Gate of light and joy.

It is also a comfortable thing to know, that the disembodied spirit of our adorable Redeemer was full of tenderness to men. That love extended even to by-gone generations, whose names are unknown to us. He went and preached—preached to spirits in prison; to those spirits which had been disobedient formerly, when the Ark was a preparing, and which had not entered into the Ark, and which were now in a place of confinement.

So much the Holy Spirit reveals to us by St. Peter. And in this revelation He affords us abundant cause for gratitude to Christ, and for stedfast trust in Him, and for patient suffering for Him, and for a lively hope of a glorious Resurrection and Ascension to Him, and of an eternity of glory with Him.

Let it not, however, be imagined that He here gives any ground for presumption, that, if we do not do well, and are not ready to suffer for Christ, and if we die in disobedience and impenitence, there remains for us any message of comfort after death.

For, be it observed, the circumstances of the persons here mentioned are unique, and can never again be paralleled. Christ, says St. Peter, suffered once for sin. He died once, but He dieth no more. He went in His human spirit after His Death, and before His Resurrection, and He preached to spirits in prison. But He is now risen from the dead; He has now ascended into Heaven.

The incidents of that preaching, therefore, can never recur.

It was fit, that, as the hour of His Crucifixion was marked by an extraordinary miracle of mercy, the rescue of the spirit of the penitent thief confessing Him in that crisis of shame, and by the translation of that spirit to Paradise, so His descent into the nether world should be marked by some special extraordinary overtures of mercy to spirits in prison.

Besides, the circumstances of the spirits in prison, to whom He is here described as preaching, were also unique and unparalleled.

They likewise can never recur.

God has pledged His word, that He will never more send a Flood of waters to drown the earth. (Gen. ix. 11. 15.) Other judgments were local, the Flood was universal.

Besides, though they who lived then, had the benefits of the preaching and example of Noah, and the long-suffering of God waited for one hundred and twenty years while the Ark was a preparing, yet their condition was very different from that of all generations of men since the Death of Christ.

The men of Noah's age had only the example of a single godly family (Gen. vi. 7, 8. 11—13; vii. 1), and, as far as appears, Noah alone and his house had a direct invitation to come into the Ark; and God looked upon the earth, and all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth (vi. 12), and the result was, that all flesh died (vii. 21), and only eight persons were saved in the Ark. But, after Christ's Resurrection, He gave a commission to His disciples to preach the Gospel to all nations (Matt. xxviii. 19) and to baptize all.

The waters of Baptism are as universal as the waters of the Flood. They are now saving us (v. 21); their saving power never ceases. God will never more send the destroying waters of a μένης κιβωτοῦ, εἰς ἣν ὀλίγοι, τουτέστιν ὀκτὼ ψυχαὶ, διεσώθησαν δι' ὕδατος·

21 [r] ὃ καὶ ἡμᾶς ἀντίτυπον νῦν σώζει βάπτισμα, οὐ σαρκὸς ἀπόθεσις ῥύπου, [r] Eph. 5. 26. ch. 1. 3.

Flood; and He will never dry up the saving waters of Baptism. The Ark of Noah was fixed in one place, and in fine it received only eight persons. But the antitype of the Ark, the Christian Church, is universal in time and place. He pours out His Holy Spirit on all flesh (Acts ii. 17), and His Gospel will be preached as a witness every where (Matt. xxiv. 14), and His words will never pass away. (Matt. xxiv. 35.)

Thus the circumstances of the generation of those who perished in the flood, differed widely from those of all generations since the coming of Christ even to the end of the world.

There appear therefore to be special reasons for special mercy to them.

There seem to be also special reasons for a reference here to their case.

Many ancient Heretics, especially the Marcionites and Manichæans, and their predecessors, even in the days of the Apostles, asserted the doctrine of dualism, that is, of two opposite principles in the world. They represented the Law as contrary to the Gospel (see Epiphanius, Hæres. lxvi.; Bp. Pearson, Art. i. p. 120, note). They said, that the God of the Old Testament was at variance with the God of the New. They alleged that the God of the former was of a stern disposition, different from the God of the Gospel. They introduced two antagonistic deities, and undermined the doctrine of the unity and sovereignty (μοναρχία) of God. This theory of dualism was the groundwork of almost all the Gnostic heresies of the Apostolic times.

This theory derived some arguments from the history of the Flood. (Cp. Aug. c. Adv. Legis, i. 45.)

St. Peter's Epistle was probably written in the East (see v. 13). There the belief in two opposite principles, a Good and Evil, was widely disseminated by the religion of Zoroaster, and by the Magi of Persia (see on Isa. xlv. 3—7). There also the Ark rested after the Waters of the Flood.

The author of this Epistle, written in the East, may have heard the objections raised on the history of the Flood, against the Divine Benevolence, and the unity of the Godhead; and he appears to be answering such objections as those, and to be vindicating that history. He shows the harmony of God's dispensations, Patriarchal and Evangelical. He teaches us to behold in the Ark a type of the Church, and in the Flood a type of Baptism. He thus refutes the Manichæan Heresy. He says that God was merciful even to that generation. He speaks of God's long-suffering, waiting for them while the Ark was preparing. He states boldly the objection, that few, only eight souls, were saved in the Ark, and he contrasts the condition of those who were drowned in the Flood with the condition of those who have now offers of salvation in Baptism. He says, that the rest disobeyed, while the Ark was preparing. He uses the aorist tense (ἀπειθήσασι). He does not say, that when the Ark had been prepared, and when the Ark was shut, and when the Flood came, and it was too late for them to reach it, they all remained impenitent. Perhaps some were penitent at the eleventh hour, like the thief on the cross. Every one will be justly dealt with by God. There are degrees of punishment as there are of reward. (See on Matt. x. 15. Luke xii. 48.) God does not quench the smoking flax (Matt. xii. 20). And St. Peter, by saying that they did not hearken formerly, while the Ark was preparing, almost seems to suggest the inference, that they did hearken now when One, greater than Noah, came in His human spirit, into the abysses of the deep of the lower world; and that a happy change was wrought in the condition of some among them by His coming.

In the words of S. Hilary (on Ps. cxix. 82), "When wilt thou comfort me?" The soul (of the faithful) knows, on the witness of the Apostle Peter, that when the Lord went down into Hades, words of comfort were preached even to those who were in prison, and were formerly unbelieving in the day of Noah, and did not enter the Ark, but may probably have had some strong penitential emotions, and have put up some hearty penitential prayers to God, and may have had some earnest desires, and made some eager but fruitless efforts to enter the Ark, when the Flood came and destroyed them. And S. Cyril answers an objection to the lateness of Christ's Incarnation, by saying, that many, who would have profited by his preaching, if He had been incarnate in their age, derived benefit from His manifestation to the region of departed souls. See the ancient valuable testimonies recently published by Dr. Cramer, Catena, pp. 66—70, and cp. Greg. Nazian., Orat. Pasch. xlii.; and Theophylact here, p. 372, ed. Bened.; and Œcumen.; and an excellent note by Estius on this passage.

The Church of England, in one of her Articles published in the fourth year of King Edward VI., declared that the body of Christ lay in the grave until His Resurrection; but His spirit which He gave up, was with the spirits detained in prison, and preached to them, as the place of St. Peter testifieth; and she has wisely appointed this portion of St. Peter's Epistle (1 Pet. iii. 17—22) to be read as the Epistle on Easter Even; and thus she on that day suggests to the faithful a profitable and consolatory meditation on the work of mercy and love, in which the disembodied spirit of our adorable Saviour was employed at that solemn time when His human body was lying in the grave.

Such appears to be the most probable interpretation of this very interesting portion of Holy Writ. Expounded in this sense, it harmonizes with the Apostle's argument concerning the blessedness of suffering for doing well in imitation of Christ.

A view of the various expositions of this subject may be seen in S. Augustine's Epistle to Euodia, Ep. 164, al. 99. Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii. p. 211; and Art. v. pp. 425—455. Cp. Milton, Par. Lost, xi. 723; Abp. Leighton here; Bp. Beveridge, and especially Professor Harold Browne on the Third Article of the Church of England; Bp. Horsley, vol. i. serm. xx.; Bp. Middleton here; and in the notes of De Wette, Huther, pp. 129—134, and Dean Alford on this passage.

21. ὃ—ἀντίτυπον—βάπτισμα] which (water) also is now saving us, being an antitype of the water of the Flood; and being ministered to us as Baptism.

"Τύπος est res præfigurans, ἀντίτυπον est res præfigurata." Raphel.

Elz. has ᾧ here, in the dative case; but ὅ, the nominative, which (i. e. water), is the reading of A, B, C, G, K, and is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf.

The word βάπτισμα, Baptism, is placed emphatically at the end, and stands in contrast with Circumcision, which some of St. Peter's Jewish readers were disposed to enforce as necessary to salvation; and the absence of all reference to Circumcision in this Epistle is a silent protest against the Judaizing notions, at which he himself had once been tempted to connive. See Gal. ii. 11—17.

St. Peter affirms that Baptism saveth us; that is, God therein does His part effectually for the salvation of all who come to Him therein. Compare St. Paul's words in Titus iii. 5, where, for a like reason, the aorist tense is used, ἔσωσεν ἡμᾶς, "He saved us by the laver of regeneration, and by the renewing of the Holy Ghost."

Thus St. Peter shows the harmony of God's dealings with mankind. He teaches that the Ark, "in which Noah and his family were saved from perishing by water," is a type of the Church of Christ, in which all who are "stedfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in charity, pass the waves of this troublesome world, till they finally come to the land of everlasting life;" and that in their double character the waters of the Flood were symbolical of the water of Baptism, salvific to all who obey God and enter the Ark which He has built for them, and abide therein; and destructive to them who disobey Him; and thus they have a double office, as Christ Himself and all His dispensations have. See Luke ii. 34. 2 Cor. ii. 16. Rev. ix. 14—20.

The mystery of salvation, says Justin Martyr, was manifest in the Flood. The righteous Noah, the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, in whom the new generation arose, as it were, from the dead, after the Flood, seems to have had a figurative relation to the eighth day, the day of the Resurrection of Christ (see above on Luke xxiv. 1, and below on 2 Pet. ii. 5), the first-begotten of every creature and the Origin of the new race born again of Him through Water and Faith. See Justin Martyr c. Tryphon. c. 138. S. Aug. c. Adv. Legis, i. 45. Cp. Jerome c. Jovinian. ii. p. 214; adv. Lucif. p. 303.

At the Creation, the Holy Spirit moved on the face of the waters, and all things were created out of the Water by the Word of God. (Gen. i. 6. 9. 2 Pet. iii. 5, 6.)

At the Deluge Noah and his family were saved by water, in which the world was drowned; and a new generation arose in Noah and his family, to people the world after its Baptism by Water.

At the new Creation of mankind in Christ, Who is the Second Adam, the Holy Ghost came down from heaven to sanctify Water in the Baptism of Christ, Who had been conceived by the Holy Ghost. Thus the Holy Ghost, the "Author of the first genesis or birth, was also the Giver of Palingenesia or New Birth" (see Tertullian, de Baptismo, c. 3; Bp. Andrewes, iii. 250); and He has sealed that New Birth to us by the Resurrection of Christ our Head from the Grave, which is represented to us in Baptism, "wherein Justification and a title to eternal life are exhibited to us, as the Death and Burial of Christ are symbolically undergone by us" (Dr. Barrow, v. p. 70); wherein we are born anew and grafted into the Body of Christ, and our life is hid with Him in God. (Col. iii. 3.)

Thus "Baptism represents to us our profession, which is to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto Him, that as He died and rose again for us, so we who are baptized and buried with Christ in His death, should be dead to sin and live unto righteousness," "continually mortifying all our evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceeding in all virtue and godliness of living," in order that we who are "baptized into His death may pass through the grave and gate of death to our joyful Resurrection, through His merits who died, and was buried and rose again for us, Jesus Christ our Lord."

— οὐ σαρκὸς ἀπόθεσις ῥύπου] not the putting away the filth of the flesh. St. Peter contrasts the Christian Baptism (βάπτισμα) with the Jewish washings (βαπτισμοί), "What is the use of that baptism which only cleans the flesh? Be ye baptized in your souls," says Justin Martyr to the Jew Tryphon, capp. 14 and 18.

— ἐπερώτημα] an interrogatory. The baptism which saveth us is not, as legal purifications were, a cleansing of the flesh from outward impurity, but it is ἐπερώτημα, an interrogative trial of a good conscience towards God. Hooker, V. lxiii.

St. Peter lays stress here on the ἐπερώτημα, or questioning, rather than on the answering, because to save is the act of God, and it is God Who originates the work of the Baptismal covenant by His interrogation, "Dost thou believe?" "Wilt thou obey?"

But St. Peter also marks man's part as necessary, by saying that it is the interrogation of a good conscience, εἰς Θεὸν, towards God, Who reads the heart; this it is which saveth, i. e. which is the instrument in God's hand for saving man.

The interrogatory examinations and trials of the Faith and Obedience of Catechumens before the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptism are described in the primitive records of the Church. See the address of St. Philip to the Eunuch, Acts viii. 37. Justin Martyr, writing in the second century, says (Apol. i. c. 61), "As many persons as believe that the things which we preach are true, and who promise to live accordingly . . . . are brought to a place where is water, and are made regenerate by the same way of Regeneration as we ourselves are regenerate, and are baptized in water in the name of the Father of all, and of Jesus Christ our Saviour, and of the Holy Ghost." Tertullian, in the same century, describes the baptismal interrogatories and vow of Renunciation, Faith, and Obedience; De Spectac. c. 4, De Coronâ Milit. c. 3, and De Resurrectione Carnis, c. 48, where he says, "Anima non lavatione sed responsione sancitur." Cp. Cyprian, Epist. 70. 76. 85. S. Hippolytus, Theophan. c. 10. Origen, Exhortatio ad Martyr. c. 12, and Vales. in Euseb. vii. 8, and Euseb. vii. 9, where Dionysius, Bp. of Alexandria, in the third century, speaks of a person who was present at the baptism of some who were lately baptized and heard the questions and answers, τῶν ἐπερωτήσεων καὶ ἀποκρίσεων. It is of these baptismal ἐπερωτήσεις that St. Peter is here speaking.

The reading of the Vulgate is "interrogatio bonæ conscientiæ in Deum," and the Greek Expositors interpret the word ἐπερώτημα by ἐξέτασις or ἐκζήτησις (Theophyl. p. 373), and by ἀρραβών, ἐνέχυρον, and ἀπόδεξις, a pledge or stipulation (Œcum.). Cp. Estius and Grotius here, and Bingham, Antiquities, xi. chap. vii., and Dr. Waterland on Justification, p. 440, who says, "St. Peter assures us that Baptism saves: that is, it gives a just title to salvation, which is the same as to say that it conveys justification. But then it must be understood, not of the outward washing, but of the inward lively faith stipulated in it and by it; Baptism concurs with Faith, and Faith with Baptism, and the Holy Spirit with both; and so the merits of Christ are savingly applied. Faith alone will not ordinarily serve in this case, but it must be a contracting faith on man's part; contracting in form corresponding to the federal promises and engagements on God's part; therefore Tertullian rightly styles Baptism obsignatio fidei, testatio fidei, sponsio salutis, fidei pactio, and the like." See note above, on Heb. x. 21.

De Wette also and Huther understand the word ἐπερώτημα in this sense, and so Professor Blunt (Early Church, pp. 36, 37), who observes that "it is certain that there was a public form of Baptism of the most primitive, even of an Apostolical date," for which he cites this passage, and Heb. vi. 1, 2; cp. Rom. x. 10; and thence we may recognize the scriptural and primitive character of the Interrogatories and Vows of Renunciation, Faith, and Obedience in the Office for the Administration of Baptism in the Book of Common Prayer of the United Church of England and Ireland. Cp. Palmer's Origines Liturgicæ, chap. v. sect. ii.—iv.

For a reply to the Anabaptist objection that interrogatories ought not to be addressed to Infants who cannot answer them with their own mouths, see Hooker, V. lxiv.

22. ὑποταγέντων αὐτῷ ἀγγέλων] Angels being subjected to Him. A protest against the heresies of the Apostolic age which subordinated Christ to Angels. See on Col. ii. 8, and Tertullian (Præscr. Hær. 33), speaking of Simon Magus, "Simonianæ magiæ disciplina Angelis serviens, utique et ipsa inter idololatrias deputabatur, et à Petro Apostolo in ipso Simone damnabatur." On St. Peter's encounter with Simon Magus, see above, Introduction, p. 37, and to the Second Epistle; and Acts viii. 9, 10.

CH. IV. 1. ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν] for us: not in B, C, but in A, G, K, and most cursive MSS., and in the Syriac and Coptic Versions, and many Greek Fathers.

— ὁπλίσασθε] arm ye yourselves—as soldiers, against the lusts, which war against the soul; ii. 11.

1, 2. ὅτι ὁ παθὼν ἐν σαρκὶ] because he that suffered, as Christ suffered, in the flesh, hath rested (πέπαυται) from sin, as Christ rested in the grave on the sabbath of His burial; he who has thus suffered, rises again from the grave of sin by a spiritual Resurrection; not to live any longer in subserviency to the lusts of man, but to the will of God. See below, on Rev. xx. 6.

He that has been crucified with Christ in his flesh (Rom. vi. 6; viii. 2. Gal. vi. 14), that is, he that is crucified and dead to carnal lusts (Gal. ii. 19, 20), has been buried with Christ unto death, and has "put off the body of sin in the flesh," in baptism, and has found in this baptismal burial a spiritual rest or sabbath from sin; and as Christ was raised from the dead on the first day of the week, so he rises again to God, in order to serve in newness of life. He is dead unto sin, and "his life is hid with Christ in God." Col. iii. 3. See above on i. 21, and Gerhard and Calvin here.

3. χρόνος] Elz. adds τοῦ βίου,—not in A, B, C.

— βούλημα] desire. So A, B, C. Elz. has θέλημα, will. On the difference between θέλω and βούλομαι see 1 Thess. ii. 18. Philem. 13, 14. There is a force in the contrast here. Formerly they were subservient to the desire (βούλημα) of the Heathen, but now they are obedient to the will (θέλημα) of God. See ii. 15; iii. 17; iv. 2. 19.

— κατειργάσθαι] to have wrought. So A, B, C, a reading much preferable to that of Elz., κατεργάσασθαι.

— οἰνοφλυγίαις] "temulentiis;" swillings of wine: from οἶνος and φλύω, φλύζω, to swell, as it were, with boiling heat (φλέγω, φλόξ). See Wetstein, p. 693.

4. ξενίζονται] they are surprised, as by some strange apparition. Cp. Acts xvii. 20, ξενίζοντα εἰσφέρεις: below, v. 12. The word is used in this sense by Polybius, Plutarch, Philo, and Josephus; see the passages in Wetstein, pp. 566 and 694. Compare the use of ξενισμὸς, surprise, in Ignatius ad Ephes. c. 19, and Dr. Jacobson's note. The servant of God seems like a strange prodigy to the world. Even the Heathen writers of the post-apostolic age could thus speak, "Rari quippe boni, numero vix sunt totidem quot Thebarum portæ . . . Nunc si depositum non inficietur amicus, . . . Prodigiosa fides, et Tuscis digna libellis, . . . Egregium sanctumque virum si cerno, bimembri Hoc monstrum puero, vel mirandis sub aratro Piscibus inventis, et fetæ comparo mulæ." Juvenal, xiii. 24. 60—66.

— μὴ συντρεχόντων ὑμῶν εἰς τὴν αὐτὴν τῆς ἀσωτίας ἀνάχυσιν] because you do not run together, like foul streams flowing together into one and the same sink, or sewer (sentina), of licentiousness.

A strong and expressive metaphor; especially in countries where after violent rains the gutters are suddenly swollen and pour their contents together with violence into a common sewer. Such is the Apostolic picture of vicious companies rushing together in a filthy confluence for reckless indulgence and effusion in sin. Cp. Juvenal, iii. 63, "Jam pridem Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orontes," &c., and G. Dyer's description of the Ruins of Rome, vv. 62—66.

5. κρῖναι ζῶντας καὶ νεκρούς] to judge the quick (i. e. those who will be alive at His second coming) and the dead: and thus to judge all. See above, on 1 Thess. iv. 17. 1 Cor. xv. 51.

6. νεκροῖς] dead in sins. See Eph. ii. 1. Col. ii. 13. Rev. iii. 1. "Animâ mortuis," Aug. Epist. 164. Clemens Alexand. and Cassiodorus here. No valid objection to this interpretation of νεκροῖς is to be found in the allegation, that in the preceding verse νεκροὺς means men physically dead. Precisely the same transition from one meaning of νεκροὺς to another, is found in our Lord's saying, "Let the dead bury their dead," Matt. viii. 22, and cp. John v. 25—29, where see the notes.

The argument of the Apostle is clear; They who revile you with blasphemous words for not running together with them in their godless and riotous excesses, will be required to render an account (of this their reviling and blasphemy) to Him who is ready to judge the quick and the dead. For (γὰρ) the Gospel was preached even to men dead in sin (as ye yourselves sometimes were, vv. 2, 3), for this purpose, in order that they might be judged or condemned (vilified by the world, as you are) according to men, in the flesh; but should live to God in the Spirit.

Therefore, since your godly life in the spirit is the end and design of the preaching of the Gospel of God, and since the mockery you encounter, and the condemnation you endure from ungodly men in the flesh, were consequences contemplated by Him, even in the publication of the Gospel—which is man's moral probation, an odour of life to some, and an odour of death to others (2 Cor. ii. 16)—it is certain that they who revile and condemn you for accepting the Gospel of God will have to render an account to Him who is the judge of quick and dead.

— ἵνα] in order that they may be judged, condemned indeed according to men (that is, according to human judgments and in human respects), in the flesh (see on this use of κατὰ, 1 Cor. iii. 3; xv. 32. 2 Cor. vii. 9. Winer, p. 358), but should live according to God, that is, in God's eye, with a view to God and by His power and love, in life eternal, in the spirit.

On this use of ἵνα, in order that, see John ix. 39; xii. 38. 1 Cor. xi. 19. Winer, p. 406.

Christ was condemned and crucified in the flesh by men,—Pilate, the Chief Priests, and People;—but He was quickened in His spirit even by death (see iii. 18, 19), and He liveth for ever to God (Rom. vi. 10). So, subsequently, St. Peter himself was judged and killed by Nero, according to men in the flesh; but by death he gained new life in the spirit; his death was gain to him, for it was his passage to life eternal.

This may be predicated of all those who suffer for Christ in the flesh; they live by dying; they are judged and condemned by the world, but they receive power to "sit on thrones," and to "judge the world:" see below, on Rev. xx. 4—6.

In a certain sense also, this act of judging the righteous by worldly trials may be called an act of the judicial power of God, who uses even evil men to try and judge the good in this world, for their probation, and for His glory. See below, v. 17.

This is the condition of all, who were once dead in spirit, and alive in carnal respects, but who have been raised from the death of sin by Him who is the Life. Their lot is to be condemned by worldly judgments, to suffer in carnal respects; but their privilege and reward it is, to live in the spirit the life of God here, and to dwell with Him in life eternal hereafter. S. Augustine (Epist. 164. 21) thus expounds these words; "For this cause the Gospel was preached to the unbelieving, in order that when they had believed they might be judged in divers tribulations, and even in the death of the flesh, but might live according to God in the spirit, in which spirit they were dead, as long as they continued in sin."

8. ἐκτενῆ] intense: stretching itself forward to the end without interruption: an epithet applied to Prayer, made continuously, Acts xii. 5; and also to Love, above, i. 22.

There is always to be a habit of prayer in the soul, and a habit of love in the heart—it is to reach continuously from the beginning of life to the end; although there may not always be an opportunity of exercising it in the outward acts specified in the foregoing precepts.

— ἀγάπη καλύπτει] Love covereth a multitude of sins. A general expression, describing the virtue of Love, which renders the merits of Christ applicable to the covering of the sins of others and also our own. See note on James v. 20, and Matt. xxv. 35—46, where Love to men in Christ is represented as the future test at the day of Judgment.

St. Peter's words are quoted by Clemens Rom. i. 49. Tertullian, Scorp. c. 6, and Augustine (in Joann. Epist., Tract. i.), who says that Love alone covers sins, because Love is the fulfilling of the Law, and is the opposite of all sins; and he often applies this argument in extenuation of the error of S. Cyprian, in the matter of heretical baptism. See Aug. de Baptismo, ii. c. 1; iv. c. 6; vi. 2: c. Gaudent. ii. 8.

St. Peter had spoken of Love, stretching itself out without interruption; and the passage of St. James (v. 20), considered together with the context here, where St. Peter is presenting Christ as their example, may suggest a belief, that he is comparing the act of Love to that of the Cherubim stretching out their wings on the Mercy Seat, and forming a part of the Mercy Seat (Exod. xxv. 18—20), the emblem of Christ's propitiatory covering of sins (see on Rom. iii. 21—25).

It is observable that the LXX use the words ἐκτείνειν τὰς πτέρυγας to describe the act of the Cherubim stretching out their wings, which touched one another, and reached continuously from one wall of the Holy of Holies to the other. Exod. xxv. 20; xxxvii. 9. Cp. 2 Chron. iii. 7—13; v. 7, 8.

The office of Love may also be compared to the act of the Patriarch's two dutiful sons, stretching out the garment on their shoulders, with their eyes averted from him, and covering the nakedness of their father. Gen. ix. 23.

Elz. has ἡ ἀγάπη καλύψει, charity will cover; but the reading in the text is that which has the preponderance of authority, and is adopted by Lach., Tisch., Alford. Cp. Prov. x. 12, LXX.

10. χάρισμα] a gift, of the Holy Ghost; see 1 Cor. i. 7. St. Peter appears to be studiously imitating and enforcing here St. Paul's admonition, Rom. xii. 6—8.

11. εἴ τις λαλεῖ, ὡς λόγια Θεοῦ] if any one speaks, in teaching, let him speak as do the oracles of God. The words λόγια Θεοῦ are used without any definite article, to designate the Holy Scriptures of God, as being sufficiently definite in themselves, and having the distinctness of a proper name. See Winer, § 19. Rom. iii. 2. Cp. 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16. Gal. i. 8.

Hence the Holy Scriptures are called simply τὰ λόγια by S. Polycarp, ad Phil. c. 7.

This precept of St. Peter deserves the consideration of those who claim to be his successors, and profess great reverence for his authority, and yet derogate from the dignity of the oracles of God, and set up oracles of their own, in place of the Scriptures, and against them. See on 2 Tim. iv. 3. Rev. xi. 3—10.

The delivery of this precept was very appropriate at a time ἰσχύος ἧς χορηγεῖ ὁ Θεός· ἵνα ἐν πᾶσι δοξάζηται ὁ Θεὸς διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ᾧ ἐστιν ἡ δόξα καὶ τὸ κράτος εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων· ἀμήν.

when almost the whole Canon of the New Testament was complete. See 2 Pet. iii. 16.

12, 13. ἀγαπητοί] beloved, be not surprised, as by some strange thing (see v. 4), by the fire of persecution kindled for your trial.

Here is a caution against another dangerous error of the Gnostic Teachers, who said, that provided men had knowledge, they need not be martyrs; and allowed men to comply with the requirements of their persecutors, and to eat meats offered to idols, rather than to suffer martyrdom. Cp. Rev. ii. 20, and the Introduction to the Second Epistle of St. Peter.

On the contrary, St. Peter, in his Epistles, declares the blessedness of suffering for Christ. This is one of their characteristics, probably derived from the writer's personal view of Christ's Glory, when Moses and Elias spake with Him of His Passion (Luke ix. 31) in the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 2). Cp. Tertullian, Scorp. 12, who quotes this passage, vv. 12—16.

The glory and happiness of suffering for God in the fire of persecution might also well occur to his mind at Babylon, where he is writing, and where he would be cheered by a remembrance of the three faithful children walking unhurt in the fiery furnace, with the Son of God. (Dan. iii. 1—25.)

This mention of the near approach of a fiery trial, intimates that this Epistle was written a short time before the Neronian persecution, A.D. 64. See above, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 40, and the Introduction to St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy, pp. 417. 423, and below, v. 17.

15. μὴ γάρ] Cp. James i. 7.

— ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος] one who sets himself up as an overseer and censor of what belongs to others; a judge of other men's servants. Cp. Rom. xiv. 4. James iv. 12. "Alieni speculator," Tertullian, Scorp. 12.

This word is applicable to those who assume spiritual functions which do not belong to them, and intrude into other men's dioceses; and it may be applied to those who call themselves successors of St. Peter, and yet, in contravention of his precept, claim to be "Episcopi Episcoporum."

16. Χριστιανός] a Christian; the name given first to believers at Antioch (Acts xi. 26), of which city St. Peter was Bishop. See note there, and Euseb. iii. 36.

— ὀνόματι] name. So A, B, and many Cursives, Versions, and Fathers. Elz. has μέρει. Cp. Polycarp, Ep. 8, who says, "If we suffer for His name, let us glorify Him."

17. ὅτι ὁ καιρός] for it is now the season of the beginning of judgment at the house of God. Here is another proof that this Epistle was written on the eve of Persecution, see vv. 12, 13. The time is now arrived for it: we are ripe for Persecution. Let no one, therefore, be perplexed or cast down, for it is now the season of the beginning of judgment at the house of God. Ye are tried by Him with temporal judgments, in order that ye may not be condemned with the world (1 Cor. xi. 32), but be purified by the furnace of trial, as silver and gold in the fire, i. 7. Observe, he calls it a season, καιρὸς, not χρόνος, and thus suggests the comfortable reflection, that the tyranny of the enemy will soon be overpast. Ps. lvii. 1.

"When holy men are punished," says Augustine, "this also proceeds from the just judgment of God. It is part of His discipline, which no righteous man is permitted to escape in this world. 'He chasteneth whom He loveth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth' (Heb. xii. 6). Hence the Apostle Peter, when exhorting the brethren to endure sufferings for the Name of Christ, thus speaks (vv. 15—18); and by these words He shows that the sufferings of the righteous proceed from the judgment of God, which begins with the house of God; whence we may infer, how awful will be the sufferings which are reserved for the ungodly: and so St. Paul says, 'we glory in you for your patience and faith in the persecutions and tribulations which ye endure, as a specimen of the just judgment of God'" (2 Thess. i. 4, 5. S. Augustine, Epist. ad Rom. i. 10).

Judgment must begin at the house of God, who out of His tender care for their well-doing will sooner punish—temporally I mean—His own children (when they take pride in their own inventions, and soothe themselves in their own devices) than He will His professed enemies, that stand at defiance with Him, and openly fight against Him. These He suffereth many times to go on in their impieties, that He may make use of this oppression for the scourging those of His own household, and in the end get Himself the more glory by their destruction. But then, however judgment may begin at the house of God, most certain it is, that it shall not end there; but reach the house of the wicked oppressor also; and that, not with temporal judgments, as He did correct His own, but, without repentance, evil shall hunt them to their everlasting destruction (Ps. cxl. 11). God delighteth to get Himself honour, and to show the strength of His arm by scattering such proud Pharaohs in the imagination of their hearts (Exod. xiv. 17. Luke i. 52. Rom. ix. 17), when they are arrived at the highest pitch of their designs; then how suddenly do they consume, perish, and come to a fearful end! (Ps. lxxiii. 18.) Bp. Sanderson, iii. p. 342. See also above, on Acts ix. 3.

19. παρατιθέσθωσαν] let them commit: our Lord's own word on the cross. Luke xxiii. 46.

CH. V. 1. πρεσβυτέρους] the Presbyters: an indication of the organization of the Christian Church under a settled ministry in Asia Minor at this time. Cp. above, Acts xiv. 23, and on James v. 14.

— ὁ συμπρεσβύτερος] your co-presbyter: the Apostle St. John calls himself the presbyter (2 John 1. 3 John 1), and in the third century S. Hippolytus calls his master, S. Irenæus (who was Bishop of Lyons), the blessed Presbyter (Philos. pp. 202. 222). A Presbyter is not called a Bishop by ancient Ecclesiastical writers, but a Bishop is often called a Presbyter.

2. ποιμάνατε] tend ye the flock that is among you: do not leave your own flock, in order to tend other people's flocks, as ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοποι (iv. 15), but tend the flock that is in you, ἐν ὑμῖν; make that your care. Observe the Aorist, which, as Dean Alford well observes, gathers together the whole work of teaching, feeding, watching, leading, into one act, occupying the entire life. On the sense of ποιμαίνειν see above, Introduction, p. 38, note.

— ἐπισκοποῦντες] overseeing the flock. The πρεσβύτεροι, καστῶς, ἀλλ' ἑκουσίως· μηδὲ αἰσχροκερδῶς, ἀλλὰ προθύμως· [3] [c] μηδ' ὡς κατακυριεύοντες τῶν κλήρων, ἀλλὰ τύποι γινόμενοι τοῦ ποιμνίου· [4] [d] καὶ φανερωθέντος τοῦ Ἀρχιποίμενος κομιεῖσθε τὸν ἀμαράντινον τῆς δόξης στέφανον.

presbyters, are said ἐπισκοπεῖν, to oversee: they are presbyters in age, and they are ἐπίσκοποι, overseers, as to office.

Hence, after the death of the Apostles, they who succeeded them in the Apostolic office, not presuming to take the name of Apostles, were called Episcopi: and thenceforth the name of Episcopus,—which in the Apostolic age had been often applied, as here, to designate those who had the oversight of a ποιμνίον or flock,—was reserved for those who had the oversight of Pastors as well as of flocks; and who are now called Bishops. Cp. Acts xx. 17. 28, and see above, Note prefixed to the Third Chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to Timothy, and notes on 2 Tim. ii. 1, 2.

3. μηδ' ὡς κατακυριεύοντες τῶν κλήρων]

There is a slight paronomasia, or play upon the words, which gives an edge to this precept.

He had just said, Ye Presbyters, tend the flock of God that is among you, overseeing it, not of constraint, but willingly (1 Cor. ix. 16, 17), not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; and he now warns them not to behave themselves as lords over the Churches committed to their charge, which are not the heritages of man, but of the Lord. See on our Lord's words to St. Peter himself, Matt. xvi. 18, Μοῦ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. Consequently the usurpation of dominion and lordship over them is an encroachment on the prerogative and inheritance of the Lord Himself.

The word κλῆροι does not mean here Clergy apart from the Laity, nor does it mean Laity apart from the Clergy; but it signifies the Clergy and Laity, or People, united together. It designates Christian Churches, which are the κλῆροι or heritages of God, as the Israelites of old were, and are so entitled by Himself in His Holy Word, Deut. iv. 20, and ix. 29, and see Grotius here.

St. Peter happily uses the plural κλῆροι; for, in Christian times, it is not one nation, as it had been of old, which is the chosen people and heritage of God, but all national Churches, all congregations of Pastors and People are heritages of the Lord: each "Church and each congregation," which every Pastor serves, is, in a mystical sense, as the English Ordinal declares, the "Spouse and Body of Christ." By the word κλῆροι, therefore, we may understand here the faithful people of Christ, distributed in regular order into various dioceses, parishes, churches, and congregations, like the companies to which our Lord distributed the loaves and fishes by the hands of His Apostles. Mark vi. 40: cp. A Lapide here.

St. Peter appears to have written these words in a grateful remembrance of those which had been spoken to him by the Lord Himself; "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me?" . . . "Feed My sheep" (John xxi. 16). And he and others were warned against usurping lordship over the heritage of the Lord by Christ's language; "On this Rock (i. e., Myself) I will build of Me the Church." Let no man therefore treat it as his own. It is the Church of Me; and of Me only (Matt. xvi. 18). I have purchased it with My blood (Acts xx. 28). Let no man lord it over what belongs to the Lord.

Here is another caution from St. Peter's mouth, which may be commended to the consideration of those who call themselves his successors. "The Apostle forbiddeth dominari in cleris." But they who claim to be his successors are not afraid to "teach that their own judgments are infallible, and to make their definitions an universal Rule of Faith, and to require subjection to their laws and persons, as of necessity to salvation, and to be called 'Dominus Deus noster Papa'" (Gloss. in Extrav. Papæ, Johann. xxii. Tit. xiv. 4), &c., all which and much more is professed by the Popes, and in their behalf. No modest man can deny that this amounts to as much as St. Peter's dominari in cleris, even to the exercising of such lordship over the Lord's heritage, the Christian Church, as will become none but the Lord Himself, whose heritage it is. Bp. Sanderson, iii. p. 283.

4. ἀμαράντινον] amaranthine; literally, woven of the flower called amaranth. (Bengel.)

5. ἐγκομβώσασθε] clasp ye on humility; submitting yourselves one to another (cp. Eph. v. 21, ἀλλήλοις as here) in the fear of God. Clasp it on as a garment (properly, a servile garment, ἐγκόμβωμα, Pollux iv. 119) clasped with a περόνη, fibula, or with a knot or belt; see Eustath. on Homer, Il. κ. 133, and Suicer in v. p. 995, and Wetstein here. Bp. Pearson, Vind. Ignat. ii. cxiv. p. 579, ed. Churton; and Fritz, Opuscula, p. 259.

In illustration of this word we may refer to the reverential action of St. Peter, described John xxi. 7. But, as Alford well observes, The action which best illustrates this precept is that of our Blessed Lord Himself girding Himself with a napkin, as a servant, and pouring water into a basin and washing His Apostles' feet, in which St. Peter had a special part. See on John xiii. 4, 5, and our Lord's precept there, v. 14.

8. Διάβολος] the devil. At the time which St. Peter is pre-announcing, the Devil was, in the strictest sense of the term, a Devil, a Διάβολος, a false accuser. For he devised all manner of calumnies against the primitive Christians, and instigated even their friends to bring them before the heathen tribunals, that they might be put to death. He was then especially "the false accuser of the brethren." Cp. Rev. xii. 10. The Lion goeth about seeking those who may be made the victims of his διαβολαί, and be cast "ad Leones." See next note.

— ὡς λέων ὠρυόμενος] as a lion roaring. This was the first form in which the Devil showed his enmity against the Church of Christ; and he was now about to wreak his fury on the two Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul.

He was now "rugiens ut leo," roaring as a lion; but he was afterwards about to change that shape, and appear in a more specious semblance, "insidians ut draco," lurking in ambush as a dragon. See below on Rev. vi. 3, 4.

Well might he now be compared to a Lion. Many of the first martyrs, e. g. St. Peter's successor at Antioch, S. Ignatius (cp. 2 Tim. iv. 17), were cast to the Lions; and the popular cry at Rome was now soon to be, "Christianos ad Leonem!" (Tertullian, Apol. 40.) The devil went about as a Lion roaring, in the days of the first persecutions of the Church, and he will go about again roaring as a Lion in the last age—at the eve of the end. See Rev. xii. 12; xx. 7—9.

— περιπατεῖ] he walketh about, Job i. 7. Therefore, the Devil is not yet confined to Hell. See above on Matt. viii. 29.

9. εἰδότες] knowing that the same kinds of sufferings are being filled up by the brotherhood that is in every part of the world. "No temptation hath taken you but such as is common to man," 1 Cor. x. 13. Do not be cast down, as if the sufferings, which ye are called upon to endure, were new, perpetual, or partial. They are only a continuation of the sufferings of Christ (see Col. i. 24), and they will soon be consummated, and they are shared by all your brethren in the Churches of God throughout the world: therefore resist the Devil, who is the author of these persecutions; standing fast and solidly grounded in faith, by which ye will be more than conquerors. Eph. vi. 16. 1 John v. 4.

10. καταρτίσει—θεμελιώσει] will perfect—will stablish: in the future tense. So A, B, and Griesb., Lach., Tisch., Alf. Elz. has the aorist optative here, καταρτίσαι.

This assurance of divine support comes very appropriately from St. Peter, in compliance with Christ's precept to him, "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren." Luke xxii. 32. Bengel.

12. διὰ Σιλουανοῦ] By Silvanus, the faithful brother, as I reckon, or count him to be (Rom. viii. 18), I write to you in few words.

This is said to assure them, and the Churches at large, of the genuineness of the Epistle. It would be brought to them by Silvanus, the faithful brother, who would certify them from whom it came. This practice of the Apostles to send their Epistles to the Churches by the hands of tried and faithful friends, has been of signal use in establishing the Canonical authority of the New Testament. Cp. Eph. vi. 21.

There was something significant in this choice of Silvanus for the purpose here described, especially in connexion with the mention of St. Mark. Silvanus, or Silas, had been chosen by St. Paul at Antioch, about thirteen years before, in the place of St. Mark, who had left him in Pamphylia, and was a near kinsman of St. Barnabas (Col. iv. 10), who was led into an altercation with St. Paul, on account of his refusal to take Mark; and who also had before been led away by the influence of St. Peter at Antioch, in opposition to St. Paul, contending for the Evangelical liberty of the Gentile Christians. See on Acts xv. 37—40. Gal. ii. 12, 13.

Silas, being chosen by St. Paul in place of Mark, accompanied that Apostle in his missionary tour in Syria and Cilicia, and in divers other parts of Asia Minor, especially Phrygia, Lycaonia, and Galatia, to Troas, and into Greece. He would therefore be known, in connexion with the Apostle St. Paul, to those Asiatic Churches which are addressed by St. Peter in the present Epistle, i. 1.

Silas had also been associated with St. Paul in writing the two Epistles to the Thessalonians, which had been published about ten years before the date of the present Epistle, and had, probably, by this time been circulated in Asia.

After the date of these two Epistles to the Thessalonians, the name of Silas, or Silvanus, vanishes for a time from the pages of the New Testament.

It does not occur after that time in the Acts of the Apostles, or in any of St. Paul's other Epistles.

But it re-appears in this present passage (1 Pet. v. 12), at the close of the ministry of St. Peter (see 2 Pet. iii. 1), which coincided in time with the close of the ministry of St. Paul.

It here re-appears in company with the name of St. Mark. Cp. note above, Phil. i. 1. And the name of Silas is here characterized by St. Peter with the honourable appellation "the faithful brother, as I reckon."

Here then we have a happy intimation of the harmony which subsisted among the Apostles and first preachers of Christ.

They were not exempt from human infirmities. The Apostle St. Peter faltered for a time through fear at Antioch, and had then been boldly resisted by St. Paul (see on Gal. ii. 11—14). The Evangelist St. Mark, the son of St. Peter in the faith (v. 13), and the kinsman of St. Barnabas (Col. iv. 10), had also faltered once for a season through fear, and had once forsaken St. Paul. (Acts xiii. 13; xv. 38.) St. Paul and St. Barnabas had formerly striven so sharply at Antioch on St. Mark's account, that they departed asunder for a time (Acts xv. 39), and St. Paul had chosen Silas, or Silvanus, as his companion in the room of St. Mark.

All these infirmities are recorded in the Holy Scriptures. The New Testament does not disguise the frailties of the first preachers of Christianity. Here is an evidence of its truth.

But this is not all. We are left to gather from incidental notices scattered in different parts of the New Testament, that by the grace of God all these frailties and infirmities were corrected and amended; and that they were graciously overruled by God's Providence to the victory of Christian virtue, and to the good of the Church, and to His glory.

As has been already shown in another place, the strife of St. Paul and St. Barnabas had now been healed, and Mark had been restored to the favour of St. Paul, and he afterwards was chosen to be the writer of a Gospel, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and with the aid of his spiritual father St. Peter, and he became the founder of the Church of Alexandria. See above, Acts xv. 39. Col. iv. 10, and Introduction to St. Mark's Gospel.

St. Peter now employs Silas to be the bearer of his Epistle to the Jewish Christians of Asia. He calls him the faithful brother, and he associates him with St. Mark, whom he calls "his son;" his son in the faith.

A happy combination. Silas had been chosen by St. Paul in lieu of St. Mark, and had preached with him in Asia, and had been associated with him in writing his first Epistle. And St. Paul, in writing to the Galatians, who are addressed in this Epistle of St. Peter (see 1 Pet. i. 1), had recorded his own contention with St. Peter, on account of his conduct toward the Gentile Christians, and had related that his own friend St. Barnabas had been formerly drawn away from him by St. Peter. (Gal. ii. 13.)

But now all differences are at an end. St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, chooses Silas, St. Paul's friend and fellow-labourer in preaching and writing, to carry this Epistle to the Jewish Christians of Asia, where Silas had formerly preached in company with St. Paul. And by this choice, and by his reference to the Epistles of his "beloved brother Paul," as a part of divinely inspired Scripture (see 2 Pet. iii. 15), he proclaims to the Jewish Christians his own perfect union in Christian faith and in Christian love with the great Apostle of the Gentiles.

Here was a noble example of repentance, and of generous self-sacrifice, and of love for Christ and the Church.

St. Peter avouches to his readers that St. Paul's fellow-labourer among them, Silas, is "their faithful brother." He calls St. Mark his son, who had once faltered in the faith, but who had afterwards preached to them in Asia (see on Col. iv. 10. Philem. 24), and whom St. Paul, writing from Rome to the Churches of Phrygia, mentions as being there among his own tried and trusted friends, and calls him "sister's son to Barnabas."

St. Paul, as well as St. Peter, now also at the close of his career, writes to Timothy about the same time as the date of this Epistle of St. Peter, and bears witness that Mark "is profitable to him for the ministry." (2 Tim. iv. 11.) And St. Peter here joins Mark with Silas, who had once been preferred in his room.

So may all wounds be healed, and all differences cease in the Church of Christ. So may all falterers be recovered, and Christian charity prevail, and God's glory be magnified in all persons and in all things, through Jesus Christ!

— δι' ὀλίγων ἔγραψα] I write in few words: with δι' ὀλίγων, cp. διὰ βραχέων, Heb. xiii. 22. The Epistle is short, relatively to the importance of the subject; and the Apostle might perhaps design to prepare them by these words to receive a second Epistle from him, on the second or polemical portion of the subject which now occupied his thoughts. See Introduction to that Epistle, below, pp. 69–72, and 2 Pet. iii. 1.

— ἔγραψα] I write: ἔγραψα is the epistolary aorist: a graceful mode of expression, by which the writer puts himself in the place of the reader, and looks at the thing written, from the reader's point of view. See Rom. xvi. 1. Eph. vi. 21. Col. iv. 7.

— ἑστήκατε] ye stand. So Elz., Tisch. A, B have στῆτε, stand ye, and so Lach., Alf.

13. ἀσπάζεται ὑμᾶς ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή] the co-elect (feminine) which is in Babylon, saluteth you. At the beginning of this Epistle St. Peter had written thus, "To the elect strangers of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia." As we have already seen;

(1) They are there called elect;

(2) They are there called strangers of the dispersion, i. e. of the Jewish dispersion, scattered throughout Asia Minor.

(3) They are there enumerated in a particular geographical order, i. e. from East to West.

(4) They are greeted in the name of Christ, with the words, "Grace to you, and Peace be multiplied." (1 Pet. i. 1, 2.)

Εἰρήνη ὑμῖν πᾶσι τοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. ἀμήν.

Hence we may infer,

That the co-elect which is here mentioned at the close of the Epistle, in Babylon, is of the same character as those persons who had been designated as elect at the beginning of this Epistle. That is to say, this word (συνεκλεκτὴ) co-elect designates a Christian congregation gathered principally from Jews of the dispersion, and thus associated, as co-elect in Christ, with those whom St. Peter at the beginning of this Epistle had addressed as the elect strangers of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. The preposition σὺν is a link which connects the elect at Babylon with the elect in Asia.

Accordingly we find, that in the Vulgate, Syriac, and Arabic Versions the word Church or Congregation is supplied here, to agree with συνεκλεκτή; and so our English Authorized Version, "The Church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you." The word συνεκλεκτὴ is also understood in this sense by most Ancient Expositors.

The word seems to be left purposely elliptical, i. e. without a substantive adjoined. St. Peter would thus leave it to the reader to supply either ἐκκλησία, Church, or διασπορὰ, Dispersion; each of those two words being admissible and suitable, and neither to be excluded.

They to whom he writes are elect, and they are also the dispersion. The co-elect is a dispersion also; yet though she is dispersed and in Babylon, yet she is gathered together as a congregation in the Christian Sion, or Church Universal, and is co-elect with other dispersed brethren who are gathered together in Christ.

— ἐν Βαβυλῶνι] in Babylon.

What city is this Babylon?

(1) The reader's first impression is, that it is the Babylon of Assyria, the Babylon on the Euphrates.

(2) It is true, that another great City in the West was called figuratively among Jews by the name of Babylon; namely, Rome. See on Rev. xvii. 1—10.

(3) It is also true, that some ancient writers supposed Babylon to mean Rome here. See Papias in Euseb. ii. 15, and Vales. there.

(4) It is also probable, that this Epistle was written a short time only before St. Peter's death (cp. 2 Pet. iii. 1), and that he died at Rome (see Euseb. ii. 25).

(5) But these considerations seem to be overbalanced by others of greater weight.

Rome was called Babylon figuratively. But tropes are scarcely admissible in dates, especially in Epistles like the present, which is remarkable for its quiet tone. In details of fact, the literal meaning seems to be the true one: and if the literal meaning will stand, it ought not to be abandoned for a metaphorical one.

(6) The fact, that Rome was sometimes called Babylon figuratively, and that St. Peter was martyred at Rome, may probably have induced some in ancient and modern times to suppose, that the Babylon here mentioned is Rome; and may serve to account for that opinion.

(7) The city of Rome is mentioned in other places of the New Testament, and always by the name of Rome (Acts xviii. 2; xix. 21; xxiii. 11; xxviii. 14. Rom. i. 7. 15. 2 Tim. i. 17), except only in a poetical and prophetical book, the Book of Revelation, where a figurative name is in its proper place; and there though the word is used six times, yet it is never placed singly as Babylon, but always with an epithet, Babylon the Great (Rev. xiv. 8; xvi. 19; xvii. 5; xviii. 2. 10. 21).

(8) It has been alleged, indeed, that Babylon was now deserted, and that it is not probable that the Apostle St. Peter should have gone thither, and have sojourned there.

This opinion has been supported by high authorities, e. g. by Bp. Pearson (de successione Rom. Episcop. i. c. viii. vol. ii. pp. 348—53, ed. Churton), who supposed that the Babylon here mentioned is a Babylon in Egypt. Cp. Professor Blunt, Early Church, p. 59, and Hengstenberg on Rev. xiv. 8.

But it may be proved, that there were at this time large numbers of Jews resident in the province of Babylon, and not a few in Babylon itself. See Josephus, Ant. xv. 2. 2; xv. 3. 1; xvii. 2. 1—3; xviii. 9. 1; and xviii. 9. 7—9. Philo, Legat. ad Caium, § 36, p. 587. Theodoret (on Isa. xiii.) says that in his age Babylon was inhabited by Jews. Scaliger (in Euseb. p. 205), observes that from "the days of Salathiel even to the seventieth year after Christ, a Chief of the captivity was elected from the stock of David, and resided at Babylon." Cp. Basnage, Annal. Pol. Eccles. A. D. 46, pp. 561—3, and Dr. Lightfoot's Sermon on this text, Works, ii. pp. 1144—6, where he says, "Babylon was one of the greatest knots (i. e. centres) of the Jews in the world. Need I tell you that there were multitudes of Jews in Babylon that returned not with Ezra? That there were in that country three Jewish Universities, and that there were ten tribes scattered in Assyria?" And it has been shown from Jewish usage, that the word Babylon need not be limited to the precise site of the ancient ruined city, but may be extended to its neighbourhood. See Wetstein, p. 698, and Vitringa in Rev. xviii. 2, "Judæi maximè Babylonem occupabant." Rennel, Geogr. of Herod. sect. xv., "So great a number of Jews was found in Babylonia, as is astonishing; they are spoken of by Josephus as possessing towns and districts in that country about forty years after Christ; they were in great numbers in Babylon itself." Biscoe on the Acts, i. p. 88. Wieseler, Chronol. p. 557. Mayerhoff, p. 128. Dr. Davidson's Introduction, iii. pp. 362—366. Cp. Huther, Einleitung, p. 23, and on this passage, p. 180, and Dean Alford, p. 387.

(9) There does not seem, therefore, to be any cause for discarding the literal meaning of the word Babylon here. On the contrary, there are strong reasons, why, with many learned and able expositors, we should adhere to it.

If St. Peter had been writing from Rome or from any place to the west of Asia, he would not, in his enumeration of the Asiatic districts at the beginning of his Epistle, have mentioned Pontus first, the most eastern region of Asia. He would not have begun his enumeration with the most distant western district, and have proceeded, as he does, in a westerly direction, till he ends with Bithynia; but he would have reversed the order; he would have begun with Bithynia at the west, and would have ended with Pontus in the east.

This is what St. John does in the Apocalypse in writing from Patmos on the west of Asia. He begins with Ephesus on the west, and proceeds in an easterly direction, and ends with Laodicea in the east. Rev. i. 11; ii. 1; iii. 14.

A similar order is observed by St. Paul, writing from Rome. See Col. iv. 13. 16.

There is no exception to this principle in the enumeration in the Acts of the Apostles, ii. 9—11. There the Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia are placed first, for special reasons; the writer is not addressing an epistle to them, but he is speaking of the region from which they came to Jerusalem, and he naturally begins with those at a distance from it, and with those who were first expatriated from it. See the note there.

The Geographical order adopted by St. Peter is precisely that which would naturally occur to a person writing from Mesopotamia, and sending forth an Epistle to be read in succession by Christian communities in different regions of Asia. He begins with Pontus, because (if we suppose him in Mesopotamia) that region was nearest to him, and his Epistle would reach Pontus first, and pass on from it to other regions in order,—Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.

Therefore the date of the Epistle being Babylon, we are led to conclude, that it was written in the literal or eastern Babylon on the Euphrates; and not in the figurative or western Babylon, on the Tiber, Rome.

(10) There were also some special reasons for a mission of St. Peter to the east, especially to the Jewish Christians of those parts. He was the Apostle of the Circumcision (Gal. ii. 7). Assuredly it was fit that he, who had a special charge to feed Christ's flock (John xxi. 16), should go and seek the lost sheep of the house of Israel; that is, the remnant of the Two Tribes at Babylon, and the Ten Tribes in Assyria.

Besides, the Jews of those parts who had come to Jerusalem for the great annual festivals, and had heard him preach at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost after the Ascension of Christ, and many of whom had been baptized by him on that day, and many doubtless had been led from those regions to Jerusalem on other great festivals in succeeding years, were well acquainted with the name and person of the Apostle of the Circumcision.

Among those devout Jews who are enumerated by St. Luke in the Acts as present at the day of Pentecost, the first mentioned are Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, that is, those who dwelt in the neighbourhood of Babylon. For as is well said by one of the best historians and geographers of Poets, Milton, describing the condition of the East in our Lord's age:—

> "There Babylon, the wonder of all tongues,
> All these the Parthian holds."
> (Paradise Regained, iii. 280.)

See on Acts ii. 9—11. They had come from their own land to Jerusalem, and had been evangelized by St. Peter there. Surely it was very reasonable that St. Peter should go from Jerusalem to Babylon to confirm those in the faith, who had come from the neighbourhood of Babylon to Jerusalem, and had been received into the Christian Sion there, by the ministry of the word of God preached by the Apostle St. Peter. See above on i. 1.

There were also special reasons why such an Epistle as the present should be written from Babylon. Babylon is Babel. It had been the source of confusion of tongues. Its very name means confusion. But now, under the influence of divine grace, the curse of Babel is removed. The Holy Spirit, who came down at Pentecost at Sion, reverses the curse of Babel. At Babel mankind was scattered abroad, with a jargon of tongues. At Pentecost the Holy Ghost comes down in fiery tongues, and preaches the one Gospel in all tongues. He enables the Apostle St. Peter, who received the gift of tongues at Pentecost (1 Pet. i. 12), to preach the one Gospel to the dispersed of Israel in Babylonia and the East. Thus Sion is built up in Babylon; the city of Confusion becomes the city of Peace.

Besides, Babylon had been the enemy and persecutor of Sion. It had carried Judah into captivity. But now it has become subject to Christ. It is His captive. It submits to His mild sway and easy yoke. He has His elect there. His Apostle preaches there. This is in perfect unison with all God's dispensations.

The Syrian Antioch was the city of Antiochus, the persecutor of God's people, the type of Antichrist. But in course of time, Antioch became the place where the faithful were first called Christians (see on Acts xi. 26). At Antioch Paul and Barnabas had been ordained to the Apostleship, and had been sent forth to evangelize the Gentile world (Acts xiii. 1, 2). And there St. Peter himself had presided as Bishop of the Church: see above, Introduction, p. 41.

Rahab or Egypt had also been the persecutor of God's people. But in His own time God made a highway in Egypt for Christ (Isa. xix. 31), especially by the preaching there of St. Peter's son in the faith, St. Mark, at Alexandria. Euseb. ii. 16.

In like manner, Babylon is now visited by St. Peter, and has heard the Gospel of Christ, and is the place whence this Epistle goes forth to the Churches of Asia and the world. From the city of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius, who wrote to the provinces of the Assyrian Empire, "Peace be multiplied to you," now proceeds the word of the Apostle, "to the elect strangers of Asia; Grace and Peace be multiplied unto you" (See i. 2).

Thus the prophecy is fulfilled; the Egyptian shall serve God with the Assyrian, and Israel shall be the third with Egypt and Assyria (Isa. xix. 24); and I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon with them that know me (see Ps. lxxxvii. 4).

Finally, the Apostle of the Circumcision, St. Peter, is thus seen to have carried the Gospel to the eastern limits of the Roman Empire. Thence he goes westward in order to seal his preaching with his blood (see Tertullian c. Marcion. iv. 5. Euseb. ii. 25; above, Introduction to this Epistle, p. 44). He goes from the Eastern Babylon in Assyria, to the Western Babylon in Italy. He goes from Babylon to Rome. He thus gives evidence of God's love to His own people, and having followed Christ to the end, and having finished his course with joy, like the Sun from East to West, he is associated with the Apostle of the Gentiles, his beloved brother St. Paul, in dying a martyr's death in the capital of the Heathen world, and having there gone down in a glorious sunset he will rise to bliss in Christ.

INTRODUCTION

TO

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. PETER.

THE First Epistle of St. Peter was written at a time when a persecution of the Church was imminent, as appears from internal evidence; and for this and other reasons already stated, the date to be assigned to that Epistle is probably the year A.D. 64 [1].

The Second Epistle is addressed to the same parties as the First, and seems to have been written soon after it [2]; and was composed at a time when St. Peter was anticipating his death [3]. St. Peter died A.D. 68 [4].

The date of this Epistle may therefore be placed in A.D. 66, or A.D. 67.

To this conclusion there have been made the following objections:—

(1) It is not probable—it is alleged by some persons—that St. Peter would write two Epistles to the same parties at nearly the same time.

(2) Nor is it probable, it is said, that the same Author would write in so different a style as that of the Second Epistle, compared with the First, especially if he were writing to the same parties, at nearly the same time.

The First Epistle, which was generally acknowledged in primitive times to be a genuine work of St. Peter, is composed in a quiet and subdued tone; but the Second is characterized by impassioned vehemence, and poetic exuberance of language. This is more remarkable, because if this Epistle is genuine, it was written by him when he was old, and looking forward to the near approach of death [5].

This Second Epistle is rarely quoted by primitive writers; even in the third and fourth centuries some doubts were expressed concerning its genuineness [6]; and in later days many Critics deny it to be a work of St. Peter [7].

Let us consider these objections.

It cannot be doubted, that there is great diversity of feeling and style between this Epistle and that which was generally received as St. Peter's, namely, his First Epistle.

But there were good reasons for this difference.

St. Peter had a twofold work to do; first, to declare the truth, next, to refute error.

[6] It is reckoned among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, but γνώριμα τοῖς πολλοῖς, by Eusebius, iii. 25; and in another place he says, τὴν φερομένην αὐτοῦ (of Peter) δευτέραν οὐκ ἐνδιάθηκον μὲν εἶναι παρειλήφαμεν· ὅμως δὲ πολλοῖς χρήσιμος φανεῖσα μετὰ τῶν ἄλλων ἐσπουδάσθη γραφῶν. S. Jerome is more explicit as to his own belief (Scr. Eccl. c. 1): "Simon Petrus duas Epistolas, quæ catholicæ nominantur, quarum secunda à plerisque (by many persons) ejus esse negatur, propter styli cum priore dissonantiam." And Epist. 120, he says, "Duæ Epistolæ, quæ feruntur Petri, stylo inter se discrepant, structurâque verborum; ex quo intelligimus pro necessitate rerum diversis eum usum Interpretibus." And Epist. 50, he says, "Jacobus, Petrus, Joannes, Judas Apostoli septem Epistolas ediderunt, tam mysticas quàm succinctas, et breves pariter et longas, breves in verbis, longas in sententiis."

As to the statement of S. Jerome's master, Didymus (in Bibl. Patrum Max. iv. 236, or in Gallandi Biblioth. Patr. vi. p. 294), "Non est ignorandum, præsentem Epistolam esse falsatam;" if the words are genuine, they mean only, that this Epistle νοθεύεται, i. e. is accounted spurious by some. But these words, ascribed to Didymus, are probably not genuine, but added by a later hand, as Wolf, Pott, Mayerhoff, Guerike, and others suppose. See Guerike, p. 465, and Davidson's Introduction, iii. p. 415.

[7] The genuineness of this Epistle is questioned by Eichhorn, De Wette, Schott, Neander, Credner, Mayerhoff, Richter, Reuss, and others; but its genuineness is maintained by Michaelis, Pott, Augusti, Storr, Hug, Flatt, Dahl, Windischmann, Heydenreich, Guerike, and others.

He had executed the first of these two tasks in his former Epistle; he performs the second in the latter.

In the first Epistle he had proclaimed the great goodness and infinite love of God the Father to all mankind, in giving His own Son, to redeem the world by His death, and to open the gate of everlasting life to all; and on this basis of Christian doctrine, he had reared a superstructure of moral duty. He had stated the obligations, under which all men lie, by reason of Christ's Incarnation, and their inedification as living stones in Him, Who is the Living Stone; and he had urged the motives which ought to constrain all to imitate Him Who died for all, in order that, being dead to sin, they may live to righteousness, and Who has left us "an example, that we should follow His Steps[1]."

St. Peter had applied these principles, in a practical and didactic manner, to the inculcation of various precepts, concerning civil, social, and domestic duties. As a wise master-builder he had thus completed a solid work of construction.

If the Church of Christ had not had any enemies, who would assail her doctrinal foundations, St. Peter might have been content with having executed this work of building up the fabric of Christian Life, grounded on Christian Faith.

But his position was like that of the valiant and wise leader of God's ancient people, Nehemiah, in building up the Holy City after the Babylonish captivity. He and his associates were encountered by Sanballats and Ammonites, who interrupted the work, and endeavoured to overthrow it[2].

They had therefore a double work to do: they must fight as well as build.

This was also the case with St. Peter; he had likewise a double work to do; first, to build up the Church; and next, to fight against the foes of the faith, who scoffed at the work, and were eager to destroy it[3].

False Teachers were stirred up by the Evil One to assail the Apostolic builders of the spiritual Sion, and to hinder the work, as Sanballat, Tobiah, and the Ammonites, had conspired to attack and harass Nehemiah and his comrades when building up the fortifications of Jerusalem. As then Nehemiah and his friends carried in one hand an instrument for building, and had in the other hand a weapon for defence[4], so it was with St. Peter. In his First Epistle he had raised up the fabric of Christian Faith and Duty. In his Second Epistle he represents that foundation as already laid, and he comes forward to contend against those who would destroy it. In the one Epistle he is a Christian Builder raising up the fabric of truth; in the other he is a Christian Soldier repelling its enemies and assailants.

Here is the solution of the supposed difficulties that have been just stated. Here is an answer to the objections, grounded on the alleged improbability, that two Epistles, of different styles, would be addressed by the same person to the same parties about the same time.

We have a striking parallel here in the Epistles of St. Peter's "beloved brother Paul[5]," as he is called in this Epistle.

St. Paul had recently written two Epistles at about the same time from the same place, Rome, to the inhabitants of the same country; first, the Epistle to the Ephesians; and, secondly, that to the Colossians[6].

Those two Epistles of St. Paul correspond in a remarkable manner with the two Epistles of St. Peter. They treat of the same doctrines: the Love of God to man in the Incarnation and Death of Christ, and of the Christian privileges and duties growing therefrom.

The Epistle to the Ephesians is of a constructive and didactic character, and is similar to St. Peter's first Epistle.

The Epistle to the Colossians, with its polemical protests and denunciatory warnings against those heresies[7] which impugned the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ, and His Incarnation and Atonement, and the immoral consequences of those heresies, resembles the Second Epistle of St. Peter.

There was great wisdom in this arrangement, adopted by both these Apostles, distributing their work into two parts, in two Epistles respectively; the one Epistle of each being designed for the statement of truth; the second, for the refutation of error.

Many there were then in the Christian Church, as there ever have been, and are now, who were imbued with a loving and reverent spirit, and dwelt devoutly on the attributes of their Heavenly Father reconciling the World to Himself by his well-beloved Son; and who rejoiced to sit, like Mary, in quiet gentleness and meek docility at the feet of Jesus, and to learn their duty from His teaching and example; and who would shrink with feelings of pain, distress, and horror, as from a withering pestilence, from all heretical cavils, which might seem to cast any disparagement on the glorious Name of their adorable Redeemer, Who of His infinite love and mercy had condescended to take their Nature and to die for them on the Cross.

For such pious and loving minds as these, the two Holy Apostles have provided divine food: St. Peter in his First Epistle, St. Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians. The former Apostle wrote particularly for the use of Jewish believers, the latter for Gentile Christians. They both taught the same truth, as it is in Christ, in those two Epistles; they taught it clearly and simply, without any reference to the Heresies by which it was assailed.

But these two Apostles knew, that it is not enough, to teach the Truth; it is necessary also to drive away error. The Christian Builder must be a Christian Soldier. While he works with the trowel, he must be girded with a sword [1]. He must build up himself and others upon our most holy faith [2]; and he must also contend earnestly for it [3].

They saw false Teachers speaking proud and swelling words against the Truth, and vaunting their own knowledge, and undermining the Doctrines of Christ's Divinity, Lordship, Incarnation, and Atonement, and denying the Lord that bought them, and scoffing at the doctrine of a Resurrection and Judgment to come [4]. They beheld the anarchical lawlessness which followed from these heresies, and the impure and dissolute practices [5], which were the fruits of the teaching of those, who, like Balaam, were seducers of others to works of lust, and who, on the plea of Christian Liberty, destroyed the foundations of Christian Truth, Christian Holiness, and Christian Charity, and turned the grace of God into lasciviousness [6]; and they foresaw, that the same errors in doctrine would produce the same evil consequences in succeeding ages of the Church. Therefore each of these two Apostles, having declared severally the true doctrine in one Epistle, proceeds to complete his work, by delivering also an Apostolic protest and caution against error in another Epistle.

This is done by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians, and by St. Peter in his Second Epistle.

Thus these two Apostles, the one the Apostle of the Gentiles, the other of the Jews, are seen united in proclaiming to every age the love of God in Christ; and in warning the Church against the dangerous and deadly errors of those, who impugn the Doctrine of His Divinity and Humanity, and of the Sacrifice offered, and of the Atonement made, by Him on the Cross.

When these circumstances are considered, it will not seem surprising that the feeling and language of the Second Epistle of St. Peter should be very different from that of the First.

This difference is seen specially in the second Chapter of the second Epistle, where the Author is describing the erroneous and strange doctrines of the heretical teachers. That chapter of the second Epistle is very different in tone from the first Epistle; but it also differs from the two other chapters of the second Epistle [7].

There are also many points of resemblance between those two Chapters and the first Epistle of St. Peter [8].

The reasons of this difference between the second Chapter of the Second Epistle and the First Epistle may be thus stated. In the first Epistle St. Peter had been like a faithful and affectionate Shepherd, feeding and tending Christ's sheep and lambs; but in the second Epistle he is like the same Shepherd driving away the wolves, who were ready to tear and devour those sheep and lambs, which Christ had purchased with His own blood [9], and had specially committed to his care [10].

[7] As is well observed by Bp. Sherlock, Dissertation on the Authority of this Epistle, Discourses, vol. iv. p. 130.
[8] Thus, for example, in the First Epistle, St. Peter dwells on the sufferings of Christ and of Christians as the appointed path to glory for Him, and through Him, for them. See i. 7. 11. 21; ii. 12; iv. 12—14. 16; v. 1. 4. 10, 11. So likewise in the Second Epistle, i. 3. 17; ii. 10; iii. 18. Compare his language on the nature of the Christian calling, in the First Epistle, i. 15; ii. 9; v. 10, with the language on the same subject in the Second Epistle, i. 5. The word ἀναστροφή, of frequent occurrence in the First Epistle (i. 15. 18; ii. 12; iii. 1, 2. 16), occurs twice in the Second (ii. 7; iii. 11). The word ἐπιθυμία, used four times in the First Epistle (i. 14; ii. 10. 18; iii. 3), occurs also four times in the Second (i. 4; ii. 11. 18; iv. 2, 3). So ἴδιος, used in an equivalent sense to the Latin suus in the First Epistle (iii. 1. 5), and in the Second (i. 20; ii. 16. 22; iii. 3. 16, 17), and the word ἀπόθεσις in the First Epistle (iii. 21), and in the Second Epistle (i. 14), and nowhere else in the N. T. These and other parallelisms are noticed by Windischmann, Vind. Petrinæ, pp. 18, 19. Guerike, p. 466. Davidson, iii. pp. 435—440; and Alford, Proleg. pp. 153. 157.

[10] John xxi. 15—17.

The gestures and features of the Shepherd, when, like David, he is killing the bear and the lion [1], or when, like the Shepherd described by Amos, he is taking out "of the mouth of the lion two legs or a piece of an ear [2]," are very different from the Shepherd's aspect, when watering his flock at the well in the evening, or when with the pastoral crook in his hand he is leading his sheep into green pastures and beside the waters of comfort.

If we consider St. Peter's natural temperament, eager, vehement, impassioned, if we contemplate the fervent and courageous Apostle, such as he was after the Day of Pentecost, and when he opened his mouth in the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem against the Chief Priests and Rulers, and preached to them Jesus of Nazareth, "whom ye crucified;" and "this is the Stone set at nought by you builders, which is become the headstone of the corner [3];" if we remember his ardent love to Christ, a love intensified by remorse [4]; if we bear in mind the pastoral commission given him by Christ, and the prophecy of Christ, that he would follow his Master in laying down his life for Him [5]; if we recollect that he did glorify God by following Him in the manner of his death; if we remember the evidences which Christ had given to St. Peter of His tender love to him, by admitting him to the secret retirements of His Transfiguration, and His Agony; if we recollect all the personal proofs that St. Peter had of Christ's gentleness and kindness, and also of His Divine Truth, and Power, and Glory, in His Teaching, His Miracles, His Passion, His Glorious Resurrection, and Ascension into Heaven, and in His sending down the Holy Ghost with the wind and fire from heaven, Whom St. Peter had as a Divine Guest living and dwelling in his heart; surely, we may say without fear of contradiction, that St. Peter would not have been St. Peter, if,—when viewing as he does in his Second Epistle the audacious boasting and outrageous contumelies, and insolent scoffings, and impious blasphemies of the Heretics, "who denied the Lord that bought them," and renewed the indignities of the Crucifixion, and rejected as a cunningly-devised fable the doctrine of the Union of the two Natures of God and Man in the Person of Jesus Christ, Who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification, and derided the promise, and defied the Majesty of His Second Coming to Judgment, and when he saw the sensuality and debauchery in life and manners, which flowed like polluted streams from the impure source of these Heresies,—he had stood quietly by, and looked on with calmness, and had spoken in unimpassioned language, such as he uses in his first Epistle.

The difference of style between the two Epistles is a natural consequence of the difference of their matter; and of the identity of their Author.

There is the same St. Peter in both. And if the second Epistle had not been very different in tone from the former, if it had been composed in the same equable and tranquil style as the First Epistle, every judicious critic, who has studied the character of St. Peter, and the history of the heresies of the Apostolic age, would have been reluctant to believe that the Second Epistle is from him.

The style of the Second Epistle is precisely that, which might have been anticipated from an enlarged and clear view of the circumstances of the writer. St. Peter, ardent by nature, and inspired by the Holy Ghost, speaks here with the oratorical vehemence and impassioned energy and holy indignation, and with the poetic enthusiasm of an inspired Hebrew Prophet. He becomes like a Jeremiah rebuking the errors and corruptions of the False Prophets [6], or like an Ezekiel looking through the hole of the wall in the Temple, and seeing the abominations wrought in the Sanctuary, and what the idolatrous priests did in the chambers of their imagery [7].

The force of the Holy Spirit, stirring within him, vents itself in bold comparisons and imaginative metaphors, and in an impetuous flood of words. Nor was his old age any bar to this poetic outpouring of his soul. What Moses was in his old age, when he sang his last song [8], what David was in his old age, when he chanted his last Psalm [9], full of ardour and energy imparted by the Holy Ghost, Who inspired him; such was the aged Apostle, St. Peter, when he wrote his Second Epistle, before his martyrdom for Christ.

There remains another point to be considered.

As has been already observed, the Second Epistle of St. Peter was not universally received in primitive times as a genuine work of the Apostle, and as a part of Canonical Scripture. If it was written by St. Peter and is an integral portion of Holy Writ, how is this to be accounted for?

Here is a question of great importance, and which concerns some other of the Catholic Epistles[1], and therefore is entitled, on general grounds, to a full and serious consideration.

We, who live now, see all the books of the New Testament collected in one printed Volume. And thus we are prone at first to form erroneous notions with regard to them. But let us divest ourselves of modern prepossessions. Let us imagine ourselves living in the second or third century. The several parts of the New Testament were originally given to the world, singly, as different Volumes, at different times, and in different places. If we had lived then, those books would have reached us one by one, and in Manuscript. Each book was to be examined separately, before it could be received as inspired. A serious question was then at issue. Is this book the work of him whose name it bears? Is it the writing of an Apostle, or no? Is it the Word of God, or not?

Such questions as these were to be asked and answered with respect to each of the Twenty-seven Books which now compose the New Testament. They were to be asked by each particular Church in succession, before a book could be said to be received by the Church Universal, which is formed of all particular Churches throughout the world. Such an examination demanded much caution, and much time was requisite before it could be completed.

However, in course of time, this process was performed. Each book was scrutinized. Each in succession passed through this searching ordeal. Some Books of the New Testament were immediately received by all Churches. This was the case with the Four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles, and with thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, and with the first Epistle of St. Peter, and with the first Epistle of St. John. No doubts were entertained with respect to any of those books by any Church. They were received at once by all as genuine, and as the Word of God. And thus the New Testament, as we now possess it, was, as to its main substance, received in the Apostolic age, and was acknowledged to be the Word of God.

It was received as such, as to its main substance. For, doubtless, there were some few other and smaller books, which are now received by us as integral parts of the New Testament, and which were indeed received as genuine and inspired by some Churches as soon as they were written; but other Churches suspended their judgment concerning them for a time.

One of those Books was this Second Epistle of St. Peter.

Some Churches of Christendom, in the second and third centuries, did not know this Epistle, and some reserved their judgment, and entertained doubts with regard to its genuineness and inspiration.

Let us consider how this happened.

This Epistle claims to be by St. Peter. It bears his name at the beginning. The Author speaks of an event, the Transfiguration, of which he professes to have been a witness, and at which St. Peter, with only two others of the Apostles, were present[2]. But it was not therefore safe to conclude that it was written by St. Peter. Writings were forged in early times by heretics in the name of Apostles, especially in the name of St. Peter[3]. It was therefore incumbent on Christian Churches to be on their guard, and not to receive any book as written by an Apostle, and as dictated by the Holy Spirit, before they were convinced by irrefragable proofs that it was Apostolic and inspired. Little harm would arise from a temporary suspension of judgment. If the Epistle was what it professed to be, viz., a work of the Apostle St. Peter, then, in due time, it would not fail to be universally received as such. But if it was not what it claimed to be, then perhaps Heresy might steal into the Church under the venerable guise of an Apostolic name, and the Church might be convicted of reading a forgery as the Word of God; and then the Credibility and Inspiration of those other Books, viz., the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and the thirteen epistles of St. Paul, which had been already received by the Church, would be impugned; they too might be exposed to suspicion; and thus the foundations of the faith would be in danger of being overthrown.

It was therefore the duty of all Churches to take time to consider, before they received any book as the writing of an Apostle. It was their duty to doubt.

[1] "Among those writings which are controverted (ἀντιλεγόμενα), but are recognized by the majority of persons (τοῖς πολλοῖς), are the Epistles of James and Jude, and the Second of Peter, and the Second and Third of John." Eusebius, iii. 25, where he distinguishes these writings from the ὁμολογούμενα on the one side, and the νόθα on the other.

[2] 2 Pet. i. 18.

[3] Namely, "the Acts of Peter," and "the Gospel of Peter," and "the Apocalypse of Peter," and "the Preaching of Peter," and "the Circuits (περίοδοι) of Peter," and "the Epistle of Peter to James." See Eusebius, iii. 3, and iii. 38, and vi. 12, and Epiphanius, Hæres. xxx. § 15, and Grabe's Spicilegium, i. 55—80, ed. Oxon, 1698, where fragments from these "Petri Apocrypha" are collected, and Cotelerii Patres Apostolici, i. p. 608, ed. Amst. 1724, where the so-called "Epistle of Peter to James" is printed. Cp. ibid. p. 755.

Let us now proceed to observe, that there were some special circumstances in the case of this Second Epistle of St. Peter which made such doubts in the first instance not unreasonable.

Suppose for argument's sake the Epistle to be genuine. Then this Epistle, it would appear, was published a very short time before St. Peter's death. The Author there speaks of himself as about to put off his earthly tabernacle, as the Lord had showed him. Suppose this to be the case. Then soon after the publication of it, the Apostle would be no longer at hand, to assure the Churches in person of the genuineness of this Epistle. The testimony of the Author himself could no longer be had concerning the Authorship of the Epistle: he was no longer on earth to give it. That testimony must be collected from other quarters—from his surviving friends, such as St. Mark and others, who were scattered by Persecution into different parts of the world. It would require time to collect their evidence, and to communicate it throughout Christendom; and the Book must wait for reception, till this evidence could be procured.

Hence a delay would arise in the reception of the Epistle.

Besides: the Church had already received one Epistle of St. Peter—the first of the two Epistles. It was universally recognized as genuine and inspired. And when this second Epistle came under review, it was found that it differed in style—or at least some portion of it, viz., the second chapter of it,—differed in style from the first Epistle, known to be by St. Peter. This discrepancy of style caused doubts and demurs in some quarters[1]. If the first Epistle was St. Peter's (and it was universally acknowledged to be so), could the other, which differed from it in style, be St. Peter's also? And if the second was his, might not some doubts be cast on the genuineness of the first?

Hence also it came to pass, that delays arose, which retarded the general reception of this Epistle.

Here we may observe two circumstances, which suggest reasons for thankfulness to Almighty God, watching over Holy Scripture.

Some persons have deduced objections against Scripture from the comparative lateness of the general reception of some few and smaller portions of the New Testament—particularly this Second Epistle of St. Peter.

But the fact is—this comparative lateness of reception furnishes a strong argument in favour of Scripture.

For, whence did this lateness of reception arise? From the wise caution and deliberation of the Church in this important matter. May we not say, it was due to the inspiration of the Holy Spirit Himself, preventing and restraining her from receiving any portion of His own Word without due evidence of its Genuineness and Inspiration? If she had acted with less caution, if she had received at once any book which presented itself bearing an Apostolic name, she might have received forgeries, she might have received heretical writings, she might have been deceived by emissaries of the Evil One, disguised as Angels of Light.

She was warned by the Holy Ghost not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits whether they are of God[2]. Some are praised in the Apocalypse because they tried them that said they were Apostles, and were not, and found them liars[3]. She would therefore make every Book pass through a period of probation, and a strict and severe ordeal;—she would summon witnesses to give evidence on its authorship; she would collect the suffrages of the Churches with regard to it, before she would pronounce her verdict, and acknowledge any Book to be the work of an Apostle, and receive it as the Word of God.

Shall we murmur or cavil because this was the case? No. Rather we may thank God that it was so. For we here see an additional reason for trust and confidence in His Holy Word. It is precisely this wise caution of the Church, this lingering prudence, or rather let us say, it is the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit Himself, to which we owe the fact, that no Book, which has gone through that probationary scrutiny, and has once been received by the Church Universal as genuine and inspired, has ever been proved to have been erroneously received as such. In two or three cases, as was before observed, the judgment of the Church was delayed, and wisely delayed, for a time, according to the sound maxim,

"Deliberandum est diu, quod statuendum est semel."

But in no case, when once given, has that judgment been reversed. The Canon of Scripture once formed has been stereotyped for ever.

[1] See S. Jerome's Observations, Cat. Script. c. 1, and Ep. cxx. c. 11.

[2] 1 John iv. 1.

[3] Rev. ii. 2.

Next, it may be observed, that the circumstances, which delayed the reception of certain books for some time, corroborate the evidence in favour of their reception, now that they are received.

Thus, for example, the difference in diction between the Apocalypse and Gospel of St. John, confirms our belief that writings so different in character would not have been received as the works of one person, and as divinely inspired, unless the primitive Churches, which received them as such, had been firmly persuaded that they were what they acknowledged them to be.

So again, as to the discrepancy of style that has been noticed between the First Epistle and part of the Second Epistle of St. Peter. This delayed the reception of this Second Epistle. But now that it is received by the Church of Christ, this very discrepancy strengthens the argument in favour of its reception. For it is evident that the Apostle St. Peter, who was enabled by the Holy Ghost to speak with tongues of various nations, could write in different styles: and reasons have been already adduced to show, that, from the difference of the circumstances under which the two Epistles were written, and from the difference of the design of each, and from the peculiar character, temperament, and position of the Author himself, St. Peter could not have done otherwise than adopt, in the Second Epistle, a very different tone from that of the First; and it is also clear, that another person, wishing to palm upon the world a forgery in the name of St. Peter, would have taken good care to imitate the style of St. Peter, as seen in his First Epistle, and would also have taken good care not to write a chapter so different in diction from the First Epistle of St. Peter, as the second chapter of the Second Epistle is.

But an objection may be urged here.

The circumstances just stated may explain, why this Second Epistle was not received at once by all Churches of Christendom in the first and second centuries. But it may be said; If this Epistle is the work of St. Peter, if it is inspired Scripture,—it was so in the first Century. A book cannot become Scripture by lapse of time. No number of years can make a writing to be Apostolic, which is not Apostolic; no number of years can make a writing to be inspired which was not inspired from the first. Eternity itself cannot change the word of man into the Word of God. And this Epistle, if it is an inspired work of St. Peter, must have been known by some persons in the first century to be an inspired work of St. Peter; and must have been received by some persons as such.

Was this the case?

Certainly, it was.

Let us remember that the Author claims to be St. Peter[1]. If this Epistle was not written by that Apostle, it is a shameless forgery; and there is good reason to believe, that such a forgery as this could not have escaped detection and exposure.

There were doubts concerning the genuineness and inspiration of this Epistle; and in consequence of these very doubts, its claims to be received as a canonical work of St. Peter would be scrutinized more closely. If on the one hand the Epistle was not what it professed to be, then it would certainly have been rejected; but if it passed through this scrutiny, and was finally recognized as genuine and canonical, then these doubts only strengthen our belief that it is what it claims to be, a work of the Apostle St. Peter.

What then is the evidence here?

Beginning with Apostolic times, we find that there are numerous passages[2] in the Epistle of St. Jude, which coincide almost word for word with passages in the Second Epistle attributed to St. Peter.

Either St. Jude's Epistle was written before this Epistle, or after it.

If it was written before, then it is not at all likely, that a forger should have transcribed so many paragraphs from the Epistle of one Apostle, St. Jude, and have ascribed them to another, St. Peter.

If St. Jude's Epistle was written after this Epistle, as is most probable[3], then this Epistle must have existed in Apostolic times, and it must have been exposed and rejected as a forgery; and it is certain, that a forgery would not have been copied by the Apostle St. Jude; or rather we may say, the words of a forger would not have been repeated by the Holy Spirit, writing by the Apostle St. Jude.

Next, let us recollect, that the literary remains of the first and second centuries of the Christian Church which have been preserved to us, are very scanty, and that it is probable that this Epistle was quoted in Ecclesiastical writings which do not now survive.

[1] See i. 1, and on i. 17.

[2] Twelve passages, at least. See below, Introduction to St. Jude's Epistle.

[3] See the Introduction to that Epistle.

This inference may reasonably be derived from later writings.

Melito, Bishop of Sardis in the second century, in a recently discovered passage, appears to refer to this Epistle [1]. This evidence is the more important, because Melito dwelt in the country to which this Epistle purports to be addressed.

The same may be said of another testimony to which we may now refer.

Firmilian [2], Bishop of Cappadocia, who wrote in the third century, speaks of Epistles by St. Peter. This testimony shows that the Church of Cappadocia had received more than one Epistle by St. Peter. And this evidence is of more value, because both these Epistles which we receive as St. Peter's are addressed to the Churches of Cappadocia and Asia [3]. Firmilian's Church and its neighbour Churches had received two Epistles from St. Peter. We have no evidence of the existence of any other Epistles by St. Peter than those which we possess. They are addressed to the Churches of Cappadocia and Asia. Therefore here is a strong presumption that these two Epistles were written by St. Peter.

S. Hippolytus, the scholar of Ignatius, and Bishop of Portus near Rome in the earlier part of the third century, quotes this Epistle as a genuine work of St. Peter [4].

We have an earlier testimony from Alexandria: Clement, the celebrated Presbyter of that Church and teacher in the catechetical school there, commented on this Epistle [5]; and Origen, his scholar, the famous teacher of that School in the second century [6], mentions two Epistles by St. Peter. This testimony is the more important as coming from that country, in which St. Mark, the son of St. Peter in the faith [7], had governed the Church.

Origen, indeed, mentions that the authority of this Epistle is questioned by some [8]. Doubtless the Heretics, who are so severely censured in it, would have spared no effort to discredit and disparage it; they would have moved heaven and earth to destroy its Apostolic authority. These very doubts therefore confirm the proof in its favour.

We have seen why it was doubted by some—on account of discrepancy of style from the first. The fact of doubts existing in some places with respect to it, is a proof that it would not be received by them before its claims were scrutinized and settled. It would never have been generally received, before all doubts on this subject were cleared up.

And what was the result of the inquiry?

Eventually all doubts concerning its genuineness and inspiration were cleared up. It was received as an inspired work of St. Peter by all the Churches of Christendom. Thus these doubts of some Churches have served a most important purpose. They have been, under God's Providence, what the doubts of St. Thomas were concerning the Resurrection of Christ. The result of these doubts is, that we need never doubt.

When we arrive at the fourth and fifth century after Christ, we find that at that time this Epistle was universally received throughout Christendom as an inspired writing of St. Peter. It was recognized and cited as such by S. Cyril at Jerusalem, by S. Athanasius at Alexandria, by the Council of Laodicea, by S. Gregory Nazianzen at Constantinople, by S. Epiphanius in Cyprus, by S. Augustine in Africa, by Ruffinus and Philastrius in Italy [9]. These venerable men were in earnest. They understood the importance of the question at issue,—Is this the work of an Apostle, is it the Word of God? They possessed many written documents for determining that question which we do not now possess. They all received this Epistle [10]. And let us consider,—to what did this reception amount? It amounted to no less than this—that this Epistle was to be read in Christian Churches to Christian congregations as the work of an Apostle; it was to be read as Canonical Scripture, as of equal Authority with the writings of Moses and the Prophets,—as the Word of the Holy Ghost.

[10] To this may be added the testimony of the Ancient Uncial Manuscripts. In A and C the First Epistle is inscribed Πέτρου Α', and in B it is inscribed πρώτη. These inscriptions show that the copyists of those very early documents knew a Second Epistle, and in A and B the Second is contained, with the inscription Πέτρου Β'. It is also described as the Second Epistle of St. Peter in C, G, K.

How could such a reception have taken place? Only from the concurrent persuasion of all those Fathers and Churches—that this Epistle is indeed the work of St. Peter, and the Word of God.

If, as has been alleged by some in recent times, this Epistle was not known in the age of St. Peter, if it is the production of a later generation, how could this general suffrage have been obtained, and this universal reception have ever been effected? The question was not concerning a various reading, or a single verse, but a whole Epistle, claiming to be from the pen of an Apostle. Suppose now that the Bishops and Clergy of the Churches in all parts of Christendom had been able or willing to palm a forgery upon the people, suppose that they had all conspired to invite them to receive the work of an Impostor as the Word of God, can we imagine that the many thousand Congregations would have connived at such an act of impiety? Would no single voice have been raised to denounce it? And this not in a dark age,—not in mediæval twilight, when ignorance prevailed, and superstitions stole into the Church; but in the meridian splendour of the fourth and fifth centuries,—in the most brilliant age of Ecclesiastical learning, in the age of S. Athanasius, S. Basil, S. Cyril, and the Gregories, and S. Chrysostom, and S. Jerome, and S. Augustine. All these received this Epistle. It was read,—as it is now read,—in all Churches, as the work of St. Peter, and as the Word of God. It never would have been so received, it never would have been so read, unless they had been satisfied by irresistible proofs that it is, what it professes to be, the work of St. Peter, and that it is, what they declared it to be, the Word of God. Their reception of it affords practical demonstration that such proofs were given. We may safely appeal to their reception of it as a sufficient reason for our reception of it. If such evidence as this does not convince us, no evidence will. There is scarcely a single writing of all Antiquity, sacred or profane, which must not be given up as spurious, if the Second Epistle of St. Peter be not received as a genuine writing of the Apostle, and as a part of Holy Writ.

Let us consider also the nature of this testimony,—the testimony of the Universal Church. The Universal Church is formed of all the Churches of Christendom. The testimony of the Churches of Christendom, regarded merely as human societies, guided by reason and experience, is assuredly of great weight. But the Church of Christ Universal is not to be regarded as a mere human association. It is not like a legal Tribunal, or a civil Assembly; it is not like a literary Institution, or a scientific Society. It is the Spouse and Body of Christ, enlightened by the Holy Ghost. It is the seven-branched Golden Candlestick, set in the Tabernacle of this World, to illumine it with the Light of His Holy Word. It is the Guardian and Keeper of Holy Writ. If any Book which the Church Universal propounds to us as Scripture, be not Scripture; if any Book, which she reads as the Word of God, is not the Word of God, but the Work of an Impostor, then, with reverence be it said, Christ's promise to His Church has failed, and the Holy Spirit has not been given to guide her into all truth. But Christ is the Truth. He is the Alpha and Omega. His Word is Yea and Amen. And therefore what He promised, that He performed. He has been, He is, and He ever will be, with His Church. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. He has sent His Spirit to teach her all things. And therefore the testimony of the Universal Church of Christ, declaring that the Epistles, which we receive as such, are Epistles of St. Peter, and are the Word of God, is not her testimony only,—it is the testimony of Christ, Who is present with her. It is the Witness of the Holy Spirit, Who is in her. Therefore that witness is true. And we may rest firmly assured, that the Second Epistle of St. Peter, which has been received by the Universal Church of Christ for fourteen hundred years, is indeed what she affirms it to be, a genuine work of the Apostle, and a part of the Holy Scriptures given by Inspiration of God[1].

[1] After this Introduction had been finished, the Writer was favoured by the kindness of the Rev. Francis Procter, M.A., Author of the History of the Book of Common Prayer,—with access to some papers of the late lamented Archdn. Hardwick, in vindication of the Genuineness of this Epistle. The learned Author designed to have written a Treatise on this question, and to have added it to those valuable works which he bequeathed to the world as Christian Advocate in the University of Cambridge. He did not live to execute his design; but enough is preserved to show his strong conviction of the genuineness of this Epistle. An extract from his papers will be found below, p. 79, and some use has been made of them in the Synopsis of the Contents of the Epistle.

Summary of the Contents of the Epistle.

In addition to what has already been said above on the design of this Epistle, the following brief summary of its contents may be inserted here:—

The doctrines which constitute the groundwork of this Epistle are those of the Eternal Sonship, Divine Majesty, and glorious Re-appearing of Christ our Saviour and Lord.

The opening salutation is addressed to all who are represented by the Apostle as partakers of the same precious faith as that which animated the writer and his Jewish fellow-Christians; and he prays that Grace and Peace may be multiplied to them in the mature knowledge[1] of God and of Jesus our Lord.

He then proceeds to recall to the minds of his readers, in a hortatory form, certain fundamental truths of religion, as already known to them.

1. The divine gift of Regeneration, bestowed upon them by God, and making them partakers of the divine Nature.

2. The consequent obligation on their part to add to their faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and other graces, till their Christian life is consummated in Love.

3. The glorious recompense, which is laid up in store for those who cherish these evangelical graces, and "bring forth the good fruit of them in their lives; and this recompense is the entrance, that is richly furnished to them, into the Eternal Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ[2]."

St. Peter had dilated on these truths in his First Epistle; and the reference to them here indicates the connexion of this Epistle with the former one, and confirms the arguments for its genuineness.

He warns them that wherever these graces and virtues are not, there the doctrine of Christ is not duly known. Whosoever does not grow in grace, and bring forth good fruit, is blind to the true nature of the Gospel, and forgets the purging away of his former sins, and cannot hope for admission into the holy and blessed presence of their Saviour and King.

The Apostle reminds them, that these truths have already been made known to them, and supposes that "they are well grounded and settled in them[3];" but he deems it right, while he is spared to them, which will be but for a short time, to stir up their minds by calling these doctrines and truths to their remembrance. Truths like these, he implies, deserve the most earnest attention; and he must be solicitous for their maintenance. For it was no fable, such as misbelievers devise, which we followed, when we made known to you the Power and glorious Re-appearing[4] of Christ. Our eyes saw some gleams of that glory in His Transfiguration on the Holy Mount, and we heard with our ears the voice from heaven proclaiming Him to be the well-beloved Son of God.

We have, also, other confirmations of these truths in the prophetic Word; to which ye give heed, and in doing so, ye act wisely—however the false Teachers may disparage it[5]—until the day dawn, and the light in all its fulness breaks in upon you.

But with regard to Prophecy, you need some cautions. The true Prophecy must be distinguished from the false: and you must remember, first of all[6], that true Prophecy is a far higher thing than the utterance of the Prophet's own knowledge; and though he utters prophecy, it surpasses his powers of interpretation; for they who uttered it, did not utter it as mere men, but as men of God, who were borne along by the Holy Ghost[7].

Besides, as there were false prophets among the people of Israel, who were a type of the Christian Church, so there will be false Teachers among you. The writer places himself, without any misgiving, among the true Prophets, and proceeds to unveil the future. He pre-announces that false Teachers will arise in the Church, and he describes the character of those Teachers, and the evil fruits of their teaching, with the prophetic fire and pathos of an ancient Hebrew Prophet. The chief characteristic of these false Teachers is, that they will "deny the Lord that bought them[8]." Here is the source of the misery which will overflow from them upon the Church. Starting forth from this destructive heresy, they will seduce many by their licentious doctrines, and will trade and traffic therewith, for love of lucre. Yet the destruction of these destroyers is at hand. They may boast of angelic intelligence and power, but He who spared not the rebel Angels, will not spare them. He who overwhelmed the world with a flood, will overwhelm them. He who consumed Sodom with fire from heaven for its filthiness, will consume them for their licentiousness. And as certainly as God destroyed the ungodly, will He save you, if you are true to Him. He who saved Noah, He who delivered Lot, will rescue you, and all the righteous with you.

After this warning and encouragement, the Apostle goes on with the prophetic vehemence and indignation of a true seer of God, to complete his description of the impiety and profligacy of the false Teachers. He beholds them as present before him. They follow the flesh in the pollutions of lust. They speak evil of Dominion, and blaspheme Glories[1]. And yet they call themselves Christians; they associate with you in your assemblies; and like Balaam, once a true prophet, but tempted to swerve from the right way by love of money and worldly honour, they leave the path of righteousness; and while they boast their superior intelligence, they degrade themselves beneath the brute creatures, whose lusts they imitate, and become like the false prophet, whose madness was rebuked by the ass upon which he rode[2].

The false Teachers, as described by the writer, bear a striking resemblance to those with whom Simon Peter himself, as we know from the Acts of the Apostles[3], and from other sources, had a personal conflict—especially Simon Magus[4]; and this consideration supplies another argument in favour of the genuineness of this Epistle.

Like Balaam, these false Teachers cast a stumbling-block in the way of God's people. They carry away with them many others, especially new converts, who had only just escaped the errors and vices of Heathenism. They allure them with the promise of liberty, being themselves slaves of licentiousness. Their latter end is worse than the beginning; for it were better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than when they had known it to turn away back from it, like the sow, that has been washed, to her wallowing in the mire[5].

The Apostle now reverts to those whom he had addressed in his First Epistle[6]. He reminds them again of the warnings uttered by the Prophets, and of the charge delivered to them by the Apostles. They well knew, that errors such as he was denouncing had been reprobated by anticipation. They knew that in the last days would arise scoffers, striking at the root of their Christian hopes, and asking, "Where is the promise of His Coming?" Where is the end of all things? "All things remain as they were from the beginning." He refutes these mockers by pointing to the Sacred History of the Creation, and by affirming, that, as the Heaven and Earth were not from eternity, but were made by God's Word; so they would not remain for ever, but would be destroyed by the same Word; and as the antediluvian world was destroyed by water, ministered from the internal reservoirs of its own Heavens and Earth, so it will be consumed by fuel and combustion supplied and set on fire by its own Elements. He reminds them that God's ways are not as our ways; that His measure of Time is not like ours; that what is slow to us, is speedy to Him, with Whom a thousand years are as one day. But, in fine, the Day of the Lord will come. The conflagration of the World will be universal. But the faithful will survive it, and will inhabit the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness[7].

On this assurance he grounds a concluding exhortation to earnestness, circumspection, and holiness. God delays His coming in long-suffering, which is salvation: for who otherwise would

[3] Acts viii. 17—25, and below, on this Epistle, ii. 1.

[4] This is thus stated by the late Archdn. Hardwick, in the Manuscript note already referred to:

"The same Peter (Symeon Peter) who professes to have written this Epistle, had himself confronted Simon Magus (Acts viii.) in the province of Samaria, where the soil, half heathen and half Jewish, was peculiarly prepared for such a conflict, and though stories told of their subsequent encounters are in many cases altogether fabulous, especially those recorded in the Pseudo-Clementines, the vast importance which the Early Church attributed to Simon Magus, is receiving fresh corroboration from inquiries of the present day.

"If Simon Magus himself was not the patriarch of all the Gnostic heresies, he was at least their first patron and great precursor. He put forth the earliest counterfeit of Christianity, and in the time of Justin Martyr he was worshipped as the first God (ὡς ὁ πρῶτος θεὸς) by nearly all the Samaritans.

"When we find him in the Acts of the Apostles, Simon, not devoid it would seem of religious sensibility, is borne along by the popular excitement; he believes and is baptized (viii. 13). Yet like the man depicted in the first chapter of our Epistle, he does not add to his faith virtue, nor place knowledge in subordination to moral goodness; he forgets that he was purged from his old sins (2 Pet. i. 9), and his last state is worse than the first (2 Pet. ii. 20).

"We cannot positively affirm indeed from what has been recorded in the Acts, that Simon, immediately after his relapse, proceeded to build up a system of belief, commensurate in every point with the heresy imputed to him by Irenæus and Hippolytus. But evidence exists to prove, that most, if not all, the ingredients of Simonianism had been projected, and were actively fermenting, in the Apostolic age. The founder of this system wished to be regarded as the highest emanation of the Deity ('sublimissima virtus'). He was consequently a false Christ, and even if it could be shown that he adopted Christian phraseology, he used the Gospel as a kind of magical agent, but neglected its moral power. He respected (so to say) its supernatural gifts and revelations, but threw off its salutary discipline, and did not scruple to prostitute its holy maxims to the basest and most selfish ends. This latter circumstance excited, as we know, the most emphatic reprobation of St Peter."

be saved? Such also had been the teaching of "his beloved brother, St. Paul," who had been represented by some[1] as a rival and opponent of the writer, and whose writings had been perverted by some, in favour of Antinomian licentiousness[2], as the rest of the Scriptures had been wrested by the unlearned and unstable, to their own ruin. Be ye therefore on your guard, for ye are forewarned. Do not swerve from your own stedfastness, but grow in grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to Whom be Glory, both now and for ever. Amen.

Ch. I. 1. Συμεών] שִׁמְעוֹן (Shimeon), the Aramaic form of Simon; used by St. James at Jerusalem, when speaking of Simon Peter. Acts xv. 14. Its use here is an evidence that the Writer is addressing Jewish Christians.

— ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν καὶ Σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ] in the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ, Ye have obtained faith by the free gift and grace of God. Faith itself is a gift of God, and your faith is equally precious in His sight with our faith. On this use of ἡμῖν, compare Rev. xiii. 11, κέρατα ὅμοια ἀρνίῳ. Winer, § 66, p. 549.

Ye obtained "this faith in and by the righteousness of Christ, Who is the Lord our Righteousness" (Jer. xxiii. 6; cp. 1 Cor. i. 30. 2 Cor. iii. 9. Rom. iii. 21—26; v. 20); and by virtue of His Incarnation and your Incorporation in Him, ye receive all grace from God. John i. 16.

The words τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ Σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ are best rendered, of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ. That they may be thus rendered, cannot be doubted (cp. Winer, p. 118, note, and De Wette here). And they are rendered thus by Beza, Hemming, Gerhard, Dietlein, and others here; and by the Greek and Latin Fathers in the similar place of St. Paul, viz. Titus ii. 13, τοῦ μεγάλου Θεοῦ καὶ Σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, where see the note, and Wiesinger's commentary there.

This declaration of the Godhead of Christ was very suitable to the commencement of this Epistle, in which the Author is speaking of the gracious dispensation by which we have become "partakers of the divine nature," v. 4; a participation effected by the Incarnation of the Eternal Word (John i. 14), God manifested in the flesh (1 Tim. iii. 16), "God with us" (Matt. i. 23).

This declaration was also very pertinent here, because this Epistle was designed to refute the errors of those who separated Jesus from Christ, and denied the Lord that bought them, and rejected the doctrine of His Divinity. See the Introduction, and below on ii. 1.

It is observable, that this Epistle ends in the same terms. See note below, iii. 17, 18.

St. Peter's usage of the article (τοῦ) and copula (καὶ) in other places of the Epistle confirms this interpretation. Compare v. 11, τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν καὶ Σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and ii. 20, and iii. 18; so that there appears to be good ground for the assertion of Bp. Middleton, p. 595, that "this passage is plainly and unequivocally to be understood as an assumption that Jesus Christ is our God and Saviour," and it may be coupled with the testimony of St. Paul to the same effect, in Titus ii. 13.

2. χάρις—πληθυνθείη] Grace to you and Peace be multiplied. The same salutation as in the First Epistle of St. Peter, and not found, in the same terms, in any other Epistle. See 1 Pet. i. 2.

— ἐν ἐπιγνώσει] in the mature knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord. St. Peter inculcates this word ἐπί-γνωσις (v. 3. 8; ii. 20) in this Epistle, directed against the falsely called γνῶσις, or knowledge (1 Tim. vi. 20), of the Gnostic Teachers.

The same thing is done by his brother Apostle St. Paul, in the Epistle to the Colossians (Col. i. 9, 10; ii. 2; iii. 10), an Epistle which, in many respects, is the best commentary on this Epistle of St. Peter. See above, Introduction, p. 70.

3. ὡς] seeing that, forasmuch as, God has done His part for your salvation, therefore now do ye yours. On this sense of ὡς, see Winer, § 65, p. 543.

— εὐσέβειαν] godliness; a word repeated in this Epistle (see vv. 6, 7; iii. 11) in opposition to the ἀσέβεια of the false Teachers; and for similar reasons, reiterated by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Bishop of Ephesus, see 1 Tim. ii. 2; iii. 16; iv. 7, 8; vi. 3. 5, 6. 11; and 2 Tim. iii. 5, where he describes false Teachers as having μόρφωσιν εὐσεβείας, a form of godliness, but denying its power. Cp. Titus i. 1. It occurs only in one other place of the New Testament. Acts iii. 12.

— δεδωρημένης] having given as a δῶρον, gift,—active; so δεδώρηται, he hath given as a gift, v. 4. Cp. Rom. iv. 21, ὃ ἐπήγγελται. Winer, § 39, p. 234.

— ἰδίᾳ δόξῃ καὶ ἀρετῇ] by His own Glory and Virtue. So A, C, and Lach., Tisch., Alford.—Elz. has διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀρετῆς. Δόξα is the Glory of the Godhead in its own Essence and Nature. Ἀρετὴ is the excellence of its moral attributes energizing in acts of Power, Wisdom, Justice, and Love. Cp. 1 Pet. ii. 9.

This use of ἴδιος for suus is characteristic of St. Peter. See here, ii. 22; iii. 3. 16, 17; and 1 Pet. iii. 1. 5.

This passage is cited as from "the Catholic Epistles," by Athanasius, Dialog. de Trin. i. p. 164.

4. θείας κοινωνοὶ φύσεως] partakers of the Divine Nature, by the Incarnation of the Eternal Word, and by your filial Adoption and baptismal Incorporation in Him. See John i. 12. This passage appears to be imitated by S. Hippolytus, Refut. Hæres. p. 333, γέγονας θεὸς . . . ὅσα παρακολουθεῖ Θεῷ, ταῦτα παρέχειν ἐπήγγελται Θεὸς, ὅτι ἐθεοποιήθης ἀθάνατος γεγηθεὶς . . . σοῦ πτωχεύει Θεὸς, καὶ σὲ θεὸν ποιήσας εἰς δόξαν αὐτοῦ. S. Hippolytus in that treatise, especially at the close, seems to have had this Epistle in his mind, see p. 338, and cp. below, ii. 4; and in his inculcation of the true ἐπί-γνωσις in opposition to the false gnosis of heretical teachers; cp. pp. 338, 339, with i. 3. 8; ii. 20.

This passage is cited by Origen in Levit., hom. 4, as from a genuine writing of St. Peter. See also below, vv. 16. 19; and so Athanasius, c. Arian., orat. ii. 1, p. 323.

5. αὐτὸ τοῦτο δέ] But for this very reason. The δὲ has an adversative force, as usual, which must not escape notice.

The false Teachers may abuse God's grace as a plea and occasion for sin; but (δὲ) do you regard it as a reason and encouragement for holiness. On καὶ—δὲ see 1 John i. 3. As to αὐτὸ τοῦτο, for this very reason, cp. Xenophon, Anab. i. 9. 21. Plato, Protag. 310. See Winer, § 21, p. 129. Matthiæ, § 470. 7. Kühner, § 278. 2.

The abundance of God's grace to us is represented by St. Peter as the reason for our diligent labour in working out our own salvation. God works with us, in us, and for us, in order that we may work for His glory and our own eternal good. Cp. Phil. ii. 12.

For this very reason, of God's bounty to you, do you also do your part, contributing on your side (παρ-εισενέγκαντες) all diligence.

— ἐπιχορηγήσατε ἐν τῇ πίστει ὑμῶν τὴν ἀρετήν] contribute, or furnish forth, in your faith, virtue.

Ἐπιχορηγεῖν is, literally, to contribute, or furnish, the requisite resources for the outfit, equipment, and training of a dramatic chorus; and perhaps ἐπὶ may here imply addition. Hence it means to supply means and resources generally. Cp. Gal. iii. 5. 2 Cor. ix. 10. Col. ii. 19, and Welstein here.

The preposition ἐν, in, indicates that the Virtues here specified are to be linked one to another, as in a chain. Seven Christian graces are here joined together hand in hand. Faith leads the Chorus, and Love completes it. St. Peter's seven correspond to St. Paul's three. (1 Cor. xiii. 13.) In each Apostolic group Faith leads, and Charity ends.

To adopt another metaphor, suggested here by St. Peter's words. Faith, the gift of God (see v. 1), is the groundwork, on which all Christian virtues are to be built up, so as to be in it as in their original and actuating principle. (Theophylact.) Compare the use of ἐν in Eph. ii. 21, 22, ἐν ᾧ πᾶσα οἰκοδομὴ συναρμολογουμένη αὔξει εἰς ναὸν ἅγιον ἐν Κυρίῳ, ἐν ᾧ καὶ ὑμεῖς συνοικοδομεῖσθε εἰς κατοικητήριον τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν Πνεύματι.

God has laid the foundation of faith: but remember, it is your faith (πίστις ὑμῶν), it is to be yours by being moulded into the whole framework of your life. God has laid this foundation, do you supply in addition (ἐπιχορηγήσατε) on your part, the materials requisite for the structure and furniture of the Christian life. Faith is the foundation; that is laid by God. Man must do his part in rearing the superstructure; he must add the successive stages of spiritual masonry, one upon another, till the fabric is complete.

Another figure also, taken from the natural world, seems to to have been in the Apostle's mind. The Christian believer must put forth his spiritual energies, till the Tree of Christian Life reaches its full maturity. See note above on Luke xvii. 5, where Christ represents faith as the seminal principle from which all Christian Virtue grows. So here St. Peter.

If this is done, then they will not be either like useless heaps of rubbish, or like barren trees; they will be neither ἀργοὶ nor ἄκαρποι (v. 8; 1 Tim. v. 13. Titus i. 12; iii. 14), but the entrance to the everlasting kingdom will be richly supplied also (ἐπιχορηγηθήσεται) to them (v. 11); they will be built up in the heavenly City; they will also be like trees planted by the side of the living Water, which flows from the throne of God. Rev. xxi. 19; xxii. 1. Cp. Dr. H. More on the Mystery of Godliness, b. viii. c. 3, pp. 261, 262.

— τὴν ἀρετήν] supply in your faith virtue, blended with your faith. Let not your faith be a barren speculative faith, but a faith that worketh by love. Gal. v. 6. Titus iii. 8. Supply also in your virtue, knowledge; let your zeal be according to knowledge. (Cp. Rom. x. 2.) And in knowledge join temperance; let not your knowledge be a γνῶσις, which puffeth up, such as that of those who, to gratify the carnal appetite, did not scruple to eat things offered to idols, and professed to have more intelligence than others, whom they condemned as weak brethren. 1 Cor. viii. 1, 2. Cp. Rom. xiv. 20.

7. ἐν δὲ τῇ φιλαδελφίᾳ τὴν ἀγάπην] and in your brotherly kindness do ye supply, in addition, love. Ἀγάπη is more expressive and diffusive than φιλαδελφία. It extends not only to the brotherhood (1 Pet. ii. 17), but to all men, even enemies. Therefore Love is the crown of Christian Virtues. As S. Ignatius says (ad Ephes. 14), ἀρχὴ μὲν πίστις, τέλος δὲ ἀγάπη.

Thus the cornu-copiæ of Christian fruits and flowers will be filled up and flow over in plentiful abundance.

8. εἰς τὴν—ἐπίγνωσιν] to the mature knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. Knowledge is the fruit of Virtue, see John vii. 17. By Christian obedience and Christian fruitfulness ye will attain to the clear knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 8; or as it is expressed by St. Paul in his parallel Epistle, that to the Colossians, "rooted and built up in Him, and stablished in the faith" (ii. 7), being fruitful in every good work, and growing into the clear knowledge (ἐπίγνωσιν) of God (i. 10).

With this exhortation of St. Peter, compare St. Paul's to the Colossians, "Put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; and over all put on Charity (Love, ἀγάπην), which is the bond of perfectness; and may the Peace of God rule in your hearts, to which also ye were called." (Col. iii. 12—14.)

9. ᾧ γὰρ μὴ πάρεστι ταῦτα] for, whosoever has not these graces, that man, whatever may be his professions of knowledge, is in fact blind; and he is μυωπάζων. He is blind, because he is μυωπάζων (observe the participle), that is, because, having the inner optic nerve clouded with the films of carnal lusts, he is unable to see those heavenly things which are the true objects of spiritual vision (2 Cor. iv. 18), and which are too bright for his hazy eyesight; and he is dazzled by them, as Saul was by the glory of the light of heaven. Acts xxii. 11. And they are too distant for the range of his feeble ken, so that he cannot descry them, but they are far above out of his sight. (Ps. x. 5.)

On this sense of μυωπάζω, to blink, to be purblind, weak-sighted, and short-sighted, see Aristot. Probl. 31, who says, that old men's vision differs from that of the μυωπάζων in this respect,—that they see things at a distance but not near, and he sees things near and not far off. Wetstein, p. 700.

The γὰρ, for, in this text brings out the important doctrine, that unholiness is the cause of spiritual blindness; and that, consequently, increase of holiness enlarges the range of spiritual vision. See Rom. i. 22.

— λήθην λαβών] receiving forgetfulness, by a deliberate act of his own will. Cp. iii. 5, λανθάνει αὐτοὺς τοῦτο θέλοντας. The opposite to this is ὑπόμνησιν λαβὼν, 2 Tim. i. 5.

10. διὸ μᾶλλον] Wherefore, since some have fallen away from their first faith, and have forgotten the vows and privileges of their Baptism, in which they were once enlightened (see Heb. vi. 4; x. 32), and since their eyes are now blinded (v. 9), do ye the rather on this account, taking warning from their downfall, earnestly endeavour to make your calling and election sure.

St. Peter places our calling before our election, for so it is to us. God from the beginning sees us in Christ; and He foresees who will persevere to the end. But we can only infer election from vocation. By Baptism men are visibly declared to be called of God. And from the fact of their being called, and ingrafted into the body of Christ, we may suppose them to be elect.

God has done His part; it remains for us to do ours; namely, so to use His grace, as to make our calling and election sure. See above, 1 Pet. i. 1, and on Rom viii. 30, and Introduction to that Epistle, p. 194.

11. οὕτω γάρ] For thus the entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ will be richly supplied unto you. If you supply your part (see v. 5, ἐπιχορηγήσατε), God will richly supply His, not only in abundance of grace, but of glory also. On this text see Bp. Bull's Sermon (vii. vol. i. p. 168), who hence concludes that according to our different degrees of improvement of God's grace here, will be our different degrees of participation in His everlasting glory hereafter. Cp. above, on Matt. x. 15. Luke xix. 17. John xiv. 2. 2 Cor. ix. 6.

The future, μελλήσω, is found in Matt. xxiv. 6, μελλήσετε ἀκούειν. The word signifies what is future, and often implies an intention, as (Matt. ii. 13) μέλλει Ἡρῴδης ζητεῖν τὸ παιδίον. Cp. Luke xxii. 23. Acts xii. 6; xvi. 27; xx. 13. Rev. ii. 10; x. 4. Hence Hesychius interprets μελλήσω by σπουδάσω.

The sense is, I shall be about to remind you always of these things, by means of this Epistle, which will be read in your ears, in your churches, after my decease; and thus I shall always remind you; and I write with this design, in order that, being soon about to be absent from you, and from this world, I may yet continue for ever to exhort you thereby, although you know these things, and have been established in the truth present with you, and therefore may seem to have less need of admonition from me, when absent from you.

But (δὲ) I deem it right, as long as I am in this mortal tabernacle of the flesh (2 Cor. v. 1), to stir you up in reminding you. Cp. iii. 1. I do not profess to teach you any thing new, but I endeavour to stir you up to recollect those things which you already know, and in which you have been already settled. Cp. note above on St. Paul's language, 2 Cor. viii. 10.

14, 15. εἰδώς] I deem it right to stir you up, as long as I am in this tabernacle, because I know that my time is short, and that speedy is (ἐστιν) the putting off of my tabernacle. Compare St. Peter's similar language in Acts ii. 26, ἡ σάρξ μου κατασκηνώσει ἐπ' ἐλπίδι. My departure is at hand, it is now fast approaching; I have no time to lose; As also our Lord Jesus Christ declared to me. Observe the aorist here: St. Peter is showing that the writer is referring to the particular occasion, recorded by St. John, when our Lord revealed this: Christ then said, that "when thou shalt grow old," literally, when thou shalt have begun to be old (ὅταν γηράσῃς, quùm consenueris), "another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not" (John xxi. 18). I have now begun to grow old, and I therefore know that my dissolution is speedy (ταχινή); cp. ii. 1. Isa. lix. 7. Hab. i. 6.

St. Peter pre-announces his own death, lest his friends and readers should be perplexed and dismayed by the sufferings of an aged and faithful servant of Christ; and lest they should be tempted thereby to falter in the faith. He therefore tells them that the Lord Jesus Christ had declared to him the manner of his death. But he has not therefore failed in his love to Christ; he is not terrified by the prospect; he describes the martyrdom which awaited him by crucifixion, whereby he would follow Christ (John xxi. 19. Cp. Euseb. iii. 1), as a putting off of his tabernacle.

He describes that death by a double figure; it is the putting off of a garment, to be reassumed in a more glorious form; it is also the removal of a tabernacle, to be replaced by a glorious temple in the heavenly Sion; as the itinerant tabernacle in the wilderness was succeeded by the fixed Temple in Jerusalem.

In this double figure he imitates his brother Apostle, St. Paul, who had said, "we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle shall have been dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; for in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house from heaven: for we, that are in this tabernacle, do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up in life." (2 Cor. v. 1—4.)

He speaks of his departure under these terms, as well knowing that by following Christ in putting off the tabernacle of the body of humiliation (see Phil. iii. 21), he will follow Him also in putting on that body of glory, which he had seen at the Transfiguration in the holy mount. He had then craved leave to make three tabernacles, and to detain Christ there (Matt. xvii. 4. Mark ix. 5. Luke ix. 33), but he had there heard Christ talking of his own departure (ἔξοδος, Luke ix. 31), and he had seen that ἔξοδος followed by the glory of the Resurrection and Ascension.

The word ἔξοδος may perhaps be derived by St. Peter from St. Luke's narrative of the Transfiguration (Luke ix. 31), and is happily here applied to describe his own ἔξοδος in which he followed his Master according to His precept (John xxi. 22), even in the manner of his death. Here is a silent note of the genuineness of this Epistle.

The same word appears to be applied to designate the death both of St. Peter and St. Paul, by S. Irenæus (iii. 1), μετὰ τὴν τούτων ἔξοδον, Μάρκος, ὁ μαθητὴς καὶ ἑρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου, καὶ αὐτὸς τὰ ὑπὸ Πέτρου κηρυσσόμενα ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν παραδέδωκεν: and perhaps St. Peter's design that his hearers should have it in their power on every occasion,—in every emergency and need, when they would require admonition and comfort,—to exercise the remembrance of these things (cp. Rom. i. 9. Eph. i. 16), after his own decease (μετὰ τὴν ἔξοδον), may have been realized, not only in writing the present Epistle, but in the composition of the Gospel of "Marcus his son" (1 Pet. v. 13).

16. οὐ γὰρ σεσοφισμένοις] for we did not follow cunningly devised fables—fables sophistically invented (πλασταῖς λόγοις, ii. 3), with fraudulent purpose, like those fabricated by others, when we made known to you the power and future coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we did this, having been made spectators of His Majesty.

The preposition ἐξ in ἐξακολουθήσαντες indicates that the followers of these fables had gone out of the way of truth.

He contrasts his own preaching with that of those whom he refutes in this Epistle. The Gnostic teachers followed cunningly devised fables. The system of St. Peter's adversary, the Father of the Gnostics, Simon Magus, was grounded on cunningly devised fables; viz., that he himself was the great Power of God (Acts viii. 10), and that from him and his paramour, Helena, the Angels were born, who made the world. See S. Iren. i. 23. 1. S. Hippolyt. Refut. hæres. vi. p. 174. Epiphan. hær. 21. Philastr. hær. c. 29. Tillemont, ii. p. 17. Ittig, de hæres. pp. 23—34. Bp. Pearson, Vind. Ign. ii. 6.

The impious fables of Simon, asserting that he himself was the "sublimissima virtus" of the Deity, the "super omnia Pater," and that he (Simon) was the δύναμις μεγάλη of God (see on Acts viii. 10), and that the Son of God was another apparition of himself, dwelling in the man Jesus for a time, are here confuted by St. Peter's declaration concerning the δύναμις and μεγαλειότης of Jesus Christ; and the heavenly witness of the Father to Him in the Mountain of Transfiguration (cp. Matt. xvii. 1—6. Mark ix. 2—7. Luke ix. 29—35. John i. 14).

— ἐπόπται] spectators, as of a great Mystery, see above, 1 Pet. ii. 12; iii. 2. The three disciples, of whom St. Peter was one, were admitted to the nearest view of the arcana of that great Mystery of Godliness, God manifest in the Flesh. 1 Tim. iii. 16.

17. λαβὼν γ. π. Θ. Π. τιμὴν καὶ δόξαν] for, having received from God the Father honour and glory.

Jesus Christ received honour, when the voice from Heaven said, "This is My beloved Son; hear ye Him;" and He received glory, when His face shone like the sun, and His raiment was white as the light (Matt. xvii. 2), and St. Peter, James, and John beheld His glory, the glory as of the only Begotten of the Father." John i. 14. On the nominative λαβών, cp. 2 Cor. v. 5, 6; vii. 5. Winer, § 45, p. 314, and on ὑπὸ see ibid. § 47, p. 330.

Christ then received honour and glory from God the Father. Compare the remarkable resemblance of this passage and John i. 14, concerning the same event, of which St. Peter and St. John were eye-witnesses. J. W. Burgon.

— οὗτος—εὐδόκησα] This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. This reading (εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησα) does not coincide with that in any of the Gospels, but agrees with the citation in the Clementine Homilies (iii. 53); and an argument has thence been derived by some in modern times (e. g. Mayerhoff) in behalf of the strange theory, that this Epistle is of Ebionitish origin! But, as Archdn. Hardwick has observed, the citation corresponds with the form in which the words appear in S. Hippolytus, c. Noët. c. 5.

See also below on iii. 15, where the author speaks of St. Paul as his "well-beloved brother," which is conclusive against that theory; inasmuch as St. Paul was the special object of hatred to the Ebionites and all other Judaizers, as Archdn. Hardwick has remarked (see Iren. i. 26. 2); and in the Pseudo-Clementines St. Paul is represented under the person of Simon Magus disputing with Peter. Schaff, Hist. of the Apost. Church, ii. 360, note.

The originality of the reading εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησα may be remarked as an argument for the genuineness of the Epistle. A forger would have copied the reading in St. Matthew, xvii. 5.

Observe too, he says, φωνῆς τοιᾶσδε (such as this), he does not pretend to give the precise words.

18. σὺν αὐτῷ ὄντες ἐν τῷ ὄρει τῷ ἁγίῳ] being with Him on the holy mount; holy, like the place in which God appeared to Moses and said, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground" (Exod. iii. 5. Acts vii. 33), and so Joshua is commanded by the Captain of the Lord's host who appeared to him near Jericho, to loose his shoe from his foot, "for the place whereon thou standest is holy." Josh. v. 15.

This designation of the Mountain of Transfiguration as "the holy mount," is an evidence that the history of that event was well known to the Christians of Asia, probably by the dissemination of copies of St. Matthew's and St. Luke's Gospels, when St. Peter wrote this Epistle.

There is a peculiar pertinency in this reference to the Transfiguration here. The False Teachers denied the doctrine of Christ's παρουσία or Second Coming (see iii. 4). The Transfiguration was designed and declared by our Blessed Lord to be a type and earnest of that Future Coming in glory. See the connexion of His declaration concerning His Coming (παρουσία) with the Evangelical accounts of the Transfiguration, Matt. xvi. 28; xvii. 1, and the parallel places in St. Mark and St. Luke.

19. καὶ ἔχομεν] and we—observe, we—possess the word of prophecy; a more sure word than even this Voice from heaven which I heard, and than that Vision of the Transfiguration which I saw. Do not therefore suppose that you have not as clear evidence of that Second Coming as I have, who was admitted to see His glory at the Transfiguration.

Our Lord Jesus Christ (says S. Augustine), foreseeing that some ungodly men would arise, who would disparage His miracles as if they were the work of sorcery, sent the Prophets to bear witness of Him before His Incarnation, and therefore the word of Prophecy is even more sure than the voice which the three Apostles heard from heaven. S. Augustine in Joan., Tract. 35.

And again; St. Peter calls the word of Prophecy more sure than the voice which he heard from heaven; he calls it more sure, not more true. And what does he mean by calling it more sure? He means, that it is an evidence by which the hearer is more assured. And why? Because it might be alleged by impious men, that the voice and light from heaven were magical illusions; but no such objection can be made against the word of Prophecy. By the Voice from Heaven the believing are confirmed, and by the Word of Prophecy the unbeliever is convinced. S. Augustine, Serm. 43.

Besides, the Voice from heaven was a single Voice, heard by only a chosen few, who survived but for a short time; but the Word of Prophecy is the concurrent testimony of many inspired persons in several ages, and has been delivered to the Churches of God; and it receives fresh accomplishments, and gains additional force, in every successive generation; and it "endureth for ever" (1 Pet. i. 25); and is ever sounding in the ears of the world.

Further, the Transfiguration was indeed designed to be a type of Christ's future Coming in Glory; but the testimony of types, which are allusive and analogical, is not so clear as the explicit promise and descriptive language of the sure Word of Prophecy.

Moses and Elias, the Representatives of the Law and the Prophets, appeared to St. Peter and the two other Apostles on the holy mount. But St. Peter, in his speeches to the Jews, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, never refers to that personal appearance; but he always grounds his appeal on the writings of Moses and the Prophets. The Vision on the holy mount was a strong argument to himself; but the argument from the prophetic word, delivered "by holy men of God, borne along by the Holy Ghost," was βεβαιότερος, surer, to his hearers.

We must come for our light to the word of prophecy; for even they, who had the supernatural light, "were fain to resolve all into this. Witness St. Peter: he, and they that were with him, saw Christ's glory and heard the voice from heaven. What then? He had the evidence of both senses; and yet after both these, he says, 'we have the more sure word of prophecy' than both these—a word more sure and more clear than them both." Bp. Andrewes, i. p. 255: see also ibid. i. 19.

Here is a strong evidence of the genuineness of the present Epistle. A forger, personating St. Peter, would have magnified the importance of the supernatural visions vouchsafed specially to him whose character he assumed. He would have exalted those revelations above prophecy. But the Apostle, whose characteristic is humility, is not "elated by the greatness of his revelations;" but wisely and soberly commends the ordinary means of grace, which all Christians, of every age and country, possess in the sacred Scriptures, as of more cogency and value for their assurance and growth in grace, than any extraordinary visions which were vouchsafed personally to himself.

— ᾧ καλῶς ποιεῖτε] to which (word of prophecy) ye do well that ye take heed, as to a lamp shining in a dark place—αὐχμηρῷ τόπῳ, a dry, gloomy, squalid place (Wetstein, p. 702)—until the day shall have dawned, and the morning star shall have arisen in your hearts.

The Apostle compares Prophecy to a lamp which guides the footsteps of the wayfaring man in a gloomy, desolate place, where he is not likely to meet any one to direct him on his way; and serves as his guide in the night and the twilight, till the dawn appears, and he no longer needs the lamp: compare note above on the word φωστῆρες, Phil. ii. 15. Prophecy is such a lamp; it has a preparatory and manuductory office, as John the Baptist, the precursor of the LIGHT, had. He was a λύχνος φαίνων, a shining lamp; and the Jews did well to rejoice for a season in his light (see on John v. 35).

But Prophecy is not the Light. It was sent, as John the Baptist was, to bear witness to the Light (John i. 7, 8). And the Lamp of Prophecy is only for a season, till He, who is "the True Light," "the Light of the world" (John i. 4. 9; viii. 12; xii. 46), shall have risen in your hearts; as John was only for a season, till Christ, the Day-spring from on high, had arisen, and was fully revealed and manifested in His works. See above, on Matt. xi. 2—13, and Rev. xxii. 16, where Christ calls Himself the Morning Star; and He is called ὁ πρὸ ἑωσφόρου φωσφόρος by Hippolyt., Refut. hær. p. 337, from Ps. cx. 3; and so Theophylact here, who says that the φωσφόρος is Χριστοῦ παρουσία.

These words, so interpreted, do not imply, that those persons to whom they were addressed had not received the light of Christ in their hearts; but they intimate, that all the prophecies concerning Christ had not as yet been fulfilled, and therefore the word of prophecy was still in some respects, especially in the predictions delivered by our Lord and His Apostles, in the New Testament, concerning His Second Coming and Future Glory, a lamp shining in a dark place.

If even St. John the Baptist was only a Lamp compared with Christ, in His First Coming, how glorious was that Coming! And if all the word of Prophecy, spoken by all the holy men of old, is only a Lamp compared with Christ in His Second Coming, how glorious will that Coming be!

The Christian, therefore, does well to take heed to the word of Prophecy, even till the Great Day shall have dawned on the world, and the Morning Star shall have risen on the hearts of the faithful, to whom He who is "the Morning Star" has proφωσφόρος ἀνατείλῃ ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν· [20] [l] τοῦτο πρῶτον γινώσκοντες, ὅτι [l] Rom. 12. 6.

mised to "give the morning Star" (see on Rev. ii. 28). Then the Lamp of Prophecy will be eclipsed in the splendour of Christ's presence, as St. Paul has taught us (1 Cor. xiii. 8, 9. 12). It will be obscured by the surpassing Light of the Countenance of God shining on the pure in heart (Matt. v. 8). They will no more need the prophetic word, who are permitted to see the INCARNATE WORD in all His Glory. Compare S. Augustine, in Joann., Tract. 35, sect. 9, and Serm. 126.

The truth of Christ's δύναμις καὶ παρουσία, power and Second Coming, is even now realized by Faith in the hearts of the believers; but it will hereafter be seen with their eyes.

20. τοῦτο πρῶτον] knowing this first of all, that no prophecy of Scripture becomes a matter of its own interpretation; for prophecy was not at any time brought (to the world) by the will of man—like the delusions of the false prophets who prophesied out of their own hearts (Jer. xxiii. 26)—but holy men of God spake, being borne along by the Holy Ghost.

However excellent the uses of Prophecy are—as just declared—yet do not imagine that it can interpret itself. It does not become a thing of its own solution. It cannot interpret itself. Its Interpreter is Time.

The word ἴδιος is used seven times by St. Peter, and always in this sense, its own: see 1 Pet. iii. 1. 5. 2 Pet. ii. 16. 22; iii. 3. 16, 17.

The word ἐπίλυσις is best explained by the use of the verb ἐπιλύω (to interpret, explain) in the Gospel of St. Peter's disciple, St. Mark, iv. 34, τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ ἐπέλυε πάντα. He was explaining all things to His disciples; cp. Gen. xli. 12, where Joseph is said ἐπιλύειν (i. e. to interpret) to each man according to his dream. And this is the sense given to ἐπίλυσις in the Vulg., Syriac, Arabic, and Æthiopic Versions. The passage of Genesis affords an excellent illustration of St. Peter's meaning. The dreams of the chief butler and baker, and of Pharaoh, were from God. So is Prophecy. They could tell their dreams. But Joseph expressly declares, on both occasions, that the interpretation appertains not to himself or to any man, but to God. Gen. xl. 8; xli. 15, 16: cp. Huther, p. 287.

The best comment on this passage is supplied by St. Peter himself, in his First Epistle, i. 10, where he represents the Prophets as making search concerning the salvation to be revealed, and as inquiring what the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, was indicating.

The Prophets were inspired to prophesy, but were not enabled to interpret their own prophecies. See Dan. viii. 26, 27; xii. 8, and Theophylact here, and the excellent remarks of Bp. Sherlock, at the beginning of his Second Discourse on Prophecy, vol. iv. pp. 19—23; and so Knapp, De Wette, Schleusner, and others.

This statement of St. Peter is an answer to the objections of those who, like the Jews, to whom he was writing, had possessed the Prophecies for many generations, and yet expected a Messiah very different from Him Who was foretold by the Prophets, and came and fulfilled the Prophecies.

It also contains a caution against several errors of the false Teachers against whom St. Peter is writing.

The Simonians, Cerinthians, and other Heretics of the Apostolic age, alleged that Moses and the Prophets were not inspired by God, but by Angels, who made the world. See S. Hippolytus, Refut. hæres. p. 178, προφήτας ἀπὸ τῶν κοσμοποιῶν ἀγγέλων εἰρηκέναι τὰς προφητείας: cp. p. 194. Some of these heretics even said that the Prophets were inspired by the Evil Spirit (see ibid., p. 245, and Tertullian, Præscr. Hær. c. 48. S. Epiphan. hæret., c. 21).

St. Peter is also warning his readers against another device of these false Teachers. They grounded their errors on arbitrary private interpretations of the word of prophecy; contravening the public testimony, and received doctrine, of the Universal Church of Christ; see S. Iren. i. 23, ed. Stieren, i. 20; i. 26, ed. Grabe, "prophetica curiosius exponere nituntur," and the assertion of Irenæus, "that the Gnostics study to pervert the Scriptures so as to suit their own fables" (i. 8. 1); cp. below, iii. 16.

The Gnostics grounded their impure doctrines upon several passages of the Old Testament, interpreted after their own polluted fancies, as may be seen in Epiphanius; and out of their mystical interpretation of it brought in many damnable heresies. Hence in this Epistle, which is wholly designed as an antidote against the Gnostics, the word γνῶσις is used in opposition to knowledge, to which they pretended; Dr. Hammond, on v. 5.

It is well observed by Neander (Church Hist., sect. iv.), speaking of some of the Gnostics, especially of the writer of the Pseudo-Clementines, that they indulge in violent and tortuous interpretations, with a view to favour their own opinions. And the writer of the Clementines, and advocate of Ebionite opinions, would not allow that in the case of the true prophet there was any state of ecstasy, in which the prophet is borne onward by the might of a higher Spirit, and announces greater things than he himself would understand. And as he could not apply his notion of Prophecy to the Prophets of the Old Testament, he looked on whatever could not be literally understood, as a mark of a spurious and delusive prophetic spirit.

St. Peter therefore contrasts the private Spirit of the false interpreters with the operations of the Holy Spirit, by whom the Prophets spake. The Prophets did not speak their own words, but were illuminated by God. They had gracious intimations from God of the glorious Revelations of the Gospel, but did not understand, nor were they able to interpret, their own Prophecies; as is well said by Œcumenius here, ᾔδεισαν τὸν καταπεμπόμενον αὐτοῖς προφητικὸν λόγον· οὐ μέντοι καὶ τὴν ἐπίλυσιν αὐτοῦ ἐποιοῦντο. They inquired what the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify. They were like lamps shining in a dark place till the dawn of day.

Since, therefore, the Prophets themselves could not expound their own prophecies, which were not produced by their own will, but were dictated by the Holy Ghost, let no person pretend to explain them by his own private spirit. But for the right interpretation of the words of the Ancient Prophets, let us listen to the words of the Apostles, who received the promised gift of the Holy Spirit who had spoken by the Prophets, and who explained by the Apostles the words which He Himself had uttered by the Prophets. Let St. Peter himself (e. g. in Acts ii. 16. 25. 34), and St. Paul, and St. Matthew, and the other Apostles and Evangelists, be our Interpreters of Ancient Prophecy. Cp. Bp. Andrewes, iii. 133. 275, 276, and Wm. Lowth, Preface to Isaiah, p. 225, ed. 1842.

Prophecy did not come by the will of man, but was dictated by the Holy Spirit of God. The Prophets prophesied, but did not interpret their own prophecies. And no one can interpret prophecy without the aid of the Spirit Who wrote Prophecy. "No one knoweth the things of God, but the Spirit of God" (1 Cor. ii. 11). And the Spirit of God does not reveal Himself in men's private imaginations, setting themselves up in opposition to the Witness of God in the Mystical Body of Christ; but the Spirit of God spake by the Prophets and Apostles to the World; and He dwells in the public assemblies of the Faithful, and makes Himself seen and heard in the general consent and concurrent practice of the Church Universal, to which Christ has promised His abiding presence (Matt. xxviii. 20), and the perpetual indwelling and guidance of His Spirit (John xiv. 16. 26; xvi. 13).

Herein consists the probationary use of Prophecy; viz., to try the faith, and exercise the vigilance and patience, of believers, and to make unbelievers themselves to become witnesses to the truth, and instruments in establishing it. If Prophecy had been ἰδίας ἐπιλύσεως, if its interpretation had been declared at the same time with its delivery, then none of those moral and probationary purposes would have been answered. The fulfilment of prophecy in a manner contrary to all previous expectation, proves the prophecy to be Divine.

On the inspiration and office of the ancient Prophets, see Tertullian, Apol. 18, "viros justitiâ et innocentiâ dignos Deum nôsse et ostendere à primordio emisit Deus, Spiritu Divino inundatos."

This passage of St. Peter seems to be imitated by S. Hippolytus (de Antichristo, 2), οὐ γὰρ ἐξ ἰδίας δυνάμεως ἐφθέγγοντο οἱ προφῆται (μὴ πλανῶ), οὐδὲ ἅπερ αὐτοὶ ἐβούλοντο ταῦτα ἐκήρυττον, ἀλλὰ διὰ τοῦ Λόγου ἐσοφίζοντο. See also ibid., c. 31: compare also his description of the Prophets, in his recently recovered work, "Philosophumena, or Refutation of Heresies," p. 337, ἔπειτα δίκαιοι ἄνδρες γεγένηνται φίλοι Θεοῦ, οὗτοι προφῆται κέκληνται, κ.τ.λ.

PRELIMINARY NOTE TO THE SECOND CHAPTER.

In the following Chapter, the writer, enlightened by the Holy Ghost, has a view of the Heresies rising up in the Church, and eagerly propagated by men who denied the Lord that bought them with His own blood, shed for them on the Cross. In it he displays the immoral consequences of these Heresies, and the ignominy which they would bring on the Christian name. He speaks in short and abrupt sentences, as one who is hurried on with impassioned vehemence and strong emotions.

The fervid eloquence of the writer in this chapter is precisely what might have been anticipated from the character of St. Peter, full of ardent love to Christ, and of earnest zeal for His glory.

It is, therefore, assuredly the part of a poor and purblind Criticism, to reject this Second Epistle, because it is not like in style to the First Epistle of St. Peter. When St. Peter wrote that Epistle, he was like a Shepherd feeding the flock of Christ's pasture; but now, in the Second Epistle, he is the same Shepherd, fighting against the wolves who were ready to tear the sheep. He is the same Shepherd in both Epistles; but the feelings by which he is animated are very different; and the language of his lips corresponds with the feelings of his heart. Cp. above, Introduction, p. 71.

As a preliminary, for the more profitable study of this Chapter, it is requisite to take a view of the principal Heresies which were springing up in the Apostolic age, and which developed themselves before the close of the first Century.

The Gnostic false Teachers of the Apostolic age, and those who arose immediately after it, whose appearance is predicted by St. Peter, denied the Lord that bought them with His blood, shed for them on Calvary, and grieved the Holy Spirit whom they had received in their baptism. St. Peter, the Apostle of the Circumcision, had a special commission to refute those heresies. For they were, for the most part, the up-growth of Judaism, not able to resist the evidence of Christianity, and desirous to accommodate it to its own prejudices. Their promoters were reluctant to receive the main doctrine of Christianity, that of the ever-blessed Trinity, as contravening the Jewish notions of the Divine Unity; and they were unwilling to accept the belief in a suffering and dying Messiah. Thus they were led to invent certain theories by way of compromise. All the heresies which are here referred to by St. Peter, will, when analyzed, be seen to be logical consequences of those Judaistic prejudices.

They may be ranged under the following heads:

The Simonians, or followers of Simon Magus, who may be regarded as the precursors of the Sabellians, taught that the Three Persons of the Trinity were only three revelations of the Same Divine Person; and they ventured to assert that Simon Magus himself was that person. Thus "they denied the Lord that bought them." See S. Irenæus, i. 20 (ed. Grabe); i. 23 (ed. Stieren). S. Hippolytus, Ref. hær. vi. p. 175.

The Docetæ of the Apostolic age, who seem to have sprung from the sect of Simon Magus, denied the reality of the human body of Jesus Christ, and asserted that He died only in appearance. Thus "they denied the Lord that bought them." Compare S. Iren. i. 20, Grabe, "passum in Judæâ putatum, cùm non esset passus." Cp. Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. p. 765, and Bp. Pearson, Vind. Ignat. ii. 11. Bp. Bull, Judic. Eccl. Cathol. cap. ii.; and Waterland on the Trinity, ch. vi. vol. v. p. 187. Tillemont, ii. p. 23.

The Nicolaitans, by their licentious practices, virtually denied the Incarnation of the Son of God; see further below on Rev. ii. 6. 15.

The Ebionites of the Apostolic age, who may be called the predecessors of the Socinians, denied the Divinity of Jesus. They affirmed that He was the son of Joseph and Mary, and born in the ordinary manner of men, and was only a just and holy man. Thus they detracted from the value of the price paid by the Son of God on the Cross, and impugned the sufficiency of that sacrifice which was offered for the satisfaction of God's Justice, and for the ransom of Mankind from the bondage of Sin and Satan, and for the reconciliation of the World to God; and thus they undermined the doctrine of the Atonement, and denied the Lord that bought them. See S. Irenæus, i. 26, Grabe, where 'consimiliter' is to be read for 'non similiter,' from S. Hippolytus, vi. p. 257.

The Cerinthians of Asia, and many others of the Apostolic and sub-apostolic age, such as Carpocrates (S. Hippolyt. Phil. p. 255), who followed in their steps, separated Jesus from Christ. They asserted that Christ descended from the Father into the man Jesus, the son of Joseph and Mary, at His Baptism, in the form of a dove, and preached during His Ministry, and worked Miracles; but that at the end of His Ministry the Christ flew away from Jesus, and did not suffer death, but that only the man Jesus suffered on the cross. See S. Iren. i. 25, Grabe. S. Hippolyt. Refut. hær. vi. p. 256. S. Epiphan. hær. 28. Tillemont, ii. p. 26. Ittig, p. 53 [1].

All the Gnostics, in fine, of whatever denomination they were, denied the Nativity, Passion, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ; though not all in the same way. Indeed, according to the excellent summary of their doctrines by S. Irenæus (iii. 11), not one of them received the truth, that the "Word was made flesh." Thus it may be truly said, that they "all denied the Lord that bought them." See S. Irenæus, cited in the Introduction to St. John's First Epistle, and Bede here, who says that "this Epistle was specially directed against the Simonians, Ebionites, and Nicolaitans;" and Bp. Bull, Defens. Fid. Nic. iii. 1, § 6; and cp. Dr. Waterland on the Trinity, ch. v. vol. v. pp. 107, 108, where he comments on this text of St. Peter, and shows that the Apostles and Apostolic men agree in censuring with the strongest language of reprobation those who taught heretical doctrines concerning the Divinity, Humanity, and Atonement of Christ. Their dogmas were condemned by the primitive Church as αἱρέσεις ἀπωλείας, heresies of destruction.

Thus great good has been elicited by the wise Providence of God from the manifold variety of error by which these Gnostic Teachers sought to corrupt the truth in primitive times. By that merciful overruling Providence, and by the Voice of the Holy Spirit in Holy Scripture, and in the Church, condemning their dogmas, and proclaiming the Catholic Faith, these false Teachers themselves have been made subservient to the refutation of similar errors in later times, and to the maintenance of the Truth in Christ.

Therefore, we may thank God for His marvellous wisdom, power, and love, in rendering the pernicious devices of the Evil One ministerial to our everlasting salvation; and we may thence derive a comfortable assurance, that even in times of greatest distress and difficulty, when the storm raised by Satan rages most fiercely, and when the water-floods of Heresy seem ready to overwhelm the Church, the rock on which she is built will stand secure, and the violence of the tempest will prove the strength of her foundation, and "the rivers of the flood thereof will make glad the City of God."

1. ἐγένοντο δὲ ψευδοπροφῆται] But there arose false prophets also (as well as true) in the people, or ancient Church of God in Israel. On this meaning of λαὸς, see Rom. xv. 10; Mede's Works, Disc. xliii. p. 238, on this text.

Do not, therefore, be surprised that there should arise false teachers among you also, even such as will bring in αἱρέσεις ἀπωλείας, heresies of destruction, by the side (παρὰ) of the true evangelical Doctrine received from us. On this use of παρὰ, see St. Paul's words, Gal. i. 8, "If any one, or even an Angel from heaven, preaches any thing παρὰ, beside, what we preached to you, and ye received from us, let him be accursed."

The word παρ-εισάγειν implies here something of sidelong and surreptitious insinuation of what is false, as in St. Paul's phrase, speaking of false brethren privily brought in, Gal. ii. 4, [1] The old Latin Translation of this passage of S. Irenæus is preserved in the editions of that Father; but his original Greek may be restored from the recently discovered treatise of his scholar, S. Hippolytus, p. 257; and vice versâ, the Greek of S. Hippolytus may be emended from the old Latin Version of S. Irenæus, e. g. for ἀποστῆναι in S. Hippolytus, p. 257, we must read ἀποπτῆναι from the 'revolâsse' in S. Irenæus, and from S. Hippolytus himself. p. 328.

αὐτοὺς δεσπότην ἀρνούμενοι, ἐπάγοντες ἑαυτοῖς ταχινὴν ἀπώλειαν· [2] καὶ πολλοὶ ἐξακολουθήσουσιν αὐτῶν ταῖς ἀσελγείαις, δι' οὓς ἡ ὁδὸς τῆς ἀληθείας βλασφητοὺς παρ-εισάκτους ψευδαδελφούς; and cp. Jude 4, speaking of false teachers who παρ-εισέδυσαν, crept in secretly by the side.

Παρ-εισάξουσιν, they will bring in. Observe the future tense. Here is a prophecy of what was still to come. Contrast this with St. Jude's word παρ-εισέδυσαν in the past tense, they crept in. What St. Peter describes as future, St. Jude declares as present. Here is an evidence that St. Jude wrote after St. Peter. Cp. iii. 2. Jude 17, and Introduction to St. Jude's Epistle.

The words ἔσονται—ἀπωλείας are quoted by S. Hippolytus, de Cons. Sæculi, c. 10, p. 98, ed. Lagarde; and Firmilian, Bishop of Cappadocia, early in the third century, refers to this passage as written by St. Peter, Ep. Cyprian. 75, "Petrum et Paulum beatos Apostolos qui in Epistolis suis hæreticos execrati sunt, et ut eos evitemus monuerunt." This is an important testimony—from the country to which the Epistle purports to be addressed (cp. 1 Pet. i. 1 with 2 Pet. iii. 1)—to the genuineness of this Epistle.

— αἱρέσεις] heresies—doctrines adopted by an act of the private choice (αἵρεσις), in opposition to the Will and Word of God, and at variance with the public teaching of the Church.

The word αἵρεσις is often used in the New Testament to signify a sect (from sequor), see Acts v. 17; xv. 5; xxiv. 5; but it is a word of more general import, as the etymology shows, and its sense in any passage must be determined by the context. Here the Apostle is doubtless condemning separation from the Church, but the false doctrines of the Separatists is what he has principally in view; and therefore αἱρέσεις may be here properly rendered heresies.

Indeed, the one involves the other. For, as S. Jerome says (ad Titum, c. iii.), "though there is this difference between schism and heresy, that schism is a separation from the Church, and heresy is perverse doctrine, yet every Schism devises some Heresy, in order that it may appear to have a reason for separation from the Church."

Heresy is so called from the Greek word signifying choice; and therefore St. Paul says that a heretic is self-condemned (Titus iii. 10), because by the very act of choosing he condemns himself. For "we Christians have no licence to bring in any thing new, or to choose for ourselves. The Apostles of the Lord are our Guides, who did not choose any doctrines, and bring them in of their own choice, but received their teaching from Christ, and faithfully delivered it to the World. And therefore, if even an Angel from heaven were now to preach to us any thing else, he would be called anathema by us." Tertullian (Præscr. hær. c. 6).

Thus this mention of Heresy follows naturally from that of ἰδία ἐπίλυσις, or private interpretation. Indeed, Heresy, or the exercise of arbitrary, private, choice in matters of doctrine, always endeavours to strengthen itself by private interpretation of Holy Writ.

The Heresies which were propagated by false teachers, denying the Lord that bought them, i. e. denying the doctrine of Christ's true Divinity and Humanity, and of the Atonement made by Christ on the cross (see the preliminary note to this chapter), are called by St. Peter "heresies of destruction," because they are opposed to the Way of Salvation; and because they as certainly lead to the destruction of the souls of men, as the true Faith leads to their salvation. Therefore, he adds, that they who bring in these heresies of destruction, by the side of the true Faith, do in fact bring upon themselves swift destruction. Here again St. Peter's language coincides with St. Paul's, who says, "that the end of those who are enemies of the Cross of Christ is destruction." (Phil. iii. 19.)

Let these warnings of the two Apostles be earnestly commended to the consideration of Socinians, and others, who deny the Godhead of Christ, and reject the doctrine of the Atonement; and to the attention of those who favour such opinions, or treat them as matters of indifference.

The false Teachers to whom St. Paul here refers, are Simon Magus and his disciples, and Cerinthus and Ebion, and the Nicolaitans; see Œcumen. and Theophylact here, and the preliminary note.

On the use of the genitive in αἱρέσεις ἀπωλείας, see above on Matt. xxiv. 15, and James i. 25.

— καὶ τὸν ἀγοράσαντα αὐτοὺς δεσπότην ἀρνούμενοι] denying even the Lord, or Master, Who bought them with His own blood, shed as the price of their redemption from captivity, for the purchase of them to Himself; and of a glorious inheritance for them. See on 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23. Gal. iii. 13; iv. 5.

Compare the parallel place in St. Jude's Epistle, where he speaks of these false teachers as denying the only Master (δεσπότην) and Lord Jesus Christ, where the word Θεὸν (God) after δεσπότην, in the edition of Elz. and in the English Version, is not found in the best MSS. (see note there), and it seems that there the Apostle St. Jude calls Christ the only Master (δεσπότην), and thus leads us to the interpretation of this place of St. Peter.

St. Peter could hardly have written these words, "denying the Lord that bought them," without some reflection on his own conduct in the High Priest's courtyard at Jerusalem, when, notwithstanding his Lord's warning, he denied Him thrice. (Matt. xxvi. 70. 72.) But he had not then seen the bloodshedding on the cross, nor received the gracious outpouring of the Holy Ghost.

— ἐπάγοντες ἑαυτοῖς] bringing upon themselves. Observe the paronomasia here. They will bring in stealthily heresies of destruction, and thus they will bring swift destruction upon themselves.

2. ἀσελγείαις] lasciviousness. See Rom. xiii. 13. 2 Cor. xii. 21. Gal. v. 19. Eph. iv. 19. 1 Pet. iv. 3. It is connected by St. Peter with the lust of the flesh in v. 18; cp. Jude 4. Cp. Wetstein, i. p. 588; the word ἀσέλγεια is interpreted in the old Glossaries by "impudicitia, lascivia."

Elz. has ἀπωλείαις here; but ἀσελγείαις is the reading of A, B, C, K, L, and is received by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf., and is important to be observed, as marking the connexion of heretical doctrine with licentious and unclean living. Those heresiarchs who "denied the Lord that bought them, also taught men to sit loose from all decent rule and order, and under pretence of liberty, to run riot in luxury and dissolute behaviour: they were heretics in morality as well as in faith, and of the worst kind." Dr. Waterland, v. p. 108.

The denial of the Incarnation of the Son of God, and of His Passion and Resurrection, took away the strongest motives to holiness; and the presumptuous claims which the Gnostic Teachers made to supernatural powers and supereminent spiritual knowledge, led to the encouragement of all carnal indulgences. Thus, for example, Simon Magus, from "whom the knowledge, falsely so called (ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις), received its beginnings" (says Irenæus), asserted that "they who believed in Him were free to live as they pleased, and that men would be saved by His grace and not according to their works; and that nothing is good by nature, but only by institution. And therefore his votaries live in lasciviousness," adds Irenæus, i. 20, Grabe[1]. Cp. Euseb. ii. 13. S. Augustine, de hær. c. 1.

In like manner, the Nicolaitans of the first century denied the need of martyrdom, and allowed the indulgence of fleshly lusts. See Œcumen. and Hammond here, and Dr. Whitby, and below on Rev. ii. 6. 14.

The Gnostic Teachers boldly asserted, that as gold is not injured by mud, so, whatever they themselves do, they are not soiled, although they wallow in the mire of lust, and filth of uncleanness; and therefore they practise with recklessness such things as those of which the Apostle says "that they who do them shall not enter the kingdom of God," and they venture to accuse us who abstain from these things, as mere dotards who know nothing. S. Irenæus (i. 6. 2).

Some of the Gnostics affirmed, that they themselves were perfect; and that no one—not even a Paul or a Peter—could soar to the heights of their knowledge, and that they were above all power, and were free to do all things on account of their emancipation from thraldom; and could not be apprehended, or even observed, by the Divine Judge. S. Irenæus i. 13, ed. Stieren; p. 61, ed. Grabe. Cp. i. 25, ed. Stieren.

Indeed, the enormities committed by them, while pretending to superior spiritual knowledge of things, are too monstrous to be recorded; they may be seen in the histories of their doctrines and practices, particularly in the works of S. Irenæus, S. Hippolytus, S. Epiphanius, and Philastrius, and the collections made from them by Tillemont, ii. 19—28. Ittig, de hæresiarch. 21—95, ed. Lips. 1690, and Neander's Church Hist. sect. iv., and Dr. Burton's Hist. of the Heresies of the Apostolic Age, 1829.

The historic records of those moral enormities, foreseen and denounced in Holy Scripture, serve the important purpose of showing, that the teaching of Heresy leads to libertinism in practice; and that the purity of society, and the happiness of household life cannot be maintained, without vigilant caution and courageous zeal against the inroads of heretical error, and that we cannot reasonably hope for the preservation of those blessings without diligent examination of sound doctrine, and unremitting earnestness in defending it.

"Denying the Lord that bought them." This Text also is of great use in confuting the exclusive notions of partial Redemption, broached by Calvinists and others of later days. In it St. Peter asserts that Christ died for all; that He shed His blood for the salvation of all; that He bought even those who deny Him, and reject the doctrine of the Atonement made by Him on the Cross, and thereby are the cause of their own destruction. St. Peter's doctrine coincides here also with that of St. Paul, who affirms that the brother may be destroyed for whom Christ died. See on Rom. xiv. 15. Besides, St. Peter here expressly declares that the destruction is brought on these false Teachers by themselves; and is not designed by God.

Thus this text declares in the strongest terms the doctrine of Universal Redemption.

God, being desirous of all men's salvation (1 Tim. ii. 4), hath in token thereof, for their sakes whom He loved, bestowed His beloved Son. The self-same affection was in Christ Himself, to whom the wicked at the day of their last doom will never dare to allege, for their own excuse, that He which offered Himself as a sacrifice to redeem some, did exclude the rest, and so made the way of their salvation impossible. He paid a ransom for the whole world; on Him the iniquities of all were laid; and, as St. Peter plainly witnesseth, He bought them who deny Him, and who perish because they deny Him (2 Pet. ii. 1). As in very truth, whether we respect the power and sufficiency of the price given, or the spreading of that infection, for remedy whereof the same was necessary, or the largeness of His desire which gave it; we have no reason but to acknowledge with joy and comfort that He tasted death for all men, as the Apostle to the Hebrews noteth (Heb. ii. 9). Hooker, E. P., book v. Appendix, p. 726. See also notes above on 1 Cor. viii. 11. Rom. viii. 30; xiv. 15. Heb. ii. 9.

— δι' οὓς—βλασφημηθήσεται] through whom the way of truth will be evil spoken of. Cp. Rom. ii. 24, τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Θεοῦ δι' ὑμᾶς βλασφημεῖται.

The Nicolaitans and Gnostics generally are described by Œcumenius as most "unholy in their doctrines, and most licentious in their lives." Clemens Alexandrinus states as a reason for his own writing, that false teachers, professing the name of Christians, and yet living shameless lives, have brought infamy (βλασφημίαν) upon the Christian name, even among the Gentiles, and that it was necessary to disabuse their minds of this illusion, and to vindicate the Gospel of Christ. See Clem. Strom. iii. init.

Doubtless, the Gentile calumnies against the Christians, to which Tertullian and the other ancient Apologists refer, and which were used to instigate persecutions against the Church (Tertull. Apol. c. 7), were caused by the dissolute practices of the Gnostics.

3. ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ] in covetousness with feigned speeches, speciously fashioned in fair forms, so as to allure and deceive (see Wetst.), they will make merchandise of you.

Covetousness is represented as a characteristic of the false teachers of the Apostolic age; and therefore in this, as well as in other respects, they are compared to the prophet Balaam, who "loved the wages of unrighteousness" (v. 15), and fell through covetousness. They taught things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake (Tit. i. 11), supposing that godliness is a lucrative traffic (πορισμὸν, 1 Tim. vi. 5); and with this view they adulterated the word of God, as κάπηλοι adulterate their wares, in order to allure and deceive. See note on 2 Cor. ii. 17. They were therefore called χριστέμποροι; see Dr. Bentley on that text, and Pseud.-Ignat. ad Trall. 7, where is a graphic picture of these Gnostic teachers,—εἰσί τινες οὐ Χριστιανοὶ, ἀλλὰ Χριστέμποροι, καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, λέγουσι Χριστὸν, ἵνα Χριστὸν ἀθετήσωσιν, καὶ οὐ νόμον συστήσωσιν, ἀλλ' ἵνα ἀνομίαν καταγγείλωσιν: for (he adds) "they sever Christ from the Father, and they calumniate the law of Christ, and His birth from the Virgin, and are ashamed of His cross, and deny His Passion, and do not believe His Resurrection. And some of them (i. e. the Ebionites) assert that Christ is a mere man (ψιλὸν ἄνθρωπον), and some of them say (e. g. the Simonians), that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are the same thing, and that the Creation was not made by God through Christ, but by some other strange power."

The covetousness of the Gnostic Teachers was exemplified by the offer made by the Father of Gnosticism, Simon Magus, to St. Peter himself, at Samaria, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles (Acts viii. 18). He supposed St. Peter to be like himself, and offered him money for the power of giving the Holy Ghost; because he worked his own magical juggleries, and taught his own licentious and self-glorifying doctrines for money. St. Peter in his indignant reply to that offer, uses the same word as here, τὸ ἀργύριόν σου σὺν σοὶ εἴη εἰς ἀπώλειαν (Acts viii. 20).

The Valentinians also, of the Sub-Apostolic age, would only impart their mysteries to those who paid large sums of money for them (S. Iren. i. 20), and the Gnostic teachers are called χρηματολαίλαπες by Pseud.-Ignat. ad Magnes. § 9.

— ἡ ἀπώλεια αὐτῶν οὐ νυστάζει] their destruction slumbereth not: properly, does not nod the head, as if it were dozing, like a weary Judge, νυστάζων δικαστὴς, Plato, de repub. iii. 405. Cp. Matt. xxv. 5, where this word describes the Virgins in the parable, and Wetstein, i. p. 508, and here, p. 703. Here is a poetic personification of Divine Retribution. Compare the words of Elijah, contrasting the slumber of Baal with the Eternal watchfulness of Him "who neither slumbereth nor sleepeth." (1 Kings xviii. 27.)

4. εἰ γάρ] For if God spared not Angels who sinned, but ταρταρώσας, committed them to chains of darkness, in which they are kept for judgment. Compare Jude 6. He (God) hath kept Angels, who kept not their own first Estate, but left their own habitation, for the judgment of the great Day, in everlasting chains under darkness. Cp. Wisd. xvii. 18. A, B, C have σειροῖς, caves, here, or dens. See Passow: and this reading is received by Lach., Alf.; but not by Tischendorf, and it does not appear to be authorized by any of the Cursive MSS. or Versions. A has ζόφοις here.

The words σειραῖς ζόφου ταρταρώσας παρέδωκεν declare that the chains of darkness are the Tartarus of which the Apostle speaks.

Besides τηρουμένους, being kept, is the reading of B, C*, G, K, and of the majority of Cursive MSS., and A and some Versions have κολαζομένους τηρεῖν, and some Versions express a future, κολασθησομένους. The reading of Elz. τετηρημένους, having been kept, rests on very little authority.

The word ταρταρώσας, found here and only here, does not necessarily signify casting them down to Tartarus, which would be καταταρταρώσας; but (like φλογώσας, τεφρώσας, κερανώσας, and other similar words) it signifies their element of punishment; and this statement, so understood, is quite consistent with the revelations of Scripture concerning the present liberty of evil Spirits, who carry a hell, a Tartarus, about with them. Cp. A Lapide here, p. 284, and Estius, p. 1170, and Bengel, who says, "possunt in terrâ versari mancipia tartari." (Luke viii. 31. Eph. ii. 2. Rev. ix. 11; xii. 9.) The word τάρταρος is used by the LXX, in Job (xl. 15), in the sense of a deep thicket, as it seems; and τάρταρος and ταρταροῦχος are used by S. Hippolytus in his newly discovered treatise (pp. 338, 339), and he seems to make a distinction between Tartarus and the lake of fire: for he describes Tartarus as a dark place, Ταρτάρου ὄμμα ἀφώτιστον ὑπὸ Λόγου φωνῆς μὴ καταλαμφθὲν, and then proceeds to speak of the lake of fire, where ταρταροῦχοι ἄγγελοι are used as instruments of punishment.

Origen (in Rom. lib. 3), referring to Jude 6, says, "æternis vinculis in tartaro (al. in tartarum) constrictos renovavit."

This passage, and the parallel in St. Jude 6, are two important Texts on the present condition and future destiny of Evil Angels; and, consequently, of those persons who yield to their solicitations (see Matt. xxv. 41),

These two texts declare—

(1) That some Angels sinned; and, as a penalty for their sin, were cast out of their original habitation; and,

(2) That they have been committed in custody to chains of darkness; and that they are now being kept in them, and they there endure some punishment.

(3) That they there remain even to the end of the World, and are reserved there for the Judgment of the Great Day.

This appears also from the language of the Devils themselves to Christ, "Art thou come to torment us before the season (καιροῦ) of Judgment?" See Matt. viii. 29, and note; and on Luke viii. 31.

It is also evident from our Lord's words, describing the transactions of the Great Day. He there pre-announces that He will then say to them on the left hand, "Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, that hath been prepared for the Devil and his angels." They are therefore not yet cast into it.

It is also further apparent from the Apocalypse, revealing ταρταρώσας παρέδωκεν εἰς κρίσιν τηρουμένους· [5] [d] καὶ ἀρχαίου κόσμου οὐκ ἐφείσατο, ἀλλ' ὄγδοον Νῶε δικαιοσύνης κήρυκα ἐφύλαξε, κατακλυσμὸν κόσμῳ ἀσεβῶν ἐπάξας· [6] [e] καὶ πόλεις Σοδόμων καὶ Γομόρρας τεφρώσας καταστροφῇ κατέκρινεν, ὑπόδειγμα μελλόντων ἀσεβεῖν τεθεικώς· [7] [f] καὶ δίκαιον Λὼτ, καταπονούμενον ὑπὸ τῆς τῶν ἀθέσμων ἐν ἀσελγείᾳ ἀναστροφῆς, ἐῤῥύσατο· [8] [g] βλέμματι γὰρ καὶ ἀκοῇ ὁ δίκαιος ἐγκατοικῶν ἐν αὐτοῖς ἡμέραν ἐξ ἡμέρας ψυχὴν δικαίαν ἀνόμοις ἔργοις ἐβασάνιζεν· [9] [h] οἶδε Κύριος εὐσεβεῖς ἐκ πειρασμοῦ ῥύεσθαι, ἀδίκους δὲ εἰς ἡμέραν κρίσεως κολαζομένους τηρεῖν· [10] [i] μάλιστα δὲ τοὺς ὀπίσω σαρκὸς ἐν ἐπιθυμίᾳ μιασμοῦ πορευομένους, καὶ κυριότητος κατα-the casting of the Devil into the Lake of Fire, as an event which has not taken place, but is yet future. Rev. xx. 10.

(4) Comparing also these texts with other portions of Holy Scripture (1 Pet. v. 8), where the Devil is compared to a roaring Lion walking about, seeking whom he may devour; and (Rev. xx. 7) where Satan is described as loosed; and with the clear assertions of the Apostolic writings, describing his present liberty, energy, and influence, and designating him as "the Prince of the power of the air" (ἀέρος not αἰθέρος, Eph. ii. 2), and as "the god of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4), we must conclude, that the chains of darkness, of which the Apostles St. Peter and St. Jude speak, and to which Satan and his associates are now confined, and in which they will be kept even till the day of Judgment, are of such power as to restrain them from ever recovering their place in the regions of light; but not such as to prevent them from exercising great power over those persons in this lower world, who allow themselves "to be taken captive by them at their will." See above, note on Eph. ii. 2, and below on Rev. xx. 1—8.

The Book of Enoch, in like manner, describes the Evil Angels as chained under the earth, till the Day of Judgment, when they will be cast into the Lake of Fire. See there, cap. v. 16; x. 6. 15; xiv. 4; xxi. 6; xxii. 4. Huther, p. 205. Cp. also the Catena here, p. 91, where we read, that "at the end of the world, Christ will condemn to severer punishment those evil Angels whom He has already shut up (in the abyss), and this He will do by casting them into everlasting fire." And Bede says here, "The Apostate Angels are yet to be condemned to the penalties of the Final Judgment; for although they have already received the nether regions of the murky air, as a prison-house, which, when compared to the bright glories of heaven, where they once dwelt, may be called an Inferno, yet there is a deeper gulf below, which still awaits them."

Accordingly, S. Jerome (in Eph. vi.) delivers it as the opinion of all the Doctors of the Church, that "the Devils have now their abode in the space between heaven and earth." And S. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, viii. 22) says, "that the Devils dwell in this nether air, and being cast down from heaven for their sin, they are here pre-condemned as in a prison, suitable to their sin." And it is asserted as an article of the Catholic Faith, by S. Irenæus (i. 2), that "Jesus Christ will come again hereafter, to raise all bodies, and to judge all men, and to cast the rebel Angels into everlasting fire." S. Justin Martyr, Origen, in Num. cap. 22, S. Irenæus (v. 26), and Eusebius (iv. 17), were of opinion "that the Devils never openly blasphemed God before the publication of the Gospel, because they did not know till then what their future punishment would be;" which opinion, whether true or no, shows that those ancient writers did not imagine that the Devil had as yet been cast into hell. See the discourse of Joseph Mede, Works, p. 24, Disc. v.

5—7.] S. Clement, Bishop of Rome, seems to have had this passage of St. Peter before him when he wrote his Epistle, capp. 7. 9. 11. pp. 34. 47 note, ed. Jacobson, p. 58, ed. Dressel.

5. ὄγδοον Νῶε] eighth Noah. Observe the order of the words; ὄγδοον, eighth, is emphatic. It not only calls attention to the fact, that he was saved with seven others (on which use of the ordinal see Winer, § 37, p. 223), but it places him as it were at the highest point of the climax; and in this respect this expression may be compared with St. Jude's saying, "Enoch, the seventh from Adam," v. 14.

Seven is the number of completion and rest, the Sabbatical number; and in Enoch—the seventh from Adam—who walked with God, and did not die, but was translated from the turmoils of this world to a heavenly rest, and taken up to God, there appears to be a figurative adumbration of the Sabbath of heavenly rest, "which remaineth to the people of God." Heb. iv. 9.

The ancient Fathers also observe, that a figure of the Glory of the Resurrection, assured to those who rise to the new life in Christ, may be seen in Noah (whose name is Comfort), the Preacher of righteousness, the eighth; under whom the seven are gathered as under their head, in the Ark, the figure of the Church, rising above the old World buried in the Flood,—which, as St. Peter teaches, is the type of Baptism, the Sacrament of Spiritual Resurrection, and makes us partakers in the benefits of the Burial and Resurrection of Christ (1 Pet. iii. 21), and derives its hopes therefrom. We are born again to a lively hope of a Resurrection to glory in Christ, whose name, Jesus or Saviour, is equivalent to 888, and who rose on the eighth day from the Grave. See note above on Luke xxiv. 1. They who abide in the Ark of the Church, built by Him Who is the true Comfort, the true Preacher of righteousness, and who brought in everlasting righteousness (Dan. ix. 24), will be borne therein by the Spirit over the waters of this troublesome world, till it is safely moored on the Ararat of Heaven. It is observable, that the Mountain on which the Ark is said to have rested, is called by the Arabs "the Mountain of the Eight." See Hammond here; or, as others affirm, a village near it is called the "town of the Eight." Cp. Winer, R. W. B. p. 82.

— ἐπάξας] This form of the aorist (instead of ἐπαγαγών) is condemned by the Atticists, and is very rare. See Buttmann, § 114, p. 64.

7. ἀθέσμων] of the lawless. Cp. iii. 17. Especially violators of divine laws, θεσμοί.

Observe, therefore, that, before the Decalogue was given, there was a Moral Law of God in the World. Cp. Rom. ii. 14. And this was broken by the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrha; and for their violations of that Law, especially as to unlawful Marriages, the Canaanites were extirpated. Lev. xviii. 3—28.

9. ἀδίκους—τηρεῖν] to keep wicked men under punishment unto the day of Judgment: as the rich man in the Parable is kept in Hades, during the interval between Death and Judgment. See Luke xvi. 23.

10. τοὺς ὀπίσω σαρκὸς, κ.τ.λ.] those who are walking after the flesh—that is, who are not led by the Spirit, but by the flesh, and fulfil the lusts thereof (Gal. v. 17, 18. Rom. viii. 12—14. Jude 8), as the Gnostic Teachers and their votaries did, see v. 2.

— καὶ κυριότητος καταφρονοῦντας] and despising lordship: as St. Jude expresses it, κυριότητα ἀθετοῦσι, they cancel, or annul lordship; i. e. render it of none effect; remove it from its place, dethrone it. See the use of ἀθετεῖν Mark vii. 9. Luke vii. 30. John xii. 48. Gal. ii. 21; iii. 15. Heb. x. 28.

The Gnostic Teachers despised and annulled κυριότητα, or lordship, in various ways:

(1) With regard to God the Father, the Κύριος Κυρίων, Lord of Lords.

Hence the Æthiopic Version explains the word lordship here by the Creator. They derogated from His κυριότης, or Lordship, by their system of dualism, in which they set up a rival evil deity in opposition to the One True God; and by separating the supreme God from the Demiurge or Creator of the material World; the origin of which was ascribed by many of them to Angels or to Æons. See above on Col. ii. 8, and 1 Pet. i. 23. S. Iren. i. 28. S. August. hær. 6. Epiphan. hær. 26. Iltig, p. 34. Tillemont, ii. pp. 17. 23, where he rightly says, "All who took the name of Gnostics distinguished the Creator of the World from the God Who revealed Himself by His Son; thus they made two gods." Cp. Gieseler, Ch. Hist. § 44.

They despised and annulled lordship—

(2) With regard to the Lord Jesus Christ. Some of them, (e. g. the Ebionites) regarded Jesus as a mere man; others (the Cerinthians) separated Jesus from Christ (see above on v. 1), and they denied the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, by which he has acquired universal lordship over the Church and over the World. See Matt. xxviii. 18. 1 Cor. xv. 25. Phil. ii. 6—9.

They also invoked other mediators in place of Christ (see on Col. ii. 8. 1 Tim. ii. 5), and denied the Lord that bought them (v. 1; cp. Jude 4); and would not call Him Lord (S. Iren. i. 1), although, as St. John says in the Apocalypse, He has His name written on

His vesture and on His thigh, "King of Kings and Lord of Lords." (Rev. xix. 16.)

They despised and annulled lordship—

(3) With regard to earthly rulers, who are Vicegerents and Deputies of God (Rom. xiii. 1—3), and are entitled to subjection for the Lord's sake (1 Pet. ii. 13). They took away the foundation of the authority of Civil Governments, by denying the Lordship of God and of Christ; and by affirming themselves and their votaries (who held the speculative gnosis which they delivered) to be free to do all things, and to be exempt from all civil restraints. See above on v. 2, and 1 Pet. ii. 16.

St. Peter wisely uses here a comprehensive word, κυριότητος, lordship, in order to remind all, that they, who despise the lordship of the Lord God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, will pay no regard to the lordship of earthly lords and governors; and that men must first "fear God," before they can "honour the king." 1 Pet. ii. 17.

— δόξας οὐ τρέμουσι βλασφημοῦντες] they (these false teachers) tremble not while railing at, or speaking evil of, glories, δόξας. Cp. Jude 8.

What are δόξαι, or glories, here?

Doubtless the word δόξα is chosen, as the word κυριότης before (see last note), for its large and general import.

It signifies,—

(1) The μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα, the excellent glory, the Divine Shechinah of the Godhead itself, i. 17.

(2) The glory of the Incarnate Word. John i. 14. James ii. 1.

(3) The glory of the Holy Ghost.

The false Teachers blasphemed the glories of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, by disparaging the Creator and Redeemer, and by ascribing the work of the Divine Sanctifier to their own magical arts, and by calumniating the prophecies of Holy Scripture, given by His Inspiration. See on i. 21.

(4) They denied the Resurrection of the Flesh; and thus they derogated from the future glories of Christ, when He "will come in His glory (Matt. xxv. 31) and in the glory of His Father" (Matt. xvi. 27), and when "He will be glorified in His Saints" (2 Thess. i. 10); and in "their glorious bodies, fashioned to be like unto His glorious body," Phil. iii. 21. See 1 Pet. i. 11, the only other passage in N. T. beside Jude 8, where δόξα is found in the plural as here.

(5) They spake evil of the glory of the Holy Angels. The Simonians represented them as the offspring of Simon Magus, who "was glorified by many as God." See Catena here, p. 93, where it is truly said, "Peter here refers to the Simonians, who blended licentiousness with ungodliness." And they traduced the Holy Angels as rebels against God, see S. Iren. i. 23. 1. And the successor of Simon Magus, Menander, called himself the Saviour, and affirmed that he could impart knowledge greater than that of the Angels. S. Irenæus, i. 23. 5.

(6) They spake evil of earthly dignities, which are images and glories of God's majesty (Rom. xiii. 1—3), and are even called gods (Ps. lxxxii. 6), as man himself is, in his headship over woman. 1 Cor. xi. 7.

(7) They spake evil of the glories of the natural world (1 Cor. xv. 40), ascribing their creation to the operation of the Demiurge, hostile to the supreme God. See the preceding note.

11. ὅπου ἄγγελοι] whereas Angels, although greater in strength and might, do not bring against them, before the Lord, a railing judgment. On this use of ὅπου see Thucyd. viii. 96, ὅπου τοσαύτη ἡ ξυμφορὰ ἐπεγεγένητο, πῶς οὐκ εἰκότως ἠθύμουν; Huther, and cp. 1 Cor. iii. 3.

There are two probable interpretations of this passage—

(1) Although they (i. e. these false teachers) are so insolent, contumacious, and impious in speaking evil of the glories of God, and of His Angels, and Saints, and His earthly representatives (see preceding note), and although the Angels of God are far superior to them (i. e. to these deceivers) in strength and might, however these false teachers may boast of their own mighty power,—as Simon Magus, who called himself "sublimissima virtus," and others did,—yet the Angels of God do not retaliate, and bring against them (i. e. against these false teachers) a railing verdict (κρίσιν); but reserve all things for the future sentence of God the Only Judge.

The good Angels of whom St. Peter speaks, earnestly desire the repentance of the wicked (see Luke xv. 7—10); but Satan is the accuser, even of the good, before God. Rev. xii. 10.

The same thought occurs in St. Jude's Epistle, in a somewhat different form, in reference to the Evil Spirit himself, by whom these false teachers were employed as emissaries. Although Michael is an Archangel, St. Jude argues, and superior in might to Satan; and although Satan dared to contend with him for the body of Moses, which had been buried by God, yet Michael did not bring against Satan a railing judgment, but referred all to the tribunal of God,—"The Lord rebuke thee!"

Therefore, great is the insolence of these heretics in speaking evil of God Himself, of His Lordship and Glory; and of that of His Blessed Son and the Holy Spirit; and of heavenly and earthly Powers.

(2) The second interpretation is as follows:—Theophylact, in ancient times, and Bengel and others, in later, suppose that αὐτῶν, them, refers to δόξας, glories; and that the sense is, as gathered from the parallel passage in St. Jude, that the good Angels do not bring a railing accusation against glories, i. e. Angelic powers, however defaced they may be; as they are in the case of Evil Angels.

This sense has something to recommend it. Satan, though fallen, is still an Angel, he is "the strong man" (Matt. xii. 29); he is a Prince (Eph. ii. 2), and he was created by God; he is immortal, and immortality is from God. Therefore he is still a δόξα, though sullied and marred; and to condemn him is not for us, but for God.

But, on the whole, the first interpretation seems preferable. St. Peter, in this Epistle, frequently uses the pronoun αὐτῶν and αὑτῶν in referring to the false teachers. See this chapter, vv. 2, 3. 12, 13; and αὐτοῖς, v. 20—22. And this interpretation is sanctioned by Didymus.

There is also something constrained in the interpretation which rightly supposes δόξας to mean glories—even the glory of God, and Christ, and good Angels—and then explains αὐτῶν, referred to δόξας, as applicable only to Evil Angels.

Besides, δόξαι is never used in a personal sense in the New Testament. Δόξα does not ever signify an Angel; but it signifies an attribute of Angels: and therefore αὐτῶν, which is personal here, can hardly refer to δόξας.

Lastly, though there is much similarity between St. Jude's Epistle and this Second Epistle of St. Peter, yet, as might be expected, the one very often adds new matter to the other. Thus here, in the next verse, we have ἀπάται, where St. Jude has ἀγάπαι, and σπίλοι, where he has σπιλάδες.

The words παρὰ Κυρίῳ are not in A and some Versions, but are in B, C, G, K.

12. οὗτοι δέ] but these men, like irrational animals, which have been born naturally for capture and for destruction. It is well observed by Bede here, that there is a resemblance between these teachers and brute beasts in this respect, that both are led by their fleshly appetites to fall into snares and destruction. They profess to exercise their reason with superior acuteness and to be able to save others, but they reduce themselves, by their doctrines and practices, to the level of irrational animals, which are made to be taken and sacrificed as victims. Cp. Bava Mezia, ap. Wetstein, p. 706, "Rabbi Judas vitulo flenti, cum ad mactandum adduceretur, 'Abi,' inquit; 'in hunc enim finem creatus es.'"

Elz. has φυσικὰ before γεγεννημένα, but it is after it in A, B, C, and is used almost adverbially,—born as mere natural creatures, without reason or grace. Winer, § 54, p. 412.

— ἐν οἷς ἀγνοοῦσι βλασφημοῦντες] They profess superior gnosis, or knowledge, but yet they are guilty of speaking blasphemy of things which they know not. On the construction, equivalent to ἐν τούτοις ἃ ἀγνοοῦσι, see Winer, § 66, p. 553. Cp. Jude, v. 10.

— ἐν τῇ φθορᾷ αὐτῶν καὶ φθαρήσονται] The double meaning of φθείρω, to corrupt and destroy, can hardly be rendered in English. Cp. 1 Cor. iii. 17, the best comment on this text. Elz. has καταφθαρήσονται; but A, B, C* have καὶ φθαρήσονται.

13. ἡδονὴν ἡγούμενοι τὴν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ τρυφήν] deeming their revelry, which is in the day-time, to be delight. Thus the Syriac Version renders this passage, and so the English Version, and Œcumenius; and Passow renders the words ἐν ἡμέρᾳ, 'by day,' and refers to passages in Pindar, Herodotus, Æschylus, and Thucydides, in support of this rendering.

This translation seems to be correct, as marking the voluptu-σπῖλοι καὶ μῶμοι ἐντρυφῶντες ἐν ταῖς ἀπάταις αὐτῶν, συνευωχούμενοι ὑμῖν· 14 ὀφθαλμοὺς ἔχοντες μεστοὺς μοιχαλίδος καὶ ἀκαταπαύστους ἁμαρτίας, δελεάζοντες ψυχὰς ἀστηρίκτους, καρδίαν γεγυμνασμένην πλεονεξίας ἔχοντες, κατάρας τέκνα· 15 [n] καταλιπόντες εὐθεῖαν ὁδὸν ἐπλανήθησαν ἐξακολουθήσαντες τῇ ὁδῷ τοῦ Βαλαὰμ τοῦ Βοσὸρ, ὃς μισθὸν ἀδικίας ἠγάπησεν, 16 ἔλεγξιν δὲ ἔσχεν ἰδίας παρανομίας, ὑποζύγιον ἄφωνον ἐν ἀνθρώπου φωνῇ φθεγξάμενον ἐκώλυσε τὴν τοῦ προφήτου παραφρονίαν.

[n] Num. 22. 7, 21. Jude 11.

ous recklessness of these deceivers, not delaying their enjoyments till night-time: μεθημεριναὶ τρυφαὶ were a sign of great voluptuousness. Cp. Demosth. de Coron. pp. 270. 279.

This is noted as a characteristic of the Gnostics. Even heathens were, for the most part, content with revelry in the night-time; for they that are drunken are drunken in the night (1 Thess. v. 7); and it was the rule of Christians to walk honestly as in the day (Rom. xiii. 13), but these heretical libertines revelled in the day itself, and deemed that revelry to be delight. See S. Jerome (adv. Lucif. p. 53), "tunc Nicolaus diu noctuque nuptias faciens obscœnas," &c.; and Epiphan. hær. 25, asserting as one of their maxims "that a man had no hope of everlasting life," ἐὰν μὴ καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν λαγνεύῃ.

Another interpretation, which deserves to be noticed, is this, while they boast themselves wise, they are like idiots and madmen in preferring the voluptuousness of a day, "unius dieculæ volaticum gaudium," to the bliss of eternity. This was the case with these Gnostic Teachers. They dissuaded Christians from suffering martyrdom for Christ (Philast. c. 36). See on Rev. ii. 14. 20. "Semper pseudo-prophetæ dulcia pollicentur, et ad modicum placent." S. Jerome, c. Jovin. lib. 11, ad fin.

— σπῖλοι καὶ μῶμοι] spots and blemishes: opposed to Him Who is ἄσπιλος καὶ ἄμωμος (1 Pet. i. 19), and to you who ought to be found ἄσπιλοι καὶ ἀμώμητοι (iii. 14).

— ἀπάταις] deceits. A and B, and some Versions, have ἀγάπαις here, love-feasts, and so Lach.: see Jude 12, οὗτοί εἰσιν ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν σπιλάδες, συνευωχούμενοι ἀφόβως, ἑαυτοὺς ποιμαίνοντες.

But it is not probable that, if ἀγάπαις had been the original reading here, it would have been altered into ἀπάταις. The probability rather is, that there is indeed a similarity between the passages of St. Jude and St. Peter, and also some independent characteristic in each. The False teachers called their meetings ἀγάπαι, love-feasts, but they were mere ἀπάται, deceits. Their table was a snare. Ps. lxix. 19. 23.

As is well observed by Windischmann (Vind. Petr. p. 45), there is a similar paronomasia or play on the words ἀπάτη and ἀγάπη in St. Paul's Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, ii. 10; "St. Peter would not call these heretical feasts by an honourable name (ἀγάπας), but styles them ἀπάτας, and describes their true character by adding the word ἐντρυφῶντες."

The Gentiles denied Christ's Passion: and therefore they rejected the Doctrine of the Church concerning the Holy Eucharist. See S. Ignat. ad Smyrn. §§ 6, 7, with Bp. Pearson's remarks, Vind. Ignat. ii. c. 11, and Dr. Waterland, vol. viii. p. 31, and the Notes in Dr. Jacobson's Patr. Apost., ii. pp. 444, 445. Therefore, also, it was only for the sake of carnal indulgence that they took part in the love-feasts of the Church.

On the Christian ἀγάπαι, or love-feasts, see above, on 1 Cor. xi. 20, 21.

14. μοιχαλίδος] of an adulteress. A very strong expression. Their eyes are full of an adulteress; as Plutarch (de Verecund. falsâ, p. 528, cited by Wetstein. Hammond, p. 815) says of persons, who have not κόρας (= pupillas, et virgines), but πόρνας ἐν τοῖς ὄμμασιν, harlots in their eyes. Compare note above, on James iv. 4, Μοιχαλίδες, ye adulteresses!

— ἀκαταπαύστους ἁμαρτίας] he who is baptized is pledged to cease from sin; see 1 Pet. iv. 1, πέπαυται ἁμαρτίας, but their eyes cannot be made to cease from sin.

— δελεάζοντες] luring: as fish are lured by a bait. A word twice used in this Epistle, see v. 18; and a metaphor likely to occur to St. Peter, the fisherman of Galilee, to whom our Lord said, Matt. xvii. 27, βάλε ἄγκιστρον, cast a hook. The word occurs only in one other place of the N. T., James i. 14.

— πλεονεξίας] covetousness, the genitive case. So A, B, C, K, L, and all the best editions. Elz. has the dative plural, πλεονεξίαις.

The construction is like that of Philostr. Her. ii. 15, γεγυμνασμένοι θαλάττης, versed in the sea, i. e. practised in seafaring affairs. See Boissonade, Philostr. p. 451. Winer, § 30, p. 175. So these false teachers are indeed exercised; but it is in covetousness; this is their art and discipline—not holiness. Cp. 1 Tim. iv. 7, 8.

— κατάρας τέκνα] children of malediction. Cp. 2 Thess. ii. 3. Eph. ii. 3. They are children of a curse, like the posterity of Ham and Canaan, Gen. ix. 25, for undutifulness and uncleanness.

15. τῇ ὁδῷ τοῦ Βαλαάμ] in the way of Balaam; on which he went, in direct opposition to the command of God, and swerving from the way of godliness, and to gratify his own love of lucre. See Numb. xxii. 12. 22. 32.

These false teachers followed Balaam, not only in his love of lucre, but in his Satanic counsel to Balak, to allure the people of God to harlotry and idolatry.

Here is an evidence that St. Peter is referring to the Nicolaitans, who are described as teaching the doctrine of Balaam. See below, on Rev. ii. 14, 15.

— τοῦ Βοσόρ] of Bosor, i. e. of Beor. Numb. xxii. 5. The ע (ayin) in בְּעוֹר (Beor) being changed in the Chaldee dialect into sigma. Hammond. Vitringa, Obs. Sacr. i. p. 936. Glass. Philol. Sacr. p. 601.

— ὃς μισθὸν ἀδικίας ἠγάπησεν] who loved the wages of unrighteousness: cp. Jude 11, and Numb. xxii. 7, where the mention of the rewards of divination is very significant. See Deut. xxiii. 4, and Neh. xiii. 2, where it is said that the Moabites hired Balaam.

Here is a clue to the character of Balaam, and a divine comment on his history. "Balaam could not forego the rewards of unrighteousness, and therefore first seeks for indulgences (from God); and when these could not be obtained, he sins against the whole meaning, end, and design of the prohibition, although nothing could prevail with him to go against the letter of it; and surely the impious counsel he gave to Balak against the children of Israel (Rev. ii. 14) was, considered in itself, a greater piece of wickedness than if he had cursed them in words." See Bp. Butler's Sermon, vii. p. 65, "Upon the character of Balaam."

16. ὑποζύγιον ἄφωνον] a dumb beast of burden, speaking with man's voice, forbad the madness of the prophet.

Horses were rare in Palestine. This general word, ὑποζύγιον, is applied to the animal which was most used for the purpose of bearing burdens. Cp. Matt. xxi. 5.

Here is an Apostolic testimony to the truth of the history of Balaam and his ass, Numb. xxii. 23. This is to be noted, because that history has been treated as a legend by some recent Expositors of the Old Testament, laying claim to the merit of special acuteness and erudition. And others have explained away the dialogue of Balaam and his ass into a mere vision of Balaam in a state of prophetic ecstasy; or into a mere imagination of his own mind: see Winer, R. W. B. i. p. 184.

To all these allegations it may be replied, that St. Peter, the Apostle of Christ, who was enabled to speak with tongues, and to discern the spirits of men (as in the case of Ananias, Acts v. 3), and to foretell the future (ibid.), accepted this history of Balaam as true, and explained its meaning, and showed how, by that signal example, Almighty God declared, that the most despised of brute creatures is wiser and more clear-sighted than a disobedient Prophet.

The dumb creature speaking by man's voice rebuked the madness of the Prophet. The ass saw the Angel which the Prophet could not see; and showed more of reason and knowledge than her master who rode upon her, and who, though endued with many spiritual gifts, was then blinded by disobedience.

In like manner the simplest peasant, who receives the history of Balaam as true,—a history guaranteed by the testimony of the inspired Apostle St. Peter, and by that of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, Who received all the Old Testament as true, and commands us to receive it (see on Luke xvi. 29),—is really a far more intelligent and clear-sighted person than the Infidel Philosopher and Biblical Expositor who reject that history as false. The believing peasant sees the Angel: the unbelieving Philosopher and Expositor are blind. Compare the similar evidence with regard to the history of Jonah in the whale's belly, on Matt. xii. 40.

b 1 Tim. 4. 1. 2 Tim. 3. 1. Jude 18.

This passage is cited as Scripture by Origen, in Numer. hom. 13.

17. πηγαὶ ἄνυδροι] wells without water: they profess to teach, but they deceive those who resort to them; like wells which attract the weary and thirsty traveller, but are found to have no water. But Christ, the true Teacher, makes those who come to Him to be like wells of living water, springing up into everlasting life. John iv. 14; vii. 38.

— καὶ ὁμίχλαι] and mists: so A, B, C. Elz. has νεφέλαι, clouds: cp. Jude 12.

18. ὑπέρογκα ματαιότητος φθεγγόμενοι] Speaking great swelling words of vanity; as Simon Magus did, affirming himself to be no less than God; and other Gnostic teachers, boasting themselves superior to the Apostles, and equal to Christ. S. Hippolyt., Phil. pp. 255. 257. See on Acts viii. 10. Iren. i. 13, and i. 23 (ed. Stieren).

These false Teachers are called wells without water, because they have not the living spring of the Holy Spirit gushing within them; and they are not called clouds (νεφέλαι) as the Saints are, but ὁμίχλαι, mists, of darkness and gloom, and driven by the gusts of the Evil Spirit. Catena, Cramer, p. 96. Euseb. iii. 26.

— ὀλίγως] a little.—Elz., with C, G, K, and many Cursives and Armenian and Arabic Versions have ὄντως. But A, B, C have ὀλίγως, and Vulg. "paululùm:" and this seems to be the true reading, and is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch. Alf.: compare v. 14, δελεάζοντες ψυχὰς ἀστηρίκτους. These false Teachers allured those persons who were only just escaping (ἀποφεύγοντας, so A, B, C,—Elz., ἀποφύγοντας) from the heathen who live in error, and by promising them liberty they made them the slaves of brutish lusts.

19. ἐλευθερίαν αὐτοῖς ἐπαγγελλόμενοι] promising them liberty; as the Gnostic Teachers did, assuring their votaries, that if they became their disciples, they were free to live as they pleased, "liberos agere quae vellent;" see S. Iren. i. 23, and S. Hippolytus (Philos. p. 175), describing Simon Magus and his followers, who boasted that they had been liberated from all moral restraints by their own superior intelligence (λελυτρῶσθαι διὰ τῆς ἰδίας ἐπιγνώσεως); and see above, on 1 Pet. ii. 16.

The latter part of this verse is quoted as Scripture by Origen, in Exod. hom. 12, and de Rectâ fide, § 1.

20. ἐν ἐπιγνώσει] by the true gnosis, or knowledge, of our Lord and Saviour. Here and in the following verses St. Peter inculcates the word ἐπίγνωσις, the ripe knowledge of Christ, in opposition to the spurious gnosis of the Gnostic Teachers: cp. i. 2, 3. It were better for them not to have had this epignosis, than after they had received it, to turn away from the holy commandment, as Simon Magus did. Acts viii. 13—23.

22. τὸ τῆς ἀληθοῦς παροιμίας] that (saying) of the true proverb. On the use of the article τὸ, cp. Matt. xxi. 21. James iv. 14. Winer, § 18, p. 99.

The proverbs here quoted were perhaps contained in two iambic verses, thus:—

εἰς ἴδιον ἐξέραμ᾽ ἐπιστρέψας κύων, λελουμένη θ᾽ ὗς εἰς κύλισμα βορβόρου.

Compare note above, on 1 Cor. xv. 33, and Bp. Pearson, Vind. Ignat. pt. ii. ch. 14; vol. ii. p. 579, ed. Churton. Compare also Prov. xxvi. 11, ὅσπερ κύων ὅταν ἐπέλθῃ ἐπὶ τὸν ἑαυτοῦ ἔμετον, κ.τ.λ.

The βόρβορος, mire, of which the proverb speaks, was specially pertinent to those Gnostic Teachers who said, that they "might wallow in the mire as much as they pleased," and that—such was their spiritual virtue—they could not be polluted by it any more than gold by mud; τοῦ βορβόρου μηδὲν αὐτοὺς ἀδικῆσαι δυναμένου. S. Irenæus, i. 6. 2.

CH. III. 1, 2. ταύτην ἤδη] This Epistle, already a second, write I unto you, beloved. This expression, "already a second," intimates that this Second Epistle was written soon after the First. Compare Bengel here, "priorem paullo antè scripserat;" and on i. 12, "alteram hanc Epistolam scribit brevi intervallo post primam."

On this sense of ἤδη see Matt. v. 28. John iii. 18; iv. 35; xxi. 14. 1 Cor. v. 3. 2 Tim. iv. 6. Hence it appears that the First Epistle also was written not long before the breaking out of the Neronian persecution and St. Peter's death (see 2 Pet. i. 14), and this is suggested by the general tone of that Epistle. See Introduction, p. 40.

The reason why he wrote these two epistles almost at the same time was his earnest desire to stir up their pure mind—clear from all admixture of sinister affection (see on 1 Cor. v. 8), to remember the words spoken before by the Holy Prophets, and the command of the Apostles of their Lord and Saviour.

Elz. has ἡμῶν, of us; but the reading ὑμῶν, of you, is in A, B, C, K, L. The Apostles are the Apostles of you, as sent to you; and they are the Apostles of the Lord, as sent by Him. Compare Jude 17, ἀποστόλων τοῦ κυρίου, and the double genitive in James ii. 1, τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν τῆς δόξης.

Some persons have argued from these words, that this Epistle could not have been written by St. Peter.

But he uses a similar expression in his First Epistle, i. 12. In both places he modestly speaks of himself in the third person, and associates himself with others who had been his fellow-labourers in the same field.

Indeed here is another evidence of genuineness. A forger, personating an Apostle, would have said, "us, the Apostles;" but an authentic Apostle, like St. Peter, is content to speak more modestly, and to say, "your Apostles." Cp. Dean Alford, Prolegg., p. 155.

St. Peter here declares the harmony of the Prophets and the Apostles; in opposition to the Gnostic Teachers, who ascribed the writings of the "holy Prophets" to some other source than that of the Gospel (see on i. 20), and so prepared the way for the Marcionite and Manichæan heresies.

The Apostles, to whom St. Peter here specially refers, were St. James—many portions of whose Epistle are adopted and reiterated by St. Peter in his former Epistle—and St. Paul: see v. 15.

On ἐν αἷς, in which two Epistles—δύο being implied in δευτέραν—see Winer, § 21, p. 128.

3. ἐλεύσονται] There will come in the last days, in scoffing, scoffers, walking after their own lusts. St. Jude refers to these words in his Epistle, v. 17, Remember ye the words spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, that they were saying to you, that in the last time there will be scoffers walking after their own lusts.

From this reference, it appears that St. Jude wrote his Epistle after the present Epistle (cp. note above on ii. 1), and that he owned this Epistle to be the work of an Apostle, and therefore an authentic writing; and if authentic, then it must be also genuine, for it asserts itself to be written by St. Peter, ch. i. 1, and cp. i. 17, where the writer describes himself as present at the Transfiguration, at which only three Apostles were present, viz., Peter, James, and John.

This passage (ἐλεύσονται—πορευόμενοι) is quoted by S. Hippolytus, the scholar of Irenæus, de Consummatione Sæculi, c. 10.

— ἐν ἐμπαιγμονῇ] in scoffing; omitted by Elz., but in A, B, C, and received by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch., Alf. "In scoffing, scoffers"—a strong Hebraistic expression: see on Acts iv. 17. They will not only be scoffers, but they will come in scoffing, like those of whom the Psalmist says, that their delight is in cursing, and that they clothe themselves with it as it were with a raiment (Ps. cix. 16, 17); and the contrast is striking to the divine words, εὐλογῶν εὐλογήσω, Gen. xxii. 17; cp. Eph. i. 3, ὁ εὐλογήσας ἡμᾶς ἐν πάσῃ εὐλογίᾳ, and Clem. Rom. i. 23.

4. λέγοντες, Ποῦ ἐστιν] saying, Where is the promise of His coming? This prophetical warning is directed against the Heretics called Lampetians, Euchites, or Ophites, and Naasseni (Catena, Cramer, p. 98. Theophylact).

Compare the warnings of an Apostolic Father; "Whosoever does not confess the suffering of the Cross, is of the devil; and whosoever perverts the oracles of the Lord to his own lusts, and says that there is neither Resurrection nor a Judgment,—he is the firstborn of Satan." S. Polycarp, c. 7.

5. θέλοντας] they are wilfully blind to this truth, which is revealed to them in the Holy Scriptures. The word θέλων expresses a deliberate act of the will. See Col. ii. 18. Philem. 14.

St. Peter censures the false Teachers, who denied the doctrine of the second Advent of Christ (Παρουσία) and of Future Judgment and Resurrection, and of the Dissolution of the material world.

He confutes them by several considerations:

(1) The World was created by God, and therefore it can be destroyed by Him.

(2) The World was created out of the water, and through water; and yet it was destroyed by God by the very same element, water; out of which it had been made. This destruction by water, at the Deluge, was executed by God as a Judicial punishment for men's sins.

The Universal Deluge, therefore, was a warning and a rehearsal of the General Judgment to come.

(3) At the Flood, the Heavens and the Earth themselves were made by Almighty God to supply the means of their own destruction. They supplied the Water by which the world was drowned. See Gen. vii. 11—21, "the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened, and the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights, . . . and the waters prevailed . . . and all flesh died."

(4) Human notions of duration of time are very different from those of God; with Whom "a thousand years are as one day."

— γῆ ἐξ ὕδατος] the Earth was subsisting out of the water and through the water. See Gen. i. 6, "God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters:" and Gen. i. 9, "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear:" and Ps. xxiv. 2, "He hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods:" and Ps. cxxxvi. 6, "He stretched out the Earth above the Waters."

On the symbolical and spiritual significance of these words, applied to the use of Water, as instrumental in the work of the New Creation or Regeneration of Mankind, see John iii. 5. Tertullian, de Baptismo, c. 3, "dispositio mundi modulatricibus quodammodo aquis Deo constitit (συνέστηκε) . . . primis aquis præceptum est animas proferre, ne mirum sit in baptismo si aquæ animare noverunt." Cp. Bp. Andrewes, iii. p. 250, and note above on 1 Pet. iii. 20, 21.

The assertion that the Earth arose out of the water is opposed to the dogma of Simon Magus, that it was engendered from fire: see S. Hippolyt., Refut. hær. p. 165.

— συνεστῶσα τῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγῳ] consisting by the Word of God—the spoken word; and, in a higher sense, by the Eternal Consubstantial WORD. The LOGOS was the Creator; and this was no new doctrine to St. Peter's Jewish readers. See on Ps. xxxiii. 6, and on John i. 1, 2, and Bp. Wilson here, p. 686.

This assertion of St. Peter, that the heavens were created by the Word of God, and subsist thereby—especially in the sense above specified—is opposed to the error of the Gnostic Teachers, asserting that the Universe was made by Angels, or by the Demiurge opposed to the Supreme God: see Iren. i. 19 (Grabe), who says (in reference to that Gnostic error) that the World was not made by Angels, nor by any powers separated from God, but by His WORD, i. e. Christ, and he refers to Ps. xxxii. 6. John i. 3, in proof of this doctrine: see also S. Iren. ii. 2 (Grabe); "omnia quæ fecit Deus, infatigabili Verbo fecit; quemadmodum Joannes Domini discipulus ait de Eo" (John i. 3).

Observe the word συνεστῶσα, consisting: that is, framed and compacted by the Word of God; and compare St. Paul's use of the same verb in the same sense (Col. i. 17), "by Him (Christ) all things consist" (συνέστηκε).

6. δι' ὧν] by means of which, i. e. by means of the Heavens and the Earth; which were the reservoirs of the Water by which the world was drowned at the Flood. The Heavens and Earth supplied the element of Water by which the world was destroyed. Gen. vii. 11. See Theophyl., Hammond, Wetstein.

So, the Fire, contained in the Heavens and the Earth, is the fuel of its future funeral pile. The Heavens and Earth have within themselves—in the electric fluid of lightnings, and meteors, and comets, and in the subterranean reservoirs of Volcanos,—the materials of their own future combustion and conflagration at the Great Day.

Hence that last conflagration is called by S. Irenæus (v. 29), a Flood of Fire,—"Diluvium ignis." The ravages made by Lightnings and the eruptions of Volcanos are prophetical signs of Christ's Coming to Judgment (cp. Matt. xxiv. 7), and are premonitory symptoms of the Earth's future destruction by fire, as even the heathen writers of Antiquity believed. See the passages from Lucretius, Pliny, Lucan, Seneca, cited here by A Lapide and others.

7. τεθησαυρισμένοι εἰσὶ πυρί] are treasured up for fire. They are indeed treasured up; but not as these false Teachers say, for eternity, but for fire, as the old world was treasured up for water; and they are treasured up by His Word, that is, as long as He wills it, and no longer. The word fire is emphatic, and therefore is placed the last in the clause; and this rendering, which is that of the Æthiopic version, seems preferable to that which connects πυρὶ with τηρούμενοι.

This reservation of the world for fire had been revealed by the old Prophets. Isa. lxvi. 15, 16. Dan. vii. 10, 11. Mal. iv. 1.

In an Oration of Melito (Bishop of Sardis in the second century), which has been published from the Syriac for the first time by the Rev. William Cureton, D.D. (Lond. 1855, p. 51), there appears to be a reference to this passage of St. Peter, —"There was a flood of water, and all men and living creatures were destroyed by the multitude of waters, and the just were preserved in an Ark of wood by the ordinance of God. So also it will be at the last time; there will be a Flood of Fire, and the Earth will be burnt up together with its mountains, and men will be burnt up with the idols which they have made; and the sea together with the isles will be burnt, and the just shall be delivered from the fury (of the fire), as their fellows in the Ark (were saved) from the waters in the Deluge" (Melito). Compare the learned Editor's remarks, p. xi, and p. 51, on the importance of this passage in relation to the question concerning the authenticity and genuineness of the present Epistle. 8. μία ἡμέρα] one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. See St. Barnabas (Ep. 15), who thence takes occasion to state the opinion, that as the world was created in six days, and God rested on the seventh day, so the world will last six thousand years, and in the seventh Millennium the End will come: and cp. Irenæus i. 28, Grabe. Cp. Justin M. c. Tryphon. c. 81, who, perhaps, quotes from this passage of St. Peter as well as from Ps. xc. 4. See Joseph Mede's Works, p. 611.

9. βραδύνει τῆς ἐπαγγελίας] He is not slack concerning His promise. He does not linger behind it; cp. the phrases, ὑστερεῖν τινος, λείπεσθαί τινος. See Winer, § 30, p. 177.

— μὴ βουλόμενος] because He is not desirous that any should perish, but is desirous that all should come (χωρῆσαι) to repentance; as to their proper place (χώραν). Matt. xv. 17. 10. ὡς κλέπτης] as a thief: see on 1 Thess. v. 2. Elz. adds ἐν νυκτί, not in A, B.

— στοιχεῖα] elements. It has been objected to this translation,—which is that of the Vulg., Syriac, Arabic, Æthiopic, and English versions,—that Earth itself and Fire are Elements, and that the writer, according to this translation, is liable to the charge of tautology; and therefore the word στοιχεῖα is here rendered heavens by some, and this rendering is justified by citations from ancient Christian writers, Justin M., Theophilus of Antioch, and Polycrates. See Joseph Mede's Works, p. 614. Bengel, Alford, Hammond, Whitby, and others.

But St. Peter's meaning seems to be, that the στοιχεῖα, elements or rudiments, of which the Universe is composed and compacted, will be loosed; that is, the frameworks of the world will be disorganized, and this is the sense of στοιχεῖα in the LXX, Wisd. vii. 17; xix. 18, and in S. Hippolyt., Philos. pp. 219. 318. This dissolution is contrasted with the consistency described by the word συνεστῶσα in v. 5. The heavens are reserved for fire (v. 7). and will pass away with a rushing noise, and, being set on fire, will be dissolved (v. 12), the elements will be on fire and melt (v. 12), and be reduced to a state of confusion; the earth, and the works therein, will be burnt up.

There does not, therefore, seem to be any cause for abandoning the common meaning of στοιχεῖα, the elemental principles of which the Universe is made.

11. τούτων οὖν πάντων λυομένων] Since then all things are being dissolved, that is, since this is their destiny, and, though the dissolution is future, yet is so sure that it may be regarded as present. Cp. Matt. ii. 4, ποῦ ὁ Χριστὸς γεννᾶται, and Winer, § 45, p. 306.

— ὑπάρχειν] More emphatic than εἶναι. In what state ought we to be subsisting (ὑπάρχειν), since that catastrophe is so certain and so sudden? See v. 10. In what state ought it to find us?

12. σπεύδοντας] hastening the Advent of the Day of God. A remarkable expression; but not strange to the Jewish mind of those whom St. Peter is addressing, "If thou keepest this precept, thou hastenest the day of the Messiah" (Debarim, R. vi. Deut. xxii. 7. See Wetstein on John ix. 7). Whoever prays "Thy kingdom come," and promotes the preaching of the Gospel to all Nations (Matt. xxiv. 14), hastens the coming of the Day of Christ. Cp. Dean Trench on the Authorized Version, p. 84, and the margin of that Version.

It is worthy of remark, that St. Peter himself, in his speech in Solomon's Porch at Jerusalem, had pressed this same truth, when he said (Acts iii. 19. 21), "Repent ye and turn to God, that your sins may be blotted out; and in order that (ὅπως ἄν) the seasons of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that He may send Jesus Christ, whom the heavens must receive till the times of the restitution of all things," i. e. of the new Heavens and new Earth, described by the writer here in v. 13.

This use of σπεύδειν in this passage, and the use of the ὅπως ἄν in the words just quoted from Acts iii. 19, have been thought by Expositors to present some difficulties. But the one difficulty solves the other. And the occurrence of this remarkable thought in this Epistle, as compared with that speech of St. Peter, is another silent evidence of the genuineness of this Epistle.

13. καινοὺς δὲ οὐρανούς] But we look for new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. On the meaning of καινοὺς, made new, as distinguished from νέος, see above, on Eph. iv. 23.

Concerning this future renovation, see above, Rom. viii. 20—22; below, Rev. xxi. 1; and St. Peter's speech, Acts iii. 19—21. Cp. Isa. lxv. 17; lxvi. 22.

There are frequent anticipations of this physical restoration in the Book of Enoch (x. 27; l. 5; liv. 4, 5; xc. 17). Huther, p. 323.

St. Peter does not represent the Heavens as destined to destruction, but as hereafter to be transformed (ἀναστοιχειουμένους) to a more glorious condition. As the mortal bodies of the Saints are dissolved by death, and will not be reduced to annihilation, but will, by reason of Christ's Resurrection, and of their incorporation in Him Who is the Resurrection and the Life, be renewed to Immortality, so the heavenly bodies will be renewed by fire, and be delivered from the bondage of corruption. See Rom. viii. 20—22.

The material Creation has sympathized with us in our Fall, and it will rejoice with the righteous in their Redemption and Revivification, when their mortal bodies will rise and bloom anew, like vernal herbs and flowers, in the glorious spring-tide of the Resurrection. See Eusebius, Severus, and others here in Catenâ, Cramer, p. 100.

Thus the benefits of the Incarnation and the Redemption wrought by the Second Adam extend also to the Natural World. He has restored already the free use of the creatures to us (see on 1 Cor. iii. 23); and He will raise the Creation itself to a more glorious state of being.

15, 16. καθὼς καὶ ὁ ἀγαπητὸς ἡμῶν ἀδελφὸς Παῦλος] as also our beloved brother Paul, according to the wisdom given unto him, wrote to you; as also in all his Epistles, speaking of these things in them; in which are some things hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction.

Part of this text is quoted by Origen de Rectâ Fide, sect. 2, σοφίαν ἔγραψεν ὑμῖν, [16] ° ὡς καὶ ἐν πάσαις ἐπιστολαῖς, λαλῶν ἐν αὐταῖς περὶ τούτων· ἐν αἷς ἐστι δυσνόητά τινα, ἃ οἱ ἀμαθεῖς καὶ ἀστήρικτοι στρεβλοῦσιν, ὡς καὶ τὰς λοιπὰς γραφὰς, πρὸς τὴν ἰδίαν αὐτῶν ἀπώλειαν.

° Rom. 8. 19. 1 Cor. 15. 24. 1 Thess. 4. 15.

and ascribed by him without any hesitation to St. Peter. See also on i. 4; ii. 16. 19.

With regard to the reading of this passage, Elz. has ταῖς before ἐπιστολαῖς, but this is not in A, B, C. However, the sense is not affected by its omission: it means in all Epistles written by him.

Elz. has ἐν οἷς, "in which things," and so C, G, K; but A, B have ἐν αἷς, "in which Epistles," and also many Cursives, and the Arabic, Syriac, and English versions, and Lachmann; and this text is supposed to contain a reference to St. Paul's Epistles, by S. Cyril of Alexandria (in Catenâ, p. 103), Augustine (De Fide, § 22), and others. They therefore are in favour of the reading ἐν αἷς, agreeing with ἐπιστολαῖς.

The context also seems to require ἐν αἷς, in which Epistles. For, it can hardly be said, that unlearned men wrest obscure things or mysteries—as they do "the other Scriptures"—to their own destruction. The wresting of one set of writings (i. e. of the other Scriptures) is here joined with the wresting of another set of writings, i. e. the Epistles of St. Paul: and the unlearned and unstable are said to pervert both.

This passage seems to have been in the mind of S. Polycarp when he wrote to the Philippians, i. 3, "No one like me can equal the wisdom of the blessed Paul, who being absent wrote to you Epistles (ὑμῖν ἔγραψεν ἐπιστολὰς), into which if you look diligently, you will be enabled to be built up unto the faith."

"Our beloved brother Paul wrote to you," says St. Peter here; "to you of Asia Minor, whom I address." Especially St. Paul did this in his Epistles to the Galatians and to the Ephesians in Asia Proper, and to the Colossians in Phrygia. Compare St. Peter's inscription of his own First Epistle to those of the dispersion of Galatia, Asia, and Bithynia; and St. Peter's Second Epistle is addressed to the same persons. (2 Pet. iii. 1.)

As has been already observed, St. Peter in these two Epistles adopts much of the language and reinforces the precepts and warnings of St. Paul's Epistles to the Asiatic Churches of Ephesus and Colossæ. See above, p. 43.

To what does he specially refer when he says that there are "some things hard to be understood in St. Paul's Epistles?"

S. Augustine thus replies to this question:—

"Even in the times of the Apostles, certain persons, who did not understand some of Paul's rather obscure (subobscuras) sentences, alleged that he said 'Let us do evil, that good may come,' because he had said 'that the Law entered in, that sin might abound; and where sin abounded, there did grace much more abound.' (Rom. iii. 8; v. 20).

"When the Apostle Paul says that a man is justified by faith (per fidem) without the works of the Law, he does not mean thereby, that, when a man has received and professed the Faith, he may despise the works of righteousness; but that every one may know that he may be justified by faith, although works of the law have not gone before his Faith. For works follow him that is justified, 'Sequuntur justificatum, non precedunt justificatum.'

"Since however the notion above mentioned had arisen at that time (viz. that works were not requisite), the other Apostolic Epistles of Peter, John, James, and Jude, specially contend against that notion; in order to maintain earnestly, that Faith without works doth not profit. Indeed Paul himself has defined Faith to be not any kind of Faith by which man believes in God; but he defines true faith to be that healthful and evangelical faith, whose works proceed from love—'Faith which worketh by love.' (Gal. v. 6.) And he asserts, that the faith which some men think sufficient for salvation is so worthless, that 'if I have faith (he says) so as to remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing' (1 Cor. xiii. 2); and doubtless that man's life is good, where faithful love works, for he says, 'the fulfilling of the Law is love' (Rom. xiii. 10)."

This remark is specially applicable to St. Paul's own latest Epistles. See above, Introduction to the Epistles to Timothy and Titus (near the end).

"Evidently, therefore (continues Augustine), for this reason, St. Peter, in his Second Epistle, when he was exhorting to holiness of life, and was declaring that this world would pass away, and that new heavens and new earth are looked for, which are to be assigned as dwellings to the righteous; and when he was admonishing men to consider what ought to be their life in this world, in order that they may be made meet for that future habitation; and being also aware that many ungodly men had taken occasion from certain rather obscure sentences of the Apostle Paul, to be reckless of living well, and to presume of salvation by faith, has noted that there are some things hard to be understood in St. Paul's Epistles, which men wrested, as they did the other Scriptures, to their own destruction; whereas, in truth, that Apostle (St. Paul) entertained the same opinions as the rest of the Apostles concerning everlasting salvation, and that it would not be given to any but to those who live well. Thus therefore Peter writes." Augustine thus quotes this chapter, vv. 11—18. S. Augustine, de Fide et Operibus, c. 22, ed. Bened. vi. p. 308.

Many of the Ancients supposed the Epistle of St. James, with the First of St. John, that of St. Jude, and the Second of St. Peter, to have been written against those who, mistaking the sense of St. Paul's Epistles, held that faith without good works is sufficient for salvation. Which opinion is greatly confirmed by St. Peter, where he says that in the Epistles of St. Paul may be found some things which by bad men are perverted to the worst sense, and to their own destruction. Bp. Bull, de Justif., diss. ii. ch. iv. Cp. also Bp. Bull's Examen Censuræ Strict. i. § 4, where he says "that St. Peter refers here to St. Paul's doctrine on justification by Faith hath been the judgment of most learned men." Cp. Bp. Sanderson, Prælect. ii. de Conscientiâ. § 5, and above, Introduction to the Epistle of St. James, pp. 1—3.

Observe, however, how wisely St. Peter guards against the inference which has been derived by some from his words—especially by Theologians of the Church of Rome—alleging that Holy Scripture is here represented by him as obscure, and that therefore it ought not to be allowed to be read by the people.

In this same chapter, St. Peter commends the "words of the holy Prophets, and the commandment of the Apostles," to the careful meditation of his readers (iii. 2); and he had said, "if any man speaks, let him speak as the oracles of God," which presupposes knowledge of those oracles (iv. 11). And he does not say here that Holy Scripture is obscure; but that there are unlearned and unstable men in the world; and that there are some things hard to be understood in some portions of Holy Scripture, which he commends to their reverent regard by saying, that they are written by "our beloved brother Paul according to the wisdom that was given him." And he does not suppose that the faithful and well-grounded believer will misapprehend them; but he affirms that unlearned and unstable men wrest them, that is, put them, as it were, to the rack, and torture them, contrary to their true and natural meaning—to their own destruction; whereas, when properly understood, they are able to make wise unto salvation. He also says that this evil practice of these unlearned and unstable men is not limited to these particular portions of Holy Scripture; but that they treat the rest of the Scriptures in the same way.

These words of St. Peter possess much interest and importance, as taking their place with the other testimonies of Prophets and Apostles to the authority of Holy Scripture.

The Prophet Malachi closes the Canon of the Old Testament by a solemn appeal "to the Law of Moses, and to the Statutes and Judgments." He says, "Remember them" (Mal. iv. 4).

The Apostle and Evangelist St. John closes the four Gospels with a similar reference. "These things are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that, believing, ye might have life through His Name." (John xx. 31.)

St. Paul, the Apostle of the Gentile World, closes his Epistles with a testimony to the sufficiency and Inspiration of Holy Scripture. "Abide thou in those things which thou hast learnt, and wert assured of, knowing from whom thou didst learn them; and that from a child thou knowest the Holy Scriptures, which are the things that are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith that is in Christ Jesus. Every Scripture, being divinely inspired, is also profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, in order that the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto every good work." (2 Tim. iii. 14—17.)

St. Peter, in like manner, closes his Epistles here with a similar exhortation, and with a warning against perversion of Scripture.

St. Jude also closes the Catholic Epistles with a memento to his readers, "Remember ye the words spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ." (Jude 17.)

Lastly, the Apostle and Evangelist St. John closes the Apocalypse with a promise of blessing to those who keep its p Mark 13. 23. 17 p Ὑμεῖς οὖν, ἀγαπητοί, προγινώσκοντες φυλάσσεσθε, ἵνα μὴ τῇ τῶν ἀθέσμων πλάνῃ συναπαχθέντες ἐκπέσητε τοῦ ἰδίου στηριγμοῦ· 18 αὐξάνετε δὲ ἐν χάριτι καὶ γνώσει τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν καὶ Σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ· αὐτῷ ἡ δόξα καὶ νῦν καὶ εἰς ἡμέραν αἰῶνος· ἀμήν.

sayings, and a curse on those who take from it or add to it. (Rev. xxii. 7. 18, 19.)

Thus the duties of the Christian Church, as the Guardian of HOLY SCRIPTURE, and the duties of every member of the Church, as bound to receive, to meditate upon, and to obey the written Word of God, are solemnly inculcated by the farewell voices of Prophets and Apostles.

Prophets and Apostles pass away to another and better world. But the WORD of GOD, written by their instrumentality, endureth for ever. (1 Pet. i. 25.)

Observe, also, the importance of this passage with regard to the Epistles of ST. PAUL.

When St. Peter wrote this Epistle, he was near his death (2 Pet. i. 14), which took place in or about A.D. 68. He refers here to St. Paul's Epistles—to all his Epistles.

At the date of the present Epistle, all St. Paul's Epistles had been written, with the exception perhaps of the last Epistle, the Second to Timothy. See above, Chronological Table prefixed to St. Paul's Epistles, pp. xiv, xv.

"Peter wrote his present Epistle a very short time before his own and St. Paul's martyrdom; and St. Peter had read all Paul's Epistles." Bengel.

St. Peter here designates St. Paul's Epistles as γραφάς, Scriptures. He says that some men wrest them as they do "the other Scriptures" (τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς).

The word γραφαί is used about fifty times in the New Testament, and is there always applied to characterize divinely inspired writings, specially those of the Old Testament, which were received by Christ Himself as given by inspiration of God. It is never used in the New Testament to designate any other writings than those. Therefore, St. Peter here declares, that the Epistles of St. Paul are divinely inspired, and are to be received as such.

This testimony to the wisdom of St. Paul and to the divine inspiration of his Epistles, is specially interesting and valuable as coming from St. Peter.

Some persons had endeavoured to make him a rival of St. Paul. "I am of Cephas," was said in opposition to others, who said, "I am of Paul" (1 Cor. i. 12). He was the Apostle of the Circumcision, and St. Paul of the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 7). And Peter had been once prevailed upon by the Judaizing Christians at Antioch to side with them in opposition to St. Paul. (Gal. ii. 11.) On that occasion he had been openly resisted and publicly rebuked by St. Paul; and St. Paul has fully recorded the circumstances of that resistance and rebuke in one of his own Epistles to the Christians of Asia: the Christians of one of the same regions as are recited in the inscription of St. Peter's First Epistle, and to which the Second Epistle of St. Peter was addressed—Galatia. (Gal. ii. 11—21.)

St. Peter, therefore, in acknowledging St. Paul's Epistles to be Scripture, that is, as written by inspiration of God, acknowledges them to be true; and therefore he owns, that what is therein recorded in St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, concerning himself, and his own conduct at Antioch, is a true history; and that he was then justly rebuked, because he was κατεγνωσμένος, condemned. (Gal. ii. 11.)

St. Peter, therefore, here refutes the assumption of those who call themselves his successors: an assumption grounded on St. Peter's supposed infallibility (see on Matt. xvi. 18), and who allege that they themselves are infallible, and are not to be rebuked by any.

But St. Peter himself faltered, and the record of his failing is written in the Word of God; and St. Peter himself owns that record to be true, and to be divinely inspired. Therefore, none of those who call themselves his successors, and who ground their claims on St. Peter's alleged infallibility, can be allowed to be infallible. And whoever desires to build his hopes of heaven on the rock and not on the sand, will not place his faith on the baseless foundation of such an imaginary Infallibility.

St. Peter's generosity, wisdom, and charity, are here manifest.

He owns himself to have been in error. He makes public reparation for his error, in writing to those to whom his error might be a snare; the Jewish Christians of Asia. He refers to Epistles, in which that error is recorded by him who rebuked him for his error. He acknowledges these Epistles to be written by his beloved brother: to be written according to divine wisdom; he owns them to be Scripture, written by inspiration of God. He thus publicly confesses and retracts his error: he thanks him who corrected him: he shows his own wisdom. "Rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee" (Prov. ix. 8).

Compare note above, at the end of Gal. ii.

St. Peter felt that he had been rightly rebuked by St. Paul; he did not indignantly spurn that rebuke as an injury, but received it thankfully as a benefit. Such is the temper of those who have learnt to be meek and lowly in heart (Matt. xi. 29); "in honour preferring one another" (Rom. xii. 10). In a like, loving, spirit, St. Peter had closed his first Epistle, saying, that he sent it by "Silvanus the faithful brother," who had been the chosen associate of St. Paul; and joining him with "Marcus his son." See note on 1 Pet. v. 12, 13.

Thus, in fine, the Apostle of the Circumcision, now ready to put off his mortal tabernacle (i. 14), is seen standing, as it were, side by side, with the Apostle of the Gentiles, who is also now "ready to be offered up, and the time of his departure is at hand" (2 Tim. iv. 6), and he declares to the Churches of Asia and the world, that the Epistles of his beloved brother Paul are to be received as divinely inspired Scripture. Thus both these Apostles proclaim to the Church Universal that they are of one mind; and that the Faith is one and the same, which they have preached in their lives, and for which they are about to die.

They died as Martyrs in the same city—Rome; and as some ancient authorities relate, in the same year, and even on the same day (see Introduction to the Epistles to Timothy, at the end). However this may be, "they were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided." 2 Sam. i. 23.

17. ὑμεῖς οὖν, ἀγαπητοί] Ye therefore, beloved, knowing these things before, take heed that ye be not led away by the error of the lawless, and fall away from your own stedfastness.

These two verses contain the sum of the whole Epistle.

First, here is a warning against the errors and allurements of the false teachers with their specious claims to superior gnosis; to this he opposes the divine gnosis, which he has just supplied, and he therefore adds what follows;—

18. αὐξάνετε δέ] But grow in grace, and in the knowledge (the true gnosis) of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: to Him be the glory both now and for ever,—literally, for the day of eternity, which has no night (see on Matt. xxv. 46). Observe the arrangement; true gnosis is a fruit of grace.

Here is a Doxology to Jesus Christ as God. On ἡ δόξα, cp. Rev. iv. 11; v. 13; vii. 12. He ends, as he had begun, with an assertion of the unity of the person of Jesus and Christ; and of His Lordship; and of His office as Saviour, and of His Godhead; because in opposition to the Gnostic false teachers these were the principal doctrines to be maintained.

— ἀμήν] Amen. So A, C, G, K, and most cursives and Versions.

INTRODUCTION

TO

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. JOHN.

EACH of the Catholic, or General Epistles has a special character.

The Epistle of St. James corrects the errors of those who imagined that a theoretical knowledge of religion, apart from practical piety, is acceptable to God [1]. St. Peter, in his First Epistle, builds up a system of ethical duty on the foundation of Christian Faith [2]. In his Second Epistle he condemns the false doctrines of those heretical Teachers who denied the Lord that bought them [3], and exposes the evil consequences of heretical teaching, in its influence on moral practice [4].

St. Jude, in his Epistle, completes the work of St. Peter. He recalls the attention of the Church to the warnings of that Apostle, and of his Apostolic brethren [5]. He displays in clearer light, and fuller amplitude, what St. Peter had revealed by the Spirit of prophecy [6].

The beloved disciple, the holy Apostle, and Evangelist, St. John, had another work to perform.

He had been admitted to the nearest intimacy with the Incarnate Word. He had leaned on His breast at supper [7]. He alone of the Twelve saw Him die on the cross, and beheld His side pierced, and there came forth blood and water [8].

St. John, who had seen these things, had testified of them in his oral teaching. And probably he had already written the record of them in his Gospel, before he published his Epistles [9]. St. John's Gospel affords the best help to the study of his Epistles. And the reader is requested to refer to the Introduction prefixed to his Gospel [10], as serving, in some respects, for an Introduction to his Epistles also.

St. John's life was providentially prolonged by the Head of the Church, in His love to her, in order that the beloved disciple might bear testimony to the fundamental doctrines of the Manhood, and Godhead, of Jesus Christ, and His Divine Sonship; and that he might also pronounce a judicial sentence, with all the weight of his Apostolic authority, on the wickedness of denying any of those doctrines; and might deliver to all of every age a warning against those Teachers who impugn any of these articles of the Faith; and might provide a refuge for the faithful under the peaceful shelter of his Apostolic name [11].

This he has done in his Epistles.

Ancient writers, dating almost from the age of St. John, bear witness to these statements.

The most important testimony of Christian Antiquity to this effect is that of S. Irenæus [12].

He came from the neighbourhood of Ephesus, the country in which St. John passed the latter part of his life, and in which he died [13]. He had conversed with S. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna;

[9] It cannot indeed be proved, that the Gospel of St. John was written before his Epistles; but for various reasons this seems to me more probable now, than when p. 266 of the Introduction to the Gospel was written. See below, on i. 1, and Guerike, Einleitung, p. 473. Hug, Lücke, and Davidson, Introduction, p. 463. [12] The words of S. Irenæus will be quoted below: see pp. 98, 99. Compare also the testimony of Tertullian, Præscr. c. 33, "Eos maximè Johannes in Epistolâ Antichristos vocat, qui Christum negarent in carne venisse, et qui non putarent Jesus esse Filium Dei." He identifies the latter heresy with the teaching of Ebion. See also S. Jerome, Prolog. in Matt., "Joannes, quùm esset in Asiâ et jam tunc hereticorum semina pullularent, Cerinthi, Ebionis, et cæterorum, quos et ipse in Epistolâ suâ Antichristos vocat."
[13] Euseb. v. 5, and v. 20.

and S. Polycarp had conversed with St. John and other Apostles[1]. The testimony therefore of S. Irenæus concerning the design of St. John's Epistles is of great weight.

Certain Heresies affecting the doctrine of Christ's two Natures and one Person had sprung up in Apostolic times. The Jews, who looked for a temporal kingdom of Christ, could not reconcile their minds to the doctrine, taught in the Gospel, of a suffering Messiah. They were ashamed of the cross of Christ: they shrank from the scoffs of the Heathen taunting the Christians with worshipping a man, who died the death of a slave.

Those Jews also, who did not rightly understand the doctrine of the Divine Unity, were not prepared to accept that other cardinal article of the true Faith, that Jesus Christ is God.

Accordingly, when the Gospel was presented to the minds of those among them who could not gainsay the proofs of its truth as a Revelation from God, they endeavoured to accommodate it to their own preconceived opinions. Such persons were no longer willing to be called Jews; they assumed the name of Christians. But they were not sound Christians; and some among them are condemned by St. John.

The difficulties just specified beset the Jewish mind when it contemplated the Gospel, as preached by the Apostles.

There was also another embarrassment which perplexed many inquirers, Πόθεν τὸ κακόν; Whence is evil? How came it into the world?

This question had produced the Magian Philosophy, with its two independent and antagonistic Powers; and it engendered also the Gnostic Theories of emanations, or æons; according to which, the Demiurge or Creator was a different Person and Agent from the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and the Law and the Prophets were severed from the Gospel.

The Heresies produced by these causes, and which sprung up especially among the Jewish Christians, in the age of St. John, concerning the Person and Nature of Christ, and against which the Apostle wrote, were mainly four[2]—

1. The heresy of those who affirmed that Jesus was a mere man; this was the heresy of Ebion.

2. The heresy of those who said that Jesus was a different being from Christ; and that Christ was an æon or emanation, who was sent into the world to reveal the knowledge of the true God, and to free the souls of men from the power of the Demiurge or Creator of matter; and descended into the man Jesus at His baptism, and departed from Him before His crucifixion. This was the heresy of Cerinthus.

3. The heresy of those who asserted that Christ had no real human body, but that he suffered merely in appearance. This was the heresy of the Docetæ[3], and of their leader Simon Magus.

4. The heresy of those who said that the world was not created by Him, or by the Father, but by some rival powers; and who affirmed that there was no necessity for abstaining from idolatry, or for incurring any danger in behalf of the Faith. These were the Nicolaitans and others.

They who taught these doctrines are called deceivers and antichrists by St. John in his two Epistles[4], as is observed by S. Irenæus[5], who speaks at large concerning these errors in his great work against Heresy[6].

A summary of the remarks of S. Irenæus on this important subject may be presented to the English reader in the words of Bp. Bull;—

"All the Gnostics, of whatever denomination, did in reality deny the true Nativity, Passion, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, although not all in the same way. This is a learned observation of Irenæus, who was a most careful investigator of the doctrine of the Gnostics, in the third book of his Treatise, where, after showing how the Apostle John, in the very beginning of his Gospel, glances at the Cerinthians and Nicolaitans, he proceeds presently to those words of the Apostle [1], and demonstrates that neither the Cerinthians, nor any other sect of the Gnostics, did sincerely acknowledge the Incarnation, the Passion, or the Resurrection of Jesus Christ.

"These are the words of Irenæus. According to those heretics, neither was the Word made Flesh, nor Christ, nor the Saviour. For they maintain, that the Word and Christ did not even come into this world, and that the Saviour was neither Incarnate, nor suffered, but that He descended like a dove upon Jesus, and having declared the unknown Father, ascended again into the pleroma. But He who was incarnate and suffered, some of them affirm, was that Jesus who is of the Gospel dispensation, who, they say, passed through the Virgin Mary, as water through a tube; others assert, that He, who suffered, was the Son of the Demiurge, or Creator, upon whom that Jesus descended, who is of the Gospel dispensation; others again say, that Jesus was indeed born of Joseph and Mary, and that upon him Christ descended, who is from above, being without flesh, and incapable of suffering.

"According, however, to no view entertained by these Heretics, was the Word of God made Flesh. For if one carefully search into the theories of them all, he will find, that there is introduced a Word of God, and a Christ that is on high, without flesh, and incapable of suffering. For some of them think that He was manifested, as transfigured into the form of man, but say that He was neither born, nor incarnate; whereas others suppose that He did not even assume the form of man, but descended as a dove upon that Jesus who was born of Mary. The Lord's disciple, St. John, therefore, showing that they are all false witnesses, says, 'And the WORD was made FLESH, and DWELT AMONG US [2].'"

The reader may be also glad to be reminded here of the remarks made by another learned English Theologian, Dr. Waterland, who has illustrated this subject with his usual erudition, and with special application to the Epistles of St. John.

Those remarks, together with the observations of the two English Prelates quoted in this Introduction, may serve as preparatory to a profitable study of this Epistle.

"If we examine this Epistle, we shall perceive"—says Dr. Waterland—"that a great part of it was levelled, not so much against Jews, or Pagans, as against false Christians; against the heretics of that time, Simonians perhaps, or Cerinthians, or Ebionites, or Nicolaitans, or all of them.

"The two principal errors which St. John there censures, were, the denial of Christ's being come in the flesh [3], and the disowning that Jesus was Christ [4]. The Docetæ, as they were afterwards called, the followers of Simon Magus, denied Christ's real humanity, making Him a mere phantom, shadow, or apparition. And the Cerinthians, making a distinction between Jesus and Christ, did not allow that both were one Person. Against those chiefly St. John wrote his Epistle. He speaks of Antichrists newly risen up [5], which could not be intended of Jews or Pagans, who had opposed the Gospel all along; and he speaks of men that had been of the Church, but had apostatized from it; 'they went out from us, but they were not of us [6].'

"Let us now proceed to the explication of those passages in St. John's Epistle which relate to our purpose.

"The Apostle observes, that the Word of Life (or the Word in whom was Life [7]) was from the beginning [8]; conformable to what he says in the entrance to his Gospel, and in opposition both to Cerinthus and Ebion, who made Jesus a mere man, and who either denied any pre-existing sub-

Secundùm autem nullam sententiam hæreticorum, Verbum Dei caro factum est. Si enim quis regulas ipsorum omnium perscrutetur, inveniet quoniam sine carne et impassibile ab omnibus illis inducitur Dei Verbum, et qui est in superioribus Christus. stantial Logos, or at most supposed him to stand foremost in the rank of creatures. The Apostle further styles the same Logos, Eternal Life [1], to intimate his eternal existence, in opposition to the same heretics. He adds, which was with the Father, parallel to what he says in his Gospel, was with God [2].

"In the second chapter of the Epistle, the Apostle describes the antichristian heretics of that time as denying that Jesus is Christ, which amounted to the same with denying the Father and the Son [3]; because whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father [4]. Cerinthus denied that Jesus was Christ, dividing Christ from Jesus; and he, of consequence, denied the Son, because he allowed not that Jesus was personally united with the Word, the eternal Son of God; nor that the Logos which he speaks of, was the only-begotten of the Father, being Son only of the only-begotten, according to his scheme; so that he totally disowned the divine Sonship, both of Jesus and Christ, and by such denial denied both the Father and Son [5].

"The Apostle goes on to say, Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God. Where again he manifestly strikes at the Cerinthian and Ebionite principles, which allowed not Jesus to be the Son of God, in any true and proper sense, such as St. John lays down in several places of his writings, but particularly in the entrance to his Gospel [6].

"In the chapter next following, the Apostle repeats the same thing as before, or uses words to the same effect; Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God [7]; and soon after adds, Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God [8]? Here lay the main stress,—to believe that Jesus, who was truly and really Man, was as truly and really the eternal Son of God [9]. The Apostle in the next verse seems to point at the Docetæ, as he had before done in the same Epistle [10], being equally concerned to maintain that Christ had real flesh, as that He had real Divinity; that so the faith of the Gospel might stand upon this firm foundation, that the Eternal Son of God became Son of Man for the salvation of mankind. Hereupon therefore the Apostle, in defence of Christ's real humanity, says, This is He that came by water and blood [11]. What he elsewhere expresses by His coming in the flesh [12], here he expresses more emphatically, by His coming in, or by, water and blood; alluding to what Christ shed at His passion, as a proof that He had then a real body, and was really man, not a spectre, phantom, or apparition, as some heretics pretended. It is to be noted, that the ancient visionaries (who were the Simonians, Menandrians, Saturnilians, and Basilidians), being ashamed perhaps to confess Christ crucified [13], contrived any wild supposition imaginable to evade it. Basilides pretended that Christ Himself did not suffer, but that Simon of Cyrene was crucified in His room [14]. The elder Docetæ said that Christ had no real body, and suffered in appearance only.

"But the Apostle here emphatically observes that Christ came by water and blood: this shedding of both water and blood out of his side, at his Passion, was a demonstration, that there was a real body then hanging upon the cross, not a phantom, or a spiritual substance. Which very argument is well urged by Irenæus [15] and Novatian [16], in proof of the same thing, against the Docetæ. As St. John is the only Evangelist who has related that circumstance of the Passion [17], so it is observable how particular a stress he lays upon it, immediately subjoining, in confirmation of it, and he that saw it bare record, and his record is true. And he confirms it further from two prophecies out of the Old Testament.

"St. John strengthens the argument further by superadding the consideration of the testimony of the Spirit. And there is the Spirit also bearing witness, because the Spirit is truth[1], is essential truth. The Spirit residing in the Church, and working in believers by supernatural graces, bears testimony to the doctrine taught by the Apostles, and believed by the Church; particularly to the doctrine here spoken of, viz., that Christ the Son of God became Son of Man for the salvation of mankind.

"The Apostle, in the close of this Epistle, sums up all in these strong words: we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life[2].

"The title of true God, in this text, is to be understood of Christ, as I have shown elsewhere. I would observe further, how aptly every word is chosen to obviate the erroneous tenets of Cerinthus, and of other the like false teachers of those times. The Son of God, not the Son of Joseph and Mary, nor the Son of the only-begotten, but the immediate Son of God, related to God as a son to a father, not as a creature to his Lord and Maker. He is come, come in the flesh, and not merely to reside for a time, or occasionally, and to fly off again, but to abide and dwell with man, clothed with humanity. We are in Him that is true, in the true Father, by His Son Jesus Christ, who is the true God; not an inferior power or angel (such as Cerinthus supposed the Demiurgus, or Creator to be), not a created Æon, the offspring of the Monogenes, or of Silence, as Cerinthus fondly imagined the Logos to be; but true God, one with the Father. And He is eternal life, the same that had been with the Father, from the beginning, before any thing was created, consequently from all eternity.

"I have now gone," says Dr. Waterland, "through the Epistle of St. John. The sum of what I have advanced is, that St. John most apparently levelled a great part of his First Epistle against the Cerinthian doctrines.

"It appears further, that in his Epistle particularly, he has asserted the necessity of believing our Lord's divine Sonship, His proper Divinity, under pain of being excluded from heaven and happiness. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father. Whosoever denies Christ to be Son of God, in St. John's sense of Son, a Son that was always with God, and is God[3], is a liar and antichrist, denying both the Father and the Son. The conclusion therefore is, that the denying our blessed Lord's real Divinity, is heresy and antichristianism, much to be abhorred by every disciple of Christ, according to the infallible decision of an inspired Apostle[4]. Many were the evasions and subterfuges of self-opinionated men, who thought it a thing incredible that the Divine Word should put on flesh, or become man; and who chose rather to pass censure upon the wisdom of Heaven, than suspect their own. But sober and modest men resigned up their faith to divine Revelation; and among the foremost of those was our blessed Apostle. So now, taking in what the Scriptures have declared of the truth of the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity; besides the true and natural import of the form of Baptism, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; we have the determination of St. John himself for the importance of the doctrine of our Lord's Divinity; and of consequence, for the doctrine of a co-equal and co-eternal Trinity[5]."

The student of Holy Writ will readily acknowledge the importance of these statements as elucidating the design and language of St. John in his Epistles; and they are confirmed by the fact, that one of St. John's disciples, S. Ignatius, speaks in similar language of censure and caution against the same heresies.

Here again we may refer to the words of Bp. Bull[6]. "The words in which S. Ignatius exhorts the Magnesians[7] 'to run together unto one Jesus Christ, who came forth from the Father, and who is and hath returned unto one,' are plainly aimed against the Gnostics, especially the Cerinthians; for the Cerinthians did not believe in one Jesus Christ, but taught that Jesus was one, and Christ another, who came down from the supreme power upon Jesus after His baptism, and returned again from Jesus before His Passion, back to His own pleroma. Nor did they acknowledge one Father of Jesus Christ; but professed that the Father was the Father of Christ. Next, when Ignatius afterwards says[1], 'that the Prophets of the Old Testament were inspired by the grace of Christ, to convince the unbelievers that there is one God, who hath manifested Himself through Jesus Christ His Son,' in these words again the Gnostics are evidently glanced at. For they all taught, that the Father of Jesus was the Demiurgus or Creator of the world, and God who created the world was one, the God who manifested himself to mankind through Christ his Son, another."

These assertions may also be confirmed by the testimony of another English Prelate, Bishop Pearson, who has observed, that the heresies of Ebion and the Docetæ were specially censured and condemned by St. John, and his scholar, S. Ignatius, in his Epistles; the former heresy involving a denial of the divinity of Christ, and the latter impugning His humanity[2].

Another of St. John's disciples, S. Polycarp, joins with his brother Bishop and brother Martyr, S. Ignatius, in condemning these erroneous and strange doctrines.

"Every one," says he, "who does not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is an antichrist; and whosoever does not confess the sufferings of the cross, is of the devil; and whosoever tampers with the oracles of the Lord, and accommodates them to his own lust, and says that there is neither Resurrection nor Judgment to come, is the firstborn of Satan[3]."

Such were the doctrines taught by the disciples of St. John.

Almighty God permitted Heresies to arise even in the Apostolic Age, and under His controlling power and superintending providence, Heresies have been made subservient to the clearer manifestation, and stronger confirmation, of the Faith.

Hence, therefore, it is evident that the Heresies which impugn the doctrine of Christ's Godhead and Manhood, are not of modern origin. They who would despoil Christ's Person of its historic reality, and would reduce it to a visionary phantom, and would dissolve the solid verities of the Gospel into legendary fables, are not propounding novelties. Their "new light is an old darkness." They are only borrowing the Heresies of ancient days. They are dressing them up in new attire, and displaying them in a new fashion to the world. These theories, when stripped of their disguise, are nothing more than reproductions of the exploded dogmas of Ebion, Cerinthus, and the Docetæ, which were propagated in primitive times.

By the mercy of God, the life of the Apostle and Evangelist St. John, the beloved disciple of Christ, was extended to the beginning of the second century after Christ. By God's good Providence he was still living, and governing the Asiatic Church, when those heresies sprung up, like tares sown by the Enemy, in the field of Christ. By the inspiration of the Holy Ghost he wrote his Gospel, in which the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ is asserted in clear language[4], and in which the evidences of His Humanity in life and death, particularly in the shedding forth of the Blood and Water from His side when pierced on the cross, are displayed to the world[5].

By the same holy guidance, St. John was moved to write Epistles, in which he has delivered an Apostolic verdict on those who deny or undermine those verities of the Gospel.

He who was the beloved disciple, and who was taught by the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Love, has dwelt more at large than any other writer of the New Testament on the duty and blessedness of Christian Love.

Yet he, the divinely-inspired Apostle of Love, the aged Evangelist, has pronounced the sternest sentence of reprobation upon those who impugn the doctrine of Christ's Godhead, and of Christ's Humanity. He has spoken of them in the strongest terms of censure, and has condemned them as deceivers, as false prophets, as antichrists. He forbids his disciples to receive them into their houses, or to bid them God speed[1]. And why? Because he well knew, and has taught in his Epistle[2], that the doctrine of Christ's Godhead and Manhood displays the Love of God to Man in its true light; and because that doctrine is the genuine source and well-spring of Love to God and of Love to Man in God; and because wheresoever that doctrine is denied, the life of Love vanishes away.

Such considerations as these may serve to place in a clear light the enormity of the guilt of heretical teaching on these doctrines.

They may also be of use in guarding the faithful against those erroneous and strange notions, in whatever form they may present themselves; and in establishing their minds in a firm belief of the truth.

With the Epistles of St. John in our hands, we are enabled by God's grace to stand proof against all assaults, however violent, of the enemies of the Truth. We are empowered to overcome all who impugn the doctrine on which the Church of Christ is built[3], and on which our hopes of salvation rest; the doctrine of the unity of the two Natures, the Divine and the Human, in the one Person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and Son of Man[4]. In controversies concerning the Godhead and Manhood of Christ our appeal is not to the words of human wisdom, but to the words of the Holy Spirit of God, speaking by the mouth of St. John.

The date of the Epistle may probably be assigned to the close of the first century[5]. The question concerning the persons to whom it was in the first instance addressed, will be considered in the Introduction to the Second Epistle.

[4] It is well said by Bp. Bull, referring to this characteristic use of this Epistle, "The doctrinal criteria of this Epistle (1 John ii. 18, 19; iii. 23; iv. 1, 2; v. 10—13. 20) enabled the Faithful to discern those heretical Teachers who diffused false and impious doctrines in the Apostolic age concerning the person of our Saviour."

The sum of these criteria is this: "Every Teacher who confesses one Christ Jesus, verily Son of God, verily made Man, for the salvation of men, is of God; in so far, that is, as he makes this confession. But, on the other hand, every one is to be held to be a false prophet, and an Antichrist, who does not confess this."

"The Apostle insists mainly on these marks, which characterize as heretics those who deny the Saviour to be very man, or to be very God, as Tertullian has observed (de Præscr. c. 33). It is therefore abundantly clear from the Apostolic writings, as well as from other early testimony, that there existed some persons, in the age of the Apostles, who denied the Divinity of Christ, and who on that account were regarded by the Apostles as Heretics and Antichrists; so far were they who held such doctrines from being considered as brethren, and true members of the Church. Hence also it is clearly evident, that the doctrine concerning the Incarnation of the Son of God, and concerning Christ, Very God and Very Man, was maintained by true Pastors of the Church from the beginning as the very root and groundwork of Christianity." Bp. Bull, Jud. Eccl. Cath. ii. 10.

I. [1] [a]Ὃ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ὃ ἀκηκόαμεν, ὃ ἑωράκαμεν τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς ἡμῶν, ὃ ἐθεασάμεθα, καὶ αἱ χεῖρες ἡμῶν ἐψηλάφησαν, περὶ τοῦ Λόγου τῆς ζωῆς,—[2] [b]καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἐφανερώθη, καὶ ἑωράκαμεν, καὶ μαρτυροῦμεν, καὶ ἀπαγγέλλομεν ὑμῖν τὴν

Ch. I. 1.] St. John begins this Epistle without any mention of himself, or of those to whom it is addressed. He appears to be unconscious of his own individuality, and that of his readers, and to be absorbed in the contemplation of the Divine Glory and infinite love and condescension of Christ. His heart is hot within him, and he speaks with his tongue.

So it had been in his Gospel. There also he is full of the subject; and gives utterance to the great truths which struggled within him for vent, and exclaims, "In the beginning was the Word."

In like manner, the Apostle St. Paul, in writing on the same subject to the Hebrews, does not begin the Epistle with any mention of himself or of them; but withdraws himself and them from the eye of the reader, and displays Christ.

In the language of the commencement of this Epistle, and in that of the Gospel, St. John appears to revert to the opening words of the Old Testament. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1). There was the beginning of the visible world. St. John had described in his Gospel the spiritual Genesis. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. All things were made by Him." (John i. 1—3.) And now in his Epistle he begins with Him Who had no beginning, but is and has been from Eternity.

S. Clement of Alexandria (Adumbrat. p. 1009) observes, that "this Epistle begins with a spiritual proem, following that of the Gospel of St. John, and in unison with it." He therefore supposed the Epistle to have been written after the Gospel. See above, p. 97, note.

The harmony subsisting between the beginning of St. John's Gospel and that of his Epistle, in declaring the doctrines of the Pre-existence, Divinity, and Creative Power of the Everlasting Word, and of His Incarnation—in opposition to the Heretics of Apostolic times, who denied those doctrines—was observed also, in ancient times, by Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, in Eusebius, vii. 25.

— ὃ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς] what was from the beginning (cp. 2 Thess. ii. 13). A statement directed against the false doctrines of those who said, as the Ebionites did, that Jesus was a mere man; or, as the Cerinthians, that He was merely inhabited by Christ as a spiritual emanation for a time.

The clue to the right understanding of this proœmium, and of the other doctrinal portions of St. John's Epistles, is to be found in a reference to the errors of those false Teachers to whom St. John alludes as antichrists (ii. 18), who endeavoured to seduce his disciples (ii. 26; cp. iii. 7), and denied that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (iv. 1 – 3), and that Jesus is the Christ, and who denied the Father and the Son (ii. 22). See Tertullian, c. Marcion.; Præscr. c. 15, and c. 33. S. Jerome, Prolog. in Matt. S. Athanas. c. Arian. Orat. iii. vol. i. p. 539; and compare the remarks of Bp. Bull, Jud. Eccl. Cath. cap. ii. vol. vi. pp. 33—47, ed. Oxon. 1827, and above, Introduction to this Epistle, pp. 98—102, and the preliminary note to 2 Pet. ii. 1, p. 86, and Dr. Waterland on the Trinity, ch. vi. vol. v. ed. 1823, where this subject is well treated with reference to this proœmium and other portions of this Epistle, as directed against Ebion, Cerinthus, and the Docetæ; and cp. Dr. Burton, Bampton Lectures, Lect. vi. p. 168.

— ὃ ἀκηκόαμεν] what we have heard, what we have seen with our own eyes. Having declared the eternal pre-existence of Christ, St. John next proceeds here, as in his Gospel, to assert the reality of His Humanity. See John i. 1—14.

— ὃ ἐθεασάμεθα] what we looked at; spectavimus, as a θέαμα or spectaculum; attracting and riveting our attention. See John i. 14; iv. 35: the word θεᾶσθαι is applied to the action of the Apostles gazing at our Lord ascending into heaven, Acts i. 11.

— καὶ αἱ χεῖρες ἡμῶν ἐψηλάφησαν] and our hands did handle, or feel. Observe the aorist. He refers to his own act and that of the Apostles after the Resurrection, in obedience to Christ's words, "Handle Me, Feel Me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have." (Luke xxiv. 39.) Here therefore is an addition to the statement concerning the humanity of the Everlasting Word. He had a true body, and the same body before and after His Resurrection; and we felt that Body.

Here then is a reply to the false teaching of the followers of Simon Magus and the Docetæ, who said, that our Lord's human body was a visionary phantom. This notion is confuted by St. John's scholar, S. Ignatius (ad Smyrn. c. 1 and c. 2), who says that οἱ ἄπιστοι λέγουσιν αὐτὸν (i. e. Christ) τὸ δοκεῖν πεπονθέναι, αὐτοὶ τὸ δοκεῖν ὄντες, where see Bp. Pearson's note, p. 433. Jacobson, and ibid. c. 3, where S. Ignatius relates that our Lord said to St. Peter and others after His Resurrection, "λάβετε, ψηλαφήσατέ με, καὶ ἴδετε, ὅτι οὐκ εἰμὶ δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον," καὶ εὐθὺς αὐτοῦ ἥψαντο, καὶ ἐπίστευσαν, κραθέντες τῇ σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ τῷ πνεύματι, c. 4 and c. 5, and ad Trall. c. 10, and c. 11; and cp. S. Polycarp, ad Philipp. c. 7, and S. Irenæus, i. 20.

On the word ψηλαφᾶν, see Gen. xxvii. 12. 21, 22, and Dean Trench, Synon. xvii., and Luke xxiv. 39, and on Heb. xii. 18.

— περὶ τοῦ Λόγου τῆς ζωῆς] concerning the Logos, or Word, of Life; that is, concerning the Word, whose essential quality is Life. For in Him is the Life, He "is the Way, the Truth, and the Life" (John i. 4; xiv. 6). He is "the Resurrection and the Life" (John xi. 25).

This appears to be a prophetic protest against those false Teachers, who separated the Life (ζωὴ) from the Logos, and made them to be like two emanations or Æons, distinct from, and subordinate to, the only-begotten Son of God; as was done by some Gnostic Teachers. See Irenæus, i. 1, and cp. Waterland, vol. v. p. 183.

The preposition περὶ, concerning, defines the subject of the whole sentence, and has a connexion with ἀπαγγέλλομεν in v. 3. On this use of περὶ, cp. ii. 26; v. 9, 10. 1 Thess. i. 9.

2. καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἐφανερώθη] and the Life was manifested. St. John uses καὶ to introduce a parenthesis here, as in the beginning of his Gospel (i. 14). The word ἐφανερώθη had been employed by St. Paul in the same sense as here, with reference to the Incarnation; see on 1 Tim. iii. 16. St. John saw the φανέρωσις, or Epiphany of the Life, when he beheld Christ raising Lazarus and others from the Dead, and when he saw Christ risen from the Grave, by His own power, according to His own Word, John ii. 19; and he heard Him say, "I am the Resurrection and the Life" (John xi. 25); "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life" (xiv. 6); "I am He that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore" (Rev. i. 18).

ζωὴν τὴν αἰώνιον, ἥτις ἦν πρὸς τὸν Πατέρα, καὶ ἐφανερώθη ἡμῖν,—[3] [c] ὃ ἑωράκαμεν καὶ ἀκηκόαμεν, ἀπαγγέλλομεν ὑμῖν, ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς κοινωνίαν ἔχητε μεθ' ἡμῶν· καὶ ἡ κοινωνία δὲ ἡ ἡμετέρα μετὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς, καὶ μετὰ τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ· [4] [d] καὶ ταῦτα γράφομεν ὑμῖν, ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ ὑμῶν ᾖ πεπληρωμένη.

[5] [e] Καί ἐστιν αὕτη ἡ ἀγγελία, ἣν ἀκηκόαμεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀναγγέλλομεν ὑμῖν, ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς φῶς ἐστι, καὶ σκοτία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδεμία. [6] Ἐὰν εἴπωμεν ὅτι κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐν τῷ σκότει περιπατῶμεν, ψευδόμεθα, καὶ οὐ ποιοῦμεν τὴν ἀλήθειαν· [7] [f] ἐὰν δὲ ἐν τῷ φωτὶ περιπατῶμεν, ὡς αὐτός ἐστιν ἐν τῷ φωτὶ, κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' ἀλλήλων, καὶ τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ καθαρίζει ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ πάσης ἁμαρτίας.

— τὴν ζωὴν τὴν αἰώνιον] the Life eternal: said in opposition to those Heretics who denied the eternal pre-existence of Christ. Dr. Waterland, v. p. 188.

— πρὸς τὸν Πατέρα] with the Father. There is no exact equivalent in English to πρὸς here; its meaning is best explained by St. John's own words, ὁ Λόγος ἦν πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν, i. e. united to God and ever abiding in and with Him. John i. 1, where see note.

This statement is made in opposition to those false Teachers, who separated Jesus from Christ, as Cerinthus did, and said that the Logos was the Son of the Only-begotten, but was not the Only-begotten of the Father; and that the Logos was a separate Æon, estranged from God. Cp. Greg. Nazian. Orat. xliv. Dr. Waterland, v. pp. 181. 188, and Tillemont, ii. p. 17.

3. ὃ ἑωράκαμεν] what we have seen—a word here repeated thrice, for greater assurance of the truth of the reality of Christ's Humanity, in opposition to the Docetæ; and of His distinct Personality. See Tertullian, c. Praxeam, c. 15.

— καὶ ἡ κοινωνία] and our communion is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ: a declaration of the truth against those who divided Jesus from Christ, and who denied His Divine Sonship, and rejected the doctrine of the Incarnation of the Son of God, by virtue of which He dwelt in us (John i. 14), and we have communion with Him and with the Father. Not one of these false Teachers acknowledged that the Word was made Flesh. S. Irenæus, iii. c. 11. See Introduction, p. 99.

The δὲ, but, in this clause, is not to be unnoticed. The καὶ, and, adds something, and the δὲ is slightly adversative. Cp. 2 Pet. i. 5. The sentence may be thus paraphrased, And, remember, our communion is not like an ordinary human association, and much less like an heretical association, but our communion is even with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ. So glorious is it!

4. καὶ ταῦτα γράφομεν] and we write these things to you, in order that your joy may be filled up to the full. The πλήρωμα χάριτος, or fulness of grace (John i. 16), flowing from the Everlasting Word, in Whom dwelleth the fulness of the Godhead (Col. i. 19), brings with it a πλήρωμα χαρᾶς, a fulness of joy, very different from that fictitious πλήρωμα, plenitude, or fulness, imagined by the Gnostics, and peopled by them with visionary Æons, into which, according to them, the spiritual men, such as they deemed themselves, would be received hereafter. See Irenæus, i. 6; iii. 11, and above, note on John i. 16. Col. ii. 9.

Observe the perfect tense, ᾖ πεπληρωμένη, indicating that the joy will be filled up, and will continue so to be. See note below, iii. 9.

5. ἡ ἀγγελία] the message. So A, B, G, K, and Griesb., Scholz, Lach., Tisch. Elz. has ἡ ἐπαγγελία.

— ὁ Θεὸς φῶς ἐστιν] God is Light, and in Him is no darkness at all: a sentence opposed to the error of most of the Gnostics, who asserted the existence of two hostile Deities, one a God of Light, the other of Darkness. S. Irenæus, i. 25. 28, Grabe. Theodoret, Hæret. fab. procem. S. Epiphan. Hær. xxvi. Cp. Ittig, Hæres. p. 34, and note above, John i. 5, and Bp. Andrewes, iii. pp. 371—376. Almost all the Gnostics adopted the theory of Dualism, derived from the Magians, and afterwards developed by the Marcionites and Manichæans.
